

BLUESKIN:

A Romance of the Past Century.

BY THE AUTHOR OF

"BLACK BESS; OR, THE KNIGHT OF THE ROAD,"

ETC., ETC.

WITH ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTY-SEVEN ORIGINAL ILLUSTRATIONS.

LONDON:

E. HARRISON, SALISBURY SQUARE, FLEET STREET.

823

✓ 71 blue

v. 1

P R E F A C E.

THE prefixion of a preface to a work which has been so long before the public as the present would be a work of supererogation did not the Author feel that he could not allow so favourable an opportunity of thanking his patrons to escape him.

On his own and the Publisher's behalf, then, the Author begs to express his warmest thanks for the very unusual amount of support which this Romance has received for so long a period.

gen. no. 247 30 June 58 134 mm. cl. = 20

BLUESKIN:

A Romance.

BY THE AUTHOR OF

"BLACK BESS; OR THE KNIGHT OF THE ROAD."

[JACK SHEPPARD KNOCKS DOWN THE WATCHMAN IN WYCH STREET.]

CHAPTER I.

JACK SHEPPARD IMPRECATES HIS MASTER.—THE FALSE CHARGE.—THE ARREST.

"CURSE you all! Curse you all, I say! My bitterest curses on you! I have borne so far all that you, in the spite and malice of your disposition, could heap upon me without a word, though my heart was full of bitterness all the time! But I will not bear it any longer! It is the last drop that makes the eup run over, and you have added that drop to-night! Curse you for doing so! Curse you for doing so! Curse you for all the indignities that you have heaped upon me at every opportunity!"

It was with a hoarse voice—clenched hands—and fierce gestures that these words were uttered.

As he finished the speaker stepped out from the shadow of the houses where he had been standing into the centre of the roadway, and shook his fists menacingly at one of the dwellings opposite.

The church of St. Clement Danes, in the Strand, chimed

Nos. 1 and 2.

GRATIS with these Numbers, in Illuminated Wrapper, The COLOURED PICTURE of EDGORTH BESS BEING RESCUED FROM THE MOHAWKS BY COLONEL THORNE.

the hour of three-quarters past eleven. The pleasant, musical sounds arose distinctly on the night air, for at that hour, a hundred and fifty years ago, London was comparatively silent.

All the shops in Wych-street—for it was there the person stood who had given utterance to such terrible words—had been long since closed, and the thoroughfare was dark and deserted.

There was, however, just light enough to reveal a shadowy figure, and the house at which he levelled his imprecations.

It was a common-looking old-fashioned structure, entirely built of wood.

The casements were small, and each story of the house overhung the other.

A signboard reached over the shop-door and window.

It was black, and had some hungry-looking white letters painted upon it.

They stood out boldly from the background, and read as follows:—

“JOHN ROOTS, CARPENTER AND JOINER.”

From one or two of the other houses in the street a faint beam of light issued from some of the upper windows, but the house we have specified, as well as those on either side of it, was in profound darkness. There was not the dimmest ray to show that they were inhabited.

But, hark! The strange figure in the roadway, as he looks up at the dark and silent habitation, speaks again.

His voice has a solemn and sepulchral tone as he utters that which may be construed into a warning.

“Beware! John Roots, beware! for the day of reckoning will surely come! It is I—Jack Sheppard—your ill-treated apprentice, who speaks—who curses you from the bottom of his heart, yet bids you beware! You have driven me from your house into the streets, penniless—a beggar! Beware of the result! My disposition is, as you say, an evil one! Granted that it is! But you, as my spiritual as well as worldly master, should have tried to make me better! How have you done so? Ha! ha! How have you done so? You have reviled me—degraded me—treated me like a dog! Was that the way to improve what you are pleased to call an evil disposition? No, John Roots, you know it is not—but the way to make bad worse! You have succeeded, and will succeed, no doubt; but, if you do, then I say again, Beware! beware! for, sooner or later, the hour will arrive when you will have to answer for your treatment of me! And then, when that time comes, tremble and beware! You have made me an outcast, have driven me into the path of crime, and the consequences of your actions be upon your own head!”

He paused, breathless and exhausted from the violence of his emotions.

He had drawn himself to his full height, and looked around him defiantly, and if any one had been near enough to observe his countenance, they would have seen upon it an expression of deep determination.

Jack Sheppard was at this period just over twenty years of age.

He was short, and very slightly made; indeed, he is best described by the word diminutive.

But, thin and fragile as he at first sight looked, a second glance would show he was of that wiry sort which is endowed with great bodily strength and uncommon powers of endurance.

His head was small and bullet-shaped.

His features were delicate and regular, but marred by the sharp cunning look which they invariably bore.

It would seem by his manner that he anticipated what he had said would call forth some notice from the house of Mr. Roots, but it did not; all remained just as it was before.

He ground his teeth with disappointment.

No doubt he would have felt it to be a solace if he could have returned his master some of the abuse, which, according to his account he had heaped upon him.

But though there was no one to listen to him, he spoke; the angry passions that were tumulting in his breast would not suffer him to continue silent.

“Ha! ha! you sleep now—sleep soundly! What care you for the poor boy who was delivered into your keeping? Nothing! He may beg, starve, steal, anything! You care not. But you shall care! Yes, as surely as there is a Heaven above me, I will make you care! I swear it! and I will keep my oath!”

A sudden and piercing gust of wind swept down the street at this moment, and Jack was fain to draw his scanty clothing still closer around his person.

Then the many churches in the old sleeping city pealed forth the hour of midnight.

One after another did the clocks commence striking, and it was full five minutes before the last chime died away.

“So late!” ejaculated Jack. “I will begone. It is folly to stay here and imprecate a senseless building! Would that I could see you once again, John Roots, for, if you held open to me your door in peace, I feel that I could forget the past, and enter. Enter and be saved!”

These last words were uttered in a sad, half-repentant tone, and there is no question that if a hand had been held out to him, he would have suffered himself to be led in the right direction.

But it was not so to be.

Scarcely had the words left his lips, than one of the windows of the house in which John Roots dwelt was thrown violently open.

It swung back against the wall with a loud crash.

A face was projected from it.

It looked strangely forbidding in that darksome street.

“John Roots!” exclaimed Jack, involuntarily, as he recognised the countenance of his master.

A harsh, disagreeable, grating voice now spoke.

“Oh! it’s you, you young scoundrel, is it? What do you mean, you gallows whelp? I’ll have you put in jail, I will! Didn’t I tell you never to come near my house again, you thief? What do you mean by coming and standing in the street at twelve o’clock at night, and cursing me in that style? Take that!”

John Roots threw some heavy object from the window at his apprentice.

Jack saw it coming, and he ducked his head.

It passed him by a hair’s breadth.

In his rage, and seeing nothing else at hand, Jack’s master had seized the looking-glass that was on his table, and hurled it at Sheppard’s head.

It came down with a terrific smash on to the stones, and broke into a thousand pieces.

They flew about in every direction.

The angry passions which had a home in Jack’s heart, flamed up like a torch.

He drew himself once more up to his full height.

The foam of passion was on his lips.

“John Roots!” he said, in wild, screaming tones, “listen to me! You have called me a thief! Heaven knows I am not one yet, but I know not how soon I may be! Once more I curse you! Curse you from the bottom of my heart! You shall yet live to repent your treatment of me, for I will have my revenge upon you!”

“Ha—ha!”

“You may laugh, John Roots, you may laugh, and affect to despise what I say! The day will come when you will wish you had rather thrust your hand into a furnace than treated me as you have! My father died at Tyburn, I know full well! But I was a child then, unable even to speak! How, then, could I help what he did? Could I control his actions? Why should the stigma of his guilt be fixed upon my character? It has done so, John Roots! It has done so! No one knows that better than yourself! When, I wonder, did you let slip an opportunity of taunting me with it? Even when we were in the presence of those whose good wishes and sympathies I was anxious to obtain? Never, John Roots, never! It is that which has always preyed upon my mind, and could I help it doing so? It is that which has soured my temper, filled my breast with angry passions, and made me sullen and morose! It is your fault, and I curse you for it? curse you a thousand times! Well, full well, you know that I am innocent of the theft which you, in the malevolence of your heart, accused me of! I would have scorned to have taken anything of yours! I am not guilty, John Roots, but, through your representations, many believe I am! For all this, as well as for your conduct on this night, will I take a terrible and bitter vengeance!”

“Begone, villain,” shouted Mr. Roots, as soon as he had a chance of making himself heard; for the rapidity with which Jack Sheppard had poured forth this torrent of passionate invective had precluded all ideas of interruption. "Begone, villain! begone, I say. Come no more near my house. Begone at once! I will not be cursed and abused thus in the open street by such as you. I tell you you are a thief! The gallows is imprinted on your face, and to it you will surely come at last!"

Jack tried to utter the passionate words that sprang to his lips, but he could only give utterance to an inarticulate howl of rage.

"Here, here: stop that, if you please! stop that! People can't be woke up out of their blessed sleep by the likes of you. Stop it, or it will be the worse for you!"

As these words were spoken in a wheezing, gasping sort of voice, Jack felt himself clutched tightly round the throat by some one behind him, who had stolen unawares upon the scene.

CHAPTER II.

GIVES THE READER SOME IDEA OF THE MANNER IN WHICH JONATHAN WILD CARRIED ON BUSINESS.

NEXT door to Newgate!

That was where Jonathan Wild lived.

Jonathan Wild, the great!

That extraordinary man, who combined so skilfully and well those two seemingly antagonistic occupations, thief, and thief-taker.

The house which he inhabited adjoined the prison-wall.

Gloomy—rambling—dilapidated.

Those three words contain the essence of a description of its appearance without and within.

We are really sorry, for the sake of our readers, that this house is no longer in existence.

We are quite sure if it was, they would, one and all, at the very first opportunity, take a stroll along Newgate-street, and have a good look at it.

It would have amply repaid them for their trouble.

Unfortunately, the house was burned down to the ground nearly a hundred and fifty years ago.

Our readers will, therefore, be deprived of the pleasure of seeing it with any other eyes than those of their imagination.

Should, however, they feel sufficient interest in the matter to go and look at the spot on which it stood, they will be able to form a tolerable idea of its size, from the fact that three large houses have since been built upon the ground it occupied.

At precisely twelve o'clock noon, on Monday, the tenth day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and twenty-one, Jonathan Wild entered one of the rooms in his mansion, and slammed the door behind him.

This room he facetiously designated as his "office."

Why we know not, for only a small portion of his business was conducted there.

It was a low-ceilinged, dingy-looking room at the back of the house, and very scantily furnished.

The floor was bare.

So were the walls.

One window only was in the room, and that was so incrustated with dirt, and festooned with the cobwebs of industrious spiders, who had gone on year after year spinning away undisturbed, that but a very small and insufficient quantity of daylight found its way in.

There was, however, one inquisitive sunbeam who used, with praiseworthy perseverance, to try for about an hour every day to take a peep at the interior of Wild's office, but he always had to give up the attempt in disgust.

But, although he had been baffled some hundreds of times, he did not relinquish the hope of gratifying his curiosity, but renewed the attack every day—that is, when the envious clouds would let him—until at last it grew into quite a settled habit.

On this particular morning, however, the curious sunbeam found the atmosphere in the yard at the back of Wild's house so clear and free from smoke that he resolved to make one last and desperate effort to accomplish his purpose.

He succeeded, and actually had the audacity, when Wild entered the office, to look the great thief-taker full in the face.

Jonathan winked and blinked like an owl.

But Wild was too full of thought that morning to take much notice of the intrusion of a prying sunbeam into his sanctum.

He merely gave a zoological sort of snarl.

Then he seated himself at his desk, along the front of which was a row of little wooden railings placed about half-an-inch apart.

Just in the middle, three or four of these railings had been knocked out, leaving an opening large enough to allow of a hand being passed through it.

This desk divided the office into two portions, and was so placed that, as Jonathan sat at it, the window was behind him.

An advantageous arrangement in two respects.

Whoever stood in front of this desk had his face to the light, so that Wild could narrowly watch every expression of it, and form an estimate of how far the person who stood before him was speaking the truth.

But those who were thus scrutinized could not scrutinize Wild in return. Oh! no. As he sat with his back to the grimy window, his face was in deep shadow.

Wild settled himself on his stool.

He took off his hat, and deliberately laid it down on the desk.

Then, with a very peculiar twitch, he pulled his dirty white wig over his forehead and eyebrows.

This gave him a very remarkable appearance, and added to his natural ugliness in no small degree.

It was one of Wild's little eccentricities to endeavour to make himself look as hideous as he possibly could.

We give him credit for succeeding in his efforts.

His face could never have been a very handsome one but now it was seamed and scarred by the numerous wounds he had received.

This done, Wild produced from the side pocket in his coat a short, thick bludgeon.

At the end at which it was held it was just large enough to be gripped firmly, while it swelled out gradually until at the top it was between three and four inches in circumference.

This upper part had been hollowed out, and then filled up again with about two pounds of lead.

It was a most murderous weapon.

Jonathan looked at it, and as he did so his mouth expanded into a grin of extreme satisfaction.

He laid it across his hat with great care. To have seen him one would have thought it was made of the most fragile materials.

That bludgeon was Jonathan's pet. He had made it with his own hands.

It was his inseparable companion.

The smile of complacency with which he regarded it gave place presently to a peculiar cackling noise.

He rubbed his hands slowly over one another, only interrupting that operation to give his wig another twitch.

One of his intimate associates would have known how to translate these movements.

Wild was pleased!

And that was the strange way he had of showing it.

Such a complicated scheme of villainy, hatched from his fertile brain, had doubtless come to a successful issue.

Tap—tap.

Some one knocked very deferentially with his knuckles upon the office door.

Wild gave his wig such a twitch that it got completely reversed, and the tail hung down most ludicrously over his forehead.

"Come in," he growled.

The door was opened about six inches, and a man put his head into the apartment.

"Mr. Wild, sir," said a voice in very respectful tones.

"If you please, Mr. Wild, sir!"

"Ya—ah! What is it?"

"Yes, Mr. Wild. Pinching Tom, if you please, sir!"

"What are you grinning at, you villain? Tell me at once, or—ya—ah!"

Wild seized his cudgel and shook it menacingly.

"I, Mr. Wild? I grin in your presence, sir?" said the man, whose fancy had been tickled by the way Jonathan had twitched his wig. "No, Mr. Wild, sir! I hope as I knows myself and you know me too well to think of doing such a thing for a moment, sir!"

Jonathan scowled at the man for a moment, but as the man looked perfectly grave, he added—

"Begone wretch! Tell Pinching Tom to come in."

The man, who was one of those belonging to Wild's gang, withdrew his head and closed the door.

Then he went through some remarkable pantomimic evolutions, caused by the endeavour to laugh heartily, without allowing the sounds of mirth to escape from his lips.

He distended his cheeks until one would have thought the skin would have given way, and for so long that he grew first red, then purple, then black in the face.

He waved his arms in the air.

His legs, which were long and thin, cut the most fantastic capers imaginable.

But he was destined to receive a summary punishment for thus indulging in clandestine laughter.

No sooner did the door shut than Wild took up his cudgel, and, with the stealthiness and silence of a cat, got down off his stool.

On tiptoe he crept across the floor.

With the greatest imaginable caution he slowly turned the handle of the door, and opened it a little way.

Then he saw the man in the attitudes we have described.

He opened the door a little wider, and waited.

Waited until he imagined his officer's jocularly had reached its culminating point.

Whack!—thud!

With two just such sounds did Wild's pet come down on the back of the unfortunate officer.

Of course, no one could stand up after receiving two such sudden and unexpected blows, so the officer fell to the ground at once.

"Murder!—murder! Oh! Mr. Wild!—Mr. Wild! please, sir! No, sir!" he yelled, as he writhed about on the floor.

Jonathan was quite delighted, and so overcome with his own cleverness, that he actually laughed aloud.

An essentially brutal disposition was Jonathan Wild's, and nothing afforded him greater pleasure than inflicting pain upon others.

It had grown with him.

When a boy he was always playing some diabolical trick, and torturing any living creature that was unfortunate enough to get into his clutches.

Now he tortured human beings.

"Oh! Mr. Wild—Mr. Wild, sir! Oh! if you please, you've broken my back! Oh! murder! murder!"

"Get up!" said Wild. "Get up! I hope it will prove a lesson to you! Get up at once, I say, or you shall have some more!"

"No, Mr. Wild, please don't! Mercy! I am getting up, Mr. Wild! I am, indeed!"

With many contortions of his body, and groans and lamentations, the officer rose to his feet.

He stood in a doubled-up sort of fashion.

The blows were doubtless severe, for Wild had dealt them with the whole strength of his arm.

The officer had much ado to stifle the yells that rose to his lips; he knew he did not dare give utterance to them, or if he had, that he would have received some further ill usage.

"Ya-a-ah!" said Wild, in a voice like a hyena's. "Laugh again, Tonks! laugh again! Ha! ha! why, it's quite funny! Tonks, you villain, why don't you laugh! ha! ha! You don't half take a joke! ha! ha!"

Tonks distorted his mouth, but he looked about as unamirthful as any one well could.

"Ha! ha! That's right, Tonks! that's right! Try it again on the other side of your face, and then tell Pinching Tom I am waiting to see him."

Glad of the chance to escape, Tonks hobbled off to the hall, where Jonathan's visitor was waiting, while the thief-taker reseated himself at his desk, and prepared to receive him.

CHAPTER III.

PINCHING TOM AND THE DIAMOND NECKLACE.—WILD DOES A CAPITAL MORNING'S WORK.

PINCHING TOM was one of the most enterprising and successful members of that large community of thieves who looked up to Jonathan Wild as their chief.

Scarcely had the great thief-taker adjusted himself and composed his face a little, than Pinching Tom entered.

There was not much respect visible in the way he walked up to the desk, and looked through the little gap in the railings.

But he had an eye to business and dispatch.

He dived his hand into his pocket, and produced a magnificent diamond necklace, such only as one of very high rank could wear, and worth probably some thousands of pounds.

"Here's a sparkler, Johnnty!" he said, as he laid the bauble on the desk. "What do you think of that, eh?"

Wild glared at the speaker.

In common with those base spirits who find or conceive themselves to be in an elevated position, Jonathan had a very exaggerated idea of the importance of his situation, and of the amount of deference that ought to be paid him.

Hence he was deeply offended at the manner in which Pinching Tom had chosen to speak to him.

But Wild never allowed his anger to interfere with his interests.

The diamond necklace, he saw at a glance, was a very valuable booty.

He dissembled.

He stretched out his hand and took the necklace.

It underwent a close examination.

"You needn't be so blessed particular," said Pinching Tom. "There's no paste about that!"

Wild growled.

"Hold your row, will you?" he said. "How much do you want for this kickshaw?"

He flung it negligently upon the desk as he asked this question, but he took good care it should fall where, if Tom felt ever so inclined to take possession of it again, he would find it beyond the reach of his fingers.

"Well," said he, in reply, "it's rather hard to estimate. You see that is a kind of heirloom, or what-you-call-it."

"Bah!"

"It is, indeed, and belongs to Lady Ingestrie."

"Lady Ingestrie! the deuce it does!"

Wild took up the necklace, and it underwent a second examination.

Pinching Tom grew impatient.

"Come, come, Mr. Wild," he said, "this here ain't business, by no means. How much will you give me for it? I needn't tell you that Lord Ingestrie will be here before the day is out and he will give a good sum to have it back again."

"Ya-ah!"

We use these letters to express the wild beast sort of noise Wild made when anything was not just agreeable to him.

"Fifty pounds," said Jonathan.

Pinching Tom looked aghast.

"Fifty pounds?" he repeated.

"Yes. Here you are."

Wild produced a bulky pocket-book, and began to rummage over its contents.

"No, I'm blest if I do! Why, Johnnty, you must be clean off it to offer me fifty pounds for a necklace worth five thousand. It really isn't enough, Mr. Wild."

Jonathan reflected, or rather appeared to do so.

"Well, Tom," he said, at length, "you are a good hand, and deserve to be encouraged. Now, I'll tell you what I'll do. I'll sacrifice my own profit, and give you a hundred pounds for it."

"Confound you for a downright rascal!" said Pinching Tom. "You won't let a fellow live, you won't. I leaves you at once. Give me the necklace back again, I'm off!"

Jonathan looked at him with one eye.

"Are you, indeed?"

"Yes, you come it too strong! I shouldn't mind taking a small sum, because you save all the trouble, but I won't part with a valuable thing like that for nothing. Give it us back."

Tom made a sudden grab at the diamond necklace, but Jonathan had put it just out of the reach of his fingers.

"Ya-ah—ya-ah! Will you take the hundred pounds, Tommy?"

"No, never! I"—

"Very good—very good. Hi! hi! Blue! Blue!" shouted Wild, banging the desk all the while with his cudgel.

"What are you kicking up that 'ere row for?" asked Tom.

Wild did not reply, but fixed his eyes upon the door, which, in obedience to his summons, was quickly opened, and Jonathan's lieutenant, Blueskin, came in.

"Hullo!" he said, gruffly. "What's the fly?"

"C. 7," replied Wild.

"Oh! ah! all right. Come on, Tom."

With a dexterity upon which Blueskin prided himself excessively, he slipped a pair of handcuffs on to Tom's wrists.

"What's the meaning of this?" asked Pinching Tom, who was, for a second or so, too much astounded to speak.

"What's your game?"

Wild smiled grimly.

"Will you take the hundred pounds, Tommy, or will you pay a visit to Little Newgate?"

"Little Newgate?"

"Yes; you've heard of such a place, I daresay, Tom," said Blueskin. "Little Newgate! That's the name for the cellars under Mr. Wild's house, where he puts any cove that don't act up to the square."

"Will you take the hundred pounds, Tommy?" said Wild, again. "I'm sure you'd better."

"I can't do it, Mr. Wild, because" —

"Oh! all right, then. Off with him, Blue, to C. 7."

Pinching Tom commenced a violent struggle. He was not exactly the sort of man to lose his liberty without making an effort to retain it.

But it availed him nothing. In Blueskin's grasp he was like a child in the hands of a giant.

Jonathan gripped his cudgel and got down off his stool.

"Stash it! stash it, Tom, or it will be the worse for you."

"Give me the hundred pounds, then, and let me be off!"

"Shan't! Ya-a-ab! You should have had it while I was in the humour! No—no! Let me see, to-day is Monday. All right. The case is clear against you, and will come on on Friday. Off with him, Blue!"

But Tom, who now became fully aware of the perilous situation in which he was, began to struggle as a man only can struggle when he finds his life depending upon it.

"Take that, then!" said Jonathan, bringing his pet down with great violence upon Tom's head. "Take that, and be hanged!"

But provident nature had bestowed upon Pinching Tom a thicker skull than it falls to the lot of general humanity to have, so the blow only staggered him.

Still it confused his faculties, and made him incapable of offering much resistance.

Blueskin caught hold of his arm and led him out into the gloomy passage belonging to Wild's house.

At the extremity of this hall, and opposite the front door, was a strong iron grating.

A man stood at it with a key, and when he saw Blueskin and the prisoner, he flung the grating open and allowed them to pass.

A flight of steps was next descended, and then another very massive door was opened and closed after them.

They were in a long dimly-lighted corridor.

Doors were on both sides of it.

Each one was strongly made, and had a figure painted upon it.

Blueskin stopped before one which was numbered 7.

He unlocked it by means of a key which he took from his pocket.

"In you go, Tom!" he said. "Take care!"

He gave him a sudden push, which caused poor Tom, who certainly had been very badly used, to fall on his face in the cell.

Blueskin did not trouble about that little circumstance, but banged the door shut, and fastened it again.

Wild was waiting for him in the passage.

"He's safe!" said Blueskin, laconically.

A succession of loud knocks came at this moment upon the front door of Wild's house.

Jonathan retreated to his office.

He, however, stood just within the threshold.

He was anxious to know who it was that had come with such a noisy summons for admittance.

"Open the door, Blue! Look sharp! If it's anyone on business I'm at home."

Jonathan heard Blueskin saunter to the door and open it, just as the knocking was renewed for the second time, and with greater violence than before.

"Hullo!"

That was Blueskin's mode of greeting everybody.

"Is this Mr. Wild's, the thief-taker's?"

"Rather! Is it business?"

"Yes."

"All right, then! Come in! Mr. Wild's at home."

"I will tell his lordship."

"Eh?"

"I say I will tell his lordship."

"Oh! his lordship wants to see Mr. Wild?"

"Yes."

"Lord who?"

"Ingestrie."

Wild heard the footman's feet descend the steps.

He poked his head out into the hall.

"Blue, you villain! Blue! Mind how you speak to his lordship."

"You be hanged! Here he comes."

Jonathan dashed precipitately into his office as he heard some one enter.

He jumped on his stool.

There lay the diamond necklace about which Lord Ingestrie had doubtless come to make some inquiries.

Wild only had just time to cover it over with his hat and lay his cudgel across it, when the office-door opened, and Blueskin, with an obsequious bow, ushered Lord Ingestrie into the sanctum of the great thief-taker.

Jonathan gave his wig one of his most ferocious twitches.

"Good morning, your lordship," he said, in servile tones; "What can I have the pleasure of doing for you this morning?"

"Well, Mr. Wild, it is a little affair I wish you to manage for me."

"I am quite at your lordship's service," said Wild, giving his wig another twitch. "What can I do for you?"

"Well, the fact is, Lady Ingestrie, on her way home from the Countess of Wiltshire's rout, was, in some inexplicable way, robbed of a diamond necklace."

"Dear me!" said Wild, with an assumption of great interest and curiosity, "How singular!"

"The necklace itself, you must understand," continued his lordship, "is intrinsically worth a very large sum, besides which, it has been in the possession of the family for many generations."

"Pinching Tom was right," muttered Jonathan. "What an idiot he was not to be civil to me!"

"What do you say, Mr. Wild?"

CHAPTER IV.

JACK SHEPPARD Baffles the Watchman, and Takes Refuge at the "Black Lion," in Drury Lane.

JACK SHEPPARD wrenched his head round with a violent effort, and found himself face to face with a watchman.

"That's right!" cried Mr. Roots, "That's right! Hold him tight—the vagabond!—or else he will escape."

"All right, your honour!" said the watchman, taking a firmer grip, "I'll settle him. You shall be provided with a comfortable night's lodging, and nothing to pay! Come along, now, will you?"

"Let go your hold!" said Jack, fiercely. "Let go, or you will find it all the worse for you. Loose, I say!"

"No, no," exclaimed Jack's master. "Lock him up! I give him in charge for threatening to take my life! To the watch-house with him! I will appear against him in the morning."

"Very good, Mr. Roots. It shall be done, sir. You'd best not be obstreperous! Take my advice, and come along quietly."

"Never!" said Jack, struggling fiercely to release himself, "never, I say! I tell you you had better let me go! I don't want to harm you; but if you will have it, I can't help it. Once more I say, let me go!"

"I desay! Is there anything else you'd like? because just say the word while you are about it."

Scarcely had the words left his lips, than by a sudden exertion of strength, which no one would have given him credit for, Jack freed himself from the watchman's grasp.

"Help! help! An escape!" yelled the guardian of the night. "Help! help!"

He sprung his rattle furiously.

Then he made a sudden dart at Jack, who clenched his fist, and throwing all his weight into the blow, struck the watchman in the face.

No human being could have stood up against a blow given with so much suddenness and force.

Down went the watchman, bludgeon, lantern, and rattle, making a terrible clatter.

But the watchmen on the contiguous beats had been aroused, and were hurrying to the spot.

Taking, apparently, no notice of the circumstance, Jack again addressed his master.

"John Roots," he said, "it is you who will have to answer for this night's work, and for what it may produce. I own I have been wrong, but at the same time, you have been wrong also. Had you, to-night, have given me a word of kindness, I should once more have crossed your threshold. I should have returned to my work, and become an honest man! But you would not have it so! You have driven me forth! You have thrown again my father's fate into my teeth! You have called me a vagabond and a thief! Farewell, John Roots; but the last word I shall utter shall be, beware! I have sworn to be revenged! Beware! beware!"

All this was spoken with extraordinary volubility, and when he finished, Jack did not pause a moment longer, but dashed down a narrow court on the opposite side of the way.

With hurried footsteps and loud cries, the watchmen coming down the street in both directions, reached the spot where their companion lay prostrate on the stones.

Rage and fear were swelling within the bosom of John Roots, and as soon as he could command his passion sufficiently to speak, he cried—

"Quick! quick! After him! Down Rose-court he went! Lock him up. I will appear against him in the morning."

Upon hearing this, the watchmen, leaving their brother to recover as he best could, dashed forward in a body down Rose-court.

But when they reached its termination, there was no one to be seen. The place was silent, and all the houses closed.

There was no outlet to this court, it being, in fact, what is generally called a blind alley.

The watchmen, by the aid of their lanterns, made a thorough search, which resulted in nothing.

The mystery of Jack's evanishment is easily explained.

From living on the spot he was, of course, familiar with the locality, and he knew well enough there was no outlet to Rose-court; and it was upon that knowledge that he built the hope of escape.

On the right hand side of the court, and not half-a-dozen steps from Wych-street, was a side door into one of the houses.

It was a large, roomy doorway, and Jack pressed himself as closely as he could against the door post.

The watchmen were all intently looking before them, so Jack's hiding-place was not even seen by them.

Even if they had seen it—looked into it even—it is questionable whether they would have seen him, so closely did he press his slim figure against the woodwork.

No sooner had they passed him than Jack slipped out again into Wych-street.

He did not pause, however; for he saw that his master had not withdrawn from the window, and that the watchman he had knocked down was beginning to recover his consciousness.

He walked silently along the street, taking care to keep as much in the shadow of the houses as possible.

When he reached the corner of Newcastle-street he came to a halt.

He leaned against the post at the corner.

A revulsion of feeling took place.

He spoke, but it was in gentle and tristful accents.

"What shall I do?" he said. "Where shall I go? What will become of me? I am quite alone in the world! I am kin to no one—there is no one who loves me."

He bowed his head upon his arm, and, as the utter loneliness of his position forced itself upon him, he wept aloud.

But not for long did he continue this childish expression of grief.

With the back of his hand he dashed the teardrops from his eyes.

"I will not be a woman, though," he said. "Not a woman! This must be fate—destiny! I will go on and see for what I am destined."

He left the post, and continued his way, until he at length entered Drury-lane.

Straight before him was a house, from the basement windows of which there issued a bright light.

All the rest of the street was in darkness.

Some impulse, which he did not strive to combat or reflect upon, caused him to direct his steps towards this house.

He knew it well.

It was a public-house.

The sign was the "Black Lion."

A very bad name had the "Black Lion" got. It was famed all over London as being a thieves' house.

Yet no steps were taken by the authorities to have it closed.

The theory of the suppression of crime by prevention was not started for many a year afterwards.

The principle then was to wait until an offence against the law was consummated, and then look after and punish the offender.

Generally by death.

Hence the police-officers rather encouraged such houses as the "Black Lion" than otherwise, for knowing this was a place to which fugitives from justice resorted, they were often able, by entering unawares, to make an important capture.

The shutters were never put up at the "Black Lion."

Jack crossed the street with a slow step, and looked in at one of the windows of the public-house.

That is, he tried to do so, for the dingy-looking blind, which had been drawn down, made such an occupation rather difficult.

The bright light, which filled the apartment into which he thus peeped, proceeded chiefly from the fire, which was a very large one, and piled high up above the hobs.

Several people, male and female, were seated there.

They all seemed happy, and enjoying themselves to the top of their bent.

A sigh came to Jack's lips.

The room seemed twice as comfortable as it really was, when compared with the street without, and the forlorn state in which he was seemed to grow more forcibly upon him.

The temptation to enter was strong—in fact, he only held back from the dread that he, a stranger, might not be very favourably received by the lawless company.

Jack could hear, with tolerable distinctness, what was going on inside.

"Now, Joe Blake," he heard a voice say, "just troll us a ditty."

The proposition was evidently relished by the rest of the company, that is, if the tremendous banging of jugs and mugs upon the table, was any criterion.

"H—m, ladies and gentlemen," Jack heard a voice say, though he could not see the speaker, "what shall it be?"

"Oh! 'Friends together!'" was the unanimous cry.

"We can all join in that."

"Very good, friends all!—here goes!"

There was something so peculiarly droll about the song, that Jack could not move until he had heard the whole of it.

"Now, friends!" said the voice which had been asked to sing, and which Jack identified as Joe Blake's, "order, I'm ready."

There was an immediate silence.

Joe Blake, then, much to Jack's surprise, repeated the first two lines of his song in a solemn voice, just as in many churches and chapels the first lines of a hymn are given out to the congregation.

The two lines were—

"Friends together we have met,
In spite of all our foes."

"Now!" said Joe Blake, "join in, ladies and gentlemen, please."

The whole of the company then sang the words given out to a jovial tune, and to the following refrain:—

Friends together we have met,
We have met,
We have met,
Friends together we have met,
In spite of all our foes.

Then Joe Blake repeated the two next lines—

"And he that would our mirth obstruct,
We'll take him by the nose."

"Now!"

And he that would our mirth obstruct,
O r mirth obstruct,
Our mirth obstruct,
And he that would our mirth obstruct,
We'll take him by the nose.

"Sure he must be some scoundrel dog,
That would our mirth obstruct."

"Now!"

Sure he must be some scoundrel dog,
Some scoundrel dog,
Some scoundrel dog,
Sure he must be some scoundrel dog,
That would our mirth obstruct.

"We'll take him to some large horsepond,
And have him soundly ducked."

"Now!"

We'll take him to some large horsepond,
Some large horsepond,
Some large horsepond,
We'll take him to some large horsepond,
And have him soundly ducked.

"And when we've had him soundly ducked,
And all these steps are taken,"

"Now!"

And when we've had him soundly ducked,
Him soundly ducked,
Him soundly ducked,
And when we've had him soundly ducked,
And all these steps are taken,

"We'll send him up the chimney-top,
And dry him there for bacon."

"Now!"

We'll send him up the chimney-top,
The chimney-top,
The chimney-top,
We'll send him up the chimney-top,
And dry him there for bacon.

"But if the devil he should come,
And think this night to have us."

"Now!"

But if the devil he should come,
He should come,
He should come,
But if the devil he should come,
And think this night to have us.

"We will persuade him if we can,
To go away and leave us."

"Now!"

We will persuade him if we can,
If we can,
If we can,
We will persuade him if we can,
To go away and leave us.

"But if he'll not lere* handed go,
And we should be mistaken."

"Now!"

But if he'll not lere handed go,
Lere handed go,
Lere handed go,
But if he'll not lere handed go,
And we should be mistaken,

"We'll send him up the chimney-top,
And bid him take the bacon."

"Now!"

We'll send him up the chimney-top,
The chimney-top,
The chimney-top,
We'll send him up the chimney-top,
And let him take the bacon.

* An old English word, meaning empty.

Now devil's gone and bacon too,
What need have we to fear?"

"Now!"

Now devil's gone and bacon too,
And bacon too,
And bacon too,
Now devil's gone and bacon too,
What need have we to fear?"

"We'll drown our cares in brandy strong,
Good wine and Johnson's cheer."

"Now!"

We'll drown our cares in brandy strong,
In brandy strong,
In brandy strong,
We'll drown our cares in brandy strong,
Good wine and Johnson's cheer.

The applause that succeeded this song was deafening and tremendous.

There was something very peculiar in this song, given out first two lines together, and then sang.

Jack Sheppard could not help feeling amused, although his heart was heavy.

"What fascination holds me here?" thought Jack. "I feel as though I was compelled to enter this place, and somehow I have no fear of the reception I shall meet with. I cannot stay here; I will go in."

As he spoke these words, Jack Sheppard left the window, and passing through the front door of the "Black Lion," and traversing a sanded passage, entered the large room where the company were assembled.

He did not know it; but he had put his foot upon the first round of the ladder of crime.

CHAPTER V.

JOE BLAKE, ALIAS BLUESKIN, GIVES JACK SHEPPARD A HEARTY WELCOME.

"BRAVO! bravo! Hurrah! Another glass, landlord! Hi! hi! Capital! capital! Well sung! Again! Bravo! Blake! Here—here! Johnson, one more bowl of your prime punch! Let's sing it over again! Now, Joe, strike up! First-rate! The best song out! Them as can't sing can join in! Now, then, over again—over again! Go it, Blake! Bring in all the lush, Johnson, my boy, and then we won't be interrupted! Bravo! bravo!"

Such were the words, uttered in every imaginable key, which separated themselves from the murmur of voices, the banging of jugs and glasses upon the tables, the thousand and one noises which arise from a tumultuous assembly, and reached the ears of Jack Sheppard confusedly, as he stood irresolutely two or three steps within the room.

The bright light which filled the place, and the rude boisterous clamour of its occupants, blinded and deafened him, and he sank, with a feeling of perfect bewilderment, upon a vacant seat which happened to be close to him.

He acted like one who is vaguely conscious that he is doing something and nothing more.

His intrusion was scarcely noticed, except by those next to him, and they simply honoured him with a long stare.

But Jack soon began to recover himself.

Observing near him a stout serving wench, who was assisting in the performance of the waiter's duties, he called for a glass of hot brandy-and-water.

The steaming spirit was in a few moments placed before him, and he tossed off the largest half or it at one gulp.

Its effect was instantaneous.

He became confident and composed.

Although, from living so long in the neighbourhood, he was acquainted with the outside of the "Black Lion," yet he had never before beheld its interior, and he looked about him with some curiosity.

The room in which he was sitting was low pitched, but spacious, and tables were arranged in it in such a manner that a large number of guests might find accommodation in the shape of seats.

But as Jack glanced rapidly around the place, his eyes soon lighted on an object which filled him with wonder and surprise.

It was the countenance of the man who sat at the head of the largest table, and who he judged, from various circumstances, to be the chairman.

He was a brawny, hairy man, and certainly not less than six feet in height.

His hands and arms were immense.

It would not have been necessary for the most casual observer to look twice to see that he was possessed of enormous muscular strength—such, indeed, as falls to the lot of few persons to possess.

But it was not the man's huge frame that attracted Sheppard's attention, it was his face.

Strange as it may appear, it was of a half blue, half purple tint.

Whether real or artificial, Jack could not tell.

It made his whole aspect hideous and repulsive in the extreme.

"How very extraordinary," thought Jack. "Whoever can he be?"

At this moment the man with the blue face spoke.

Jack recognised his voice.

It was that of the man who had been called Mr. Blake, and who had sung the extraordinary ditty we felt we were compelled to give to our readers in its entirety.

"Order, pals, order!" cried Mr. Blake, knocking vigorously upon the table with a small ivory hammer. "Order, order!"

"Order, order!" echoed several other voices, and then something like silence was obtained.

"I never sings that song," began Mr. Blake, "without thinking of the chap I learned it of. He was a brave fellow, that he was. Many a glorious night have we spent together; but that is a long while ago, when I was hardly twenty."

"It's a downright good'un," said some one in reply, "who was it that learned it you?"

"Most of you must have heard of the name. He was a crackman of the first order, and though his career was a very brief one, he made himself a reputation that won't easily be forgotten. He suffered at the triple tree nineteen years ago this very day, and that's what puts me more in mind of him, poor fellow! It will be a long time before we look upon his like again!"

Why there is but one man that would come up to that description," said a man who was seated next to Jack on his right hand.

"You are right there. Such a description would apply to no one but him. He was a rare fellow! It was through him that I got my face such a colour as it is."

"Was it, really?" asked several voices. "I have often wondered what was the cause of it."

"I'll tell you now," said Mr. Blake, finishing his glass of punch. "It's a thing that always vexes me, and I was uncommon savage when it occurred. But it's no good grieving about shed milk. It can't be altered now."

"And it was through that you got called BLUESKIN, Mr. Blake?"

"It were!" replied the chairman, emphatically. "Not that I mind that in the least, only what vexed me was that I should always be known if once seen a mile off."

"Ah! that you would. That's the inconvenientest part of it," said another voice.

"However, how I got it was very singular. You must first know my pal and me was out on a little business one night. I won't say where, but there was a strong box we very much wanted to open, but for the life of us we couldn't manage it. 'This is very aggravating,' says I; 'what shall we do?' 'I don't know,' says he; 'yet stop. I have an idea.' 'What is it?' says I. 'We'll blow the lock open,' says he. 'With gunpowder?' says I. 'Yes,' says he. 'Where shall you get the powder from?' says I. 'Oh!' says he, 'I've got some in my pocket!' So he took out a little paper parcel, and laid it open on the ground just by the box. Well, he takes some of this powder, and rams it into the keyhole. It was quite a fresh notion to me, so, like a fool, I put my face a good deal closer than I had need. 'Let me light it!' says I. So I got out a match, and lighted the powder in the keyhole, and then a most awful scorching flame shot up into my face. 'Fire and fury!' I cried. 'I'm done for! I'm blinded!' 'We shall both be done for,' says he, 'if you make that noise.' Well, it turned out some of the sparks from the match dropped on to the paper on the floor, and set light to all the gunpowder. However, my pal went to the box and found it opened, for the inside of the lock was clean blown out! He got the swag, and we got off all safe. I was blind for many a day after, but at last I recovered my vision, and at last got well. But the powder got into my skin, and nothing will fetch it out; so ever since then I have had a blue face, and that's why people calls me BLUESKIN."

Mr. Blake's extraordinary account of how he came with a blue face was listened to with the greatest interest, and several comments were passed upon it.

At last some one said—

"But I say, Blueskin, you haven't told us now, what was the name of the pal who was with you, and who, you said, was tucked up at Old Tyburn nineteen years ago."

"No more I did," said Mr. Blake; "that was a little omission on my part. I always get forgetful and stupid, somehow, when I think of my old friend. It was a pity he was cut off in his prime as he were. I shall never forget him, and I know there'll never be his equal!"

"But his name, Blue?—his name?" cried several voices.

Joe Blake rose from his chair, as he said—

"His name, pals, was TOM SHEPPARD!"

"TOM SHEPPARD?" shouted Jack, springing up so suddenly, that he overturned his seat, and, pushing his way up to Blueskin, who looked at him with the utmost astonishment, "TOM SHEPPARD? Do you mean to say that you were a comrade of my father's?"

CHAPTER VI.

JACK SHEPPARD, BY BLUESKIN'S ADVICE, JOINS JONATHAN WILD'S GANG.

BLUESKIN gasped for breath.

"God bless me!" he said, at length, "he's the very image!"

No sooner had he uttered these words, than a scene of the greatest possible confusion ensued.

Jack looked about him in perfect calmness.

A dozen hands were outstretched towards him.

Joe Blake rose to his feet, and, catching Jack in his arms, almost smothered him in his embrace.

"That ever I should have lived to see this day," he said. "I never knew Tom had a son, but I can't doubt your assertion. You are exactly like he was at your age. I never saw such a wonderful resemblance."

Blueskin took up his hammer, and struck it upon the table until order was restored.

"Silence, pals," he said. "Silence. You've heard a bit of this, of course. Order, there. I've got some one to introduce as you'll live yet to be proud of. Pals, fill up your glasses, and drink to the health of my old comrade's son. What's your name?" he asked in a whisper.

"Jack."

"Drink to the health of JACK SHEPPARD!"

Thus suddenly did Jack find himself lionized, and it is scarcely to be wondered at that it made the lad vain, and blinded him to the fact that, under no circumstances, could it be any honour to be received by such company as was there present.

His health, however, was drunk by every person in the room with loud applause, for to all of them was the name of the crackman, Tom Sheppard, familiar.

Jack stammered out some words in reply, and then sat down next to Blueskin, a seat having been provided for his special use.

"But what brings you here, Jack, lad?" asked Blake. "How is it we have never heard of you before?"

"I am an apprentice," said Jack, "and have been outlived, through ill treatment, to leave my master."

"Ah! Jack, you were lucky to drop in here. But how came you to do so?"

"Some impulse which I could not control, urged me hither. I entered, and took a seat unobserved, and was about to leave again, when I heard my father's name mentioned."

"It's a rare chance. But strange things do happen sometimes. However, Jack, I repeat it was lucky you came here. If you choose, you can live the life of a gentleman for the rest of your days. Do you say the word?"

"I do," said Jack, "for I'm quite careless what comes of me!"

[BLUESKIN INTRODUCES JACK SHEPPARD TO JONATHAN WILD.]

"Now don't say that, Jack,—don't say that! Never despond, my boy—never despond! It's the worst thing in the world."

"But how can I help it? What is to become of me? John Roots has ruined me for life! Who would employ an apprentice who has not served his time?"

"Well, not many, perhaps," said Blueskin. "But I do happen to know some one who would be very glad to secure the services of such a sharp chap as you are!"

Jack was silent, but he nevertheless felt flattered at Blueskin's description of him.

"And not only that," said Blueskin, "the fact of your having left your master would be more a recommendation to him than otherwise."

"Indeed! How is that?"

"And when he knows your name, and who you are the son of, he will be ten times more anxious to have you than before."

"That's very odd," said Jack, who had not been sparing with the strong liquors on the table before him. "That's very odd! Nobody that I have met with yet would ever have a word further to say to me when they knew my father was a housebreaker and died at Tyburn. Just as if I could help that!"

"Just as if you could indeed. But Jack, my lad, when you've lived as long as I have, and seen as much of the world, you will find it about as reasonable in most other things as it is in that."

As he finished speaking, Blueskin took up his chairman's hammer, and rapped violently upon the table.

Whether it was to call for order in the disorderly assemblage, or whether it was to give due weight to the opinion he had uttered, is best known to himself.

"But stop," said Jack. "You asked me, if I would like to live like a gentleman for the rest of my days."

"I did."

"And that you knew some one who would take me. Is it so?"

"It is, Jack—it is. Only say the word, and there you are. It was a most fortunate thing for you that you came in here to-night!"

"I hope it will be so, was the reply. "But, tell me. Who is this person who will give me employment, and the means to live like a gentleman for the rest of my days?"

"I'll warrant you'll know the name well when I mention it," said Blueskin, with a smile.

"Who is it?" asked Jack, impatiently.

"Jonathan Wild!"

"Jonathan Wild?"

"Yes! Jonathan Wild! I told you you would know the name!"

"But," said Jack, "what does he want with me?"

"Ah, now you're asking what perhaps I ought not to tell you; but if you'll give me your word you'll not split, I'll trust you!"

"You have it, then."

"Jonathan Wild—Jonathan Wild the Great! as he is generally and justly called—and he is a great man, I can assure you, lives in the house next door to Newgate."

"I know that."

"Very well. Now I am his lieutenant!"

"His what?"

"Lieutenant—deputy—or whatever you like to call it. I am second in command."

"To Jonathan Wild?"

"Yes! And I am quite sure he would be overjoyed if you would join his band! It is the best thing you can do. Society has set its face against you, and as you are the weakest you will go to the wall unless you choose to take up arms and defend yourself."

This speech was rather incomprehensible to Jack.

"But what am I to do?"

"Oh, Jonathan will soon put you up to all that. Do you consent to do as I advise?"

"I do! As well that as anything!"

"As well that? And better too, I should think. All you've got to do is to act on the square, and keep friends with Jonathan, and you're all right. But I must tell you his temper is not the most amiable in the world, and his friendship very difficult to retain."

"Oh!"

"However, the fact of the case is simply this: my gaffer, Jonathan Wild, is a kind of inter—what do you call it—cessor?—Yes!—he is a kind of intercessor between the robber and the robbed!"

"I don't understand."

"Oh, but you will do before long, and I am not a very neat hand at explaining anything."

Jack placed his arm upon the table, and let his head sink upon it.

"Hullo!" said Blueskin. "What's up! Come Jack, my lad, don't give way to your feelings in that way! Have another glass, and let's have a manly heart, and no whining! Cheer up, I say, for I can tell you your fortune's made!"

But Jack's heart was heavy.

Blueskin patted him encouragingly upon the back.

"You won't deceive me! Lor' bless you, I can see it's in you. I know well enough what you're going to be! Nature has formed you for it, and the world has determined you shall do nothing else! Your's will be a dashing career, I tell you!"

Jack looked up.

The tears were in his eyes.

But they were not the indications of a genuine grief.

The unusual quantity of spirit which he had imbibed, and to the use of which he was an utter stranger, had affected his brain, and superinduced that species of intoxication called maudlin.

"There, that's right! Don't be a girl, Jack! There was nothing of the woman in your father's disposition. Oh! no—quite the reverse! I tell you what it is, Jack! I am sure of it! Before you are a month older you will be a more notorious and expert cracksmen than your father was!"

"My father?"

"Yes, my old pal; you know! A short life and a merry one! Plenty of excitement! Plenty of adventure! Plenty of money! What more can you require?"

Jack shuddered.

"My father!" he said, "you speak of him! Would I were not his son, and then I should have been spared all that I have suffered in consequence!"

"Oh! that be hanged," said Blueskin, "you ought to be proud! And you will, too, when you know a little more. Let us drop it, and join the company. They are surprised at our long talk! Come, rouse up! Remember you have promised to become a member of Jonathan Wild's band!"

CHAPTER VII.

RETURNS TO JONATHAN WILD, LORD INGESTRIE, AND THE DIAMOND NECKLACE.

"WHAT did you say, Mr. Wild?"

That was the question to which Lord Ingestrie gave utterance when he heard Jonathan murmur some words whose meaning he could not catch.

"Nothing. That is, nothing of any importance!"

Jonathan had to twitch his wig to regain his composure.

"It is really an extraordinary and audacious affair, your lordship—very audacious indeed! Last night did you say it occurred?"

"Yes, Mr. Wild. Or perhaps it would be more correct to say this morning, for, though her ladyship cannot say precisely when she missed the necklace, yet she fancies it must have been after she left the countess's saloons."

"Perhaps," said Jonathan, with a leer, "it may not have been stolen, but only lost? String broken—come unfasted, or something of that sort, eh? Have you offered any reward?"

"Not publicly, Mr. Wild, not publicly."

Jonathan rubbed his hands slowly one over the other, and looked attentively at his visitor.

"We were at first of your opinion, Mr. Wild," continued his lordship, "and thought—nay, made sure that it had been lost only; but though every inquiry and instant search was made, no traces of it could be found!"

"How unfortunate."

"The news of the loss soon spread among the servants, and I am sure the reward that was offered would have induced whoever had found it to give it up."

Jonathan shut one eye.

He feigned to be quite overcome by his lordship's extreme cleverness.

"Dear me," he said, "if you were a professional man I should be quite jealous of you! There is nothing like taking prompt steps in a matter of that sort."

"I think not," said his lordship, with a little more pomposity in the tones of his voice than there was a minute before. "You see, as I said, not only is the necklace intrinsically very valuable, but an heir-loom that has been in the possession of the Ingestrie family for generations."

"Ah!" said Wild. "How much did you offer the servants if they found it?"

"A hundred guineas!"

Jonathan laughed in his usual disagreeable fashion.

"What's that?"

"I laughed, my lord."

"Why? At what?"

"The idea of thinking a hundred pounds was a large reward for such an object."

"It is a large amount."

"To a beggar, probably!"

"However," said his lordship, rather angrily, "I am quite certain it was stolen—not lost, and that none of the countess's servants had it."

"Oh, indeed! Well, it is just possible you are right." Jonathan glanced at his hat lying on the desk, and beneath which so snugly reposed Lady Ingestrie's diamond necklace.

Little did his lordship dream that the identical thing which he was in search of was just under his nose.

But so it was.

"I was advised to come to you, Mr. Wild," resumed Lord Ingestrie, "for I had been told you had frequently succeeded in obtaining things which had been stolen."

"Or lost," said Jonathan, with a hideous grin, "your lordship's information is quite correct."

"I thought the less time that was lost the better it would be, so I came here at once."

Wild bowed.

"If your lordship will please say what you require, I will see what can be done."

"I want the necklace back as soon as possible."

"Exactly! Now you must understand, your lordship, I never make any charge for what trouble I may have in the matter. Never, by any chance! My only object in doing it is to assist persons like yourself, for instance, to get back property which would otherwise be lost to them for ever."

"That is very praiseworthy upon your part, Mr. Wild."

"Now, with respect to this necklace. I have no doubt I can get it back for you if you are willing to pay a price for it. I have agents of mine to whom all the thieves in London are known, and it could be ascertained in the course of a very few hours whether it was in the possession of any one of them or not."

"I see; and supposing you find some one has it, what then?"

"The person is at once communicated with, and told that the owner wishes to get back his stolen property. A reply is then sent, naming such and such a sum, which, if given, and no questions asked, the goods will be returned."

Wild paused, but as Lord Ingestrie said nothing, he went on.

"You will of course understand, my lord, that neither of the principal parties concerned, come into contact with each other, and having thus explained the matter, what amount does your lordship think of offering to the person who has the necklace, to give it up?"

Jonathan's hand wandered to his hat.

Little did Lord Ingestrie imagine that the necklace was beneath it.

"What should you think, Mr. Wild?"

"Oh! you ought to be the best judge of that, since you know exactly what value you put upon it, and I don't."

"But they will not expect the full value, surely?"

"Something very like it they would, if they knew your lordship set store by it."

"But they needn't know that."

"Certainly not!"

"And then, another thing, they would not be able to dispose of it to anyone! It is too well known!"

"In its present state it is; but, dear me, there are men in London who will buy any kind of jewels, and ask no questions."

"But how do they contrive to dispose of the stolen goods?"

"That, I imagine, is a secret best known to themselves. I should think very likely the jewels were picked out, the settings melted, and then remanufactured, or perhaps sent direct on to the continent."

"You seem to know all about it, Mr. Wild?"

"I do, your lordship. In my position as head police-officer it is necessary that I should know all about it."

"To be sure it is. But come, what is it to be?"

"That," said Jonathan, pushing his wig back on to the crown of his head. "That, as I said before, it would be best for you to name; but still, if your lordship wishes me to make a suggestion—"

"I do, Mr. Wild."

"That is sufficient. Then I humbly beg to suggest that you offer four thousand guineas for the necklace!"

"Four thousand guineas! Nonsense. You must be dreaming!"

"Your lordship forgets that you asked me to suggest an amount."

"I know, Mr. Wild. But I consider that beyond the bounds of all reason."

"I am sorry that your lordship is of such an opinion. It's quite erroneous, I can assure you—quite erroneous!"

Jonathan shook his head in quite a melancholy way.

"But, Mr. Wild, consider. You must surely have made some mistake. That is its full value."

Jonathan appeared to reflect for a moment.

"Look here, your lordship, its no advantage to me, I sacredly assure you, to advise you to give so much. In fact, if your lordship had not pressed me as you did, I should not have named a sum at all. However, you are not bound to follow my advice. Offer for its return whatever you think proper, and I will try what can be done."

It was now Lord Ingestrie's turn to reflect.

"I will tell you what I will do. I will offer three thousand pounds for the restoration of the jewel, which sum, Mr. Wild, I don't mind telling you, is one I can ill spare. Can you get it back for that?"

Jonathan Wild put his elbows on the desk, and rested his chin in his hands.

"Now, my lord, you have asked me a question to which it is impossible for me to give a reply. I will, as I told you in the first place, send out my agents to make inquiries for it. Should they be successful, they will offer the three thousand pounds; but whether the person who holds the necklace will give it up for that amount is more than I can tell."

"I comprehend."

"I am glad you do."

"But I do not like the idea of encouraging robberies in this way, Mr. Wild."

"Of course you don't. No more would anyone else. But this is it. The person who stole the necklace may be found, captured, convicted, executed; but that is all the satisfaction you would have, my lord. You would never see your diamond necklace again, unless under some form when you would not recognize it."

"I suppose such is the case; but surely, Mr. Wild, there is room for amendment in the law, and next session I shall assuredly bring the matter forward, and see if I cannot be the means of having an alteration."

"Do so, my lord—do so. You will obtain the thanks of the whole country at large."

A most infernal hypocrite was Jonathan Wild, for while he uttered this speech, so inimical as it was to his own interests, no one would have dreamed, to look at his face, that he was doing other than enthusiastically enunciating those opinions which he had nearest to his heart.

But he did not trust himself to speak further upon the subject.

"However, your lordship, I am too much occupied just now, and I dare say you are too to go any further into that subject. Let us see that we clearly understand each other about this diamond necklace!"

"Very good."

"Your lordship offers three thousand pounds if it is given up intact?"

"I do!"

"And give your word to take no ulterior steps in the matter?"

"I suppose I must say yes to that too, though it goes sadly against the grain."

"Then, your lordship," said Wild, getting down off his stool, and holding open the door, "if you will call here at this time to-morrow, I will give you a report of my success. Good morning, your lordship, good morning!"

"Good morning, Mr. Wild!"

CHAPTER VIII.

PLACES THE READER IN POSSESSION OF SOME FACTS RELATIVE TO JONATHAN WILD.

WITH the greatest of care, Jonathan Wild closed the door of his office after his noble visitor.

There was a contortion of his visage which might, by a stretch of the imagination, be construed into a grin.

He mounted his stool.

He lifted his hat.

There, on his desk, scattering faint scintillations of light from its numerous facets, was the diamond necklace.

Very rich, very chaste, very beautiful—but, above all, very valuable it looked.

The contortion on Jonathan's face expanded.

The cackling noise in his throat, which we have before described, began to make itself heard.

The great thief-taker was undoubtedly delighted beyond measure.

He picked up the necklace by the clasp at one end of it, and raised his arm so that it hung down in a straight line.

Jonathan gazed at it with great admiration.

Like many, he had a fancy for glittering ornaments, and he took care that there should be no lack of such things about his own apparel.

Few people at that time thought it, but they were all genuine.

And so the contemplation simply of the diamond necklace gave him pleasure.

But, much as he admired and liked it, he preferred the three thousand guineas which Lord Ingestrie had offered for its restoration.

In the position Jonathan now held the necklace, and as he communicated to it a slight rotatory motion, it sparkled and looked most gorgeous.

Then, having gazed his fill, he placed his other hand underneath it, and lowered it slowly into his palm, where it lay in a glittering, conglomerate heap.

He took hold of the clasp again, and amused himself by gently raising and lowering it in his hand.

It was a childish action, but it pleased the great mind of the great Jonathan Wild.

But his agreeable occupation was interrupted.

A hasty step sounded in the passage without.

A hand was placed upon the handle of the door.

Before he had time to do more than let the necklace fall wholly into his left hand and close his fingers over it, which only in a very insufficient manner concealed it, the door was opened, and Lord Ingestrie, looking heated and excited, rushed in.

With a presence of mind really admirable, Jonathan, without the least perceptible indication of embarrassment, carried his left hand to his coat pocket.

He dropped in the necklace, and was safe.

Turning towards Lord Ingestrie for an explanation of his unlooked-for and hasty intrusion, he noticed that there was an angry expression in his lordship's eyes.

"You are surprised to see me back, Mr. Wild, I have no doubt?"

Wild bowed in assent to the proposition.

"It is disgraceful—abominable, Mr. Wild—disgraceful in the extreme!"

"My lord?"

"That such things should happen in broad day in a crowded street! I say again it is abominable, Mr. Wild, and is the result of that system to which I have consented to become a party."

"I do not understand—you have not informed me what has taken place," said Wild, with some misgiving; "pray, my lord, be more explicit."

"Explicit! what do you mean, Mr. Wild?"

"Your lordship forgets that you have not yet told me what has happened that has so much disconcerted you."

"True!" replied Lord Ingestrie. "I had forgot! Excuse me, I beg."

"No apologies, my lord—no apologies! Pray tell me what is the matter?"

"This! You are perhaps aware I came here in my carriage!"

"I was not aware of it, though, of course, I did not suspect that you had come on foot."

"My man, while waiting for me it seems, walked the horses up and down the street."

"Just so, your lordship."

"Well, when I left your door I saw the carriage a little beyond the corner of Giltspur-street, and as I felt disinclined to wait on your doorstep until he drew up, I made him a sign that I would walk to the spot where the carriage then was."

"Yes—yes!"

"It was an unfortunate proceeding for me; for, before I had gone a dozen yards, a young chap ran up against me. I guessed at his object, and endeavoured to capture him, but he eluded my grasp, and was off round the corner of the Old Bailey like a shot."

"Good gracious!"

"And when I carried my hand to my pocket, I found my gold repeater, chains, and seals clean gone."

"Impossible!"

"I wish, with all my heart, it was. But my watch has gone—stolen from me in the presence of fifty people, and the thief escaped."

"It is a most unparalleled occurrence."

"Ought such a state of things to continue for a single moment?" asked his lordship, in a great rage. "Answer me that? But I'll rouse the country. I'll try if there can't be a stop put to such shameful, bare-faced robberies! I'll see what can and what can't be done!"

"I very much regret such a thing should have happened your lordship, very sorry. But surely you do not blame me in the matter?"

"Oh no!—oh no!" replied Lord Ingestrie, in a tone of voice that belied his words. "Only it seemed natural for me to run in here!"

"You were quite right in doing so, quite right! Rely upon it, everything shall be done that lies in my power to get it back again for you, and if possible, to punish the offender."

"Oh! I have no doubt of that, Mr. Wild," said his lordship, somewhat mollified.

"Can you give me a description of the thief?"

"Well, hardly. He was young and thin, and that's all I can say about him!"

"You must allow, my lord, that that description is rather vague!"

"I am conscious that it is—fully conscious."

"But, with respect to the watch and its appendages, I suppose you can be a little more precise?"

"Oh—yes," said Lord Ingestrie, who thereupon entered into a minute description of his watch and seals.

Jonathan took it down in some hieroglyphics which he was pleased to dignify by the name of writing.

"You trust to me, my lord," he said. "When you call here to-morrow for intelligence respecting the necklace, I will try if I cannot give you some of a satisfactory nature respecting your watch and seals."

"Thanks, Mr. Wild; and now I will go. This has been a most unfortunate affair for me altogether."

"It has," said Jonathan, pulling his wig forward vigorously, "and no one I am sure deplores it more than myself. The only consolation I have in the matter is, that I am in a position to do your lordship a service. If I could afford it, you should be put to no expense whatever."

"No, no, I don't wish that. It would not be fair. Good morning, Mr. Wild."

"Good morning, your lordship. I hope you will have better luck this time."

"I will try, at all events," said Lord Ingestrie.

Wild listened for the closing of the first door.

"Ha, ha!" he said, as soon as he heard the expected sound, "ha, na! Lost his watch! He, he!"

Jonathan put on his hat, and took up his pet.

"Not a bad morning's work, so far," he said. "What a fool Pinching Tom must be, to be sure! If he had just been civil, as he ought, he would have had his share of the swag!"

He looked round his office.

"I've a good mind to pay a visit to C. 7," he said. "I've a good mind, and I will too!"

Having come to this determination, Jonathan hastily left his office and passed out into the hall.

The man at the grating flung it open, and allowed Wild to pass through.

We have already described the route to the cells or dungeons beneath Wild's house.

Jonathan was soon at the door of C. 7.

He did not enter, though, nor did he even open the door.

Just about on a level with his face was a little square piece of wood, sliding in a groove, and this he pushed aside.

It disclosed a circular aperture, crossed by three iron bars.

Jonathan knocked at the cell door with his bludgeon, making a terrible clatter.

"Hi, Tom! Pinching Tom!" he said. "Where are you? I've come to see you, villain!"

A suppressed howl came to his ears.

"Oh! you are sulky, Tom, my friend, are you? You'll soon get over that! You'll know how to speak another time, and be civil to me; that is, if you have the chance! You're a clever chap, though, Tom, and I shouldn't like to part with you just yet. Now, then, are you going to speak or not, eh?"

"What do you want?" growled a voice.

"Speak respectfully, you villainous-looking wretch! Speak civilly, without you want to be trucked up on Monday! Do you hear?"

"Yes, Mr. Wild."

"If you had spoke as you ought when you came in, I should have given you something worth having for the necklace, but I offered you fifty pounds to make you know yourself better. Do you hear that, Tom?"

"I does, Mr. Wild, I does."

Pinching Tom's voice was becoming more submissive in its tone.

Perhaps he had come to the conclusion that it would be preferable to sacrifice some of his insolent bearing to losing his life on the scaffold, for he knew well enough Wild had the power to send him there.

"I hopes, Mr. Wild, as how you'll forgive me this time," he said, "and I will bring you something worth your while to have. I'm sure that necklace is more than any one else has ever brought!"

"Well, perhaps it is, Tom, perhaps it is! I've got a tender heart, Tom, and I couldn't go and sit down leaving you here. You promise to do differently in future?"

"I does, Mr. Wild; I does indeed, if you'll only let me out!"

CHAPTER IX.

GIVES THE READER A DEEPER INSIGHT INTO JONATHAN'S MODE OF LIFE.

JONATHAN WILD unlocked the cell door, and flung it open upon its hinges.

Pinching Tom came forth.

Straws were entangled in his hair, and clinging to various portions of his apparel.

On the whole, he looked much the worse for his brief sojourn in C. 7.

He stood before the great thief-taker in an attitude humble enough to satisfy him, and waited for him to speak.

"This is an act more clement, I can assure you, than I generally perform."

"I knows it, Mr. Wild."

"But I like you, Tom! You are a clever fellow! That's why I give you a chance for your life."

"Thanks, Mr. Wild!"

"Oh! stuff. Be off with you!"

"Yes, Mr. Wild."

"But mind you, if you don't act up to the square, so sure as I'm a living man I will have you convicted and executed; so mind that!"

There was something very horrible in the vindictive way in which Wild pronounced these words.

Pinching Tom shuddered.

"You may trust me, Mr. Wild, I am sure."

"Very well, come along, and say no more about it."

As he spoke, Wild fastened the door of No. 7, and preceded Pinching Tom along the passage, who was glad enough when he emerged into Newgate-street—never had it seemed to wear so bright an appearance as it did then.

But at present it is not Pinching Tom with whom we have to do, but Jonathan Wild.

Having thus released his prisoner, he ascended the broad flight of stairs in the hall, and entered a front room on the first floor.

This was his private apartment, where he repaired to solace himself with a glass, and cogitate upon the affairs of the day, and concoct new villainies for the morrow.

When he opened the door there arose from the hearth a dog who, with lowered ears and tail, slunk across the room towards him.

It was Jonathan Wild's dog.

He, with a sagacity that was almost human, had learned that submission was what his master liked to see, and he exhibited it accordingly.

But by no means was he a coward; he was cunning and ferocious as the thief-taker himself.

Had any one seen him they would have set him down as an ugly customer.

When in the streets—for he sometimes accompanied Jonathan in his excursions—he was looked at with suspicion by the passengers, and children ran terrified away, while other dogs, by various artifices, endeavoured to elude his observation.

In his way he was as much feared as his owner.

We do not know how it was that Jonathan Wild came to keep a dog, unless we account for it on the principle that all human natures, no matter how brutal, have a certain amount of affection which they find it is necessary to have some object to transfer to.

But one would think there was scarcely enough of this feeling in Jonathan Wild's disposition to make it requisite that he should have something to carry it off.

But, be that as it may, there was the dog, and one fact is worth a thousand theories.

Very short in the nose, very thick in the neck, very broad in the chest, very slim in the body was Jonathan Wild's dog.

He looked up in his master's face, and seeing there a rather more complacent expression than usual, ventured to prick up his ears, and in a feeble kind of way to wag his apology for a tail.

But he did not presume upon any further demonstration of affection.

He crept back to his position on the hearth.

Jonathan's face certainly did look calm and composed—wonderfully so.

He was illuding himself with the notion that he had, by releasing Pinching Tom, done a generous and noble action.

But it was policy alone that induced him to do what he had done.

Well enough he knew the value of him, and that it would be long before he found any one who could replace him.

Still he thought the little piece of discipline he had administered would be beneficial.

Whether it really was or no time alone can tell us.

Jonathan drew a chair to the table and sat down.

He removed his hanger from his waist, and stood it up against the mantel-piece.

Upon the table were a bottle, glass jug, a clay pipe, and several other articles.

He took up the bottle, and poured some fluid from it into the glass, which from its colour and odour was surely brandy.

Then he filled his pipe, lighted it, and leaned back in his chair.

Jonathan Wild was at ease.

He smoked with great deliberation, fixing his eyes first on the rude pictures, which certainly hid the nakedness of the walls, if they did no more, and then upon the smoke-begrimed ceiling.

And this was what Jonathan conceived enjoyment to be.

Some people have most eccentric ideas upon the subject.

But much as may be said against Jonathan's mode of enjoying himself, surely it was not so bad as those who flocked by thousands to see a poor woman risk her life in Aston-park the other day by walking on a trail rope stretched many feet above the ground.

They were gratified, doubtless, at the consummation of the tragedy—they were at any rate, if their behaviour afterwards be taken as a criterion.

In our opinion they were just a trifle worse than Jonathan Wild!

And that is saying a great deal!

Wild grew still more and more composed.

Things had gone well with him that day.

And now we think that as he is in such a happy frame of mind, we cannot do better than take the opportunity, as such a good one may never occur again, of giving the reader a yet clearer insight into Wild's household arrangements, and very questionable transactions.

It will save much future trouble, and assist greatly to make the reader fully comprehend what follows.

These details too, will be interesting in an historical point of view, since the writer has taken the trouble to peruse the Old Bailey records, from whence he has derived the fullest and most authentic information relative to Jonathan Wild.

In the course of the ensuing narrative, the whole of the facts he has gathered will be embodied, so that it may be relied upon as an authentic account of his entire career.

The same remarks will apply also to the other two prominent characters—Jack Sheppard and Joseph Blake, alias Blueskin.

These three individuals are universally allowed to be the most extraordinary characters which the criminal records of any country can exhibit.

The main thread or outline of this romance may therefore be relied upon as actual fact, the subsidiary portions being composed of simply such incidents as may call forth the deepest degree of interest.

It has been hinted a few pages back that Jonathan Wild had at his command a gang of desperadoes.

Such was the fact.

The principal members of this band were Blueskin, who was second in command to Wild himself, and Quilt Arnold.

Ostensibly a chief of the police, Jonathan was enabled to keep these men without suspicion or remark, since they were all attired in a precisely similar manner to the ordinary police force, and their duties were supposed to be similar also.

But such was very far from being the case.

Jonathan Wild had also established himself upon a firmer basis by ingratiating himself with the ruling powers by the discovery of Jacobite plots, and the delivery of the offenders to justice.

Such things just then were very common, for the change of dynasty had not endured for a period of time sufficiently long for the people to get used to it, and for the prejudices in favour of the occupation of the throne by the Stuarts, who had held it for so many generations, to become extinct.

Many people, therefore, who felt those very ticklish things called honour and conscience were concerned in the matter, endeavoured to fan the breath of rebellion in the land, and to some great extent succeeded.

The three first Georges had a mortal terror of the Jacobites, as all the adherents to the deposed king James were called, and they used every means they could devise for their extermination.

When therefore Jonathan showed himself instrumental in bringing many of these people to the scaffold, he was looked upon with an eye of favour by the Court party, and there is no doubt that this was the reason why many of his mal-practices were allowed to pass unnoticed.

But as he found himself so eminently successful, larger schemes of aggrandizement began to dawn upon Wild's mind.

He conceived and carried out the very original plan of organizing all the thieves of the metropolis into one body, who should all look to him as their leader.

The mode of operations was very simple.

Whatever booty they might be successful in obtaining was to be brought at once to Jonathan Wild, who gave them for it a certain sum of money, of course very much less than the real value of the articles, and yet more than they could obtain of the ordinary receivers of stolen goods in the metropolis.

He exercised over these men a tremendous power, since he was able, at any time, to get up a case against them, and have them convicted and executed.

Hence, it was clearly the best policy to keep friends with Jonathan Wild, for, so long as they did so, they were exempt from the penalty which the law demanded for their crimes.

But that was only one portion of Wild's business.

He not only trafficked with the thieves, but also, as in the case of Lord Ingestrie, with the persons from whom things had been stolen.

And incredible as such a scene as that described as taking place between Wild and Lord Ingestrie may be, yet it is no more than a bare statement of facts.

Of course there were many people who were robbed of highly-prized articles, who were glad to obtain Wild's assistance to get back their property for a consideration.

His statement with respect to the manner in which the stolen goods came into his possession was straightforward in the extreme.

His officers, he said, were mostly able, by making inquiries at places where thieves were known to congregate, to ascertain who had the article, and for what sum they would be willing to give it up, and no questions asked.

To this, for the reasons given, people were generally glad enough to agree.

Then, with an art that was really consummate, Wild always refused to make any charge for his trouble in getting back the stolen goods.

He pretended that it was a part of his duty, though, at the same time, he contrived to hint that he should not be offended if some gratuity were offered to him for his services, the amount of such gratuity to be proportionate to the worth they attached to what he had done.

In this way he avoided liability to the laws, for it was not until years afterwards, when his transactions came to light, that such a thing amounted to compounding a felony.

But, as the reader can already see, such was not Wild's precise method of carrying on his business.

All stolen goods were, in the first instance, brought direct to him, and, upon their handing them over to him, he gave a certain amount, running the risk whether there should happen to be any inquiries made about them.

Hence it often happened—as in the case of the diamond necklace—that Wild had the goods actually in his possession when people came to make inquiries about them, and employ him to get them back.

But Wild was always politic enough to allow a day or two, and sometimes a week to elapse, before the goods were restored.

By doing this he not only warded off suspicion, but apparently enhanced the value of his services.

But there was another contingency to provide against.

Of course a large proportion of the stolen goods he purchased were never asked about at all, so a means had to be devised for their safe and profitable disposal.

To do this Wild again exhibited his invention. A Dutch trading vessel was purchased by him, and provided with a crew.

This ship—or rather lugger—conveyed ostensibly ordinary merchandise, but it also served to transport the stolen property to Holland, where there was no danger nor difficulty of disposing of it at a large profit.

From this it must be evident that Jonathan amassed a large sum of money, though what became of it no one knows.

He certainly never spent it all himself.

The presumption is he had some place or places for secreting it, and where it was never found.

There was also another source of income which Wild had, and upon which we have not touched.

Provided, as he was known to be, with powers from the Secretary of State, which no one could form a correct estimate of, he did not scruple to seize upon many innocent people and immure them in the cells beneath his house, where, if they did not choose to submit to the extortion of a large ransom, they were denounced as Jacobites and traitors.

That a denunciation of such crimes at that period by no less an accuser than Jonathan Wild was equivalent to condemnation and execution is a well-known fact, so it is not to be wondered at, that people of the two evils chose the less, and submitted to be mulcted in a large amount.

But we have yet further to go.

Utterly indifferent upon the subject of Jacobinism or loyalty—though it is mentioned by many that he had a decided leaning towards the former—Jonathan did not scruple to act in the same manner with those who were really guilty of the crimes of which they were accused, and thus they had an opportunity, by giving Wild a large sum of money, of evading the consequences of their actions.

Then there is every reason to suppose that Wild, by lending himself to some rather underhand measures proposed by the government, contrived to extort large sums from them also, as well as immunity for his offences.

Thus, no matter how things stood, money was sure to come into Jonathan Wild's hands somehow.

CHAPTER X.

BLUESKIN INTRODUCES JACK SHEPPARD TO JONATHAN WILD.

"JACK—Jack! Lift up your head. Wake up! wake up! There's business to do, and if you are going to do it, you must not be sleeping here. Awake! Awake, I say!"

It was Blueskin who spoke.

The boisterous company, which had assembled at the "Black Lion," had gradually dispersed.

To them, as to wild predatory animals, the advent of the day was the signal for them to seek some place of concealment until darkness again descended upon the earth.

So one by one, as the faint light of the approaching day straggled into the kitchen of the old inn, its noisy occupants slunk away.

Some went into Drury-lane, who lost no time in diving into the numerous courts that there abound, and others into odd nooks and corners of the inn itself.

These were the favoured few to whom the landlord, Joe Johnson, extended his protecting arm.

And so, ere the rising sun had shed his first beams upon the roof-tops, Joe Blake and his old comrade's son were the only persons left in the apartment.

Jack was sleeping heavily—so heavily that Blake could not awaken him.

His arms had fallen upon the table and his head on to his arms, and there he lay like one dead.

His breathing was heavy.

He was sleeping off the effects of the deep potations in which he had indulged, and to which he was so unaccustomed.

Upon Blueskin they appeared to have taken no effect.

He shook Jack roughly, and lifted up his head.

But even that failed to arouse him in the least.

He let his head fall again on to his arms.

"It's no good trying to wake him up, I see," he said. "If I did he would be as stupid as an owl. He must sleep on, not here, though. Johnson, Johnson, my boy! come here!"

In obedience to his call the landlord appeared upon the threshold.

"This is a particular friend of mine," he said, "and you must find some place where he can have an hour or two's sleep."

"Oh! all right! I can soon do that, if you will bring him upstairs."

"That's no trouble," said Blueskin. "Here you go!"

So saying, he raised Jack in his arms, and followed the landlord out of the kitchen, along the passage, and up two flights of stairs.

Here the landlord pushed open a door, and Blake followed him into a double-bedded room.

In Blueskin's powerful arms Jack was no more than a child would be in the hands of most persons, so he walked across the room without an effort, and laid him on the bed.

"And what are you going to do, Blake?" asked the landlord, when Jack was thus satisfactorily disposed of.

"I must be off to my old quarters. Jonathan may want me, and I never like to be out of the way when he does."

"I s'pose not," said Johnson, descending the stairs.

"Ah! he's a wonderful man, is Mr. Wild—a wonderful man! Any one could see that with half an eye!"

"And," said Joe, "if you could look at him with both your eyes wide open, you would think him a wonderful man indeed."

"I daresay, I daresay."

"But, Johnson, my boy, the lad upstairs is the son of my old comrade! Look after him carefully. When he awakes, let him have just what he likes. I will be answerable for it."

"Very good."

"Do not, however, let him leave the place on any account. It will be some hours, I rather think, before he opens his eyes again! Tell him to expect me every minute!"

"Then you are coming back to-day?"

"Oh! most certainly, you may expect to see me soon after noon."

"Very well, Mr. Blake; you may depend upon things being just as you desire. Good-bye!"

The landlord watched Blueskin cross Drury-lane, and turn down White Horse-yard on the opposite side of the way.

"Ah!" he said to himself, "strange fellow, that! He seems all open and candid, but I can't make him out a bit—not a bit! He's a perfect mystery to me. Here sometimes he speaks like a blackguard, sometimes like a born gentleman! It's very strange. Perhaps I shall know who he is some day. I'll warrant, now, his name is no more Blake than it is Blueskin! I'd give no small trifle to hear his history, that I would! Perhaps I shall know it some day. Those that live longest stand the best chance of seeing and hearing most."

With this trite observation, the landlord of the "Black Lion" turned away from the street door to attend to his household duties.

It was almost twelve o'clock when Jack awoke from his lethargic slumber.

He looked about him for a few moments bewildered and surprised.

He could not make out how he came to be where he was.

There is scarcely anything more confusing to the perceptions than to wake up suddenly in a strange place which we have never before seen.

Jack just took one glance around him, and then closed his eyes again.

A measured and heavy footstep on the stairs attracted his attention.

He raised himself up a little on his elbow, and listened. But the effort was a painful one.

His head ached horribly.

Nearer and nearer, however, came the lumbering footsteps.

The door opened.

A face and form, of which he seemed to have some dim recollection, stood upon the threshold.

It was Joe Johnson, the landlord.

"So you've woke up at last, have you?" he said, roughly, but yet kindly. "Blest if I didn't think you had gone to sleep for good!"

"Who are you?" said Jack; "and what place is this? I seem to know your face, and yet I cannot recollect who you are."

"Me? Oh! I'm the landlord here. The "Black Lion", you know. This is one of my bed-rooms. Joe Johnson is my name. Mr. Blake put you there, and told me to look after you. Understand? He will be here directly."

"Blake—Blake!" repeated Jack, confusedly. "Blake? Who's Blake?"

"Oh, I can see there will be no good done with you in the way of talking just yet a bit. Take my advice. Lie still for half-an-hour. Don't go to sleep, though. You will find yourself better then. When you find your ideas getting out of a tangle, jump up and pour this jug of cold water over your head. You will be as right as a trivet then. Good bye to you. Don't forget, Mr. Blake will be here soon."

The landlord left the room.

Johnson's words exactly expressed the state of Jack's mind.

It was in a tangle.

By slow degrees, however, as he lay upon the bed with his eyes closed, all that had occurred on the previous night arranged itself chronologically in his thoughts.

He recollected the quarrel he had had with his master. How he had been taunted with being the son of a man who was hanged. How he had been called a thief. How he had rushed from his master's house into the streets with fierce, vindictive words upon his lips. How he had returned at that still hour of the night when first we saw him, and heaped curses upon his master's head. Then came the struggle with the watchmen. His escape. His entry into the "Black Lion." The man with the blue face. The mention of his father's name. What had been said; and after that all was blank.

But it was no difficult matter to fill up the hiatus of his thoughts.

By the time he had done this he felt wonderfully better.

His head ached, but his brain was no longer perplexed. He sprang from the bed, and seeing a huge pitcher of water, he followed the landlord's advice, and plunged his head completely into it.

The water, when it touched his inflamed skin, seemed icy cold.

It bubbled pleasantly about his ears and neck.

The pain ceased as if by magic.

It was such a relief, and so delightful to have his head under water, that he could not draw it out until his failing breath compelled him.

Then he felt wonderfully better.

Of a surety the landlord's treatment was efficacious, and he ducked in his head again and again, until at length he felt himself completely revived.

He proceeded then to arrange his apparel.

When he had finished he looked indeed very little the worse for his night's debauch. His eyes were bloodshot, and the lids full and overhanging, but that was all.

He stood, too, pretty firmly upon his legs.

"Let me see," he said, "the landlord told me, I think, I was to wait here until Blake, or Blueskin, as they call him, came. What does he want me for? Oh, I recollect—to join Jonathan Wild's band! I will do it, for something seems to tell me that the celebrated thief-taker and myself will be great friends. Perhaps, then, I may have my revenge upon John Roots! Oh, that would be sweet, indeed!"

The very thought of the distant prospect, even of consummating his revenge upon his master, appeared to endow him with a fresh accession of strength.

John Roots had raised up a more terrible enemy than he imagined.

Jack Sheppard stepped towards the door.

But just as he was about to fling it open and descend the stairs, he again heard the approach of some one.

He drew back at once.

That subtlety of intellect which pervaded all his actions prompted him instinctively to draw back rather than open the door, though he knew very well he had nothing to dread.

It was Blueskin.

"Bravo!" he said, on his entrance, on seeing how well Jack looked. "Bravo! Come along down stairs, and then to Jonathan Wild."

"I am ready," replied Jack. "I'll follow."

The pair quickly descended the stairs.

"In here first," said Blake, catching Jack by the sleeve, and dragging him through a little door on the right. "In here first."

It was the bar.

"Now Johnson, a couple of glasses of your best brandy, and then we're off!"

"Yes, Mr. Blake; with pleasure sir."

It was at first against Jack's inclination to imbibe any more spirits, but he was prevailed upon by his companion to do so.

"Just this one toothful," he said. "It is just what you require to set you right. You mark my words if you don't feel another man after it."

The toothful, as Blueskin called it, was a good-sized wine-glass full.

Nevertheless, Jack drank it off.

He became at once conscious of its effects.

The dull feeling which had oppressed him both bodily and mentally, passed away as if by magic.

Its effect was to produce a buoyancy of spirit, and a degree of recklessness which he had never before exhibited.

"Hurrah!" he said. "I'm all right now, and ready for anything."

"That's the ticket, then. We ought to lose no time, for I left Mr. Wild in his little room upstairs, where he always sits for an hour or two in the afternoon. That's when he's best tempered."

"Who cares whether he's good-tempered or bad, eh? I don't Blueskin, I don't."

Blake slapped him on the back just between the shoulders.

"Capital!" he said. "Capital! That was just like your father. Capital. But when you see Mr. Wild be civil, but bold."

"Oh, come along, I am ready to see him. Good bye, Johnson, old boy."

The landlord of the "Black Lion" looked quite agitated at the sudden change.

The fact was it was not altogether owing to the brandy having got into Jack's head that this sudden alteration took place, nor was it artificial and foreign to his nature. On the contrary, he had been noted for his recklessness, audacity, and good humour.

The events which we have at some length described, of course had for a time the natural result of diminishing the exuberance of his spirits, but with the elasticity of youth he had overcome all that.

"Now, Jack," he said, as they shaped their way towards Newgate-street; "just listen to me!"

He was encouraged by his strange and newly-formed friend, whom he followed eagerly to the street-door.

"Cut along."

"If you only manage matters carefully you will get on in the world. I have taken a great fancy to you, and I will look after you. Now, as you know, I am going to introduce you to Jonathan Wild."

"The great?"

"Yes; Jonathan Wild, the great! He is a great man, but, like all other great men, he has a weakness. It is harmless enough, and I won't say not natural enough, but it is a weakness notwithstanding."

"Oh! it is?"

"Yes."

"And what is yours?"

"Mine?"

"Yes, yours."

"I haven't one."

"How can that be?"

"Oh! easily enough."

"I don't see it."

"You don't?"

"Most certainly not."

"What did you tell me just now?"

"What about?"

"Jonathan Wild."

"And what about him?"

"You said that every great man had his weakness."

"I know I did, and it's quite true."

"Then what's your weakness? You don't mean to say you are not a great man?"

"Oh! stop your jokes. Listen to what I am going to tell you; you'll find it very important to you, indeed."

"Oh! bother; listen to me. If every great man has a weakness, is every one who has got a weakness a great man?"

"Bah!"

"Because, if that's the case—and your's aint good logic if it isn't—I am a great man. I've got a weakness—a strong weakness, too! I love all the pretty girls I see."

"Don't be a fool, Jack, or I'm off, mind that. 'Woman's the devil,' as the old proverb says, and you'll find it out one of these days if you don't watch it."

"Never mind; I shall love them just the same bless their hearts. But what do you want to tell me?"

"Ah! now you're getting a little bit reasonable. Really, since you had that nip of brandy, you don't seem like the same."

"Oh! I feel all right, and as happy as a king. The only drawback is, I haven't had an opportunity of serving old Roots out."

"An opportunity will be sure to occur sooner or later, Jack, so don't let that trouble you. Now, here we are, at the corner of the Old Bailey, so if you want to hear how you are to behave to Mr. Wild, and have any regard for your neck, you'll listen patiently to what I've got to say."

"I am listening," said Jack.

CHAPTER XI.

RELATES THE MANNER IN WHICH JACK SHEPPARD COMMITTED HIS FIRST ROBBERY.—THE ALARM.

He looked up at the large, black, gloomy-looking prison as he spoke.

Old Newgate!

Not the present uniform-looking structure, but the building which preceded it.

Little did Jack think, as he gazed upon the shining walls, how intimately that structure and himself were to be connected, and the fate for which he was predoomed.

But, in fact, he had no opportunity for thought, for his companion spoke to him earnestly.

"There is nothing," said he, "which Mr. Wild thinks so much of as being treated with respectful submission: mind that! He does not like one who is afraid to move or speak, nor yet one that would cheek him in his own house."

"I understand."

"He is a man who possesses an unlimited extent of power; therefore it is to the advantage of everyone to keep on the right side of him! He allows me to make freer with him than anyone else, but even I am careful."

[JACK SHEPPARD RESCUING THE SHROUDMAKER.]

"Oh!"

"Look, here is his house. This is his door. Now, Jack, don't forget to bear in mind what I have told you. If he is pleased with you, he will engage you at once."

"Don't be afraid."

"I tell you for your own good," said Blueskin, producing a key from his pocket, with which he opened the street-door of Wild's house. "Come in."

Jack stepped into the hall with a confident air.

But, although Blueskin could thus at pleasure enter Wild's house, yet it was none the less guarded. Taking pattern by the prisons, to which Wild's house altogether bore a strong resemblance, he had a man stationed at each door of any importance, whose duty it was to see that none passed the portal except those who had a right to do so.

This office was taken in turns by Wild's men, and the man at the post was termed "on the lock."

Tonks was "on the lock" on this occasion.

Poor Tonks, who had received such summary and condign punishment for daring to laugh at his august master!

He got up when he saw Blueskin enter.

He put his hand to his back with a rueful and piteous air as he hobbled forward, making many a strange grimace the while.

Apparently Jack saw in it the elements of something mirthful, for he laughed unrestrainedly.

Tonks scowled at him.

"Ha! ha! you may laugh, my young spark! Some time or other you'll know what it is to laugh on the wrong side of your face. Curse you! Oh—o—oh! Murder! The devil!"

A sudden accession of pain in the region of Tonks's back made him utter these sudden cries and twist himself into sundry curious shapes.

"This way," said Blueskin. "You'd better mind what you're at, or you'll find yourself in the same state as he is."

"What's the matter?"

"Oh! he offended Mr. Wild this morning."

"Well!"

"So Jonathan gave him two smacks with his bludgeon—pet he calls it."

Jack whistled.

"Oh! that's Mr. Wild, is it? Now, what did he do to offend him?"

"Laughed!"

"Eh? What? Oh! gammon. You don't mean to say he had that for laughing?"

"I do though; but silence! This is Mr. Wild's room. Don't say another word."

Blueskin tapped with his knuckles upon the panel of the door.

Jack was not quite at ease.

He drew an unfavourable conclusion with regard to Jonathan's character, from the fact that he had maltreated one of his men for such an offence.

Fain would he, if he had the power, have drawn back.

But a harsh, inarticulate growl, which might be translated into "Come in!" arose from the other side of the door.

Blueskin opened it at once and beckoned Jack.

Jonathan Wild was in pretty much the same position as he was when we saw him last—that is to say, seated at the table smoking his pipe, and occasionally solacing himself with a draught somewhat stronger than water, which stood on the table before him.

He had taken off his hat and wig.

His hideous physiognomy, with its numerous scars and patches, was therefore displayed to the greatest perfection.

He glanced at the new comer with some surprise.

Blueskin walked up to the table.

Jack Sheppard crossed the room, and, taking off his hat, made Jonathan a bow, in which respect, dread, and insolence were curiously mingled.

Wild's dog rose from the hearth, and looked up into Jack's face with a dubious glance.

Jonathan acknowledged Jack's bow by removing his long clay pipe from his mouth.

Blueskin, with an amount of familiarity which no one else dare assume, filled a glass from Jonathan's bottle.

He held it half-way to his lips.

"Mr. Wild," he said, "I have to-day a great and unexpected pleasure, one that I"—

"Ya—ah!"

Wild was getting impatient.

"I have the pleasure, Mr. Wild, of introducing to your favourable notice the only son of my esteemed comrade, Tom Sheppard."

Jack made another bow.

Blueskin took a sip from the glass.

"Tom Sheppard, the creaksman?" ejaculated Wild, looking at Jack with growing interest. "Tom Sheppard, the creaksman?"

"The very same, Mr. Wild," said Blueskin, "he's been driven from his master, and wants you to take him into your service."

Jack made a third bow to confirm the truth of what Blueskin had advanced, but he did not speak.

Wild was conciliated.

He filled a glass and pushed it towards Jack.

"Very glad to see you," he said, in an amiable tone as he could assume. "Act square, and then all's right, ain't it, Blue?"

"It is, Mr. Wild. And as for my friend Jack here, I can answer for him. He'll turn out a great man, Mr. Wild, I am sure of it."

"Ya—ah! What's he going to do? Father's business, a?"

"Exactly, Mr. Wild. I'll put him up to it."

"Ah, do! Does he know the conditions?"

"Not yet, Mr. Wild."

"Oh!"

"I thought it best not to say anything about it till I had brought him before you, and found whether you were inclined to take him into your service."

"Right," said Jonathan, approvingly. "Then I'll tell him myself, eh?"

"If you don't mind the trouble, Mr. Wild, it would, perhaps, be quite as well."

Artful Blue.

Those were the speeches Wild delighted to hear.

And he knew it.

"Sit down, then," said Jonathan, graciously. "Fill up your glasses, and then we'll talk business."

"Yes, Mr. Wild."

Jack drew up a chair to the table, and sat down in it with a careless air, as though he felt quite at home.

The glasses were filled to the brim, and Wild relighted his pipe.

He turned towards Jack.

"Ah! well," he said, "you've heard what my lieutenant has said about you! What's your name?"

"Jack, Mr. Wild."

"Well, Jack, and you're quite willing to assist me, eh?"

"I am," said Jack, "and I hope you'll prove a better master than my last was."

"That will depend entirely upon yourself. Who was your master?"

"John Roots."

"The carpenter of Wych-street?"

"That's him."

"I know him," said Wild, "and so you were his apprentice?"

"I was, but I was forced to run away, and then I met my father's old friend, who told me he would bring me to you, Mr. Wild."

"Oh! A-hem! Have you seen much of the world, Jack?"

"There are many who have seen more."

"Of course. But has your experience showed you that the world is divided into two portions?"

"Rather!" said Jack. "Rich and poor."

"Ya—ah!"

"Is that wrong, Mr. Wild?"

Jonathan looked at him contemptuously.

"You're a babby!" he said, "a green sucking babby!"

This was touching Jack upon a vulnerable spot.

He jumped up off his chair.

It was his ambition—his vanity—to be thought a man.

Such is generally the case with young men of a boyish aspect, as Jack was.

"Ya—ah!" said Jonathan, whose choler began to rise.

"What do you mean?"

"Sit down, Jack," said Blueskin. "It's all right. Don't be a fool. You made a little mistake, that's all. You didn't understand Mr. Wild. Sit down again, and he will explain."

Thus persuaded, Jack resumed his seat.

"I thought you hadn't cut your wisdom teeth yet!" continued Jonathan, "but you are a lad of spirit, I can see."

"You make no mistake there, Mr. Wild."

"Hold your row, Blue, and let me talk to Jack here. Well, as I said, the world is divided into two unequal portions—those who rob, and those who are robbed."

"I see."

"It is quite evident you must be one or the other, but it appears to me you have not had the privilege of making your choice."

"That's just it, Mr. Wild," said Jack, with the least tinge of sadness in his words. "They won't believe I am honest."

"Of course not; so the best thing you can do is to make them right. You will never be forgiven if you don't."

Jack was silent.

"Now," pursued Wild, who was certainly either in a most temperate mood that afternoon, or else, with that keen eye of his, had seen the value such an adherent as Jack would be to him, "you have only this to do—act square."

"In what, Mr. Wild?"

"Business, of course. If you get anything bring it to me, and I will buy it of you at a fair price, but if you attempt to set up in business on your own account, by taking your goods elsewhere, look out for your neck."

that's all. But, while you keep in with me, I'll promise you to get you out of all trouble. Do you understand?"

"I think I do, Mr. Wild," said Jack, bluntly. "You must get all you can, bring me the money, I'll pay you for it, and you shan't have anything to fear for the"—

Jack made an expressive gesture with his hand and his neck.

"That's it, Jack," interrupted Blueskin. "That's it. It don't take you long to see through a ladder. Ah! you'll turn out a great man one of these days! Fill up your glass, if you please, Mr. Wild, and drink to the health of JACK SHEPPARD!"

"Ya—ah! Shan't! Hold your row! Mind your own business!"

Then, turning to Jack, he said—

"You understand?"

"Quite."

"Be off, then, and be hanged to you both!"

CHAPTER XII.

JACK GETS AN INKLING OF A NICE LITTLE PLOT, WHICH HE DETERMINES TO FRUSTRATE.

UPON receipt of this gentle intimation that the interview was over, our friends withdrew.

They paused at the street door.

"What am I to do next?" asked Jack.

"Anything you like until twelve to-night, and then I will meet you at the 'Black Lion.' I intend to crack a crib to-night, and for you to go with me, just to get your hand in, you know."

"What time is it now?"

"Five minutes to six."

"I have, then, six hours to do what I please?"

"Just so. Six hours and five minutes. Take care of yourself, and mind you are there at the time."

"Trust me for that. But ain't Wild a rum bloke?"

"He is," said Blueskin, with a smile. "But I wouldn't advise you to let him hear you say it."

"No, no. Open the door. I'll be off."

"Away with you. Recollect the 'Black Lion' at twelve!"

The door of Jonathan Wild's house was banged after him.

Jack ran down the steps into Newgate-street.

There he paused.

"What am I to do now?" he asked. "Walk about, I suppose. I wonder what they call this? Is it destiny, I wonder? Only just think what extraordinary things have happened since I left old Roots yesterday! Ah! well, as Jonathan said, I was born to prey upon society, so what's the good of trying to contend against fate, eh?"

All notions of right and wrong were not yet extinct in Jack's breast, and so he called sophistry to aid him to persevere in the course he had marked out.

Although the hour was an early one, yet it was growing quite dark.

Indeed, that evening it was dusk at least an hour before its usual time, for the sky was completely covered with thick black clouds.

It seemed to promise to be a favourable night for the business in which Jack was to be engaged.

He was rather at a loss, however, to know how to pass the time until the hour of his appointment.

He sauntered slowly down Snow-hill, and so on into Holborn, then a very different thoroughfare to what it is now.

When night came it was very badly illuminated indeed, since all the light there was proceeded from flickering oil lamps, suspended for the most part on ropes, which stretched from one side of the street to the other.

When Jack reached Middle-row he turned into a small public-house. He thought to wait there would be preferable to idling about the streets.

But one person was in the taproom when he entered.

His age might have been guessed at forty.

His attire was rich, but very plain.

The sword, too, which he had unbuckled from his side, and laid upon the table before him, was beautifully fashioned, and such as was worn only by gentlemen of distinction.

Jack noted this before he took his seat.

He called then for refreshment, and, as he sat there, more leisurely examined the appearance of this gentleman, who, when Jack entered, had just glanced up at him and no more.

An indefinable curiosity to know who he was took possession of Jack Sheppard, who was naturally of an inquisitive disposition.

Yet why he felt an interest in this stranger he could not tell, unless it was that his mind just then required some occupation.

"I should like to know who he is," he thought, "and what brings him here, and I will, too. I'll find it out. It will just be something to do until twelve o'clock. There is something going on, I know, or the likes of him would not be in a place of this sort. I'll keep my eye upon him."

And so he did.

Not to all appearance, though, for he feigned to be gazing listlessly at the wall before him.

But Jack's sight was keen.

Not the slightest movement of the stranger was unnoticed by him.

He saw, too, that his face was far from being a pleasing one.

There was a restless movement about the eyes that betokened suspicion and distrust, perhaps even treachery.

His form was rather inclined to corpulency. His face was full, and his cheeks puffy.

In accordance with the fashion of the time, he wore upon his head a peruke.

Near his hand was a bottle of wine, to which he paid frequent attention.

Presently he rose, and walked with a hurried step up and down the room.

At length he paused before the window, and looked out.

Jack felt more and more convinced that something was going on, and though certainly it was no business of his, yet he determined to find out all about it.

The stranger stood at the window for about twenty seconds.

Then, with a gesture of impatience, he turned away, and sat down again.

He played nervously with the trappings of his sword, and his lips moved rapidly.

But what he said Jack could not tell.

Then, from some under portion of his apparel, he produced a watch, so thickly studded with diamonds that it actually seemed to emit little rays of light.

This gave Jack's thoughts a new turn.

"I should just like to know," he thought, "what old Jonathan would give for a thing of that sort? I've half a mind to take it and try, and I will, too!"

That was rather a difficult thing to determine upon, for, after just glancing at the dial, the stranger hastily put it back in an inner pocket, and drew his waistcoat over it, which then were made almost as long as the coats themselves.

With an indifference, which was most assuredly affected, the stranger leaned his back against the wall, and closed his eyes.

But his hands still played restlessly with the sword hilt.

"Now, I would bet anyone a guinea," said Jack, mentally, "that he has got an appointment here with some one, and either he is here too early, or his friend is behind his time."

Scarcely had Jack made this reflection than he heard a hasty footstep in the passage without.

The next moment the door opened, and a man hurried into the room.

It was plain enough to be seen that his rank in life was much lower than the stranger's, for, though he had the air of a confidant, yet his demeanour was respectful in the extreme.

He removed his hat, nor did he venture to sit down until the other waved his hand for him to do so.

Jack strained his hearing to the utmost, but what the new comer had to say was uttered in so low a tone that nothing more than a humming, murmuring sound made its way to where Jack was.

Then he observed that anxious and suspicious glances were cast upon him.

He was a bar to their conversation.

But Jack did not mind that.

Suddenly, however, the stranger banged the bottom of the bottle, from which he had been drinking, on to the table.

A girl appeared in answer to the summons.

"Where is your master?" asked the stranger, in an imperious voice.

This was the first time Jack had heard him speak, and he paid particular attention to the intonation.

There was something so peculiar about it that he felt sure, let him hear it under what circumstances he might, he should be sure to recognize it.

"He is in the bar, sir," said the girl timidly, for the way in which he had spoken had awed her.

"Tell him to come hither, then; I want him!"

"How uncommon polite he is in his manner of speaking, to be sure," muttered Jack.

The landlord of the public-house entered hastily, wiping his hands upon his apron.

"You sent for me, sir, I believe," he said. "What is it you require?"

"A private room, if there is such a thing to be had in the house. I will pay you for it."

"Of course, sir—of course! I am sorry, sir, but the only private room we have"—

"Is engaged, I suppose," said the stranger, rising.

"No, sir—oh! no, sir, I was not going to say engaged, but it is upstairs, sir, if you please, if that will be no objection!"

"None in the least—none in the least. All the better."

"Very good, sir, would you please to step this way. It's the room just over this one, sir, and we use it to sit in ourselves."

The landlord, who was inclined to be rather morigerous, preceded his guests out of the tap-room.

Jack listened to their receding footsteps along the passage, and then heard them ascend the stairs.

"Confound them all. What do they mean by baulking me in that fashion. But I'll be even with them, I'll bet. I don't know how it is, but I feel uncommonly desirous of knowing what it is they have got to say to each other. Some rascality, evidently, or they would not be so afraid of being overheard."

Jack emptied his glass and looked up at the grimy ceiling.

"The room just over this, is it? How in the world, now am I to hear what they say? I must make haste if I am to do it, or they will be done. I can't hear where I am, that's quite clear, and as for going up-stairs, why that might be awkward; besides I don't know where they are. Ha! there's some one coming down. I'll listen."

Jack jumped up and ran to the door.

"Oh! it's the landlord, I suppose, coming down again. Why the stairs must be just on the other side of the passage, surely."

In another moment Jack heard the landlord reach the floor.

Then a door closed.

"I'll do it," said Jack. "I'll do it, and risk the consequences. They had better not interfere with me, that's all."

He projected his head a little way into the passage.

An oil-lamp, which burnt in that dim fashion incidental to all oil-lamps, so far from lighting up the place, only confused it with the numerous shadows which it cast.

Jack looked both up and down the passage.

No one was visible.

His hearing had not deluded him. There, on the opposite side to where he stood, and a few feet lower down, was the staircase.

"There's nobody about," said Jack, "no one at all: so here goes."

He crossed the passage and sprang up the staircase like a ghost.

CHAPTER XIII.

JACK SHEPPARD ENDANGERS HIS LIFE THROUGH MEDDLING WITH MATTERS THAT DON'T CONCERN HIM.

It was most certainly very daring of Jack to run up the stairs in that manner, but he did not pause to reflect that he was going the right way to get his head into trouble.

Up he went.

The stairs were dark and steep, but without once stumbling he gained the top.

He was rather perplexed then what to do.

He could positively see nothing, for the staircase had no windows.

There was only one thing to be done.

Placing his hand against the wall, and feeling his way along it, Jack crept forward.

When he had proceeded in this manner about half-a-dozen steps a fresh and apparently insuperable difficulty arose.

He could hear some one coming upstairs.

What was to be done?

Advance he dared not, since he had no idea what was before him.

There appeared to be no hiding place.

Jack was nonplussed.

Before he could recover from his bewilderment sufficiently to think a little, whoever it was that was coming had got almost to the top of the stairs.

Then Jack saw the reflection of a light.

Then the jingling of glasses.

"Oh! hang it all, what shall I do?" he said. "It's the landlord, I know, bringing them something to drink, and a candle! It's all up with this job, for he'll see me, of course. It's aggravating not to be able to do what you make up your mind to, but it can't be helped. Eh! yes it can! dear me! stop now!"

These incoherent sentences meant that as he put his hand against the wall he felt a door.

His first impulse was to turn the handle, but he immediately saw how impolitic such a proceeding would be, so he paused.

Likely enough it was the door of the very room in which the two visitors were, and if so, the act of opening it would be to insure immediate discovery.

But there was no time to be lost.

He listened at the door.

Not the faintest murmur reached his ears.

"They cannot be in here, surely," he said, "or else I should hear voices. There is nothing else to be done. I'll chance it!"

Jack turned the knob, and found the door open to his hand.

All was darkness within.

"Here goes," he muttered. "I must chance it now!"

So saying, he slipped inside the room, and closed the door silently.

He heard the landlord in the passage.

To his surprise, too, he could hear quite plainly the murmuring of voices.

Still he did not venture to stir. He waited until his eyes had become familiar with the darkness.

The landlord passed the door of the room in which he had so opportunely taken refuge.

But he heard him open another, very close indeed to it.

At the same moment he heard a voice, which he identified as the first stranger's, say—

"Now, landlord, quick! You have been a long time gone; I don't like to be left in the dark."

Jack was not a little astonished at the plainness where-with he heard what was said. He could scarcely believe that he was not in the same room with the speakers.

And then he noticed, as he turned his face in the direction whence the sounds came, that a few rays of light found their way in, and to some slight extent assisted him to define several objects.

"It's a partition," said Jack, to himself. "Bravo! Fate is in favour of me, clearly. I shall, without the least trouble in the world, hear every word they say without any one being a bit the wiser; that is," he added, "if no one comes in here bothering."

"That will do, that will do," Jack heard the stranger say impatiently. "You can leave us now, and mind that we are not disturbed."

"Yes, sir, I'll take care of that, sir! If you should want anything you will find a hand-bell on the tray."

Jack heard the door close, and the landlord, after traversing the passage, descend the stairs.

Feeling then a little more secure, he adventured with most cautious footsteps to draw yet nearer to the screen, or partition that divided the two rooms the one from the other.

To do this the utmost caution was necessary.

Should he by any accident come in contact with any one of the many articles of furniture there might be in the room, a sound would be produced.

The result of that sound would be his discovery.

Therefore Jack, with a tread as silent as a cat's, made his way slowly forward.

The mode in which he did so was strange.

He crouched down and held out his arms as far as possible in advance of him.

Then, little by little, he crawled across the room.

A carpet was laid upon the floor, and this was wonderfully in his favour.

But the apartment was of no very great extent, so that, although his rate of progression was slow, yet it took but a few seconds for him to reach the partition.

We have said that there were several crevices in this partition, and that through them a few straggling beams of light found their way.

They stretched in long pencils across the floor.

Seeing this, Jack thought there was, if he drew nearer, a chance of his not only being an auditor of the interview between the two guests, but a spectator also.

In this anticipation he was disappointed.

The chinks were not wide enough for him to see through.

He must, therefore, be content with hearing what was going to take place.

In order to do this most conveniently he seated himself on the floor, as close to the screen as he dared, without risking discovery.

It would seem in the short space of time which ensued after the landlord closed the door, and while Jack acted and reflected as we have recorded, that the occupants of the private room did no more than pour out and drink some portion of the wine which had been brought them. Certainly no word was uttered by either of them.

As secrecy appeared so important a desideratum in their conference, it is probable enough they were silent for this brief period in order to make sure that the landlord actually passed down the passage and descended the stairs.

Jack waited now very anxiously for them to speak.

He was not long kept in suspense.

A chair was moved uneasily upon the floor.

Then the first stranger spoke. Jack knew it was him for there was something so uncommon in his intonation that, once heard, it would ever afterwards be recognized.

"And so, Steggs, you are quite sure you are right—made no mistake—eh?"

"None at all, your lordship. I have been careful in the extreme."

"That is well!"

"I am glad," said the man who had been called by the rather peculiar name of Steggs, "I am glad that your lordship thinks that what I have done is well."

The tones were fawning and servile in the extreme.

No great amount of penetration was required to see in what position he stood with the whom he had called "your lordship."

"Well now, as there is no time to lose, Steggs, and as we are entirely free from the fear of being overheard, state as simply as you can, what you have discovered and done, so that an ultimate plan of operations may be resolved upon."

"I will, your lordship. In obedience to your commands, I set out this morning to make inquiries relative to the truth of the statement that had been made to your lordship, that your brother's daughter, whom all thought dead, was alive."

"Yes—yes. I know all that. Go on—go on."

"I am going on, your lordship; only I understood that I was to mention the whole of the particulars; but that is a little error on my part which I must intreat your lordship to forget."

"Never mind—never mind. Proceed."

"I went to Prince's-street, Little Turnstile, as you directed. It is a most horrible place, my lord. Faugh! it makes me quite sick to think about it."

There was a jingling of glasses for a moment as though Mr. Steggs was so overcome that he was compelled to have recourse to the wine.

"It was to No. 16 I went. It is a miserable, runous tenement, but a large one, and in the occupation of many persons."

"Yes—yes."

"I will pass over the difficulties I had in ascertaining, without asking the direct question, what portion of the house Mrs. Roblet occupied, but briefly say it was a large room on the top floor."

"So far, then, the statement was corroborated."

"Yes, my lord, and even much further. You were told Mrs. Roblet gained a livelihood by making shrouds, and such I found actually the case."

"Yes. And did you find that—that?"

"She employed girls to assist her in their manufacture? I did, my lord. Sometimes, when trade was good, she had as many as twelve or fourteen; but now she employs only one."

"Ah! and that one?"

"Is a girl who lives somewhere in the purlieus of Drury-lane. She is miserably poor, for work performed by women is rarely well remunerated; but in spite of her poverty she is clean and neatly dressed, while an air of good breeding pervades her every action, and is quite sufficient to show even the most casual observer that there is noble blood in her veins."

"Indeed—is it so?"

"It is, my lord; and that she is the daughter of your lordship's brother there cannot, I think, be the shadow of a doubt."

A sudden movement, as though his lordship had started to his feet, made itself heard, and then a hurried striding up and down the room.

"Confound your caution, Steggs," muttered Jack, "why couldn't you have just said whose daughter she was, eh?"

CHAPTER XIV.

JACK RESOLVES UPON THE FRUSTRATION OF HIS LORDSHIP'S DELECTABLE PLOT.

JACK SHEPPARD was completely carried away by the intense feeling of interest which the fragmentary conversation created in his breast, and he was quite wild to think the man Steggs had been so near letting out the name of this girl's father, and then after all had not done so.

His lordship paced up and down the room for full five minutes, and then he flung himself into a chair.

Mr. Steggs was silent.

He was waiting to be spoken to.

Jack could hear his own heart go thump, thump, thump, against his breast with most alarming violence.

He felt afraid it would be heard.

But that dread was soon overcome, for he heard again his lordship address Mr. Steggs.

He was evidently greatly agitated.

"What is to be done, Steggs?" he said, "what is to be done? Do not be afraid to speak. You know that you and I have no secrets from each other. You tell me that you can entertain no reasonable doubt about what Williams stated on his death-bed being true, namely that the—little child had been spared by him instead of—well—well—you know."

"There can be no doubt of its truth, my lord. Everything, so far from invalidating his confession, tends only to confirm it. He told you he had disobeyed your orders. That the child, instead of quitting this world, had been placed by him in a family in Charles-street, Drury-lane. That he had watched over her all his life, and that at present she was occupied by an old woman named Roblet as a shroud maker."

"And you have found all these details correct, you say?"

"Every one of them."

"As you have said, then, there is no room for doubt, what is to be done Steggs, what is to be done?"

Again his lordship jumped up from his chair, and paced up and down the room.

"Something, your lordship, must be done, for, of course, you don't wish all the estates to pass out of your hands into this girl's, as they assuredly would by the conditions of your brother's will. It was her disappearance, mysterious as it was, which shortened his days, and you know the clause which he inserted to be acted upon in the event of her ever being found. What do you think, my lord?"

"Think, Steggs? I asked you to think. What is it?"

that must be done? that something must be I know full well."

"If I should advise, my lord, I should say get rid of her. Put it out of her power to ever appear and prove her identity."

"No, no, Steggs, I have been bad enough—am bad enough—but I could not deliberately plan the murder of a young and beautiful girl; you said that she was beautiful, Steggs, did you not?"

"I did, my lord."

"I could not do it, Steggs, I could not do it."

"Do what?"

"Murder her!"

"Then," muttered Jack, between his teeth, "you are not quite so bad as I took you for, and I am glad of it."

"Surely your lordship never contemplated such a thing. It would be hazardous in the extreme. Fools only think of disposing of a person by murder! A thousand things arise to cause detection. The disappearance of the victim, the insuperable difficulties there are in the way of getting rid of a body when the life has been removed; all these, my lord, combine to make murder out of the question."

"I am glad of that, very glad. But how is she to be got rid of?"

"The modes are numerous. It remains for you to choose whichever you may consider the safest and the best."

"Speak out, then," said his lordship, resuming his seat. "You are craftier than I am. Speak out: Tell me the one which, in your politic brain, you think most likely to succeed."

There was a moment's silence.

The interest with which Jack continued to listen to this conference is indescribable.

Already he could see that a scheme of deep villainy was afoot, of which all that he had heard was but the induction, and his impatience to know what it was the man Steggs would propose was painful in the extreme.

He was at no loss to gather from the conversation he had heard a succinct account of the whole affair.

The elder brother of the man who was addressed by Steggs as my lord, had evidently possessed some valuable estates.

His sole heiress was his daughter, and to her was everything bequeathed.

But his younger brother coveted the estates.

A child was all that prevented him from having them.

This child he had caused to be abducted by a man named Williams, to whom he had given instructions to destroy its life.

But on his deathbed this man confessed the truth, and pointed out where the girl could be found, as he imagined, to the man Steggs, who had made the younger brother acquainted with his dying statement, and had sided with him to keep the property from its lawful owner.

This was simply the state of the case.

But already had Jack determined to frustrate this plan, let it be what it might.

Hence his anxiety and impatience to know what Steggs would utter next.

At last he spoke.

His voice was low and cold.

"My lord," he said, "we will start with a disputable proposition, and that is, that it lies in the power of two persons, acting in concert, to take away with impunity the life of a third party."

"Is this so?"

"Assuredly. Well is justice represented blind, since her decrees are as fallible as they well could be."

"But what is it that is to be done?" again asked his lordship. "Time passes. What would you do?"

"Make her a felon!"

"A felon?"

"Yes, a felon."

"But how can such a thing be done?"

"There is no difficulty in finding the means. It can be done, and, my lord, you will be safe."

"Indeed! How so?"

"Can it be possible your lordship is unacquainted with the circumstance that by the laws of England a felon—a convicted felon—can never succeed to an inheritance?"

"True! I was aware, but had forgotten it. I see now, Steggs. You would get her convicted—transported—and trouble no more in the matter."

"Precisely so, your lordship. Do you approve of my plan of action?"

"It is a devilish one."

"Your lordship flatters me."

"God forbid! No, no, Steggs, your plan is good, unquestionably, but it has one fault."

"One fault?"

"Yes; it is too intricate."

Steggs was silent.

"And not only that, too tedious. Setting aside the trouble there would be to get up and sustain a case that would entail conviction, think, in the meantime, what a many chances there might be of all being discovered. No, no, Steggs, that will not do."

"I am sorry you think so, your lordship. But what is it you yourself advise?"

"Some plan involving promptitude of action—something that can be put into execution and completed in half-an-hour."

"Boldness and rapidity are good qualities in a scheme, but the risk is always so much increased."

"I think the risk could scarcely be greater than the one you have proposed. In that there are so many circumstances, and all so dependent upon one another, that, like some long chain by which a prisoner is descending from a fearful height, should one link be imperfect, destruction would be inevitable."

"You are right, my lord, but I think it possible to make every link perfect. Still, what is it you propose?"

"This," said his lordship. "You say you know the place where she is employed?"

"I do."

"It is close by here, is it not?"

"Scarce ten minutes' walk."

"It wants now just that much of nine. Look here, Steggs. At such an hour as this, it is probable she will be making her way homewards."

"Quite so, your lordship."

"Then take me there at once."

"What would you do?"

"Let us both set upon her and bear her off to a place of security. Her ultimate fate will depend upon herself."

"Then," said Steggs, "if such is your determination, and it is to be carried out to-night, we must leave her this moment."

"So much the better. Come, then, lead me to her work-place. We will wait there for her to come out. We can manage between us to stifle her cries, and put her into a hackney-coach!"

"It can be done," said Steggs. "The spot, too, is most favourable, for after dark it is most lonely. As of course you are aware, it is close to Lincoln's Inn-fields, and, to reach her home, she will have to pass down Gate-street and Duke-street."

"Precisely so."

"That, then, will be the place. It is a thousand chances if any one is in sight or hearing."

The door was flung open, and the worthy couple descended the stairs, in order to set out on their nefarious errand.

"Thank goodness!" said Jack, scrambling to his feet, "I can put a stop to that."

CHAPTER XV.

JACK SHEPPARD MAKES A FRIEND WHO CLINGS TO HIM THROUGH LIFE.

It was very easy for Jack Sheppard to come to such a determination, but we think he was so much carried away by what he heard, that he did not perceive all the obstacles he would have to overcome.

His sympathies, as almost every one else's would have been, were strongly enlisted in favour of the poor shroud-maker, who had such unscrupulous enemies as his lordship and his man Steggs.

But it was very certain no amount of personal peril would deter Jack from making a desperate attempt to rescue the young girl from their hands.

With this resolve, he hastened to the head of the stairs, and waited.

Waited until he thought they had had time enough to depart.

vided him with, had Jack gained a complete victory over two well-armed men, who were each, so far as all appearance went, more than a match for a stripling such as Sheppard was.

But the contest had disturbed the residents.

Many windows were now thrown open, while scores of eager tongues inquired what was the matter.

But for the most part, seeing that it was only a street brawl, and such as often happened two or three times in a night, they withdrew their heads and slammed the windows after them.

A rattle was sprung, and the tramp of approaching footsteps sounded clearly on the night air.

But, not heeding them, Jack turned towards the young girl whom he had so signally befriended.

CHAPTER XVI.

BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD COMMIT A BURGLARY AT "THE GRANGE."

"FEAR nothing now!" he said, for he found she was trembling violently. "The danger has passed away. It was greater, perhaps, than you have any conception of. All is well now, but, so that you may be secured from another attack, I will accompany you to where you live. First, however, stay where you are a moment, so that I may see how far your assailants are injured."

The young girl, after making a great effort, spoke.

Her voice trembled very much, but that only had the effect of imparting to its musical accents a new charm.

"I am much obliged to you, sir," she said, "much obliged. I had no idea I had an enemy in the world. Surely I must have been mistaken for some one else."

"Not a bit of it," said Jack.

"But I will not give you any further trouble, sir, or trespass further on your kindness. Do not, I pray, let me trespass upon you any longer. I feel that already I owe you an obligation which I can never repay."

"Oh, stuff about repaying; but if you really do feel grateful for what I have done, stand where you are a moment, while I look at your two foes."

As he spoke, Jack hastened towards the individual whom he knew only by the name of "your lordship," and the rascal Steggs.

He rightly enough concluded that the young girl would not resist the request he had made in such terms.

She remained quite still.

The springing of rattles increased.

In the distance a lantern could be seen flashing through the gloom.

Jack stooped over his prostrate foes.

They both lay as immovable as though life were quite extinct.

"I will astonish Blue and Johny," muttered Jack. "Blest if I don't. It will only be right to see what his lordship has in his pockets, and I am determined to have that capital-looking watch of his."

With great dexterity Jack unbuttoned the huge waistcoat which "his lordship" had put on over his ordinary apparel.

With equal featness he transferred the gold watch and its long thick chain and seals to his own pockets.

But with the exception of a purse containing a few sovereigns and some silver, that was all in the shape of valuables which his lordship had about him.

This disappointed Jack.

He was in hopes and expectation of finding something about his person that would give a clue to his identity.

But nothing of the kind could he find.

His lordship had been crafty enough to remove everything that might tend to show who he was.

So Jack, to his chagrin, was compelled to go without knowing who the young girl's uncle was.

The discovery of his name would he knew be all important.

But when he had thoroughly searched all his pockets, and was assured that what he sought was not to be found, Jack consoled himself with the reflection, that in a few hours, an account of the assault would be made public.

As for Steggs, he disdained to trouble any further with him.

There was but little likelihood of his finding anything in his pockets worth the trouble of taking.

He hastened, therefore, to the spot where he had left the young girl he had rescued.

But at the same moment that he reached her side a watchman reached it also.

He was flourishing his lantern and rattle in a maniacal fashion.

He had come from the direction of Queen-street.

Other watchmen were hurrying to the scene from Holborn way.

With great rapidity Jack reasoned in this wise.

If he chose to go down Queen-street there would be no one to oppose him, provided the watchman who had just come from there was put out of the way.

It was, too, just the route he wished to take.

To the great astonishment of the watchman Jack dodged behind the girl, and hit him a tremendous blow on the ear.

So effective was it, that, without uttering a sound, the watchman measured his full length upon the stones.

"That will complicate matters, I rather think," said Jack.

Then, taking the young girl by the hand, he added, hurriedly—

"Now, my dear, if ever you ran before, run now, for your life depends upon your getting away from here at once! Come along!"

So saying he set off at great speed.

The young girl, however, who to the full comprehended what he had said to her, kept up with him admirably.

Round the corner, along Queen-street, past Great Wild-street, and into Drury-lane, they sped like the wind.

Just opposite the top of Long-acre they paused for breath.

They listened.

But no sounds from pursuing footsteps came to their ears.

"I think we have done them," said Jack, triumphantly, for altogether he felt not a little proud of his night's work; "so now miss, if you will tell me where you live I will see you safely indoors."

His companion tried to speak.

But she could not.

She burst into a passionate flood of tears.

She sobbed, too, as though her heart would break.

Jack was alarmed.

Every one of those manifestations of distress went through his heart like a sword.

"Come, come, miss," he said, "don't cry in that way. There's nothing to be afraid of now, I can assure you. Cheer up, cheer up, do, and tell me where I am to take you."

Making a violent effort, the young girl checked her tears, and spoke to him.

"Nowhere," she said.

That was all.

Then she wept again, with even greater bitterness than before.

"Nowhere?" repeated Jack, in tones of great surprise, "nowhere? How is that? I thought you lived in Charles-street."

The girl wept more and more.

"Such is the case," she said. "At least I did live there—but," she added, interrupting herself suddenly, "how came you to know where I lived? I never saw you in my life before."

"I know that, but never mind just at present how I gained that information. Is it possible you live there no longer?"

"Alas! yes. My mother, who was the only relative I had in the world, is dead. She died the day before yesterday, and was buried to-day. We—we owed the people money for—rent, you understand, and as—as I couldn't pay it—"

Her tears and sobs would suffer her to say no more.

"They turned you out into the street, eh?" said Jack. "Just like people—just like 'em"—as served just the same—exactly."

"You were?" said the young girl, feeling a fresh interest in her companion; "how strange!"

"Rather, but what were you going to do when you were stopped?"

"I cannot tell you, for I do not know. I had just come from Mrs. Roblet's, and she cannot pay me the money for the work I have done."

[BLUESKIN ATTACKED BY THE MASTIFF AT "THE GRANGE."]

"That's awkward; but it appears to me I am in a position to do you further service still. I have no home of my own, but I have a friend, who for my sake will, I am sure, be glad to take charge of you."

"Oh! indeed—indeed!" said the young girl, "I cannot consent to place myself under any further obligations to you. You have already done too much."

"Too much? How can that be?"

"More than I can repay!"

"Oh! nonsense. I told you before never to mind about repayment. I would not accept anything more from you than a kind word, if you possessed all the wealth in the world."

"I am glad of that," said the shroudmaker, earnestly, "not only because I like to hear you say so, but because I am in a position to repay you."

"Very well, then. Now come with me. Believe me, it is most important for your own interests to do so. I have something to tell you that will fill you with amazement!"

"What is it?"

"The motive which prompted those two men to make the attack they did upon you."

"Can you give it?"

"Most certainly."

"And is it true that I am really the person that was marked out for it? Are you sure there was no mistake?"

"I am. Quite sure."

"I should scarcely think it could be me! I know no one, and cannot conceive a reason for it. I feel confident they have made a mistake in the person."

"Well, if you are a young girl living in Charles-street?"

"Yes—yes!"

"A shroudmaker, and working for Mrs. Roblet, of 16, Princes-street, Lincoln's Inn-fields."

"I am—I do!"

"Then there is no mistake at all about it. It would take too long to tell you what I know while standing in the street; besides, it would be unsafe to do so, for hark! I can quite plainly hear people in pursuit!"

The sounds filled the poor girl with terror, and already looking up to Jack as being able to defend her from all harm, she clung tightly to him for protection.

"Save me—oh! save me!" she said. "What will become of us; I am terrified to death."

"There is no occasion to be alarmed," said Jack, coolly. "Just you do as I want you, and then we shall be right enough. Will you trust to me?"

"Yes, yes—oh! yes. You have saved me once."

"I have, and will a thousand times, if it be necessary. But come, this is the way."

Again taking the hand of the shroud-maker in his, Jack ran with her down Drury-lane as far as the "Black Lion."

He paused for a moment on the threshold of the inn, and looked behind him.

His pursuers were neither in sight nor hearing.

"Hurrah!" he said, "we have done them. I told you we should, my dear. They have evidently either turned up the wrong part of Drury-lane, or else down Long-acre. Come in here along with me. You will be welcome, and what is more, quite safe."

"I will trust myself into your hands," said the girl, solemnly, "and God forgive me if I act wrong."

"Aud," said Jack, "may God forget me if I do not shield you from all harm!"

CHAPTER XVII.

APPEARS TO POINT TO THE FACT THAT BLUESKIN IS NOT EXACTLY WHAT HE SEEMS—A MYSTERY.

UPROARIOUS shouts and other signs of boisterous merriment issued as usual from the old public-house, and when a louder chorus of bacchanic laughter rose, the girl Jack had taken under his guardianship again clung half-terrified to his arm.

She was, in fact, in a high state of nervous excitement, which such events and startling incidents as had happened to her within the last half-hour could scarcely fail to produce in a delicate and sensitive organization.

But, again assuring her that she was in a place of perfect safety, and had nothing whatever to fear, Jack drew her along the passage, and into the bar.

"Johnson! Johnson!" he cried, in a loud voice, upon finding the place was empty, "Johnson, my boy! This way, I want you."

With wonder very visibly portrayed upon his countenance, the landlord appeared in answer to the summons.

The girl had sunk half-fainting on a seat.

"Fetch the missus," cried Sheppard, "and ask her to look after this poor thing. I ask it of you in the name of Joseph Blake!"

"What's that you are asking in my name?" said a voice at this juncture, and which Jack immediately recognised as that of Blueskin. "What is it, eh?"

As he asked this question, Joe Blake, who had heard Jack utter his name while he stood in the passage, pushed open the half-door that led into the bar, and entered.

He gave vent to a whistle as soon as he saw the girl.

"Hullo, Jack. This won't do, you know. Up to your tricks already. Well, I shouldn't have thought it. Who is she? What does she want?"

But Jack replied in a serious voice—

"Don't ask me any questions just now, but render me the favour I desire. It is simply that Johnson's wife should attend to this poor young thing, who is half-fainting with fright. I will tell you all that has happened as soon as I get a chance."

"Oh! all right. Here is Mrs. Johnson herself, and she will see to her, I know. Won't you, now?"

"To be sure I will, seeing it's a friend of yours, Mr. Blake. Here, my dear," she added, addressing the girl, "rouse yourself; you will soon be better."

"Treat her with the greatest care, Mrs. Johnson," said Jack. "I am going now. You will have your reward for succouring her one day; for she is a real lady."

A smile appeared on the face of the landlady as Jack made this assertion, which was by no means borne out by the girl's attire.

It was tasteful and neat, but very, very poor.

But Jack made his exit as soon as he had spoken: and as Mrs. Johnson had a kind heart, she felt much affected as she looked upon the pale, suffering, and beautiful face, and at once set about recovering her.

Blueskin had accompanied Jack from the bar, and the pair made their way into the kitchen, when they sat down.

The place was tolerably full of people.

To all of them Blueskin appeared to be well known and a favourite, for a universal shout of welcome came from the lips of all present.

But as soon as they could, both avoided the notice of the company.

"It wants half an hour of the time when I propose we shall start," said Blueskin, looking up at the dingy face of a Dutch clock which hung opposite to the fire-place.

"You are before your time."

"I am, but I thought I might as well come on here, and better. But now tell me the meaning of your bringing that girl here? What happened after you left me?"

In reply to this question Jack went into a very elaborate statement of how he had entered the public-house in Middle-row, Holborn, and what had ensued thereupon.

To the whole of the extraordinary narrative did Blueskin listen with the most wrapt attention. Not a word escaped him, and he fairly puzzled Jack with the number of seemingly aimless questions which he asked him.

On the whole, Jack was enabled to give pretty satisfactory replies.

Most particularly did Blueskin ask if he—Jack—was sure there was nothing about the individual who had been named as his lordship that would afford a clue to his identification.

Jack replied in the negative, but produced the watch which he had taken.

Blueskin was much surprised at its magnificence.

"Why this is worth a little fortune," he said; "now I think we shall be able to find out what we want to know."

"How so?" said Jack, looking also at the watch; "I can see nothing on the seals."

"That's nothing to do with it."

"How, then, will you find out?"

"By taking the watch in the morning to Jonathan. He will come down pretty handsomely for it, I dare say."

"But I don't see how that will tell us. Surely Jonathan cannot tell the owner of every watch that is brought to him?"

"Well, not exactly; but it will be done in this way. You may, I think, rest pretty well assured that his lordship won't be willing to lose his watch without making an effort to regain it, and the chances are that he will apply to Wild."

"I see now, of course."

"Jonathan having the watch in his possession, will be able to treat for its restoration in his usual fashion; and so you see when 'his lordship' comes to Little Newgate, we shall be able to learn who he is."

"So we shall."

"I am determined to use every effort to find out who this girl actually is, and if possible restore her to her proper position. I have already something more than a suspicion of her name and title."

It was now Jack's turn to be interested.

"The deuce you have! Tell me, tell me at once!"

"No."

"No?"

"Ask me for no reasons," said Blueskin, rising, and apparently in some agitation. "I cannot give them. Besides, it is time we started."

So saying, he left the kitchen, leaving Jack to follow his example, which the reader may rest assured he was by no means slow in doing.

The sudden alteration in the behaviour of his friend was mysterious in the extreme.

"There's something more I have got to find out," said Jack to himself, "and I'll do it, too!"

"Now, Jack," he heard Blueskin, "are you coming?"

"In a minute," was the reply, and Sheppard ran hastily to the bar.

He was in hopes of seeing either Mrs. Johnson or his protegee there, but in this he was disappointed.

Nor was there even the landlord himself of whom he could make an inquiry.

Fain would he before starting upon his expedition with

Blueskin, the dangers of which, of course, he could not estimate; fain would he, we say, have seen again for a brief moment the young girl he had rescued, and received an assurance that all was well.

But he could not gratify this desire.

Blueskin was at the door of the inn waiting for him, and Jack feared to anger his new friend by delaying to come at his command.

He was fearful, too, that he would consider he was hanging back from his word, and that was a thing Jack could not bear to have ascribed to him for anything.

Therefore, he sacrificed his inclination and went to the front door.

It must be understood that, although the street door of the "Black Lion" was always left open, yet there was a half-glazed inner door, the panes in which were protected by a net-work of wire, which swung shut after everyone who came either in or out.

Just as he pulled open this door, Blueskin again called to him.

He was standing on the step, and near him was the landlord.

"What a time you have been," he said, "I thought you did not mean coming."

"I didn't choose to come before," replied Jack, sullenly; "and what business had you to think any such thing? If I had not given my word no power on earth should make me go with you, but as I have promised I will perform."

"Bravo, Jack!" said Blueskin, who was pleased at this manifestation of independency. "Say no more. I was in a hurry, that was all."

This apology was sufficient for Jack.

"Come along," continued Blueskin; and then, turning towards the landlord, he added—

"Bear in mind what I have said, Johnson. Treat her with every respect. I have my own particular motives for it."

"You shall be obeyed, captain," replied Johnson, "rest assured of it. Good night to you! You will find everything for you at Gregg's."

"All right, Johnson! Good night. I shall be back by four."

"Very good, I shall expect you."

"And now, Jack," said Blueskin, "just step out."

"Have we far to go?"

"Only to Gregg's."

"Where's that?"

"In Long-acre. We shall get a horse and cart there, and then drive to Kilburn."

"But tell me what it is you know or suspect about the girl," said Jack. "You cannot imagine my anxiety to learn something further. What was the reason you acted as you did when we were in the tap-room?"

Blueskin made no reply.

Jack repeated his question.

"I have said do not ask me for any reasons."

"I know you did, but surely there can be no harm in your telling me what you know?"

"I say again I cannot do it," said Blueskin, almost fiercely. "If it is as I have good reason to suspect, she is to some extent mixed up with my own fate—my own life, and that I never relate to a soul."

"Your life?" repeated Jack, perfectly amazed.

"Yes, mine!"

Jack Sheppard felt the curiosity he felt already, increased a thousand times.

"For heaven's sake," he said, "now you have said so much say more, for I am sure I could not bear the suspense. Tell me—tell me at once."

But Blueskin relapsed into a moody silence, nor could Jack by any means extort another word from him.

He was aroused, however, from the conflict of his thoughts by Blake coming suddenly to a halt.

It was at the corner of King-street, Long-acre.

Jack looked up and saw it was a lively stable.

Blueskin simply made a sign for Jack to follow him, and then passed under a gateway into a spacious yard, on every side surrounded by numerous buildings.

Then Jack heard Blueskin blow a whistle, which had a peculiar sound.

It was instantly responded to by a rattling of wheels over the stones with which the yard was paved.

But Jack's thoughts were too much occupied to take more than a cursory notice of what was going on; he kept asking himself—Who was the young girl he had saved, and what way was she connected with Blueskin?

CHAPTER XVIII.

FOLLOWS JONATHAN WILD UPON ONE OF HIS NIGHT EXCURSIONS, AND RELATES THE DARING DEEDS WHICH HE COMMITTED.

"A LIKELY young fellow that!" muttered Jonathan Wild, after he had so cavalierly dismissed Jack Sheppard and Blueskin from his presence. "A very likely young fellow, indeed! I shall be able to make something of him in time, I daresay, so I shall begin with giving him plenty of encouragement! That's the way to do it!"

Having come to this conclusion, Jonathan took a few whiffs at his pipe, and then pouring out a tumbler full of brandy, he drank considerably more than half of it at a draught.

The spirit was strong, and it forced the moisture into Wild's eyes, and for a second or two fairly took away his breath.

"That's better!" he gasped. "I ought to take something extra before I do what I intend to do to-night. It would not do to trust it into any other hands than my own. Just let me see that I have got the particulars all right!"

Hereupon, Jonathan picked up that day's newspaper, and, in a low voice, read with great deliberation the following extraordinary paragraph, as though he wished to impress every word of it upon his mind.

The paragraph ran thus—

UNPARALLELED OCCURRENCE.—We are indebted to a correspondent for the following particulars of an event we believe to be without a parallel. It appears that Friday last, the 7th instant, was fixed for the celebration of the nuptials of H—y J—ff—s Esq., of E—n—hall, Tottenham, and J—c M—k—l, only daughter of G—e M—k—l, Esq., of the L—e, Theobald's-park. The union was brought about by love only, and a long and happy life was looked to as being the fortunate lot of the youthful pair. But, alas! as if to prove the folly of trusting to the stability of earthly things, an event occurred which has thrown the whole country-side into the deepest gloom. That event was death! While the bridegroom was in the act of putting the ring on the finger of the bride, in accordance with the terms of the marriage ceremony, he felt the hand of the bride become deathly cold, and ere he could scarce note this circumstance, she fell back upon the marble flooring of the church. The utmost consternation of course prevailed, and every means tried to restore the bride to life, but in vain. The vital spark had fled for ever. The effects of this scene upon the bridegroom and the other relatives of the bride can be better imagined than described. But the strangest part of the affair remains yet to be told. It has transpired that for the three nights immediately preceding the wedding, the bride-apparent dreamed that while the ceremony was being performed she fell down dead. That she should dream of the wedding for three nights running was in itself not very remarkable, but that she should dream the same dream, and that of so strange a kind, was exceedingly so. On the second occasion, while relating her vision, she declared herself firmly of belief that it was prophetic, and that it would happen just as she had dreamed. The third occasion, which was on the night preceding the day of the wedding, she expressed herself still more confirmed in this belief, and requested as a favour, which she asked as a person about to die, that they would inter her in her nuptial garments, not removing a single article from her person. Every endeavour was made to dissipate this gloomy foreboding, but without result, and her agitation at the refusal of her request rose to such a height that the worst consequences were dreaded, and at last, to calm her, they made the promise which she required. We have stated already the catastrophe. It turned out that her dream was fulfilled to the very letter. Of course nothing else is talked of for miles around. The funeral of the unhappy bride is fixed to take place to-day (Monday), and it is expected that a large number of people will assemble to witness the obsequies. We understand from the best authority that at the urgent desire of the bridegroom, who is almost crazed under his sudden bereavement, the bride will have her express wishes fulfilled; that is to say, will be placed in the coffin in her wedding-dress. A tiara of diamonds, which is estimated at being worth two thousand five hundred pounds, and which had been presented to her by her father, will be buried with her, she having obtained a solemn promise that not one article which she wore should be removed. Altogether the affair is quite unprecedented, and caused the greatest possible excitement. We shall publish in our next impression a full account of the funeral.

Such was the paragraph which Jonathan Wild so carefully perused.

As he finished reading it, he let the paper fall to the floor.

He smoked on abstractedly for a few moments, being deeply immersed in his reflections.

Presently his cogitations took consistence and form.

He uttered three words.

"Two thousand pounds!"

Those were the words.

It was then pretty evident about what Jonathan was considering.

He had more than half made up his mind to go to Tottenham.

The reader can guess his object.

It was to rob the dead!

The diamond tiara Jonathan considered it would be a world of pities to allow to remain upon the brow of a dead person, to whom it could not by any possibility be of service. He calculated the difficulties there might be to overcome.

But, as none of them appeared to be insurmountable, he determined to make the attempt.

To despoil the dead!

It was what nine hundred and ninety-nine people out of a thousand would have shrunk from doing.

They would have been overcome by the horror of the idea.

But Jonathan was unquestionably one in a thousand.

Upon his imbrutalized perceptions the corpse of a human being made no more impression than would any other mass of inert matter. Like Lady Macbeth, he would have said—

The sleeping and the dead are but as pictures.

He rose to his feet, and put on his hat and wig.

"Yes," he muttered, buckling on his banger, "I will do it. The diamond tiara shall be mine. What will there be to fear? Nothing, absolutely nothing. While alive, what chance could a delicate girl have with me? None. Then how much less when dead! That's the way to look at it. I'll have one more nip of brandy, and then start."

It was in this way Jonathan endeavoured to buoy up his heart; but, in spite of his philosophy, his hand trembled fearfully as he poured the spirituous liquor from the bottle into the glass.

"It won't do for me to start while I am nervous like this. I shall sit down again, and drink a little more. I can see I have not had enough."

And yet he had drank enough to reduce any ordinary man to a state of utter helplessness.

"Let me see," he said. "There is Lord Ingestrie's reward for the necklace; I must manage somehow to make that up to four thousand pounds. Then this tiara added to it will make six thousand pounds! A glorious sum, and worth something to obtain. No matter how disagreeable, I will have it!"

Avarice was the mainspring of Jonathan's existence.

As he contemplated the amount of his prospective gains his nervousness disappeared.

But it required some little resolution to screw up his courage to undertake the job.

Again he rose.

This time he walked straight to the door of his apartment, and, passing through it, descended the stairs, and reached the hall.

A faint groan came to his ears.

It was poor Tonks uttered it.

He was still "on the lock," as they called it.

Jonathan strode forward.

"Now then!" he said, "what the deuce are you groaning in that way for? Hold your row, will you?"

Tonks, at the sound of the thief-taker's voice, stifled the groan that was upon his lips, and made a hideous face instead, for he saw that Jonathan had the cudgel in his grasp.

"I say hold your row!" cried Wild. "Why don't you reply?"

"Yes, Mr. Wild."

"Where's Quilt Arnold?"

"In the garrison, Mr. Wild."

"The garrison" was that portion of Jonathan's house which was specially reserved for the accommodation of his band.

"Go to him, then, and tell him to bring my horse round to the front door; I am going out."

"I will, Mr. Wild," said Tonks, getting up with a painful effort upon his legs, and hobbling down the hall

"And look here! tell him to saddle a horse for himself at the same time; I shall want him to go with me."

"Very good, sir."

Tonks disappeared.

Glad was he to do so with a whole skin.

Jonathan Wild stuck one end of his bludgeon into his pocket, and put his hands in also.

With his head bent a little forward he walked slowly up and down the hall.

He was arranging the order of his proceedings.

In an incredibly short time, considering what had to be done, Quilt Arnold—who, like Blueskin, being high in Jonathan's confidence, was provided with a key, which enabled him to open the front door at pleasure—Quilt Arnold, we say, in a very few minutes after the reception of the order entered, and told the great thief-taker that the horses were waiting at the door.

Quilt Arnold, who, as is well known, was one of the most daring members of Jonathan Wild's gang, was of medium height, and very strongly built. In his countenance there was nothing prepossessing, unless, perhaps, his eyes, which were jet black, small, and piercing. Indeed, it was few who could keep their countenances unmoved when Quilt fixed his keen glance upon them.

To those who were immediately under him he was overbearing and tyrannical to a degree.

To Jonathan most morigerous.

But this is by no means a rarity.

He spoke in a cringing tone of voice.

"The horses are all ready, if you please, Mr. Wild," he said, "and waiting at the door."

"Very well, Quilt," growled Jonathan, throwing off his abstraction and advancing to the door. "Follow me. Keep a few yards in the rear, and take notice if you hear any one on the road besides ourselves. I am going out of town a little way."

"Yes, Mr. Wild, I am quite ready, sir, if you please."

As he spoke, he shut the door after him, and hurried down the steps into the street.

CHAPTER XIX.

WILD HAS A HORRIBLE ADVENTURE IN THE VAULTS OF TOTTENHAM CHURCH.

THE night was cold and dark.

Dense, sad coloured clouds obscured the sky.

The wind came in short and fitful gusts, and whistled dismally as it swept round the narrow corners.

Occasionally, too, a heavy send of rain would reach the earth.

Newgate-street was deserted.

At that time few people ventured forth after dark, in consequence of the risk they ran of being set upon by thieves.

But on this night certainly no one would leave the shelter of a roof, unless compelled by some pressing necessity to do so.

Quilt Arnold felt anything but pleased at the prospect of a long ride into the open country.

But it was more than his head was worth to demur, so he wisely held his peace.

Jonathan Wild mounted his steed.

It was a tall, sinewy creature, not by any means handsome, but of that kind usually chosen for cavalry service—fleet, powerful, and enduring.

Quilt Arnold mounted also.

With great precision, then, Jonathan shaped his course for his destination.

No one was much better acquainted with the topography of London and its environs than he was.

As they approached the open country the cold rapidly increased, and the wind was enough to cut one to the bone.

Still Jonathan, unheeding, pushed on, while Quilt, shivering in every limb, kept, as he had been bid, a few paces behind him.

At length, to the inexpressible joy of the latter, the village of Tottenham was reached.

It was by no means late, at least between ten and eleven o'clock, and yet every one in the village appeared to have retired for the night.

With the exception of one place.

That was the village inn.

From the windows of this streamed a bright light,

Jonathan drew up at the door and called to Quilt Arnold to approach him.

"I am going in here for a few moments," he said. "Walk the horses up and down and keep a sharp look-out upon every person that passes you. I will send you out something to drink."

"Yes, Mr. Wild."

Jonathan entered the inn.

He correctly calculated that in the kitchen of the inn he would find the principal people in the village assembled, and as it was only natural to suppose the Bridal of Death, as it might be termed, would be the subject of the conversation.

Jonathan wanted some particulars respecting the funeral.

He entered the kitchen then, and, as he expected, found it full of people, all busily engaged in talking.

He sat down upon a seat near the door without exciting more than casual notice.

As he passed the bar he had called for a glass of brandy-and-water for himself and another for his man.

Then, having been supplied, he prepared to listen to what was going forward.

A little weazen-faced man, with a disagreeable squeaking voice, was speaking.

"You can say what you like," he cried, evidently in reply to some observation that had just been made. "You can say what you like; but still, for all that, I shall stick to my own opinion!"

"And what is that?"

"What is it? Why that before many days are over some of the London thieves will be down here, and off the diamond head-dress will go!"

This proposition was received with murmurs of disbelief.

"Ah, well! time will show who's right and who's wrong. There hasn't been time for it to get known among them yet; but when they do hear of it, you'll see."

"But it would be sacrilege to break into a church; besides, it would require some one with very strong nerves to descend into the vault at night, and in the dark, for it would not do for them to show a light."

"Yes, I know that fast enough; but such a thing as that would be a powerful temptation, and there are men in London who would dare and do anything for money."

"I don't say there ain't, but this I do say, and that is if one of these London gentry as you've been speaking about was to come down with the intention of taking the diamond head-dress, they would find it a harder job than they anticipated."

Wild began to prick up his ears.

Some information would now doubtless be given that would be of the most material assistance to him.

"Fools!" he muttered; "but it is as well there are so many in the world, or how is a clever fellow to get a living?"

"Yes," said the thin man, with the squeaking voice, "I knew there would be considerable difficulty in the way."

"There would—more than they would be able to get over."

"Pho! pho!"

"First, then, there's the church-door. It's only last Whitsuntide that friend Robins here put a new lock on it."

"That's right enough," said a person whom Jonathan supposed to be Robins; "and a good lock it is, too. I made it myself, after a design of my own, and I give any one leave to try and pick it."

Wild smiled grimly.

"Very well, but supposing they do pick the door?"

"No, no," interrupted Mr. Robins, vehemently, "they can't pick it, I tell you."

"But, just for the sake of argument, we'll say they do pick it."

"But what's the good of supposing what can't come to pass? An argument must have something to stand on."

"Well, well," replied the other, "we'll suppose they do get inside the church. They might get through the window, you know."

"Oh! very good," said Robins, "I don't say nothing about the windows; I say they can't pick the lock, so what would be the good of supposing it?"

"Hear, hear! of course!" murmured the company.

"I say we'll suppose they get inside the church. Why, their difficulties have only just began. You all know where the vault is—just in front of the altar?"

"Yes—yes."

"Well, the stone that covers it, you know very well, is a flat slab of marble, and weighs I don't know how many hundredweight."

"Five or six," said a voice.

"Then wasn't it mortared down this very afternoon, and now I should like to know how they are to get it up, eh? without any one in the village being aware of it?"

"My friend," said the weazen-faced man again. "In the course of my life I've been to a great many places and seen a great many things, and I can tell you that I have known thieves do more wonderful and seemingly impossible things than that would be."

"They must have an uncommon pluck to try such a thing on, and no mistake," said another voice. "It isn't a diamond wreath that would tempt me to do such a thing, bad as I want money."

"Now then, are you going to stop setting here all night, I should like to know?" said a woman, whose appearance may be briefly summed up in the words, "fat, fair, and forty." "Ain't you ashamed of yourself, Mr. D., to sit here setting such an example; keeping men away from their wives; but it's just like you, you wretch. Look at the clock; it's nearly half-past eleven!"

The rapidity and shrillness with which these words were uttered produced an electrical effect upon the company.

Even Jonathan was so disconcerted that he took a huge gulp of his brandy and water.

"But my dear," began an apologetic voice, "you forget."

"What do you mean, Mr. D.?" said the landlady, with additional rateness; "how can I forget? Can you look the clock in the face without feeling downright ashamed of yourself?"

Mr. D. made no reply, from which it may be inferred that he would feel ashamed of himself, nor would it need a conjurer to divine he was a subject to gynarchy.

But the guests seemed perfectly to understand what was meant.

One and all finished what ever there was before them, and the knocking out of pipes was something terrific.

They were all in a hurry to depart.

A strict woman was Mrs. Dyer, the landlady, and lord too, of the "Tiger's Head." Every night was the front door closed, and the company turned out punctually at eleven o'clock, but on this occasion she allowed them an extra half hour.

But, despite her acerbity, a capital business was done at the "Tiger's Head." Mrs. Dyer was a special favourite with every one of the customers, for she was one of those monstrosities of feminine nature known as a "fine woman."

But in this case the word "fine" has always been a meaning very different to what Dr. Johnson set down for it in his dictionary.

He defines it "pure; thin; not coarse."

Now, neither of these definitions can apply to a fine woman, with the exception of the last; but, in this case, the negative must be removed.

Then you have it exactly.

However, Jonathan Wild, seeing this state of things, deemed it expedient not to attract attention towards himself by remaining until the room was clear, so was nearly the first to leave it.

Quilt Arnold was walking the horses up and down, according to orders.

Jonathan mounted immediately, and set off at a gallop. It would be necessary for him to defer the commencement of his attack until the whole of the inhabitants were deep in their first sleep.

His brief sojourn at the "Tiger's Head" had in its results surpassed his utmost expectations.

He had acquired there the very information necessary to the successful execution of his plan.

Quilt Arnold was far from pleased.

But the night was by no means so inclement as it had been. The wind had considerably abated—the sky had become clear of clouds, and so the uncomfortable dashes of rain came no longer.

During this ride Jonathan arranged in his mind his exact plan of operations.

What that was will be quickly seen.

Having allowed, as he considered, a sufficient time to elapse, he turned his horse's head in the direction of Tottenham Church.

All these movements were quite incomprehensible to Quilt.

"What in the world is he after?" he muttered, as he once more placed himself in the rear of the thief-taker.

CHAPTER XX.

A SCENE OF HORROR—JONATHAN WILD BELIEVES HIS LAST HOUR HAS COME.

ABOUT two hundred yards from old Tottenham Church Jonathan Wild pulled up and dismounted.

It was before a gate leading into a meadow that he had stopped.

"Undo this gate, Quilt," he cried, "and turn the horses into it. Then follow me on foot."

As it happened, the gate was not locked, but merely fastened with a spring latch. Arnold had no difficulty in doing as he had been bid, and he ran along the lane after Wild, who had almost got out of sight.

At the small wooden gate leading into the churchyard, Wild paused and looked carefully all about him, as well as listened with all his ears.

But all was still.

He made a rapid gesture to his follower to be silent and follow him.

Dreading lest, in the perfect stillness which prevailed, that if he trod upon the gravelled path the sound of his footsteps might be heard, he walked upon the turf.

Twenty steps brought him to the door of the church.

Before it was a fantastic-looking porch completely overgrown with parasitical plants.

Once under this place Jonathan felt himself pretty secure from observation.

He lighted a dark lantern which he took from his pocket.

He, however, only partially withdrew the slide before the lens.

His object was to make an examination of the lock.

From what the maker of it had said, Wild fully expected to find some very complicated piece of mechanism.

But to his astonishment the keyhole of the lock was large enough for him to put his little finger in.

A grin of derision came to his lips.

The locksmith was but a novice of the art now brought to such perfection. He had fallen into the prevalent error that to be impregnable a lock should be large.

But now they are made upon quite an opposite principle.

From a pocket in his vest Jonathan produced a queer-looking little instrument.

Bidding Quilt hold the light, he inserted it into the keyhole.

He worked it about for some time unsuccessfully. The lock resisted him.

But Jonathan persevered, and the result was that at last the bolt of the lock shot back with a snap.

In spite of themselves both started.

In the silent church it sounded almost as loud as the report of a pistol.

The door creaked open.

After waiting to assure himself that no alarm had been given so far, Wild entered.

He took the lantern into his own hands again.

"Close the door, Quilt," he whispered, "and stay at it on guard. I am going to the other end of the church. If you hear anyone coming, give me the alarm at once."

Having made this arrangement, which was certainly an admirable one, Jonathan, allowing the faintest possible gleam of light to fall upon the ground before him, advanced with the greatest confidence as to his destination along the nave of the church.

It had been mentioned in the conversation that the vault wherein reposed the young bride so inopportunistically stricken down by the hand of death was immediately opposite the altar.

On reaching this spot Wild looked about him for the indications of one of the slabs having been recently removed.

This he was not long in discovering.

He stooped down and pressed with his thumb nail upon the cement between two of the stones.

It was quite soft.

But now a great difficulty arose. The slab was large and consequently heavy, while he was unpossessed of any tools that would properly assist him to elevate it.

However, slight as the prospect of lifting the stone from its setting seemed, Jonathan put the lamp down on the floor, and with a large clasp-knife commenced picking out the mortar.

In a very short time he had completed this part of his task. The whole of the cement was removed.

His coat pocket now provided him with an implement which he never went anywhere without taking with him.

This was a small crowbar.

With the same air of quiet deliberation as he had all along exhibited, Wild inserted its point into the space where the mortar had been, and began to prize the stone.

He worked gently and steadily.

Gradually the heavy piece of stone was raised, and it was soon high enough for him to insert the thin end of his bludgeon as a kind of wedge.

After this the work became easier.

But, nevertheless, he would have been glad enough of Quilt Arnold's assistance, only he considered it to be essential to his safety to have Quilt there on the watch for the approach of any one.

That individual felt the greatest interest in what Wild was about. His visit to the "Tiger's Head," and afterwards apparently aimless ride into the country and back to Tottenham, roused Quilt's curiosity to such an extent that it became almost unbearable.

He strained his eyes, and endeavoured to pierce the thick obscurity in the old church.

He could just see a shadow occasionally, which he identified as his master's body.

The sound of prizing the stone, however, came to his ears with perfect distinctness.

"What is he after?" he muttered. "I'd give a trifle to know; but, of course, it's more than my head's worth to move from here and try to find out. Hang it all, who is he afraid will come I wonder to the church at this time of night? Hallo! what's up now?"

A fall, and then a bitter execration.

Those were the two sounds that Quilt heard in quick succession, and which interrupted the chain of his meditations.

Both are easily explained.

The bludgeon which Jonathan had so cunningly put underneath the stone had slipped from its position, and the slab fell back again into its setting.

All Wild's labour was lost.

No wonder he vented the curse he did. It was certainly aggravating in the extreme.

But, undeterred by this mishap, he recommenced his work with fresh vigour.

He called Quilt to his aid.

Never before was Jonathan so willingly obeyed.

Their joint exertions of course effected a great deal, and at last both, by pushing with all their might, succeeded in getting the slab on to the flooring of the church.

But they did not remove it altogether; an aperture just large enough for the thief-taker's body to pass through was left, but that was all.

Jonathan Wild took the lantern in his hand and prepared to descend.

"Now, Quilt," he said, "back again to the door."

"Yes, Mr. Wild."

"I am going down here, you understand. What to do doesn't in any way concern you, so don't trouble your head about it; but just keep inside the door, and the moment you hear a sound indicative of the approach of any one give me the alarm instantly."

"Very well, Mr. Wild."

"I shall trust to you, recollect. If anything occurs, the best thing you can do to make me aware of it will be to blow your whistle."

"Yes, sir."

"Not loudly, you understand. A long, low note. I shall hear that."

Quilt resumed his station at the door.

Jonathan Wild slowly lowered himself into the vault.

He felt steps under his feet.

They were covered with some soft substance, into which his boots sank deeply. A minute's thought told him what it was.

Sawdust.

That was it. The stairs were thickly covered with it. Then Jonathan got fairly beneath the flooring of the church.

To say that a clammy sensation of fear did not seize him would be untrue.

Jonathan Wild was human, and susceptible of human influences.

The silence awed him.

The dampness chilled his blood. He could feel it cold even about his heart.

The intense darkness seemed like some mass of black velvety material, which was pressing upon him in every direction.

But, mastering these sensations with a tremendous effort, and summoning up all his fortitude and courage, Wild drew back the slide of the lantern lens to its fullest extent, and allowed the whole of the light to pass freely through the lens.

It revealed with great distinctness the dark, black walls, which presented a vivid contrast to the white sawdust, with which the steps were plentifully covered.

Slowly, step by step, Wild descended the rude steps leading into the vaults.

At their termination was a strong iron door.

Upon perceiving this unexpected obstacle, Wild felt half inclined to turn back, making that serve for an excuse.

The fact is, he was terrified, and was becoming more so every minute.

But still in his terror one thought was uppermost in his mind.

And that was, should he so far be the slave of his own apprehensions as to leave his object unachieved, he would, when he reflected upon the circumstance by the light of day, be mortified beyond measure at his own pusillanimity.

And so he would not turn back.

And yet he felt an equal disinclination to proceed further.

He could not avoid feeling conscious that a strange, heavy sensation was pressing upon his brain.

He put out his hand to steady himself.

By an accident it was against the door of the vault that he leant instead of the wall.

Slowly, and with a dismal sound, it gave way before the pressure.

Finding that the door was unsecured seemed to have a re-invigorating effect upon Wild, and he shook off to a very great extent the "thick coming fancies" which oppressed him.

He made a step forward into the vault.

As he did so he fancied he heard a sound coming apparently from a great distance.

It was like a muffled groan or shriek.

"Pho, pho!" said Wild, and he waived his bludgeon about him in a defiant manner as he spoke. "Pho, pho! I will be fooled by my fancy no longer, or else I shall end by going mad."

He rapidly flashed the light of the lantern about him, and thus obtained a transient glimpse of every part of the place he was in.

The vault was spacious.

But there was no one in it save himself and dead.

The atmosphere, however, appeared to have a sickly, clammy feel, and which as he inspired it seemed to communicate itself to his whole frame.

Then Wild found that by speaking he lessened the gloomy horror of the place.

His voice, he thought, never sounded so pleasantly before.

"I wonder now," he said, as he opened the door of the lantern, and so allowed the light to diffuse itself equally all round, "I wonder, now, whereabouts the coffin is that contains the tiara of diamonds? It will be well earned when I get it."

This was true.

That he should be in doubt and perplexed to know which was the coffin he wanted was natural enough, for all round the vault were niches, in which, upon shelves, the coffins were ranged one above the other.

Wild did not see room for above three more, without some fresh place was provided for them.

But on looking more attentively he perceived that some of the coffins, which were all uniformly painted black and cased with lead, bore every appearance of extreme age.

Then the thought struck him that most likely they had been placed there in, so to speak, chronological order.

If this should be, much trouble would be saved.

And sure enough such proved to be the case.

In brief, he found at last one niche in which the coffins were quite new, or rather appeared to be, for Jonathan could detect no difference between them.

The two top shelves were unoccupied.

If, then, his theory was correct, the topmost one must be the one he sought.

He turned round to seek some object upon which to stand, for he found he was not high enough to reach this one.

As he did so, he heard, with the utmost plainness, a dull, rustling, bumping noise.

He turned round with the rapidity of lightning.

His eyes fixed themselves upon the coffin, which he made up his mind contained the object of his desires.

Was he dreaming?

Did his eyesight play him false?

No; he felt neither of these was the case, and yet he saw that which would be by everyone deemed an impossibility.

The coffin moved.

Not once, but twice, thrice, while the thumping, struggling sound increased.

Wild tried to move.

But it was as though he was possessed by some frightful incubus, which held all his corporal faculties enthralled.

He could not move.

He could not speak.

His jaw fell in the effort, but he could not raise it, while his eyes seem starting from his head.

His attitude and his countenance were expressive of the most intense, unutterable horror.

And then arose a shriek so wild, so unearthly, so brain-piercing in its tones, that it was sufficient to drive anyone who heard it into madness.

And to enhance the frightful nature of the scene, ere yet the awful scream was fully articulated, the coffin turned over on its side, and fell with a terrific crash on the floor at the thief-taker's feet.

He felt his senses were leaving him.

The lantern dropped from his nerveless fingers.

At the same moment he felt himself clutched with vice-like power by the arm.

That seemed to break the spell, and his pent-up feelings gave vent in one heart-bursting groan.

Jonathan Wild sunk down on the floor of the vault in a swoon!

CHAPTER XXI.

RETURNS TO BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD, AND RELATES HOW THEY EFFECTED AN ENTRANCE INTO "THE GRANGE."

"Now, JACK! Up with you! It will be better to ride than to walk, I can tell you. Jump up!"

Such were the words addressed by Blueskin to Jack Sheppard, when, in answer to the signal given by the former, a horse and cart appeared in the yard belonging to the livery stables in Long-acre.

Jack obeyed.

Blueskin was by his side in a moment, and then, taking hold of the reins, he touched the horse with the whip and drove out into the street.

The horse was one that possessed every essential requisite for such a job as he was now upon, and without any coercion he drew the light vehicle along at a rapid pace.

The Oxford-road was the point to which Blueskin shaped his course.

As yet Jack knew nothing of their destination, and so he took this opportunity to inquire.

"Kilburn," said Blake.

"And what sort of a place is it?"

"A very pretty old-fashioned building, known simply as 'The Grange.' Keep your eyes open, and then you will be able to manage a little job of the kind yourself."

"But Blueskin, my friend, do as a favour tell me all you know about the young girl at the 'Black Lion.' If you had any idea how anxious and interested I am about her you would do so at once."

As before, however, his companion made no reply to his question.

This behaviour puzzled Jack exceedingly, who began, like the landlord, to entertain an opinion that Joe Blake as he called himself, was something more than he professed to be.

And in that conjecture they were perfectly right.

In the progress, however, of this narrative the mystery in which he inshrouded himself will be dispelled, and the reader put into possession of one of the most extraordinary life romances that could be imagined.

It will not fail to be suspected that there was in some way a connexion between the shroud-maker and Jonathan's lieutenant, and we may as well state here that such was actually the case.

But of the nature of the connexion we can at present say nothing.

Jack's disposition was one that might truly be called an impressionable one, and the peculiar circumstances attendant upon the rescue of the girl had not failed to exert a deep and lasting influence.

His mind was occupied with and about her exclusively.

It tormented him to a degree that his comrade should actually have some knowledge respecting who and what she was, and yet refuse to impart it to him.

The cart sped on its way.

A few minutes after they had passed the church of St. Giles's-in-the-Fields, they heard the hour of midnight pealed forth.

Another turn to the left and they were in the Oxford-road.

This was completely deserted; neither horse nor man appeared in view.

As, however, at the period of our story this place was open country, the wind swept along it with great keenness.

It was rather strange that on that night Jonathan Wild and Quilt Arnold—Blueskin and Jack Sheppard should both be out on that particular night and bound on perilous expeditions.

There was not a word further uttered by either Sheppard or Blueskin until the railings which surround Hyde-park were reached.

Then the latter spoke.

"Don't be sulky, Jack," he said. "If it was in my power to communicate to you what I know I would do so freely, but I cannot."

"Why not? In what way is it a secret?"

"Thus. I could not answer you without giving you a glimpse of my own life—I mean without enabling you to form an idea who I really am—and that would be impossible."

Jack was silent.

"I will, however, promise you to do all I can to serve the girl, but you must not expect to know all my thoughts. The time will come, perhaps—perhaps not."

He turned into the Uxbridge-road along which they went at unabated speed.

"And now, Jack, listen to me. Dismiss from your mind all thoughts except those immediately connected with the business we are upon. Less than a quarter-of-an-hour now will take us to 'The Grange.'"

"It's no good asking me not to think about her," replied Jack. "It would be impossible."

"Oh! stuff! be a little bit more like a man, or I shall be ashamed of you."

The remainder of the distance to Kilburn was passed over in silence.

And now the moon rose above the huge masses of clouds upon the horizon, and shed a subdued light upon the scene.

Picturesquely situated upon a piece of gently rising ground, was a quaint, red-brick building.

When they were within twenty yards of it, Blueskin pulled up, and pointing with his whip, said—

"Yonder is the place. We must get out here, for if we go further, the grating of the wheels may be heard. It is a neat-looking place."

"Who lives in it?" said Jack.

"A retired city merchant, named Hadley. He is immensely rich, so we ought to make a good haul! It is not, however, for booty in the shape of plate or money that I go, but for some papers also."

While speaking, Blueskin and Sheppard alighted from the cart, and led the horse to the side of the lane, where, as is not infrequently the case, grass was growing in abundance.

The horse immediately bent his head, and began cropping the sweet herbage.

Shut up in a London stable as he was nearly all the year round, and fed upon nothing but dry food, a meal of grass was quite a luxury.

"It won't be worth while to tie him in any way," said Blake. "I know him. He will stray only a few yards from where he now is. Just get up on to the step of the cart and give me the bag of tools I left upon the seat."

"Here you are! Why, what a weight they are!"

"Yes, rather. Come along now, at once. We are already later than I intended to be; however, perhaps it is quite as well."

"Why?"

"It will have given everybody time to get sound off to sleep."

As Blueskin had been informed by the person whose duty it was to take an accurate observation of every place that was to be entered, "The Grange" was completely surrounded by a high brick wall.

He had come provided with the means of surmounting it.

Upon reaching one particular spot, he opened the bag of tools, and took therefrom a bundle, which, when unrolled, proved to be a strong rope ladder.

Jack looked with great curiosity to see how it was to be made serviceable.

Then he noticed that to one end of the ladder was fastened a piece of iron, which curved over and formed two hooks large enough to hold on a wall.

Blueskin held this part in a particular manner with his right hand, while in his left hand he held the other end of the rope ladder.

He stood a little way from the wall, and swung his arm backwards and forwards.

Suddenly, then, after taking a very careful aim, he let go of the iron part, and up in the air it went.

As it descended, it caught upon the top of the wall, and Blake, by a sudden jerk, secured it there.

It made a sharp clinking sound as it struck against the brickwork, but it was so explosive that it was a thousand chances if it attracted notice, had anyone been about and heard it.

To throw the ladder so that the iron hooks should catch upon the top of the wall, of course required no small amount of dexterity and skill, but Blake, by long practice, was able to accomplish it with as much precision as a Mexican can throw the lasso over the neck of a wild horse.

Jack was quite lost in admiration.

"Wonderful!" he said. "If I had not seen it done I should never have believed it! That's what I call downright clever!"

"Oh! if that surprises you, you shall be astonished presently. That is the easiest part of the whole affair! Now, then, you go up the ladder first, and I will hold it steady at the bottom for you, as you are not used to it. When you get to the top sit astride the wall, and wait till I join you."

Jack Sheppard was very lithe and nimble, and he climbed up the ladder with the agility of a young squirrel.

On reaching the top, he, in obedience to Blueskin's instructions, seated himself across it.

Then Blake himself ascended.

Beneath them was a summer-house or arbour, which stood at the extremity of a little garden.

This garden was at the rear of the building, which was the part Blueskin had chosen at which to make his burglarious entry.

CHAPTER XXII.

THE STRUGGLE BETWEEN BLUESKIN AND THE MASTER—THE DISCOVERY AND THE ALARM.

OUR friends—for such we think our hero and Jack are fairly entitled to be called—were certainly, as yet, only at the commencement of their work, but still, so far all had gone well. No alarm had been given, and they looked forward confidently to bring the matter to a successful issue.

[JONATHAN WILD PAYS A VISIT TO HIS PRISONERS.]

Cautioning Jack to be silent, Blueskin, without further loss of time, drew the rope ladder up, and reversing the hooks at the top, let it down on the other side.

They found it more than long enough to reach the ground.

For the same reason that he had before given—namely, to be enabled to steady the ladder for his less experienced companion—Blueskin was the first to descend.

Just, however, as he reached the ground, and before he could fairly turn round, a monstrous mastiff, which, during the night, was turned loose to guard the premises, uttering a suppressed and savage growl, sprang upon him.

Blueskin was totally unprepared for this attack. The spy who had reconnoitred the place had said nothing to him of the circumstance of a dog being at large during the night.

It was fortunate for Blueskin that he wore one of those huge neckcloths then in vogue, for the dog flew at his neck, and would unquestionably have bitten him severely had not his teeth imbedded themselves in its voluminous folds.

The sudden dash with which the dog came against him, hurled him to the ground, but, recovering his presence of mind almost instantaneously, he clutched the brute with no gentle gripe by the throat, and immediately commenced to struggle with him.

His great aim was to prevent the dog making use of his voice, which would have infallibly aroused the people in the house.

Jack Sheppard, when he saw the mastiff make such a sudden attack upon his friend, was for a moment paralyzed with horror, but quickly arousing himself, he began to descend the ladder.

This, he found, was more difficult than he could have believed, for it swayed about in the most perplexing manner, and grazed the skin off his knuckles dreadfully.

In the meantime the fight continued.

He could hear Blueskin in a whisper calling to him to come to his assistance, which he was sure he would not do if it were not necessary.

Fearing, then, that Blake should think he was holding back from fear, Jack let go of the ladder, and dropped the remainder of the distance.

He alighted on the soft mould with but little injury save the shake.

The dog, upon seeing approach another of his enemies, made a furious effort to get free from Blueskin's grasp.

But in vain.

"Quick, Jack, quick!" the latter exclaimed, in a hoarse whisper. "Quick, help me, or we are lost! Knife the brute—knife him, I'll hold him tight the while."

Acting upon this hint, Jack drew a very formidable clasp knife from his pocket, and crept forward to stab the dog.

But despite Blake's assurance that he would hold the dog tightly, he found it beyond his strength to do so, and they rolled over and over, and round about so fast, that it was hard to distinguish one from the other, and, certainly, to have made a stab with the knife would have been hazardous in the extreme.

But at last Jack himself grasped the brute with his left hand, and then with great suddenness plunged the knife just under his shoulder into his heart.

A torrent of blood gushed forth as he withdrew the knife, and the dog, in a moment ceasing his struggles, fell back quite dead.

The wound was instantaneously fatal.

Jack wiped his knife, and dragged the dog off the body of his friend.

It was a large and, doubtless, valuable specimen of his species, and it required all the strength of which Jack was possessed to move him when he was dead.

Breathless and exhausted, Blueskin rose to his feet.

Fortunately he had received no hurt from the dog, with the exception of such as had been inflicted by his claws, and these, painful as they were, Blueskin cared not for.

"That was a very narrow escape, Jack. Why didn't you come to my assistance earlier? You would have saved me a good deal of strength and one or two scratches."

"I came as soon as I could. The ladder swung about so that I could not get down. Look here, how it has served my hands, the skin is all off the back of them. I let go when I was half-way down, but as I lighted on a garden-bed it didn't much matter."

"We have both been in the wars. Confound the dog. However, let us be thankful it is no worse. Pick up the bag of tools again, it is just at the bottom of the wall, and come on as quickly as you can."

Jack obeyed; and in a minute or two after stood with Blake at the door which opened from the kitchen into the yard.

This the spy, who under the garb of a beggar, had a day or two before visited the place, was fastened merely by two bolts, one near the top and the other near the bottom of the door. There was no lock, but a drop latch only.

Acting then upon this information, Blake cut two circular holes in the door, through which he could introduce his hand, and then noiselessly drew back the bolts.

Jack's excitement was intense when Blueskin lifted the latch and opened the door.

As soon as they were inside, Blake lighted a dark lantern and cautiously looked about him.

All was well!

beckoning Jack to come in silently, he closed the door; and again having recourse to the bag of tools, he took therefrom a couple of pairs of slippers.

These were of wadding, covered with silk, and made large enough to fit over the ordinary boots.

Of course, when they were on, their footsteps would be inaudible.

Blueskin handed a pair to Jack, and motioned to him to put them on.

This done, the next things he produced were two masks of black crape, which were sewn up into folds.

When the one which was given to him was on, Jack found that he could see through it with considerable distinctness, but Blueskin's face was perfectly invisible.

This, then, was an effectual precaution against their faces being recognized, if they should happen to be discovered. But Blueskin was so expert that this scarcely ever happened to him, yet, for all that, he never failed to provide against contingencies.

Having now effected an entrance, and made all their preparations, it remained, of course, for them to secure their booty as speedily as possible, and decamp.

Accordingly Blueskin unfastened the door leading from this kitchen into the interior of the dwelling, and passed through it.

They then found themselves on a square landing, from which ascended two steps leading to the principal or entrance hall of the mansion.

The silence of the grave prevailed, which even the presence of the two burglars did not break, for owing to the thick wadding slippers they had on their steps were perfectly noiseless.

Jack Sheppard followed his accomplice up the broad staircase in the hall conducting to the rooms above.

With the greatest certainty as to his course Blueskin ascended the second flight, and paused before a door at the extremity of a narrow passage.

Using the greatest caution he took hold of the handle and turned it gently round.

The door yielded.

But as it turned upon its hinges it made an ominous creaking sound.

Still it was not sufficient to awaken a sleeper.

The pair glided into the room.

The deep breathing of some person in a sound sleep reached his ears.

Blueskin carefully withdrew about an inch the dark slide which covered the lens of the lantern.

By the beam of light thus sent forth the whole of the apartment was bit by bit revealed.

On every side were tokens that no cost had been spared in the furnishing of it.

Heavy draperies, thick carpets, massive and gorgeously-carved and gilt articles—all combined to produce an air of perfect luxuriance.

Blueskin placed the lamp on the floor, and sinking down crawled on all fours towards the bed.

Upon reaching it he lifted up the valance and peeped underneath.

What he sought was there.

It was a strong box.

Increasing, if possible, the caution which had characterized all his previous movements, Blueskin grasped with his right hand the iron handle in the end of it, and began with an exertion of strength of which few men would have been capable to drag it towards him.

As it slipped slowly and steadily, without a jerk, over the thick carpet, it scarcely made a sound.

To Jack, who stood watching his proceedings, it seemed to take an age to get the chest fairly out from underneath the bed.

But at last, and without the least noise being made, it was accomplished.

Blueskin paused a moment for breath.

He listened at the same time.

But as all in and about the place seemed to be in a state of utter repose, he proceeded to continue his operations.

His next act was to take a bunch of small-sized skeleton keys from his pocket.

He looked closely at the keyhole of the box, and then selected a key which he thought would answer his purpose.

Jack watched him with the greatest anxiety.

Having chosen a key, Blueskin placed it in the lock.

It turned slightly.

Imagining, then, that it was only necessary for him to exert a little force to make the key turn in the wards, he pressed upon the bowl.

Instead, however, of producing the expected effect, to his utter confusion and dismay a bright flash of light shot forth, which was immediately followed by a loud and stunning report, which would more than suffice not only to alarm one household, but a whole neighbourhood.

CHAPTER XXIII.

THE MYSTERIOUS STRONG BOX IS THE MEANS OF BRINGING DANGER ABOUT THE EARS OF THE TWO HOUSE-BREAKERS.

BLUESKIN, with a cry of pain and rage, sprang to his feet. Jack snatched up the lantern.

But the strong box, as if deeming the explosion not sufficient, commenced making a noise of a different character.

In tone it greatly resembled that intricate piece of mechanism, a musical-box, only the sound was about a thousand times greater.

Evidently the box was made in a manner so as to best resist attack, for not only had the presence of a strange key caused a loud report, as if from a pistol, but also set some hidden machinery in motion, which created a clanging, ringing noise.

"Thieves! thieves! Murder! murder! Help! help! Thieves! thieves!" shouted a voice from behind the curtains of the bed.

It was succeeded by the loud ringing of a bell in some distant part of the building.

Everybody in the place would be aroused.

The position of the two housebreakers was most desperate.

For a moment Blueskin stood bewildered by the rapidity of the events which had occurred.

The clamour grew greater and greater.

But Blueskin quickly recovered his presence of mind.

He shut the chamber door, locked it, and shot two bolts into their sockets.

As he thus accomplished the, as it appeared to Jack, insane feat of making them prisoners, the tramp of hurried footsteps could be heard in the passage.

Blueskin turned away like lightning, and, rushing to the bed, drew back the heavy curtains.

"Murder! murder!" screamed a man, who was sitting up in bed, pulling a rope, which doubtless communicated with the bell which was still tolling loudly, "Help—help! Oh! murder! help!"

With no gentle hand Blueskin dashed the barrel of a pistol into the man's mouth, who, of course, was Mr. Hadley, the retired merchant, and occupier of the Grange.

"Cease your cries!" exclaimed Blake in a deep, stern voice, "and let go the rope, or, so sure as it is a pistol barrel which I have put into your mouth, you are a dead man."

Mr. Hadley fell flat back in bed.

He trembled with fear at the close approach of death.

But short as was the time this took, it was long enough to enable some of the inmates to reach the door.

They knocked violently when they found it fast.

But Blueskin had resolved upon a bold course of action.

It is just possible, considering the dreadful state of fright in which Mr. Hadley then was, that he might, by acting promptly, have made his escape.

But that, until his purpose was accomplished, was not what Blueskin wished to do.

"Open! open!" cried several voices at the door. "What's the matter! Open! open!"

Blake seized Mr. Hadley by the arm, and, exerting his utmost strength, pulled him out of bed.

The merchant, half-dead with fear, plumped down upon his knees as soon as he reached the door.

Blueskin shook him vigorously.

Then pressing the muzzle of the pistol against his forehead with sufficient force to cause considerable pain, he whispered in his ear impressively—

"Mr. Hadley, if you have any desire to see another day, you will reply as I tell you to reply."

"Yes, yes, good sir," was the answer, in an agony of trepidation. "Take all I've got, good sirs, but spare my life."

"Ah, now you talk sensibly. I would rather not shed your blood if I could avoid it; though I should not for a moment scruple to do so if I saw, or fancied I saw, a necessity. Repeat my words in answer to those without. If you do not, your blood be upon your own head; for I will assuredly blow your brains out. I should then, before your domestics could enter, have time to effect my purpose and escape."

While this took place the hammering and shouting at the door increased to a terrific extent.

"Now," said Blueskin, "speak after me. If your voice trembles in the least—if you fail to repeat my words correctly, or do anything to rouse a suspicion in the minds of those without that all is not right, that moment shall be your last. Do you understand?"

"Ye—es, good sir. Spare my life."

"Obey me, and I will."

"Who's there?" asked those without. "What's the matter, sir? Is it thieves or fire? What was that shot? and why was the alarm-bell rung? Open! open!"

They paused for a reply.

"Repeat these words," whispered Blueskin: "Say, it's all right—there's nothing the matter."

Mr. Hadley made two or three abortive attempts to speak.

Then he gasped out rather than uttered—

"It's all right—there's nothing the matter."

This unexpected reply produced quite a consternation in the minds of those without—they glared at each other agast.

"All right!" they repeated. "Nothing the matter? Why who rang the alarm-bell?"

"I did," replied Mr. Hadley, speaking after Blueskin. "I woke up dreaming and frightened, but it's all right now."

The servants, however, appeared far from satisfied and did not move.

"What are you stopping there for?" asked the merchant, still repeating after Blueskin, "Don't I tell you it's all right, and there's nothing the matter?"

"Yes, yes; you do!" replied a chorus of voices, "but you speak so strangely."

"What is it to you how I speak? Be off at once. To bed with you all. The one that dallies to obey my orders will be discharged to-morrow."

This threat had the desired effect, and the servants withdrew with, be it said, manifest reluctance.

There was something so artificial and contrary to his usual manner in the way their master spoke, that they felt sure something was amiss, though what that something was they could not conjecture; for had he not, with his own voice, told them that nothing was the matter.

In face of the threat of discharging anyone who lingered what could they do but retire?

Nothing.

It was, however, with uneasy consciences.

Blueskin waited and listened until he felt sure that everyone had departed.

Then he spoke to Sheppard, who had, from a variety of antagonistic emotions, stood perfectly still during the enactment of the extraordinary scene we have described.

"Pick up the lantern, Jack," he said, "and turn on the full light. Quick, now! there is no time to be lost if we are to accomplish our purpose and get off safely."

As he spoke he let go his hold of the merchant, who fell to the floor in a state of insensibility.

It was hardly possible for human nature to be proof against what he had endured. Indeed, that he should have stood up against it so long as he did is something wonderful.

As directed, Jack took up the lantern, and, turning back the slide, tolerably illuminated the apartment.

The clanging noise inside the box had ceased.

The machinery, which no doubt consisted of some cunning arrangement of springs and wheels, had run down.

If Blueskin had had the ordering of things, he would certainly not have allowed Mr. Hadley to go off in a swoon, but made him unfasten his strong box.

However, as it was, there was nothing left for him to do but to open it himself.

This he now had little fear in doing, for he calculated and with some show of reason, that it had done all in the shape of mischief that it was capable of doing till it was again put ready for action.

Knowing it to be customary with many people to sleep with the bunch of keys under their pillow, Blueskin went to the bed in the hope of finding Mr. Hadley's, for it of course stood to reason that the proper key would be the easiest to unlock the box with.

In this hope he was not disappointed.

A bunch of keys was there.

His practised eye enabled him to almost immediately select the proper key from the others in the bunch, and, on applying it to the box, he found it turn in the lock with ease.

He hastily lifted the lid.

The contents of the box almost dazzled him.

"Get the bag, Jack," he cried, "and slip these things into it. Bravo! it is a splendid booty, and well worth all the trouble it has cost us."

So saying, he rapidly turned out of the box a very valuable service of plate, and, in addition to that, a casket, the contents of which he judged to be jewels.

Then, without devoting any further attention to them, he proceeded to examine the indorsements upon a number of little packages of papers.

Nearly all of these he contemptuously cast aside, but one or two he placed carefully in his breast-pocket.

But still he seemed in quest of something more, for, without pausing an instant, he kept tossing things out until at last the chest was quite empty.

While he was thus occupied, Jack had carefully stowed into the bag which contained their tools the whole of the dinner service, the casket, and a great many other objects of less value.

He finished just as Blueskin turned the last thing out, and he stood looking curiously at him.

It would not by any means be going too far to say that the number and diversity of events of which he had been cognizant during the past few hours had quite a confusing effect upon Sheppard's mind.

The imminent danger in which they had stood had unnerved him, and it is not at all to be wondered at that it did.

With the stock of the pistol with which he had threatened to take the merchant's life, Blueskin knocked against the walls of the iron chest in order to discover whether there were any hollows in it.

But there did not appear to be. No matter whereabouts he struck, a uniform solid sound was produced.

He was irritated at being unable to find what he sought.

It was a certain document, with the nature of which the reader will presently be made acquainted.

He rose up.

"Have you got all safe, Jack?"

"Everything," replied Sheppard, hoisting the bag on to his shoulder. "Here, you had better take the lantern."

"Yes. We have done a pretty good night's work, though what I wanted was not in the box."

"Indeed."

"No. It was a paper of great consequence to Jonathan Wild. But come, if we stay much longer it will be broad daylight by the time we reach London, and that will never do."

So saying, Blueskin unfastened and opened the door.

No sooner, however, did he cross the threshold, than a sudden dash was made at him, and a dozen hands clutched at different portions of his body and apparel, while a shout of exultation arose from many throats.

CHAPTER XXIV.

AVARICE AS USUAL SUCCEEDS IN DULLING JONATHAN WILD'S SUPERSTITIOUS FEARS.

BEFORE we proceed to relate what Blueskin did upon this occasion, it is absolutely necessary that we should revert to Jonathan Wild, and detail the sequel of the frightful events which occurred in the vaults beneath the old church at Tottenham.

It will be recollected that Jonathan, hearing a noise behind him, turned suddenly round, and beheld one of the coffins moving slightly, while from its interior a sound, the like of which he had never heard before, proceeded.

Attenuated already as his mind was by the ghastly objects wherewith he was surrounded, it is no matter of surprise that this spectacle should consummate the enchainment of his faculties.

Then, as with bursting eyeballs he gazed upon it, his senses received a still greater shock, for a fearful shriek—such as might, without any stretch of the imagination, be supposed to emanate from some damned soul when hurled headlong downwards to perdition—rent the air, which stagnated around him.

And then ere he had died away—horror of horrors! the coffin toppled over, and fell on to the floor of the vault.

Jonathan felt his senses were leaving him.

And yet before total annihilation supervened he was conscious that a bony hand had seized him with an iron grasp.

After that all was nothingness.

For the first time in his life, Wild swooned.

How long he remained in a state of syncope he had, of course, no means of telling, but it was for no very great length of time, since the peculiar chilliness of the atmosphere would naturally have a revivifying effect upon the system.

When he came back to life his brain was in a whirl.

It was some time before he could call to mind what had happened.

The rayless darkness puzzled him. It was long before he could form an idea of where he was.

A sensation of weight, too, was about his limbs, as though some heavy body was pressing on them.

But Jonathan's mind and memory were strong and lucid; so after a time it happened that he recollected all that had taken place up to a certain point.

What that certain point was the reader already knows.

For a few moments he was the slave to a fresh accession of superstitious terror.

But with admirable self-control he subdued it.

Then he slowly rose to a sitting posture, and drew his legs from under the heavy weight which was above them.

In this attitude he remained for a few seconds.

Every second his mind was getting clearer, and what was more, freer from ghostly dread.

He put out his right hand.

But he drew it back with an involuntary shudder of loathing and disgust.

It had touched something cold—icy cold.

Then in another instant he recollected what, from the peculiar feel, it must have been.

His lantern.

Nothing more.

His dark lantern, which he now remembered he had in his fright let fall.

It was with anything but repugnance, after having made this discovery, that he again extended his hand in the direction of the cold object.

But this time he was not so fortunate, for he made several fruitless attempts before he could succeed in touching it.

At last he found it.

With trembling eagerness he opened the little door and felt with his fingers if the wick was uninjured.

Yes, all was well.

In another moment he ignited it by means of a phosphorous match, for Jonathan always took the precaution—a good one under any circumstances—to have about his person the means of readily procuring a light.

The wick of the lantern flickered and spluttered a great deal before it caught light properly, and to prevent any current of air reaching it Jonathan closed the door in which the bull's eye was fitted.

Slowly and carefully he got upon his feet.

By the time he had drawn himself up to his full height a broad beam of light issued through the lens.

Then as he looked downward a frightful spectacle presented itself to his view.

Truly was it enough to freeze the blood.

The coffin which had in so inexplicable a manner tumbled off the shelf reached the floor with so much violence that it was burst open.

Within it, completely bathed in blood, was the disfigured remnants of a corpse.

Jonathan's heart heaved at the sight.

But what is it that causes such a sudden revulsion of feeling on the part of the thief-takers?

He no longer shrinks back as if horrified, but on the contrary bends downwards with the utmost eagerness.

It is because he sees sparkling with a rare effulgence in that darksome place the coronet of diamonds which the fond father had presented to his daughter as a nuptial gift, and which, in accordance with her strange desire, was buried with her.

It is that which he stoops to pick up.

As much as possible, he averts his eyes from the dead body while he does so.

Then, to his surprise, he finds it cling tightly, and he has to use some degree of violence to disengage it.

But at last it comes away in his hand, and he holds it so that the rays of the lantern fall with the greatest luminosity upon it.

Jonathan has not yet got to the end of the horrors of that place.

He starts.

His face turns of a ghastly, sallow hue.

The diamonds are dappled in fresh blood.

The setting itself is bruised and battered, and clinging to it is a quantity of dark brown hair.

"Good heavens!" said Wild, his voice for the first time breaking the silence of that gloomy place. "Are horrors to never cease? I see all now as plainly as though I had been witness to the whole. Would that I had never been tempted to come upon this errand, for this is a sight which, when I am alone and in darkness, I shall never be able to banish from my imagination. It is horrible in the extreme."

A fascination which he could not resist drew Wild's eyes to the loathsome sight upon the floor of the vault.

"Yes, yes," he said; "poor thing! Buried alive! I can easily understand how her morbid mind, for such it must have been, clung to the idea that her dream would be fulfilled, and so, at the moment, nature gave way, and she swooned. A swoon which her friends took for death."

"She must have revived, and found herself in her coffin. Imprisoned—in darkness—alone. I can fancy how she shrieked for aid when she realized her situation. How she called upon her husband—father—mother—brother—all without result. I can imagine, too, her frantic and futile efforts to free herself. How, as she writhed about, she struck the walls of the strong, leaden-bound coffin till her bleeding limbs were first bruised then broken. It must have been her head, as she struck it against the top and ends and sides which I heard, and which produced the sound for which I was at a loss to account. How terrible must have been her struggle to actually move so great a weight from its position! It must have taken a long time, and who can picture the extent of her agony the while? Then, at last, the coffin must have got so placed that but a slight thing would destroy its equilibrium. That was when I heard her give her death-shriek, as the coffin fell upon the floor. Well, well, after all, I ought to feel glad that I have arrived at a solution of the horrible affair. If I had not, it would have haunted me to the last day of my existence—as it will now—"

It was half to himself that Wild spoke these words. The reader will perceive they were simply the ideas which passed through his mind.

That he was correct in his conclusions there was every reason to believe. It can easily be accounted for, if we imagine her of an exceedingly sensitive organization. The idea of the so close prospect of marriage would of itself produce a great amount of mental excitation. Then a dream of so extraordinary a character as that which she was reported to have had, would, in such a subject, have a morbid tendency, and, in the end, cause a suspension of nature complete enough to deceive the best medical man in the universe, who did not happen to take precedent circumstances into consideration, and so be on the watch for such an event.

And so, unquestionably, the poor young thing, who one would have thought could scarcely have been worthy of so terrible a fate, was consigned to the grave alive.

Even Jonathan Wild, brutal as he was by disposition, grew almost pathetic in his words when the suffering she must have endured were forced upon him. It was probably the first time he had ever felt the sentiment of pity towards any one in his life.

Life now, however, was beyond all doubt extinct.

Well, indeed, was it so, and that the vital spark did not cling to that once fair casket, but now bleeding, mutilated mass of flesh.

Jonathan Wild slowly let the tiara, which he had undergone so much horror to obtain, drop from his hand.

He felt to take it away, covered with blood and matted with hair as it was, would be impossible.

It fell upon the floor for whom it had been intended.

Cowed and subdued by what had taken place, Jonathan proceeded to quit the place in which he had suffered more agony of mind than he ever had, or most likely ever would in any other.

As, however, he moved away, he suddenly remembered an occurrence which had yet to be explained.

CHAPTER XXV.

JONATHAN WILD AFTER ALL CARRIES OFF THE BRIDE'S DIAMOND TIARA.

"I had forgotten," said Wild, in a strange, hushed voice, as he held aloft the lantern above his head, and glanced in a scared fashion about him, "I had forgotten that—some one—a—caught hold of my arm. Who was it? Who was it, I say?"

All was still.

The fears which Jonathan had with so much difficulty kept in check now came throwing back with tenfold intensity.

And who could wonder at it.

Surely he must have been something either much more or much less than a man who would, under such circumstances, have evinced no signs of trepidation.

That it was not she who now lay so still in death that had seized upon him with such a convulsive grip was tolerably evident. Who then could it have been?

Fain would Wild have received an immediate answer to that question.

But none came.

Suddenly, however, he gave a start; the light of the lamp had fallen upon some dark object that looked like, and, yes, surely, must be a human being lying in another part of the vault.

A second glance showed Wild that he was not mistaken. It was a human body, and, by the attire, a male.

Who could it be that, at that ghostly hour, had followed Wild down the staircase?

Was it the husband?

Jonathan thought so.

He drew nearer, and then he recognized the clothing and the individual.

It was Quilt Arnold.

His presence there is easily accounted for.

From the moment that Wild entered the church a fierce and ungovernable curiosity arose in his breast to know what it was the thief-taker wanted in the vaults.

Dread of the consequences that would ensue if Wild found he had left his post for a long time kept him back, but even this failed presently.

Let the risk be what it might he determined to satisfy himself.

Now it by no means followed that because he had come to this determination he should take no measure to conceal this dereliction from duty from his master. On the contrary, he removed his shoes, and with only his stockings as a covering for his feet crept along the aisle of the church in the direction of the stone slab which he had assisted in removing.

He cautiously peeped into the abyss.

He could neither see nor hear anything.

But having come so far he determined not to turn back without doing what he wished, so he lowered himself through the aperture even as Wild his master had done, only Quilt, not being near so bulky, accomplished the feat with so much the greater ease.

He immediately discovered that the steps were thickly covered with sawdust.

This was most favourable to him, since it amounted to almost an impossibility for his footsteps to be heard.

He gained the door opening into the vault.

He peeped in.

Wild was standing with his back turned towards him, and holding the lantern close to the floor.

That was when Jonathan was looking for something upon which to stand.

Then Quilt heard the stifled cry.

The drumming noise.

His eyes turned in the direction whence it came.

He saw the coffin move, and fall off the shelf.

He heard the frightful shriek as it descended. His brain was pierced.

Overcome with the intense horror of the scene, he sprang forward at the moment when the lantern fell from Wild's hand.

Upon the impulse of the moment, upon thus suddenly finding himself in darkness, he grasped Jonathan's arm in the manner we have related, who, as we are also aware, fell backwards like one suddenly struck down by death.

Quilt Arnold let go his hold, and staggered two or three paces, as he thought, in the direction of the door.

But before he could tell whether he had 'aken the right direction, he felt his legs give way beneath him, and he, too, lapsed into utter insensibility.

No sooner did Wild see his officer, than he comprehended at once all that it has taken us some time to relate.

Take it for all in all, it was just one of those things which would elicit his utmost wrath.

The humanizing effect of the scene of horrors he had passed through was entirely dissipated. He lost sight of everything but rage at this disobedience of his orders.

"Curse you!" he said, and he dealt the unfortunate officer a couple of fearful kicks in the ribs. "So that's the way you treat me, is it? Get up with you, or curse you, I'll — Ah!"

A sudden thought struck Wild.

He would punish Quilt Arnold in a manner he would never forget.

He would leave him in the vault to come to his senses and get out as best he might.

Wild was quite himself again.

He chuckled gleefully.

"Yes—yes, Mr. Quilt. We'll see how you like waking up and finding yourself in the dark along with the dead. It will shake your nerves a little for you. Ha! ha!"

Wild's laugh always had a disagreeable sound, but it was more than usually apparent in that place consecrated to the remains of those who were no more.

His eye again fell upon the tiara, for the gems sent out numerous scintillations of light.

He had dropped it conscious of some feeling of remorse.

But now so complete and sudden a reversal of his feelings had taken place, that, cursing himself for a fool for having dropped it, he took it up again and, notwithstanding the loathsome state it was in, stuffed it into his coat-pocket.

This done he strode towards the door, and passing through closed it carefully after him. Had there been a fastening to it he would have fastened it also.

His great object now seemed to be to get out of the church with as much celerity as possible.

The stone he left just as it was.

"There is a little surprise in store for some one," he said. "I wonder who it will be."

He pulled the church door to after him.

But, however careless he might be about leaving traces to show that the church had been broken into, he was especially careful not to identify himself in any of them.

For this reason he stood in the porch and looked warily around before he ventured to emerge into the graveyard.

He listened too to hear if anyone was stirring.

But at that hour everybody in the village with the exception of himself was fast asleep.

Finding all quiet he passed down the smooth gravelled walk and through the little gate into the road, along which he walked hastily until he reached the meadow where by his orders the horses had been placed.

He led out his own and mounted him, and, turning his head in the direction of London, set forward at a sharp trot.

All the way he went the thought of what a shock it would give Quilt to come to his senses and find himself alone in a vault amused him vastly.

"Ha! ha! I fancy I see him now—poor Quilt! If he gets out of that all right, and don't go mad, or anything of that sort, I rather think he will feel more inclined to obey my orders, and not go prying where he isn't wanted. Ha! ha! It's a capital joke. I shall tell Blueskin of it. Ha! ha!"

Wild was never so facetious before.

But then think of the good day he had had.

And what was best of all, he had in addition the diamond tiara in his pocket, for returning which he fully expected to extort a sum very far indeed above its value.

CHAPTER XXVI.

JONATHAN WILD PAYS A VISIT TO HIS PRISONERS.

It was hard upon daybreak when Wild drew up in front of his own house in Newgate-street.

He was evidently expected by some one, for as soon as the horse stopped the door opened.

One of his men was on duty named Levee, and, going out, led his master's horse round to the stable.

Jonathan went straight up stairs.

He was weary.

Entering a room in which the different objects were just visible, he threw himself upon the bed, and was soon in a deep, sound sleep.

It was, however, disturbed by fantastic images, the result of what he had gone through during the night.

About ten o'clock he awoke, and, according to custom, took up his station in his office.

He did a good bit of business, but as it was simply in the trade, it is not worth while to trouble the reader with it.

The day was closing in when Mr. Wild left his office.

It was his custom always to stick to business.

He had half expected to have a visit from Lord Lugestrie, but the day passed quite away, and he did not make his appearance.

Then, as we have said, he got off his stool and directed his steps towards the upper portion of his house.

But when he had mounted a few stairs, he paused suddenly as a thought crossed his mind.

He placed his hands behind him, and pursued it.

Then, having come to a determination upon the subject, he slowly walked down stairs again.

He turned at the bottom, and made his way towards the cells.

The man who was stationed at the grating swung it open to allow him to pass through.

"Has Quilt come back yet?" asked Jonathan, in a surly voice.

"No, Mr. Wild, if you please sir, he has not."

"Ya—ah! Shut up. Where's Blue?"

"Aint seen nothink of him since late last night, Mr. Wild."

Wild strode along the subterraneous passage from which the cell doors opened.

"I suppose that Blue and that young Sheppard have gone to Hadley's crib at Kilburn? What's amiss, I wonder, that they don't come back? It will be awkward if he steals the paper, and it is found upon him. When once its existence is suspected, farewell to that scheme. And yet I think I can trust to Blue. He's my right hand, and no mistake."

By the time he had done muttering these sentences the end of the corridor, if so it might be called, was reached.

The blank wall apparently was before him.

But only apparently.

Jonathan stooped down and pressed steadily on the corner of one of the stones with which the passage was paved.

A slight grating noise succeeded, and a secret door in the stone wall swung open.

Wild passed quickly through the opening and then closed the door again.

On the side, however, upon which he now was there was no attempt at concealment.

The door could be plainly enough seen.

Wild was now in a corridor very similar, so far as general appearance went, to the other one.

Before one of the cell doors, of which there were several, he paused.

It was the last but one from the end of the passage.

The locks all through Jonathan's house were constructed after one model, which enabled him, by carrying a master-key, to open any door he pleased.

This key he produced, and fitted into the lock before him.

It was attached to his neck by a steel chain.

Having unlocked the door, he next proceeded to withdraw the bolts, of which there were two, one at the top and one at the bottom.

Then, lifting up his foot, he kicked the door violently open.

So soon as this was done, he heard a great rustling as of straw from the interior.

Mingled with it was the clanking of a chain.

Then he heard a voice.

"Villain! away—away!" it said, in horrible screaming accents. "It is in vain you come to threaten. Do you worst—do your worst, I say. While I can use the faculty of speech, I will defy you."

These words seemed to produce no effect upon Jonathan Wild.

Or if they did he took it very coolly.

With great deliberation he seated himself upon the sill of the door.

And here we should observe that this dungeon, like the rest, had its floor several feet below the level of the passage.

So as the great thief-taker sat in this rather peculiar position his legs hung down, but did not reach the dungeon floor.

As he thus sat, he was on a level with anyone who might be there.

Jonathan crossed his legs one over the other with an air of indifference, while with his right hand he played with that bloodthirsty weapon he called his pet.

He fixed his gaze upon the inmate of the cell.

It was a man—and by several little tokens evidently one of rank—but in such a frightful state of filth and emaciation, that he was terrible indeed to look upon.

He was secured to the wall by means of a heavy chain, which was rivetted round his waist.

Upon hearing the sound of Jonathan's voice, it would appear as though he had been suddenly inspired with strength, for he had raised himself on his hands and crawled as far towards the door as his chain would permit him.

Strange, indeed, was it, and indomitable and courageous to an extraordinary degree must he have been thus to breathe defiance to Wild, for what means had he of defending himself.

None whatever. The sound of his enemy's voice had inspired him with a factitious vigour, but he was nevertheless entirely at the mercy of the thief-taker.

And as Jonathan sat in that strange fashion on the stone step leading down to the dungeon, his face assumed an expression such as might well have become a fiend.

Two things were evident.

He treated his captive's menaces and threats with the utmost derision.

He looked upon his miserable state with satisfaction.

Few kindly feelings found a home in the breast of Jonathan Wild, and most assuredly pity for the sufferings of anyone was not one of them.

On the contrary, almost without exception, he furnished him with matter for delight.

With the most careless and indifferent air Jonathan leaned against the upright of the door.

The mocking smile which distorted his lips filled the wretched prisoner with infuriation.

Foam rose to his lips.

His eyes burned with vindictive hatred.

"Hence, villain!" he shrieked in his impotent rage.

"Hence, villain! Destroyer of my peace and happiness, begone! begone! Spare yourself the trouble of making another attempt to bend me to your hateful purpose, for I tell you it will be useless—quite useless. I defy you."

"Ha! ha!"

"You laugh at my defiance and my threats."

"I am in a position to do so."

"But you will not always be, Jonathan Wild, not always. And when you are not beware."

"Fool!" exclaimed Jonathan, who began to lose his patience and his temper at the same time, "idiot that you are not to comply with my demands!"

"I will never do it, Jonathan Wild; you will never do it, and therefore I defy you to do your worst."

"Sir Marmaduke Morel, you are a traitor."

"And you, Jonathan Wild, are a villain."

"Granted that I am, still it does not negative my accusation. I tell you again, Sir Marmaduke, you are a traitor, and as such your life is forfeit to the sovereign you have outraged."

As Jonathan made this loyal and dramatic speech, he put his tongue in his cheek, and distorted his visage into a frightful leer.

"What good is it to me to deny it? Yet, good or not, so long as I have breath enough left in my body to utter a denial I will utter it."

"You are a Jacobite."

"You lie! to your teeth I tell it—you lie, Jonathan Wild, you lie! I am not a Jacobite."

"Ha! ha!"

"Laugh on, fiend, and mock me until you are weary. Full well do you know this charge has only been trumped up against me in order that you may extort money, and rob my children of their inheritance. But this time your plan will fail, Jonathan Wild—signally fail; for never, never will I succumb to you."

"We shall see presently," said Wild, still affecting unconcern, as, taking a short pipe from his pocket, he began to smoke with great deliberation. "You are obstinate, you have held out long, but you will be obliged to give in at last. If you had been wise, you would have done so at first; if you will take my advice, you will do so now."

The prisoner this time was silent.

The reaction was coming.

Excitement had up to the present moment set his weakness at defiance, but that excitement consumed itself.

He sank down upon the damp earth of which the floor of the dungeon was composed.

"You see," said Jonathan Wild, as he noted this circumstance, "I was in the right. You cannot hold out—you must give way."

Painfully the wasted wretch turned over on his side.

He spoke, but it was no longer in the wild, screeching manner which had previously characterized what he said.

His voice was hollow, and seemed like a strange half moan, half whisper.

"Jonathan Wild," he said, "you apprehended me on a warrant charging me with being a Jacobite and a participator in treasonous designs against my sovereign. You made me a prisoner, and conveyed me to this noisome place. No one can know better than yourself how entirely without foundation was the charge against me. I was innocent in word and deed. During all the party strife, which has been for so long prevalent, and which cannot fail to be fatal to the welfare of the kingdom, I have kept carefully aloof from the contending parties; have preserved a strict neutrality. Whatever my own convictions were, I never allowed them to transpire. Possessed of a sufficiency of wealth to enable me to maintain myself and family in comfort, I sought no more; but anxious for their own comfort and security, withdrew from the world, and secluded myself far from the haunts of men. But you, Jonathan Wild, like some foul and venomous reptile, coveted the little which I had, and in the attempt to obtain it have not scrupled to blast my happiness. As I say, you brought me here unjustly a prisoner, and wrongfully accused me, and then wished me to make my little all the price for my life and freedom. But no, Jonathan Wild, rather than exherediate my children from that which is theirs unalienably I would suffer the torments of the damned, and die a thousand deaths!"

Jonathan smoked on in silence. Neither by word nor act did he attempt to interrupt this long speech from his victim, who has already said enough to give the reader some ideas of the great wrong which he suffered at his hands.

Still more exhausted, the prisoner lay upon the flooring of the cell.

And yet only a week before he was robust and strong, but starvation and the darkness and dampness of his dungeon had literally brought him to the brink of the grave.

He was one of the many victims whom Jonathan Wild, under the pretence of their being rebels, contrived to apprehend and lodge in the vaults beneath his house.

Most people, when in this predicament, had been only too glad to sacrifice what they had in order to be released; for, as we stated in a former chapter, it had become notorious that should any one be accused by Wild of Jacobinism, it was just tantamount to being condemned, for conviction followed in every case.

It was injudicious on the part of the Government to employ such a man as Wild; but no doubt they thought they were acting for the best. At that time things were very different to the present. The country then was filled with malcontents, who were perpetually hatching fresh conspiracies.

Sir Marmaduke Osborn was a baronet, which title had been transmitted to him by his ancestors who had had it bestowed upon them for services rendered to their country.

Jonathan Wild had fixed upon him as being a likely subject for him to commit his extortion upon, and, as we have seen, made him a prisoner. The price he set upon his release was that the whole of the estates belonging to Sir Marmaduke should be transferred to him.

This, the conversation which we have recorded, sufficiently shows he had resolutely refused to do, and he languished a prisoner in that dark cell.

Jonathan hoped he should tame him by resorting to the same means as those which are employed to tame brute beasts; but up to now he had failed to accomplish his end.

Whether ultimately he did so or not will transpire in the course of the narrative.

And during this time the wife and family of Sir Marmaduke were plunged into the deepest distress and doubt at his inexplicable disappearance; for there was nothing by which they could trace him to his present abode.

Observing that his prisoner still preserved his lifeless attitude upon the floor, Jonathan jumped down from his seat, and made his way towards him.

At his approach, however, Sir Marmaduke shrunk slowly and slowly back, as he would before some furious animal.

At last he reached the wall, and could go no further.

He leant himself against it, and fixed his eyes upon Wild's face.

For the life of him, Jonathan could not withstand that steadfast gaze.

"Are you going to add personal violence to what you have already done?" asked the prisoner. "Have I not suffered enough at your hands?"

"Comply with my demands," replied Wild fiercely. "I will not be set at nought by you any longer."

"I will never comply. A thousand times over, were such a thing possible, would I sacrifice my life rather than I would my possessions."

"But I do not want your life. It is your estates, and I will have them, too. Besides, you seem to forget that if you are punished as a traitor your goods pass away from your family just the same, and are confiscated to the Crown."

"Villain! diabolical villain!" murmured the prisoner, as this conviction was forced upon him. "Surely there will come a day when you will have to answer for all this!"

"Ha! ha!" laughed Wild. "I am perfectly willing to take the responsibility of answering for my actions."

"Time will show that—time will show that. Again, I say, Jonathan Wild, do your worst. I care not."

"I shall give you till to-morrow to decide."

"It is useless. You can take my answer now."

"No."

"I say, yes."

"You don't know. Not yet have you known the bitterness of starvation, but you shall know it. I say again I give you till to-morrow to decide. I shall come then, Sir Marmaduke, and I hope by that time you will see the wisdom of doing as I desire. If not, I shall at once bring you to trial, and then your fate is sealed. You shall die as a traitor an ignominious death, and the name of Osborn shall be execrated in all future generations. What you have inherited shall be swept away from them. Thus not only do you destroy yourself, but you destroy them also."

Well was it for the safety of Jonathan Wild that his captive was so powerless as he was. His words excited him to frenzy, and had he been capable of it he would have made a desperate attempt upon the villain's life.

But Wild knew that he was safe.

He waited for a reply.

None came.

"You are thinking over what I have said, I hope," added Jonathan, after a pause of some moments. "Surely now you must see that it is best. Look, here is a deed transferring your estates to me. It is a legal instrument drawn out to my instructions."

As he spoke Jonathan took a folded paper from his pocket.

"Sign this," he said, unfolding it, "and you are a free man instantly. You have yet strength to do it. Come." Sir Marmaduke held out his hand for the paper.

With a smile of exultation Jonathan gave it to him.

For a moment the unfortunate gentleman looked with fading vision at the paper.

Tears filled his eyes.

Through the mist he fancied he could see his wife and children driven from their homes, wanderers upon the face of the earth, their name bearing the brand of infamy.

That would be the result if he still persisted in refusing compliance with Wild's demands.

On the other, although his possessions would pass away from him, yet he would remain. Disgrace would not affix its stigma to his name. He would be able to exert himself for their maintenance, which he was certainly better qualified to do than they.

He wavered.

Jonathan observed it, and already congratulated himself upon the triumph he had achieved.

But then the conviction of his own entire innocence arose in Sir Marmaduke's mind, and though he knew that his judge would be prejudiced against him, yet he thought surely he would not be suffered to perish.

He determined not to barter away his birthright, but to trust himself to a trial.

Then, to the confusion of Jonathan, his prisoner crushed up the paper which had been given him, and feebly threw it from him.

"Never—never," he said. "I am innocent. Once more do your worst."

With these words, a faint spasm convulsed the frame of the unfortunate knight, and, closing his eyes, he fell backwards as though bereft of life.

"Confound him," said Wild, as he stamped his foot. "Confound him. But no matter—no matter. I can wait. He has hesitated, and now I shall conquer."

He stooped down and shook Sir Marmaduke roughly, but he was quite unconscious.

"Curse his contumacy! I never had so much trouble with any one before. Never mind; it is worth my while. To-morrow I will visit him again, and doubt not that I shall succeed in bringing him to sign the paper. I will take it and put it back. How he has crumpled it, to be sure."

As he spoke, Wild picked up the paper, and carefully smoothing it out, put it back into his pocket.

He scrambled then up the high steps into the passage beyond.

Then casting one more glance at the inanimate form of his prisoner, Jonathan closed the door and fastened it securely.

This done, he retraced his steps, and, reaching the hall, again ascended the stairs.

CHAPTER XXVII.

JACK SHEPPARD AND BLUESKIN FIND IT A MUCH MORE DIFFICULT MATTER TO LEAVE "THE GRANGE" THAN THEY DID TO ENTER IT.

THE strange adventures and proceedings of Jonathan Wild have now for some time occupied our attention, but as he is in no immediate danger we feel it an imperative duty to turn to two other characters, who were, and in whom we hope a greater interest is felt than there can be in the villainous thief-taker, whose conduct in the case of Sir Marmaduke nothing whatever could excuse.

The two characters to whom we allude are, as the reader more than expects, Blueskin and Jack Sheppard.

It will be remembered that we left them in a position of great peril.

The servants, satisfied that something was wrong, had crept back silently to the door of their master's room and listened.

They heard the conversation which had passed between the two burglars, and had therefore little difficulty at arriving at the facts of the case.

With a boldness for which they deserved commendation they resolved to lay in wait at the door, and as the two midnight intruders passed out pounce upon them at unawares.

One of their number, too, they sent to obtain additional assistance.

It was only for a second that Blueskin lost his presence of mind.

ropping the lantern which he held in his hand he clenched both fists, and struck out at his foes.

But they were many to contend against.

Very soon, however, they found they were getting the worst of it.

As for Jack, he had not been molested. As Blueskin preceded him, he was in time to see the attack upon his friend and to draw back from the danger.

[BLUESKIN AND SHEPPARD ESCAPING FROM "THE GRANGE."]

But it was with no intention to desert his friend that he drew back: it was to put down the bag of plate, and so soon as he had done so he sprang forward to his assistance.

The sudden rush that he made among the servants was very effective, and two or three were driven back.

But, seeing Jack was such a stripling, they made sure it would be a very easy task to obtain a victory over him.

But never were appearances more deceptive than they were in this case, and so they quickly found.

Blueskin quickly enough discovered that he could do little more than shake off his foes.

This was a state of things that could not possibly be continued. He felt sure that before long others would come to their assistance, and resistance would be vain.

So, waiting for an opportunity, which very quickly occurred, he drew two pistols from his pockets, and, cocking them, took a deliberate aim.

At the sight of the fire-arms the servants drew back. Like all those who are unaccustomed to them, they dreaded them much more than they really deserved to be, which was owing to the exaggerated idea they entertained of their powers of mischief.

"Stand back, every one of you," cried Blueskin, in a stern voice. "Stand back, or by heaven I will blow the brains out of the one who does not!"

The fierceness and resolution with which these words were uttered made the servants involuntarily move a few steps backwards.

Blueskin was not slow to perceive the advantage he had gained, and so, like a skilful general, he followed them up, and drove them before him down the passage towards the staircase.

When he saw the turn matters were taking, Jack extricated himself from his assailants, and, re-entering Mr

Hadley's bed-room, brought out the bag containing the booty.

The servants shrank back further and further before the muzzles of the pistols, but, just as they were about to beat a retreat they heard their master shout to them to stand fire.

Mr. Hadley, who had recovered from his swoon, emerged into the passage; he, too, held a brace of pistols in his hands.

He took a steady and deliberate aim, and pulled the trigger.

Jack felt a sudden cessation of pulsation about his heart, and the blood turned cold in his veins as he heard the click of the pistols.

But they flashed only in the pan.

This, doubtless, was owing to the time they had been disused.

The servants turned and fled.

Blueskin turned round suddenly, and fired one of the pistols along the passage in the direction of Mr. Hadley.

A loud report filled the air, and was succeeded by a cry and a fall.

"By Jove you have hit him, Blueskin," said Jack, as he looked half terrified around.

"Never mind him," replied his companion. "Follow me at once. If I mistake not we have by no means got to the end of our difficulties. Quick—quick!"

He rushed down the staircase as he spoke, Jack following closely at his heels.

But they did not descend the flight that led from the first to the ground floor.

A number of men were congregated in the hall.

The servant, who had at the commencement of the affray been sent out for assistance, had returned, bringing a formidable force with him.

The situation of the two housebreakers was critical in the extreme.

But Blueskin was prompt to act.

"Back, Jack!" he said. "We can't fight against such a lot as that, unless we outrench ourselves somewhere so as to gain an advantage over them. Back—back!"

Sheppard had no choice in the matter, so he perforce obeyed the directions given him, and, turning round, re-ascended the stairs.

The retreat of the burglars had of necessity an emboldening influence upon those below, and they rushed up the broad staircase in a tumultuous throng.

On the second landing Blueskin paused a moment to look round, but perceiving no place where he could make a successful stand, he ran up another and narrower flight of stairs.

They were closely followed by their pursuers.

The heavy bag of plunder was a great incumbrance to Jack, but he kept up bravely.

This narrow staircase was, of course, well adapted for defence, though Blueskin could by no means see his way to ultimate escape; for that they would be able to overcome or even keep at bay, for any length of time, so many foes was beyond the bounds of possibility.

As soon as they reached the top of these narrow stairs, Blueskin fired his remaining pistol.

The men who were ascending were packed so closely together, that the shot could not fail to be most effective.

A scene of the greatest confusion followed.

Then Blueskin lunged, in quick succession, both his discharged weapons down the staircase.

It was the best use he could put them to, for he would have no opportunity of loading them again.

Then, with great rapidity, Blueskin drew another brace of pistols from his pocket, and discharged them simultaneously, and flung the weapons at the heads of his foes.

This vigorous and deadly resistance struck a panic into the hearts of the domestics and those who had come to their assistance, and they hesitated to advance.

At the moment when he fired this last volley Blueskin heard Jack calling to him in a suppressed voice.

Then a rush of cold air blew upon him.

Being unprovided with fire-arms, Jack had taken no part in the affray, and therefore turned his attention to the discovery of some means of escape.

The first thing his eyes lighted upon was a ladder resting against the wall.

Immediately over the top of this ladder was a trap-door.

Quick as thought Jack ascended the ladder.

The trap-door was secured by a couple of bolts, and these Sheppard worked with much difficulty withdrew.

It was then he called to his companion.

The trap-door was, on the outside, covered with lead, and consequently very heavy; but, exerting all his strength, Jack pushed it open.

As he expected, it was a means of reaching the roof-tops of the mansion.

Without another moment's delay, and before those below could recover from their panic, Blueskin sprang up the ladder, and was out on to the tiles as soon as Jack was.

Then with great presence of mind, he, hearing that the men were rushing up the stairs, pulled the ladder up after him, and closed the trap-door.

Some little time must now elapse before the pursuers could reach the roof, and it was obviously the best policy for our friends to descend as quickly as possible by some other means.

But this was no easy task: an apparent impossibility, in fact, for neither could at all see how it was to be accomplished.

They had not much time to spend in deliberation.

"There is only one way of doing it, Jack," said Blueskin, who had made a rapid but careful examination of the roof.

"And what is that?"

"To descend this pipe here in the angle of the building. Do you think you could manage it?"

CHAPTER XXVIII.

THE BURGLARS CONVEY THE "SWAG" TO WILD'S WAREHOUSE IN THE HORSEFERRY, WESTMINSTER.

JACK SHEPPARD looked rather scared as he contemplated the very hazardous mode of descent proposed by his comrade, and then shook his head.

He might well be excused for feeling rather dubious, for it really did not seem possible for a cat to descend.

In one corner of the building was an iron pipe, used for conveying the rain-water off the roof to a cistern below.

In diameter it was about four inches.

"It is our only hope," said Blueskin, "and we had better risk that than stay here and be taken, as we assuredly shall be if we delay much longer."

"We shall; that's true enough."

"I will go first, and you can follow me."

"Agreed; I would rather you try it first. But what shall I do with this bag of swag?"

"Oh! drop it down."

"But the plate?"

"Oh! it won't signify if it is bruised a bit. Drop it."

"Very good," said Jack, and leaning forward he let the bag fall from his hand.

It was heavy, and fell swiftly.

It reached the earth with a jingling sound.

"Now then, Jack, I'm off; watch how I do it."

Taking every precaution, Blueskin set about commencing the perilous descent.

He laid himself flat on the tiles, and gradually lowered himself until he reached the parapet.

The edge of this he clutched tightly, and so hung for a moment.

The iron pipe was within a foot of him, so, cautiously shifting one hand, he at last grasped it.

Then he shifted his other hand.

Jack grew dizzy to see him.

But with the greatest caution Blueskin descended by the pipe. He scratched his hands and knees in the process, but for such trivialities as those he did not care a jot.

In a very short space of time, considering the difficulties he had to contend against, he reached the ground.

But Jack did not wait until his comrade had done this, but when he was only about halfway down had begun to descend also.

Of the two Jack got down easier, which was owing as much to his slowness as his agility, and, in fact, he was by the side of Blueskin before that individual was aware that he had more than commenced his very perilous journey.

However, he was glad there was no more delay, for the trampling of many feet told him that the servants were already on the scent.

"Confound it," said Blueskin, as he picked up the bag and ran across the yard with it in the direction of the wall where the rope-ladder was hanging. "Confound it! This is one of the most troublesome jobs I have ever had in my life. Look sharp, or our retreat will be cut off, after all."

Jack increased his speed, and there was good reason that he should do so, for lights were flashing about in all directions.

Very fortunately the ladder was not far off, and they reached it in a few seconds.

"Now, Jack, up with you. Quick! I will follow."

"And the swag?"

"I'll see to that. I will tie it to the bottom of the ladder, and draw it up after me."

"Capital! You would have found it rather difficult to carry up with you."

It was easy enough to climb up the ladder while Blueskin held it steady, and Jack was soon on the top of the wall.

While he was going up, Blueskin had tied the bag to the last round of the ladder.

Then he himself mounted it, and seating himself astride the wall, commenced to haul up the booty.

But at this moment the servants reached the wall, and one man, who looked like a gamekeeper, or something of that kind, had a double-barrelled gun in his hand.

"Come down there," he shouted, raising his piece and covering our friends with it, "Come down, or by heaven I'll blow you both to atoms!"

Before he had finished his speech though, Blueskin had drawn up the ladder and lowered it on the other side.

"Over the wall, Jack, and hang by your hands," he cried, as he himself slipped down the ladder, "and then follow me."

Jack did as he was bid, and then arose the report of the gun.

Its discharge was harmless.

Before the echo had died away, Blueskin was standing at the foot of the ladder, and he was directly afterwards rejoined by Sheppard.

Still they were far from safe.

The plunder though was all right, and so as he considered himself the stronger, Blueskin picked it up, and set off at such a run, that Sheppard had as much as he could do to keep up with him.

After going at this pace for about a hundred and fifty yards, he slackened speed and looked back.

No signs of pursuit could be seen, so they went on at an easier rate.

The horse which they had left in the lane fully justified Blake's assurance that he would not stray away. In fact, he was on the identical same spot.

The bag of plate was thrown into the cart by Blueskin, who mounted and took the reins, while Jack scrambled in after him.

The horse was refreshed by his halt and banquet in the lane, and, without any incitement, went along at a fast trot that got over the ground in a most surprising manner.

As they turned the corner of the Edgware-road into Oxford-street they saw before them, on the eastern horizon, the first faint flush of coming day.

But still, in the opposite quarter of the heavens, the moon shone with a brilliancy as yet undimmed.

To Jack's surprise, instead of making direct for the stables in Long-acre, Blueskin turned off towards Westminster.

"Where are you going?" Jack asked.

"To Jonathan's crib in the Horseferry, where he keeps the swag."

CHAPTER XXIX.

RETURNS TO QUILT ARNOLD, WHO WAS LEFT BY WILD IN THE VAULTS BENEATH TOTTENHAM CHURCH.

HALF-AN-HOUR after Jonathan mounted his horse and rode off towards London, Quilt Arnold began to exhibit some symptoms of returning animation.

He moved slightly, and a faint groan came from his lips.

The two kicks which Jonathan administered had damaged his anatomy a little.

It was pain, doubtless, that brought him back to life.

At first he was very confused.

He felt a terrible aching pain every time he drew his breath or attempted to move.

Quite at a loss, too, he for some moments tried to recollect where he was and what had happened.

He opened his eyes and his confusion increased.

He could see nothing.

For a moment a horrible idea entered his mind, and he felt his blood grow suddenly cold in his veins, while he turned heartsick with apprehension.

He fancied he was blind.

The agony he endured while that thought had possession of him was intense indeed.

And it is not at all to be wondered at that he should be seized with such a conceit, for so black was all around that he could perceive no more difference when he had his eyes open than he could when he had them closed.

He remained still, and strove to think.

To recollect what was the last events that had happened to him.

But so excited and nervous had he become that memory for a time eluded him.

Gradually, however, came back to him the remembrance of all that had occurred on that to him night of horrors, up to the point where Jonathan uttered his frightful yell and let fall the lantern.

After that he could remember nothing except Wild had slipped from his hold, and that he had, in a devious, uncertain kind of way, endeavoured to find the outlet to the vault.

"That is it," he thought, when he had reached this point in his recollections. "I—I am not blind! but in the vault with the dead."

And now, when the conviction that he was not blind, and that his inability to see arose only from the fact that there was no means by which a ray of light could enter to dispel the darkness, he grew more composed.

With much pain and difficulty he raised himself to a sitting posture.

Then so great an accession of pain came over him, that if his back had not happened to lean against the wall, he must have fallen back on the floor of their vault.

But this pain was produced only by change of posture, and in a little while its intensity abated.

Like most others of his profession Quilt never failed to carry about with him a ready means of procuring a light, and now the first thing he did was to feel in his pockets for matches.

These he produced, as well as a small piece of wax candle.

The atmosphere in the vault was of so humid a character, that it was only after a severe struggle that the candle caught light at all, and then the flame was weak and sickly.

But Quilt's eyes had become so accustomed to the darkness, that to him the feeble light was quite sufficient to illuminate the vault.

He raised himself to his feet, and then found the acute pain in his ribs had greatly subsided.

"W—where's Jonathan?" he asked, as he glared about him, and held the candle so as to make it pretty equally diffuse its rays over the entire vault. "Where's Jonathan?"

But, of course, no Jonathan was to be seen. At that moment he was half-way on his road to his own house in Newgate-street.

Quilt had not yet noticed the coffin.

That was a little surprise in reserve for him.

Presently, however, his eyes fell upon the ghastly and loathsome object.

In his agitation it is a great wonder he did not drop his light.

But though it shook about a great deal in his grasp it did not fall.

"Good heavens!" he said, "what horrible work has Wild been at here! Surely he must be a fiend, for who but a fiend would mangle a corpse thus? What earthly object could he have had, I wonder?"

From these words of Quilt Arnold the reader will perceive he had fallen into a mistake, for upon seeing the disfigured body he very naturally concluded it must be some of his master's handiwork.

The more he looked, though, the less probable this supposition seemed, and then again he asked himself where Jonathan was, and how he came to leave him in the vault?

"I must get out of this frightful place," he said, after an ineffectual effort to collect his thoughts. "I must get out of this place, and then, perhaps, I shall be able to think."

Having come to this conclusion, he made his way across the vault to the iron door.

When he saw it closed his heart sank suddenly like a lump of ice in his breast; but, to his joy, he found it open to his hand.

To spring up the stairs, and through the narrow aperture into the nave of the church, was but the work of a moment.

Then he stopped to think.

After a while he spoke.

"Jonathan must have left me there," he said. "He recovered and found I had disobeyed him. That was his idea of punishing me. Bah! I am not such a fool as to be frightened by dead bodies, though when I saw that coffin move off the shelf and heard Wild yell out I was scared a bit, I'll allow."

He walked slowly up and down the aisle of the church.

As he was shoeless, having, as the reader will remember, divested himself of that part of his clothing in order to approach Jonathan unheard, he glided up and down with the silence of a ghost.

"I can't make it out," he said. "It puzzles me entirely; and yet I should uncommonly like to know what he wanted there, and I will, too, I'll warrant. Who knows it may be something that will place Wild as much in my power as I am in his. That would be glorious. To think of being able to say, 'Be civil, Johnny, or I'll have you hanged at Tyburn next sessions.' He! he! Fancy saying that. Oh! it would be prime! I should be able to pay off a little then of what I owe him. He! he!"

Quilt was so delighted with this prospect that he for a little while forgot everything that had just taken place, and where he was as well, but he was suddenly recalled to himself by a return of the pain in his side.

At every breath he drew he felt as though some one stabbed him in the vitals.

He groaned, and was obliged to seat himself upon a bench that was close at hand.

The paroxysm was doubtless produced by the laughter he had indulged in, for now he was quiet, and only partially inflated his lungs, the pain was much easier.

"How came I by this hurt?" he said. "I felt nothing of it when I went into the vault. It must be there then that I received it. But how?"

He leaned his chin upon his hands, and strove to think.

"Could I have done it in my fall? No, I don't think that could be. Stop. Jonathan recovered first—saw me there. All is plain now: it must have been him that mauled me in this fashion.

"The skin is unbroken," he continued. "What was it? Has he kicked me, I wonder, with those heavy boots of his? I suppose so. If he has, it is a mercy my ribs are not broken, and I don't know now but what they are."

To the best of his belief, however, after making as good an examination as he could, the bones were whole.

"I must get out of this, and at once, too. I am a fool for having stayed here so long. I do not want to have to answer for what Jonathan has done down in the vault. But for his treatment of me he shall suffer. I swear it—I swear it!"

Wild had raised up another enemy.

"I will bide my time, though," he said, gloomily. "I will bide my time. Vengeance will come at last, and it will be none the worse for keeping. Dearly, dearly shall you rue this. Oh! curses! curses!"

Quilt had forgotten himself in his excitement, but the pain in his side soon brought him to himself.

Slowly he dragged himself out of the door of the church.

He stopped upon the steps to put on his boots.

All around him was very still. The wind and the rain had gone, and now it was a calm, fine night.

Not the faintest breeze seemed to shake the leaves on the yew-trees in the churchyard.

It was fortunate for Quilt that no one was abroad, that no curious eye saw him leave the sacred building, or he would have found himself in a ticklish situation.

Down the gravel walk—his feet seeming in the stillness to make a tremendous noise—he went, and out at the little swinging gate into the lane.

"The horses were in the paddock," he said, "but of course Jonathan has taken them with him. Curse him. I expect I should find it no easy matter to mount. I must even go as I am."

It seemed a long walk from Tottenham, but much to his relief he found the pain constantly and steadily abating.

It was nearly ten o'clock when he reached London.

He did not repair straight to Newgate-street, but visited a friend of his who had a public-house on Clerkenwell-green.

Here he remained during the whole of the day, uncertain how to proceed; but towards night, finding himself almost well, he directed himself to Jonathan's house, and was admitted.

The first intelligence he received was that Wild had been inquiring after him.

But other and more important matters must now have our immediate attention.

CHAPTER XXX.

JACK SHEPPARD IS INTRODUCED TO WILD'S WAREHOUSE IN THE HORSEFERRY, WESTMINSTER.

IN a former chapter we have already at some length described the manner in which Jonathan Wild carried on his business transactions in Newgate-street.

We have seen how Pinching Tom brought him the necklace which he had stolen from Lady Ingestrie.

But although small articles were sometimes in this way brought to Jonathan direct, yet it was not the usual course, nor was it that pursued with plunder of a more bulky description.

The great thief-taker was by far too politic to keep in his house anything that could compromise him in any way should the authorities take it into their heads to search his domicile.

In consequence it became a necessity to have another establishment, where the goods could be safely warehoused.

Acquainted with every part of London as Jonathan was, he soon found a place suitable for his purpose.

This was a solitary public-house in the Horseferry, Westminster; then a desolate and fearful place.

One of his men, who was known by the name of John Oaky, and who was entirely in his power, Jonathan installed in this house ostensibly as its landlord.

To a casual visitor, and sometimes such did drop in, the house presented in all respects a very ordinary appearance. There was nothing whatever to engender suspicion.

It was then towards this place that Blueskin directed his cart.

By the time they arrived at the "Ship and Rainbow"—for such was the sign of the public-house—it was broad daylight, and people were beginning to move abroad.

Upon hearing the grating of the wheels, John Oaky, the landlord, ran to the door, and, as soon as he saw Blueskin, he precipitately retreated into his house.

At the side of the building was an opening leading into the yard at the back of the public-house, and down this Blueskin turned.

Oaky was standing there waiting to receive them.

"All right?" he said, interrogatively.

"Yes," replied Blueskin, as he scrambled out of the cart. "Where's the ostler?"

"Jack will be here in a minute."

"I am going to stay for an hour or two, so let the horse have a good feed the while."

"Very good. Are you hurt, captain?"

"Just a little, but it is nothing to speak of."

"And who is this youngster?" inquired the landlord, pointing to Jack, who had also descended from the cart.

"A fresh hand."

"Oh! indeed."

"You would know his name, John, if you heard it."

"Very likely."

"And be very much surprised, for his father was an old particular of yours."

"Who is he, then?"

"His name," said Blake, "is Jack Sheppard!"

"Sheppard?"

"Yes."

"The son of poor Tom Sheppard?"

"He is."

"Wonders will never cease. Here, Jack, lad, give us your hand! I'm glad and proud to see you. Why, Joe, now I come to look at him, they're as like as two peas, as the saying is."

"They are; but where's your ostler? Why don't he come?"

"I don't know. Hi! Jack, Jack!"

"Here you are, guv'nor."

"Look sharp," said Oaky, "take the nag out, and give her a good feed of corn. We'll put the cart under the shed."

He exchanged a meaning glance with Blueskin as he spoke.

The horse was taken out of the shafts and led into the stable, while Oaky, going to some large double doors, took a key out of his pocket and opened them.

Jack looked inside this place with some curiosity, but he was disappointed in his expectations of seeing anything remarkable.

It was a common, tumble-down looking place, littered over with straw.

Between them they easily ran the cart into the shed, and as soon as they had done so Oaky transferred the key from the outside to the inside of the door, and locked them in.

"Now, Blueskin, where's the swag?"

"Hush! Some one may overhear you. Be cautious."

"All right. There's nothing to fear."

"Here it is, then," said Blueskin, producing the bag containing the plate and other valuables they had stolen.

"It's a fair lot, any how."

"Not amiss. But come, don't let us lose time unnecessarily."

"You trust Jack here?"

"With everything. You have no more need to be afraid of him than me."

"That's the style then. We will soon let him into a secret or two."

Upon hearing this Jack kept a wary eye upon all that was going to be done.

In the first place Oaky removed the straw from one portion of the floor of the shed which was formed of square slabs of stone.

Then taking from his pocket a curiously-fashioned instrument, Oaky next proceeded to insert it into a small round hole in one of the stones.

He gave it one half turn round and it became fixed.

As this instrument now formed a kind of handle he seized it with both hands, and exerting his utmost strength, lifted the stone from its setting, disclosing a steep flight of steps beneath.

Oaky descended them and held up his hands to receive the bag which Blueskin gave him, and then followed, at the same time telling Jack to do likewise.

The desire to know something more of the mysteries of Wild's business was very strong in Jack's breast, so he obeyed with alacrity.

The steps were only six in number, and terminated in a small cellar-like place, which, however, was piled up with packages tied up and labelled like those in a pawnbroker's ware-room.

These were articles which Wild anticipated an application for.

The temperature of the place was almost like an oven, so that Jack concluded there must be a concealed fire somewhere, though to what uses it was put or intended he could form no notion.

Besides, his attention was pretty well occupied in watching the proceedings of Blueskin and John Oaky.

One by one the various objects which had been crammed into the bag were taken out, examined, and sorted into two heaps.

"There will be no hope of Jonathan's being able to restore these things in safety, and the sooner those that can be identified are disposed of the better it will be for all parties concerned."

"Very good, Mr. Blake. In course, in Mr. Wild's absence, I take my orders from you. Then you would like to have these run down at once?"

As he spoke, the quondam landlord pointed to the largest of the two heaps.

The articles that composed it were for the most part the service of plate, upon every piece of which was engraved the arms and crest belonging to Mr. Hadley's family.

"Certainly," said Blueskin, "there ought to be no delay whatever."

"There shan't be; they shall be run down at once. I'll carry as many as I can; you and Jack must bring the remainder."

This was done, and between them they contrived to carry it all to a recess at the further end of the vault, and which Jack had not before noted.

In this recess was fitted a small furnace, and this was the source whence the heat emanated.

An iron crucible of a very large size was fixed in the top of this furnace, and in it was a quantity of white, molten metal, which Jack rightly took to be silver.

The pieces of plate were dropped one after another into this crucible, and almost as soon as they came into contact with the liquid they melted away.

Full an hour passed, nevertheless, before all the plate was melted, or, as Oaky called it, run down.

In this shape, of course, it was impossible for it to be recognized, and then, when there was a sufficient quantity in the crucible, it was run down into very legitimate-looking ingots, for which Jonathan easily found a ready sale, though where they were actually disposed of was perhaps known to himself alone.

These proceedings were very interesting to Jack from the fact of their utter novelty.

When the melting business was quite finished, the trio returned to where the other articles had been left.

"Make them up into a parcel, and label them as usual," said Blueskin. "My mind is easy now about the plate."

"Oh! yes."

"There will be a tremendous outcry about to-night's work," continued Blake. "It was a desperate affair. At first everything went well, but afterwards they took a turn just the other way."

"Have you been tracked at all?"

"I think not; in fact, I may say I am sure not. And we cannot be recognized by our features, for both of us wore masks."

"Then you haven't much to fear now," said Oaky, as he placed the new parcel along with the others. "Come along in-doors, and have a meal and a rest, for under the circumstances I don't think it would be altogether wise for you to go through the streets by daylight."

"Nor I, nor do I feel inclined. I have had no sleep scarcely lately, so I shall take the present opportunity of having a good one."

"That's right, captain."

"And you have had no alarm of any kind?"

"Oh! none at all, tell Mr. Wild. For my part, so long as things are done in the way they are now, I don't see how any suspicion is to be roused."

"Nevertheless, be cautious. It would be a case with us all if this place is found out."

"It would, it would."

Just as they were entering the back door of the public-house, Jack caught hold of Blueskin by the arm.

"The girl at the 'Black Lion,' the shroudmaker that I rescued. I must see her."

CHAPTER XXXI.

STEGGS GIVES "HIS LORDSHIP" A PIECE OF ADVICE WHICH IS IMMEDIATELY ACTED UPON.

THE blow which Jack Sheppard had given his rascally lordship was a very effective one apparently, for not all the united exertions of the watch could restore him to his senses.

But not so with Steggs, although one would have thought he had had most knocking about.

Perhaps he was used to hard knocks.

However, be it how it may, as soon as "his lordship" was lifted off his body, he sat up and rubbed the back of his head with a rueful air.

"A coach," he gasped, "a coach for myself and his lordship. Five shillings for anyone who will fetch a coach."

The offer of this reward, coupled with the fact that a lord was in distress, stimulated several to run off in various directions.

In less than five minutes they heard the rattling of wheels, and one of those crazy old vehicles, the predecessors of our modern cab, drew up at the corner.

By this time Steggs had managed to regain his feet, and by his instructions "his lordship" was picked up and put inside the hackney coach.

When this was done, and his employer comfortably disposed upon the seat, Steggs himself entered, having first acted up to his word, and given the man who had fetched the conveyance the five shillings he had offered him.

The coach drove off in the direction of Holborn, for Steggs had instructed the driver to take them to the public-house in Middle-row, and then the crowd which had assembled, after spending some time in fruitless speculation, dispersed.

The little distance between these two places was soon accomplished.

Still insensible, "his lordship" was carried in by the driver and Steggs, who though a good deal hurt, was not seriously so.

The landlord recognized his guests again instantly. "Get ready your best bed-room immediately," said Steggs, "and send for a doctor. This gentleman and myself have been set upon and almost murdered by a gang of thieves."

"Yes, sir. The room is ready," said the landlord. "This way, if you please. Straight upstairs, sir."

"Do you help to carry him," said Steggs. "I am almost as much hurt as he is. And I feel that to take him up stairs would be beyond my powers."

"Willingly, sir," replied the landlord.

Steggs now carrying in his right hand a candle, led the way up the staircase, and on reaching the top by the landlord's directions opened a door immediately opposite to him.

It led into a neatly-furnished chamber, and "his lordship" was laid as carefully as they could upon the bed.

Then turning towards the driver of the coach and putting half-a-guinea into his hand, Steggs said—

"Drive to the nearest surgeon's and bring him here at once."

"All right, sir," said Jarvey. "There's Doctor Taylor as lives just round the corner of Gray's-inn-lane. Will he do?"

"Yes—yes. Bring him at once."

The hackney coachman, who for once in a way was satisfied with his fare, seeing that it was about four times as much as was legally his due, obeyed with willing alacrity.

During his absence Steggs busied himself in looking after his own hurts a little, but he found that beyond a few rather severe bruises he was all right.

He cleansed the dirt from his face, hands, and apparel, and then performed the same office for his employer.

He had scarcely finished when the landlord, accompanied by a tall pale young man entered the room.

"Doctor Taylor," said the former; and then the young man, without uttering a word, gravely took off his hat and walked to the bedside.

The administration of some volatile stimulant caused the robleman to open his eyes and groan.

The first object upon which his gaze rested was his accomplice Steggs, and that seemed to give him the clue to all that had passed.

He had, however, sufficient presence of mind not to make any remark.

His lordship's face was terribly damaged by the blows Jack had given it, but when the doctor had carefully sponged it with warm water there did not seem to be much the matter.

"Our enterprize failed, Steggs," said his lordship, as soon as the doctor and the landlord had retired. "How was it? What fiend mauled me in this way?"

"That, your lordship, is I regret to say more than I can tell you. The attack was so sudden and unexpected that I could not see by whom it was perpetrated."

"But I did, Steggs. I did."

"Who was it, my lord?"

"A boy! A stripling that looked as if he could be knocked down with a reed. It was the same who was sitting in the room down stairs when you entered."

"Indeed," said Steggs, in a tone of voice that boded no good feeling towards Jack. "I am glad I know who it is, I shall be able to pay him off and punish him for his interference."

"Ha! Steggs," cried his lordship, struck by a new thought. "His interference? Why should he interfere?"

"I know not, unless"—

"Unless what?"

"Unless he managed somehow to overhear our conversation."

"He must have done so! Perhaps he knows all—has already told the girl? Oh! Steggs! I am ruined—lost!"

"Not so, my lord! not so! You are in danger—imminent danger of having all discovered, but if we are prompt, we may yet be in time to carry out our purpose. If you will remember, my lord, I have been especially careful not to mention you by name, so that, in all probability, the meddling young fool is in ignorance of it!"

"We will hope so, at any rate!" replied his lordship, much relieved, "and yet he may have recognised me? Who knows? I don't think he did though, now I come to think."

"Have you any reason for holding that opinion?"

"Only this, Steggs, he looked very curiously at me when he entered, and regarded me as though I was an utter stranger."

"Why, then all is well. The information he has already acquired will avail him but little, even supposing he listened to the whole of our interview, which I think is scarcely possible."

"But what are we to do, Steggs?"

"Do, my lord?"

"Yes, do."

"Only one thing I conceive, and that"—

"Go on."

"That, my lord, I am afraid we shall find rather difficult."

"It is to obtain possession of the girl."

"Precisely."

"But how are we to do it? Where is she?"

"That, my lord, is the difficulty of which I spoke. Of course I have no more clue to her whereabouts than you have!"

His lordship sprang up in bed.

"We must find her, Steggs, we must find her, if we search every house there is in London. Or that which I have so sinned for to obtain will, after all, elude my grasp, and"—

"Do not look upon it in that light, my lord. Instead of despairing, let us hope! As yet, a short time only has elapsed. Let us commence our operations without delay."

"That is good advice, Steggs! good advice! Curse the villain, he has made me so stiff and sore that I can hardly move!"

"And I, my lord! I have said nothing about my hurts, but they are both serious and painful."

"Never mind—never mind! I can find you a plaster for every one of them."

"You are very good, my lord."

"Only get those two persons into my power, and then you may name your own reward!"

The eyes of the villain Steggs glistened with cupidity, as he heard these words.

"It is good as done, my lord! Two persons, did you say?"

"Yes!"

"The girl?"

"She is one, the other is the fiend that baulked me in my designs, and battered my body!"

"Do not fear for him, my lord. I have a personal feeling in that matter."

"So much the better! I will make him live to remember and regret the day he took it into his head to interfere with me! Curse him! I ache from head to foot!"

"Rest satisfied, my lord," said Steggs, "you shall have such a revenge upon him as shall fully satisfy you. It galls me to the soul to think an urchin like that should have overcome the pair of us!"

"He took us by surprise, and that is half the victory."

"True; but his muscles must be like steel. His blows came down like hammers."

"I wonder how long it will be before I can get out.

Steggs?" asked his lordship, after a brief interval of silence. "I don't like the idea of being here idle."

"That depends upon yourself. I think if you will try to sleep till morning you will then, by an effort of your will, be able to get up and go about as usual."

"I will do so—I will do so!"

"Believe me, it will be the best."

"And you, Steggs?"

"I, my lord, must find some place where I can repose my limbs a little. I am more used to hard knocks than you, and don't feel them so much, but I think, of the two, I came decidedly the worst off in the encounter."

For once, we must coincide with Mr. Steggs.

"Well—well, be it so. I know, by myself, that you must want rest. But let us be stirring in the morning early."

"Do not fear for that."

"Good night, Steggs. The landlord will find you another room."

"Thank you, my lord, and now, if you would allow me to give you a piece of advice, in the shape of a suggestion."

"Speak out! What is it?"

"We shall have, you may be sure, the greatest possible difficulty in finding out the retreat of the two persons of whom we are in quest, if we have nothing to guide us. Now, my lord, there is a man in London who, in consideration of a sum of money, will place these persons in our hands in less than twelve hours."

"Impossible."

"It is true, nevertheless."

"And who is this man, Steggs? What is his name?"

"JONATHAN WILD!"

CHAPTER XXXII.

IN WHICH HIS LORDSHIP COMES TO A PERFECT UNDERSTANDING WITH THE GREAT THIEF-TAKER.

"JONATHAN WILD," repeated his lordship, "surely, Steggs, I have heard that name?"

"Most likely, I should think. He has been making himself rather notorious lately."

"But he is a thief-taker, is he not?"

"That is one portion of his avocation, but he by no means confines himself to that."

"I have heard but little about him, Steggs, and that little was by no means to his credit. I was told he always managed to wreak ill on all those who became in any way connected with him."

"Pho! pho! my lord, place no credence in that. It is the misfortune of all great and successful men to have base detractors."

"It is. And so, Steggs, you would advise that we obtained Wild's co-operation in this affair?"

"Most certainly, my lord."

"Well, well, you ought to know best. But leave me now. I will think of it—I will think of it."

"Do so."

"We cannot see him before the morning, so there is plenty of time to decide."

"There is. I will, then, with your lordship's permission, seek an hour or two's rest."

"Call me at eight, Steggs. I will get up then, come what will."

"Very good, my lord," said Steggs, obsequiously, as he closed the door. "Good-night, my lord."

"Good-night."

"It will go hard but I make something out of this affair," muttered Steggs, as he sought the landlord, "very hard, indeed. I, too, will reflect, for, after all, it may not be politic to take Jonathan into our confidence. He is a villain, but that's nothing. He would not scruple to betray anyone, and that is a great deal. I must think—I must think."

But Mr. Steggs made one little mistake, he should have thought before he broached the suggestion; for in the morning, when, according to instructions, he awaked his lordship, that gentleman very decisively expressed his determination to act upon the advice given him.

Now Steggs had come to the conclusion that he had not taken the wisest step for his own interests, but it was too late to draw back, or, if he had made an attempt even, it would have at once excited surprise, if not suspicion, for upon every other occasion he had always made a point of instantly acquiescing with his employer's opinions.

"You must take me to Jonathan Wild's at once," he said, as soon as he had partaken of a hasty breakfast. "Is it far from here?"

"Quite close at hand, your lordship; but your face!"

"Oh! never mind that. I will call at the first chymists we come to, and get him to dress it for me. Such a triviality as that must not have power to keep me back when anything so important as the capture of this girl is going forward. Are you ready?"

"I am always ready," said Steggs, bowing low, "and willing, too, whenever your lordship requires me."

A smile of contempt came to his lordship's lips, but when Steggs raised himself to an upright position it had disappeared.

"Let us start, then, immediately," he said, "the less time there is wasted now the better."

Accordingly, in about two minutes afterwards, this precious pair were on their way to Little Newgate, whither we will precede them.

For once in a way, Jonathan came down to his office nearly an hour before his usual time that morning. The fact is, he expected to do more than an ordinary day's work.

He was anxious, too, to learn what had ensued upon the discovery of the sacrilege at Tottenham Church.

In these days of rapacious penny-a-liners, we should have had several columns in print about it at breakfast-time, but then the newspaper press was quite another affair.

No, Wild did not look for any printed intelligence of the affair, but he fully expected that he would be immediately communicated with.

The blood-stained tiara was still in Jonathan's pocket, and in the one on the other side of his coat was Lady Ingestrie's diamond necklace.

This little affair he fully expected to bring to a termination this morning, so that, with two such important pieces of business upon his mind, it is no wonder that Wild seated himself at his desk much earlier than was his wont.

Then, again, there was the affair between him and Sir Marmaduke.

He was uneasy, too, about the non-arrival of Joe Blake. It was something very out of the way for him to fail in an expedition, but as he did not come, Jonathan began to dread the worst.

While these thoughts were passing through his mind, Jonathan assumed a favourite attitude.

He placed his elbows on the desk, and holding the palms of his hands together, rested his chin in them.

"Let me see," he said, "I ought to expect Lord Ingestrie here first. Now shall I restore him his necklace, or put him off for a day or two longer? Which will be safest, I wonder? I must be guided by circumstances."

As he spoke he dived his hand into his pocket, and drew the necklace forth.

"A very pretty little ornament, that's certain. Rather old-fashioned, though. I should not care to give three thousand pounds for it myself, though he must if he wants it back."

At this moment some one tapped gently at the office door.

"Talk of the —," said Wild, as he lifted up the lid of his desk, and slipped the necklace into it. "Come in!" he shouted in his most ferocious tones.

It was Tonks who had tapped at the door, and just projecting his nose into the apartment, he said—

"If you please, Mr. Wild, there's two gentlemen as want to see you on particular and private business."

"Where, villain?"

"They are in the hall, if you please, sir."

"Then bring them in at once, and be hanged to you! How dare you keep them waiting?"

Tonks disappeared, and in another moment returned, ushering in that individual who as yet we know by no other name than "his lordship," and his companion in evil, Steggs.

Jonathan was rather disappointed when his eye fell upon his visitors, for he fully expected it would be Lord Ingestrie.

Tonks lost no time in closing the door, and leaving his imperious master and his visitors alone.

With a horrible contortion of the facial muscles, which on Jonathan's countenance did duty for a smile, he spoke—"Good morning, gentlemen," he said. "In what way can I be of service to you?"

For a moment this question was unanswered.

His lordship felt rather embarrassed. He scarcely knew how to approach the subject.

Steggs was silent. Without instructions from his employer he, of course, could not venture to say anything.

At length his lordship spoke.

"Mr. Wild," he said.

Jonathan made a bow and a grimace, which said as plainly as though his lips had articulated the words—

"Yes, that is me. What do you want?"

At any rate, his lordship so interpreted it, for he went on—

"The business upon which I have come to obtain your co-operation, is secret and important. Can I confide in you?"

"You can, my lord."

"How?" exclaimed his lordship, and evidently, by the tone in which he spoke, more surprised and chagrined than he was delighted, "do you know me?"

"Perfectly well," said Jonathan. "You are Lord——"

"There—there! that will do!" said his lordship, hastily interrupting him, "there is no occasion for mentioning my name."

"As you please, my lord. But you asked me a rather unusual question, that is, whether you could confide in me?"

"Exactly."

"Well, then, to save time, I will simply assert that you can confide in me freely, and without fear. Indeed, if you would allow me to advise——"

Jonathan broke off suddenly. He wanted to feel his way.

"What is your advice, Mr. Wild?"

"Simply this. When you do confide in me, do so without reserve. Keep nothing back. The importance of the pursuance of this policy with either your doctor or your lawyer is well known. It is more important still that you should pursue that policy with me."

"Well—well; perhaps so. Listen to me, Mr. Wild, if you please. I daresay you will find what I want you to do an easy enough matter."

"I am listening with the greatest attention, my lord," said Wild, as he took up a pen and a sheet of paper, for he always made notes of what was said to him, though, as he did this in cipher, they were legible to no one but himself.

"You must know, in the first place, that a few days ago a young girl, of whom I wished to get possession, resided in Charles-street, Drury-lane, and obtained a livelihood by working for a Mrs. Roblet, of No. 16, Princes-street, Lincoln's-inn-fields, whose occupation is that of a shroudmaker."

"Just so, your lordship, I quite understand so far. Pray go on."

"Having resolved to carry her off, I sent my confidential servant, Steggs, here, to make inquiries respecting the time she left her place of work, and so on, in order that we might concert measures for the execution of our design."

Wild nodded.

"We arranged that Steggs should meet me at a public-house in Middle-row, Holborn, and accordingly, about half-an-hour before the appointed time, I repaired thither, and sat down in the public room to wait his arrival."

"Scarcely had I seated myself, than there entered a boy, I was going to say, for such anyone would take him to be at first sight, though I should think his age must have been about twenty or twenty-one."

"I suppose," said Wild, "that this all bears upon the case?"

"Oh! certainly. Well, I waited in the room some time, and this lad sat there also near the fire. At last Steggs came, and he began to tell me the result of his errand when I stopped him, for I perceived this lad was trying his best to listen to what we had to say, and this, of course, I wished to keep a secret."

"Perceiving this, I say, I asked for a private room, and was shown to one on the first floor. We had our conference there, and, secure of not being overheard, talked freely of the matter."

"The end of it was that we resolved to carry the girl off that very night, for Steggs had ascertained that she always left her work at a little after nine o'clock."

"We chose the corner of Gate-street and Great Queen-street for the place to lay in ambush, and accordingly made our way there at once."

"A hackney coach was hired, and by Steggs's instructions drawn up in the square, while we stood near those iron railings at the corner of the street which I daresay you have noticed."

"I know the spot perfectly well, my lord, and I must say that scarcely a better for your purpose could be found in all London."

"The information which Steggs had obtained turned out to be perfectly correct, for just after the clock in the Old Square, Lincoln's-inn, had struck the hour of nine we heard a light footstep rapidly approaching us, and then as she passed under a lamp I saw her features. It was the girl I sought!"

"Yes—yes."

"We sprang forward, and made her a prisoner so suddenly that she scarce knew what had happened. I was felicitating myself upon the success which had so far crowned our expedition as we bore her rapidly towards the hackney coach, when we were taken aback by a horrible yell, and then were assailed with the greatest fury by someone."

"Steggs was the first to fall."

"Then this unknown assailant grappled with me, and to defend myself I had to let go my hold of the young girl."

"To be brief, I was worsted by this fellow, for his strength seemed something supernatural, and I carry now the marks of his blows. However, before I lost all consciousness, I saw and recognized him. It was the lad who looked so curiously at me while at the public-house."

"Indeed."

"Yes. He must have managed in some way to overhear our conversation, and so thwarted my plans. Now the girl I must have at any risk, and that at once. The lad as well must be found, and then I will settle accounts with him."

His lordship then proceeded with the aid of Steggs to give a minute description of the shroudmaker.

Afterwards of the lad.

So correct was this latter one, that when he had written it Jonathan muttered—

"Jack Sheppard by all that's damnable!"

CHAPTER XXXIII.

JACK SHEPPARD AND JONATHAN WILD HAVE A SLIGHT DISAGREEMENT.

IN a moment now Jonathan Wild connected Sheppard's non-appearance, and, being mixed up in this affair together, made one event account for the other.

The reader will not fail to have perceived that, though his lordship had given Wild what appeared to be a very circumstantial and candid account, yet it was not a correct one, since he had made no mention of the relationship which existed between himself and the young girl.

It is not surprising that he should have hesitated or altogether shrunk from putting Jonathan in possession of so tremendous a secret; and therefore he led the great thief-taker to suppose that his motive for abducting the young girl was because he had taken a fancy to her.

Jonathan was used to affairs of that sort, so he at once took it for granted that that was what his lordship wanted with the young girl.

"And this took place last night, you say?"

His lordship nodded.

"London is a large place, but I think I may give you the assurance that in a day or so the girl will be in your hands, and the lad as well. But there is one little point which has not yet been taken into consideration."

"What is that, Mr. Wild?"

"Why, you see, it will not be possible for me to prosecute these inquiries for your lordship without expending money."

"Of course not. Now, Mr. Wild, what value do you set upon this service?"

[JONATHAN WILD IS CHASED BY THE THAMES POLICE.]

"Well, I can hardly say. It depends upon many circumstances. I should think about five hundred pounds."

"Five hundred pounds, Mr. Wild. That is a very large sum of money."

"I am well aware of it, my lord. But I suppose you want this girl."

"I must have her," he replied, vehemently; "let the cost be what it will."

"Very good. Then my demand is ridiculously small. However, as I have said it, I won't run back from my word. Write me out your promise to pay me five hundred pounds upon the consummation of the affair, and I guarantee to place the girl in your hands in less than forty-eight hours."

His lordship hesitated a moment, when Wild gave him the pen, but upon second thoughts he wrote it, and Jonathan carefully folded it up and put it into a compartment of his pocket-book.

A grim smile came over the thief-taker's face. He imagined the five hundred pounds as good as earned, for, of course he made sure that Jack would not hesitate to tell him where the girl was to be found.

But in this he reckoned without his host.

"It's as good as done, my lord," he said. "You need trouble your mind no more about it. It's a pity you did not come to me in the first instance; but, however, it does not signify further than that by this time your lordship would have achieved the object of your desires."

"I shall leave you then with that assurance. Only perform your promise, and I shall not be particular to a few pounds extra. Good morning, Mr. Wild."

Tonks appeared in answer to the summons.

"Show these gentlemen to the door, villain."

"Yes, Mr. Wild. Oh! yes, sir. This way, gentlemen if you please."

As the office-door closed after his visitors, Jonathan assumed his former attitude.

"Let me think," he said; "let me think. There is more in this affair than meets the eye, I feel convinced."

Jack Sheppard, too! By what chance is he mixed up in it? I must question him when he returns, and learn all from him, as well as where the girl is at the present moment. This will be another good day, I can see."

Tap—tap.

"More visitors," said Wild, as he twitched his wig over his eyes. "More grist to the mill. Ha! ha!"

This time it was Lord Ingestrie.

He looked pale and anxious. He had had some difficulty in raising the money Wild demanded for the restoration of the necklace.

"You don't look well, my lord," said Jonathan. "I am afraid you have been worrying yourself about the necklace. It was quite unnecessary, I can assure you."

"No, no. It is not that. It is the trouble I have had to get the money."

"Indeed."

"Yes. But I have managed it. And now, how have you succeeded?"

"Indifferently well, my lord, indifferently well. My men found out indirectly who had it, and made overtures for its return."

"And the result?"

"Well, my lord, the result is not quite as I expected. It must have got wind that your lordship set an intrinsic value upon it, for they are more extortionate than I thought they would be."

"Then never mind. It must go."

"Indeed."

"Yes. I have already had the utmost difficulty in getting together so large a sum. I am sorry I troubled you at all in the affair."

"Oh! pray don't mention that. My trouble has been nothing, as I may say, but what it has been your lordship is heartily welcome to."

"And now, just for curiosity, what does the miscreant ask for restoring the stolen article? I mean how much money."

"Just so."

"How much is it?"

"Three thousand five hundred guineas!"

"Three thousand"—

"Five hundred."

"Why, you said at first, offer four thousand."

"I know I did, but your lordship thought that rather unreasonable, and it was afterwards settled at three."

"So it was; but I had, nevertheless, counted upon four, and that is the sum I have raised."

"Then," said Wild, who had the greatest possible difficulty in concealing his exultation, "do you feel inclined to give the amount named?"

"I certainly don't feel inclined, but still"—

"You would not like such a thing to go out of your possession?"

"I should not, Mr. Wild, and that is just it."

"Then the better way for you will be to give the money."

"And can't I bring the fellow to law?"

"Oh! impossible!"

"How so?"

"I don't know who he is."

"But your man, who has managed the business so far?"

"Has not seen the actual person, but a go-between."

"How confoundedly cautious!"

"It is necessary to be so, my lord, when you have a noose dangling over your head."

"Of course, of course."

"I told my man to offer the three thousand, but as that offer was not accepted, and five hundred more asked, I could not do anything until I had seen you."

"No, no."

"For I did not know whether you would be willing to give that amount."

"I suppose it must be so," said Lord Ingestrie, with a sigh, as he drew forth a phrethoric pocket-book, and began counting out some notes.

"F vexations," said Wild, sympathizingly, "to have to part with so large an amount to get back one's own property, is it not?"

"You are right, it is; I feel it. I suppose, though, there is no choice in the matter."

"None at all."

"Just count those, then; I think you will find them all right."

"The are quite right," said Wild, who rapidly counted the notes, "and now about your lordship's watch?"

"Ah! where is that?"

"I have no idea; I cannot get the least trace of it. But make your mind easy about that; I will get it back for you sooner or later."

"I am glad to have such an assurance. And now, Mr. Wild, in spite of your deprecation of your trouble you must have had a good deal, and the business cannot have been managed without putting you to some expense. Now what is your charge for all this?"

"Nothing."

"Nothing?"

"Nothing!" repeated Wild, emphatically.

"But did I not understand you to say that the three thousand five hundred pounds was the exact amount you would have to give?"

"Such is the case."

"Then how are you to be paid?"

"Oh! I have my salary as a chief police-officer."

"I am aware of that, but it is always usual for something extra to be charged."

"I know that, but my sole desire is to serve your lordship. I very much regret you should have to pay anything at all, and I could not think of taking anything from you myself."

"Tut, tut!" said Lord Ingestrie, who was completely deceived by Wild's apparent magnanimity. "Tut, tut! I can't allow you to have all your trouble for nothing."

"Of course," said Wild, with a hypocritical whine, "it would be rude and ungrateful on my part were I to refuse to accept anything your lordship might be pleased to give me in recognition of my services."

"To be sure it would. Now what shall it be?"

"Oh! my lord, I could not think of naming anything for a moment. That I must leave entirely with you. You may rest assured that I shall be completely satisfied with anything that your lordship may be pleased to give me."

"But I hardly know how to estimate your services. Beyond the bare fact of knowing that you have found out the stealer of the bracelet, and arranged with him to return it for a certain sum, I know nothing. However, I shall be very glad if you will accept of this fifty pound note."

"You are too munificent," said Wild, "by far too munificent."

"Not at all. I would a thousand times rather give any amount of money away than I would have it extorted from me."

"And so would I, and so of course would everyone else."

"That, then, is settled. And now, Mr. Wild, how about the necklace?"

"Well, you can either meet the person who is to give it up, or you can come here for it, whichever you like best. I should prefer the former."

"Why, Mr. Wild?"

"Oh! for no very particular reason, except that you would see that I had represented things to you just as they actually are."

"I do not doubt you for a moment, and if you will allow me I will in preference call here for the necklace."

"As you like, my lord."

"You can meet this intermediate party and get it back. To tell you the truth, I have no desire to face them."

"Perhaps it is best not. They are always on the look out for treachery."

"I suppose so, and therefore I will call here, and receive it from you. When shall I come?"

"To-morrow morning at this time, if you please, my lord. I hope you will accept of my thanks for the liberal, very liberal present you have made me, and believe that I shall be always grateful."

"Say no more," said Ingestrie, as he prepared to quit Wild's office. "Your behaviour throughout the whole of this affair has been praiseworthy in the extreme."

"I am not a little delighted," said Wild, "that I should have been fortunate enough to win the good opinion of your lordship. As for your watch I will make it a point of honour of getting it back for you."

"Thanks! You may rely upon my gratitude."

"No, my lord," said Wild, as he got off his stool and held open the door to allow his illustrious visitor to depart. "Under no circumstances will I accept of a penny for that matter. I am quite firm about that."

"Well, well! We shall see! Good day!"

"Good day, my lord. Tonks, show his lordship to the door."

Jonathan waited until he heard the front door bang, and then he ventured to give utterance to his thoughts.

"So far, very good," he said. "Very good, indeed. What an infernal fool he must be. Oh! but the magnanimous dodge is the dodge of all dodges. Ha! ha! Three thousand five hundred and fifty pounds. A capital morning's work indeed. Now I only want to be equally lucky with" —

But before Jonathan could finish his sentence another visitor was announced; but before we relate who it was, and what took place at the interview, we must turn our attention to some of our characters whom we have for some time neglected.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

THE DIAMOND TIARA IS THE MEANS OF GETTING JONATHAN INTO TROUBLE.

Not until darkness had fairly settled upon the earth would Blueskin move from the "Ship and Rainbow" public-house, although Jack importuned him to do so.

But he turned a deaf ear to all he said, nor would he on any account suffer Jack to go away alone.

In accordance with the resolution he had expressed he sought a bed-chamber, and having, after some trouble, got a promise from Jack that he would not take advantage of his slumber to steal away he composed himself to sleep.

Jack, to tell the truth, was glad enough to follow his example, for he sadly needed rest.

And so at night, as we have said, they awoke refreshed, and having eaten a hearty meal departed.

Had anyone been on the watch they would have seen nothing remarkable in the fact of two persons putting up all day at the inn, and going away as they came, but as it happened no one noticed either their arrival or departure.

The horse was quite fresh after his day's rest in the stable, and he carried them along at a pace few others could have equalled.

Blueskin drove straight to the livery stables at the corner of King-street, Long-acre, and alighting there, went in the direction of the "Black Lion" on foot.

Those who are acquainted with the locality will be aware that it is not more than six or eight minutes walk to the ancient inn, for the building itself is still in existence, although the sign has been changed.

Now it is called the "Cock and Magpie."

Had Blueskin entirely consulted his own inclination he would have made his way direct to Newgate-street, but he had promised Jack he should call at the "Black Lion."

When they arrived the place was rather empty. It was almost too early in the evening for their customers to arrive.

The pair walked straight into the kitchen at the back of the house, and there they found Johnson very composedly smoking a pipe.

He rose as he saw his visitors enter, and hastened to bring two chairs towards the fire for their accommodation.

"How is —" Jack began, and he suddenly stopped. He did not know the name of the girl to whom he had been of such essential service.

But Johnson seemed to understand perfectly well who he meant, for he said —

"She is all right, and looks so different that you would hardly know her. I expect her every moment. She was here just now, but she went out about two minutes ago along of the missus."

"Let us have something to drink, Johnson, and bring a glass for yourself," said Blueskin. "I suppose there is no news?"

"Nothing as concerns you. I've been rather uneasy all day, for you know you told me to expect you about four o'clock this morning."

"I know I did, but I got to Oakley about that time, and there I have been ever since."

"I felt pretty sure you were safe, for I know you are quite able to take care of yourself."

Johnson soon had the brandy on the table, and all three took a tolerable quantity, Jack the least, for he was in a perfect fever to see his protégée.

After waiting what appeared to him to be an endless time, though it certainly was not more than a quarter-of-an-hour, the rustling of female garments reached his ears, and then Mrs. Johnson entered, closely followed by the young girl.

Jack fairly uttered a shout of astonishment and delight when he beheld her. He had already seen sufficient of her countenance to know that it was a more beautiful one than it falls to the lot of most feminine humanity to have, but he was hardly prepared to see her looking so lovely as she did.

The cry he had uttered had the effect of instantly drawing the girl's attention to him, and as soon as she saw her preserver a glad smile rose to her lips, and with a slightly heightened colour in her cheeks and sparkle in her eyes, she held out her hand to Jack.

It was a small and beautifully-shaped hand, and such a one as many a titled dame would have given a trifle to possess.

Under the landlady's care she had quite recovered.

Her old clothes were thrown aside, and she was attired in some that belonged to one of Johnson's daughters now deceased, and which, as she was about her age and size, fitted her admirably.

With an air of charming freedom, she drew up a chair close to Jack's and sat down in it.

It is in woman's nature to feel grateful for a service rendered, and the fair shroudmaker was no exception to the rest of her sex.

Her familiar manner soon put Jack at his ease, who, it must be confessed, felt at first rather bashful and confused.

Almost the first question that he found courage to ask her was her name.

"I have two," she said; "one is Elizabeth Lyon, and the other is a nickname they gave me at Mrs. Roblet's."

"And what is that?"

"Edgworth Bess."

"Edgworth Bess!" repeated Jack, "what an extraordinary name. What in the world made them call you that?"

"I can't imagine, but that is the name I have always gone by."

"And now," said Jack, "I promised to tell you what I know about you, and how I came to learn what I do know."

"You did. Tell me now, do."

"I will. You must know, in the first place, that last night, having some time to while away, I went into a public-house in Middle-row, Holborn."

"Yes."

"As soon as I entered the public room my attention was immediately attracted by a man who was sitting at a table near the window. He was burly and middle-aged, with a countenance at once cunning and forbidding."

"And was that one of the men who attacked me?"

"Patience, and you shall hear. Now, when I looked at this individual I saw that, although he was dressed with great plainness, yet everything he had on was of the best material, while, lying on the table before him, was a richly-jewelled sword, from which I concluded he was something more than he appeared to be; and I was confirmed in this supposition by seeing him presently draw from beneath his coloured waistcoat a very valuable gold watch, which he put back with an impatient air, as though he was waiting for some one who had appointed to meet him there, but who was behind his time."

"This second supposition of mine turned out to be quite correct, for a little while afterwards a man came in, and then both began to converse together in a low tone."

"Go on, go on!" said Edgworth Bess, for by this name we shall in future call her. "I am impatient to hear the rest."

"I tried my utmost to hear what they said, but to my mortification, I could not make out a syllable. I observed, however, that they glanced suspiciously towards me, and then the one who was there when I went in called for the landlord, and asked for a private room, who showed them into one on the first floor, and just over the one in which they had been sitting.

"I don't know how it was, but I felt uncommonly curious to know what they had got to say to each other, though, of course, it was no business of mine. Nevertheless, so strong did this desire become, that I determined, let the risk be what it might, to try and overhear their conversation."

"What a courage you must have," said Bess "I should have been frightened to death."

"Oh! that was nothing," said Jack, with a satisfied smile, for every one likes to be thought brave. "I finished my glass, and then went to the door of the room and peeped into the passage."

"No one was there, and just before me I saw the stairs. I sprang across the hall and up the stairs like lightning, and after being nearly found out got into a room that was only separated from the one where the two mysterious visitors were sitting by a wooden partition."

"And so you could hear every word they said?"

"I could with the greatest ease and distinctness, and then I found that the one who had come in last addressed the other as my lord."

"My lord! He was a nobleman then."

"It appears like it; however, let me go on with my story. You can make your remarks about it afterwards."

Full of wonder and interest Bess listened.

"His lordship called this man by the very funny name of Steggs, and, from what I heard, it appears that this Steggs had been sent to ascertain whether some information, which had been given to his lordship, was correct."

"Yes, yes."

"Well, that information was, whether a girl who lived in Charles-street, Drury-lane, worked for a woman named Roblet, a shroud-maker, of No. 16, Princes-street, Lincoln's Inn-fields."

"Why, that is me!"

"So it turns out. Well, I found that this lordship, for his name was never mentioned, though I think my friend here who is talking to Johnson knows it,—I found that this lordship had had an elder brother who had inherited a great deal of property from his father, but who was now dead, and that this elder brother had a daughter to whom the estates would revert by law."

"I understand that."

"So much the better then, for you will be able to comprehend that if this girl was not in existence the younger brother would inherit the estates, but while she lived he could not do so."

"Certainly not."

"To a wicked and unscrupulous man the thought of destroying or in some way getting rid of this child who stood between him and wealth would, of course, occur, and so this younger brother employed a man to make away with the little heiress."

"How dreadful!"

"But this man, like many another before him, found it impossible to murder an innocent and beautiful child, so he gave it instead to some poor people who lived in Charles-street, Drury-lane."

"Then—then—"

"Stop and hear the end. Williams,—for that was the man's name who was to have done the horrid deed,—finding himself drawing near to an end, sent for a comrade of his named Steggs, and disclosed the whole affair to him, and died entreating him to see the heiress restored to those rights from which she was so unjustly deprived. But this Steggs, it seemed, thought he should reap the most profit by siding with this younger brother, and so told him the whole affair. It then became necessary to ascertain whether the story told by the man Williams was correct, and, if so, to concert measures for putting it out of the power of the heiress to succeed to that property bequeathed to her by her father."

CHAPTER XXXV.

JONATHAN WILD FINDS IT NECESSARY TO READ JACK SHEPPARD A LESSON.

"AND so," interrupted Edgworth Bess, "that is the reason why those two men attempted to carry me away."

"That is the reason."

"And you, as soon as you heard this plot, without thinking what peril you might encounter, resolved to frustrate it?"

"I did, and, as you see, succeeded."

"Oh, it was noble of you, indeed it was," she said, with tears of gratitude and admiration thronging in her eyes. "I shall never be able to recompense you for what you have done."

"Tush! I have done nothing yet to what I mean to do. Johnson here will find you in a home for a little while, and during that time I will ascertain the name of this lord and all particulars, and I will never rest until I have succeeded in restoring you to your rights."

"And then when you have I shall be able to repay you. That is," she added, "if you will think what I offer you repayment."

"I should be better pleased," said Jack, "if you would say nothing about repayment. Believe me, I shall never accept of anything."

"Do not be offended with me, but I do not like to be under an obligation to anyone. I suppose it is because I have an independent spirit. But it was not money I was going to offer you."

"What then?" asked Jack, a wild hope springing up in his breast, "what then?"

"Since you will accept of nothing I will not tell you. It would be useless to tell you."

"No, no. Tell me, do tell me, what you are going to offer me."

Bess was silent, and then timidly placed her hand upon Jack's.

"Yourself?" he asked, while he pressed it between his own rough palms, "impossible!"

But even as he said the word he saw upon the face of the young girl an expression which told him it was true.

Under the excitement of the moment there is no saying of what extravagance he might not have been guilty had not the voice of Blueskin at that moment recalled him to himself.

"Now then, Jack, you have said quite enough, I'm sure. Come along. We must see Jonathan to-night."

Jack rose, and once more pressing the hand of Edgworth Bess, he said—

"To-morrow I will be here, and I hope with some information that will be worth communicating."

A glance was the only reply Jack had to this speech, but it was so full of meaning that it made his heart bound in his bosom and his veins throb with an unknown delight.

The young girl loved him.

Those who have studied human nature know how easily gratitude merges into affection, and so it was with this young girl.

As for Jack, he loved her even before he saw her.

As he followed his comrade out into the open street, all things seemed to him to wear a new aspect and appear more pleasing than they did, but the change was in his own breast.

The criminal transactions in which he had participated faded utterly from his mind. One feeling, one thought alone occupied him, and that was love.

All the way to Newgate-street he was buried in a reverie, and spoke not a word.

Probably enough Blueskin formed a shrewd guess as to the cause of his abstraction, but if he did he made no remark about it.

With his pass-key Blueskin opened the door of Wild's house.

A dim light burned in the passage.

By its aid he saw a man seated in the chair near the door.

He slept.

The horrible snoring that he made placed that beyond a doubt.

Blueskin shook him roughly.

The man awoke.

He glared about him in bewildered surprise.

"Thank your stars," said Blueskin, "that I found you sleeping at your post, and not Jonathan. Where is he?"

"Upstairs in his room," he said. "Confound it, I could only have just dropped off."

Without waiting to listen to the excuses of this man, Blueskin, with Sheppard at his heels, crossed the passage and ascended the stairs.

He paused at the same door that he had stopped at upon a former occasion.

He tapped gently.

Then listened for some sound from within.

A growling snarl reached their ears, and Blake opened the door and entered.

Just in the same position by the fireside as when Jack was first introduced to him sat the redoubtable thief-taker.

"Back safe again, Blue, eh?"

"Yes, Mr. Wild."

"And young Sheppard?"

"Yes, here he is."

"Ha! Success?"

"Only partial."

"How's that, Blue, eh?"

The reader will perceive Jonathan treated his lieutenant with greater civility than he did his myrmidons.

"We had a desperate job, and got the plate all right; but, although I searched the iron box beneath the bed thoroughly, not a trace of the paper you want could I find."

Whatever paper this was, or whatever it might contain, it was evidently very important to Wild, and he was much disturbed at not obtaining it, if one may judge by the manner in which he sprung to his feet and walked up and down the room.

"We must not give it up, Blue. The paper is in existence, I am confident of that."

"It is not in his strong box."

"Be it where it will, I must have it. Did you carry off all the plate?"

"All."

"Then the expedition has not been altogether profitless. But we will speak further of this in the morning. In the meantime, be off, I want to have a little private conversation with friend John here. Ha! ha!"

CHAPTER XXXVI.

JONATHAN WILD PROVES TOO MANY FOR JACK SHEPPARD.

WHICH of the two, Blueskin or Jack Sheppard, was most astonished at hearing these words from Jonathan Wild it would be hard to say, and why he should finish with that short, disagreeable, spasmodic kind of laugh, they were at a loss to imagine.

However, Blueskin took the hint to go.

As soon as he had left the room Jonathan's manner underwent a considerable change.

He thought that on the present occasion it would be his best policy to be civil with Jack.

It was a great effort for him to be civil to anybody.

"Draw your chair closer up to the fire, Jack," he said, "and pour yourself out a glass. I want to have a little talk with you. Should you like a pipe?"

"No, thank you," said Jack, more and more amazed at the thief-taker's condescension. "I never smoke."

"Don't you, indeed? Well, fill up a glass."

Jack did so, and then just putting it to his lips he replaced it on the table, for he was all impatience to hear what Jonathan had to say.

Wild took about half-a-dozen whiffs at his pipe before he spoke.

"Jack," he then said, "I have formed the highest opinion of you, my boy; I think we shall get on very well together."

He paused, evidently expecting a reply, but Jack was quite at a loss how to answer him, so he merely nodded his head.

"There is only this. You must work with me; as soon as ever you set yourself up in opposition, down you go."

"Oh!"

"It's true, my own safety requires it, and when that is the case I never scruple much about what I do. Many and many a promising youth has come to grief by that very thing."

"Setting themselves up in opposition to you, Mr. Wild?"

"Exactly. Now I hope, Jack, for I have taken the greatest fancy to you, that you will never do anything so foolish, because if you were, in spite of my regard, you would share the same fate."

"And that fate?"

"Is a hempen collar at Tyburn."

Jack fidgetted about in his chair.

The conversation was taking a disagreeable turn, and he began to ask himself whether Jonathan knew anything of his proceedings with his lordship and the shroud-maker, and whether he would call that setting himself up in opposition.

Wild's next words confirmed his worst fears.

"Now, Jack, you went last night, or rather, to speak more correctly, the night before last, along with Blueskin to crack a crib at Kilburn, and you've got back safe. Now what I want more particularly to know is how you and where you passed the time after you left here, and meeting with Blueskin at the 'Black Lion?'"

"Oh! no how. Just waiting about, that's all."

"Just waiting about. Oh! indeed, Jack! Now, for your own good, I'd advise you to be careful what you say, and candid, too, or it may be the worse for you."

He did not know how it was exactly, but somehow, Jack felt the greatest repugnance to tell Wild anything about the fair shroud-maker. He could not help fancying that he saw in Jonathan one of those who would keep her from her rights.

He wished for an opportunity of speaking to Blueskin upon the subject, so as to be guided by him, but there was no means by which he could get to speak to him.

Jack was terribly uneasy, not on account of himself, but upon that of the young girl he had so soon learned to love.

The harsh tones of Jonathan Wild broke in upon his meditations.

"And while you were waiting about, did you go anywhere?"

"Oh! yes!" said Jack, with a great effort, "I went to several places."

"Did you? Can you tell me some of them?"

"No, not at this moment."

"Then I will refresh your memory a little, Jack, my boy; wasn't one of the places you went into a public-house in Middle-row, Holborn?"

Jack started. "How in the world," he asked himself, "could Jonathan have learned that he went in there?"

"Wasn't the public-house in Middle-row, Holborn, one of the places you waited at, eh?" asked Wild, in a louder tone of voice. "Why don't you answer me, eh?"

"I was trying to recollect."

"Ya-ah!"

"And now I call it to mind, I did go in there and wait, I think."

"You think you did?"

"Yes."

"So do I. Now when you went in, who was it that you saw sitting at the table by the window?"

"That's just what I want to know, and mean to find out," said Jack.

"Ha! ha!"

"Of course I can see plainly enough you have, by some means or other, learned all that has taken place, so it's nonsense for me to attempt to deny it."

"Bravo, Jack! Now look here."

Jonathan produced his greasy leathern pocket-book, and took from it a bank-note, which he handed to Jack.

"That's for yourself, my boy! Put it into your pocket."

"No," said Jack, "before I do that I should like to know what I am to do in return for having it."

Jonathan shut one eye, a favourite action of his when he saw people appear to be cunning.

"You are a clever chap, Jack, a very shrewd, clever chap. You are quite correct in supposing that I want you to do something for which that note will be payment."

"Then, if that's the case," said Sheppard, as he tossed the piece of paper across the table, "you had better not pay me until I have done it. Pay beforehand is the worst pay of all."

Jonathan scowled; but for all that, he forced one of those short laughs of his from his lips.

"Sharp youth! Well, now, to go back again, you overheard at this public-house a plot, between two persons, to abduct a young girl."

"Yes, I did, and I don't deny it, but they didn't succeed quite so well as they thought they would."

"I know they didn't. And now, Jack, do you know this man's motive for wanting the girl carried off?"

"Yes, I do."

"Then that's all right," said Wild, who added immediately, "I wish I did."

"Well?"

"Knowing this, Jack, you must, of course, be aware that he has resolved to have her, and have her he will."

"I don't know about that," said Jack, sullenly.

"Don't you, indeed?"

"I can see pretty well how it is."

"Can you really?"

"Yes I can."

"Then, my clever young friend, just be good enough to say how it is."

"Why, when Steggs and his lordship failed in their enterprise, they came direct to you, fancying that you would be easiest able to find out where the young girl now is."

"Wonderful! That is precisely it. Now, Jack, a great deal will depend upon this."

"Upon what?"

"Do you know his lordship's real motive for wishing to get possession of this girl?"

"I do."

"I say his real motive, not his apparent one."

"Of course."

"Now, just to try you, Jack, and more depends upon your answer than you think, tell me what you think is the real motive."

Now Jack for once made a miscalculation.

So artfully had Wild managed the whole affair that he felt sure he did know all, and, therefore, he thought there could be no harm in letting him know the extent of his information.

He spoke at once, and to the point.

"He wants to carry her off, and either murder her or put her out of the way somehow, because she being his elder brother's child is the heiress to the estates which his lordship now unjustly holds."

Jonathan's breath was quite taken away by this intelligence.

He dropped his pipe, and stared at Jack with wide open mouth and eyes.

His behaviour was so exactly that of a recipient of a piece of unexpected and astounding news, that Jack knew instantly he had been trapped into making a false move.

"Is this true, Jack?" gasped Wild.

"True!" iterated Sheppard, infuriated that Wild should have overreached him, "didn't you tell me you knew all about it when you did not, or else you would not ask me whether it was true?"

"But, Jack, his lordship told me that his motive was entirely different. Is it really possible that what you have told me is true?"

"It is something more than possible."

"Why—why, Jack! she—she"—

"What?"

"Is worth her weight in gold to anyone who can lay hold of her. Where is she, Jack?"

"And do you think, Jonathan Wild, that I would be instrumental in placing her in her rascally uncle's power? Never, never!"

"Mind, what you're about, Jack. You may just as well tell me at once, and save trouble, for I am sure to find out."

"And if I tell you where she is, whose side shall you take—her's or her uncle's?"

"Ha! ha!"

"What is there to laugh at?"

"Oh! lots. Now, which side do you think I should take?"

"I don't know."

"I'll tell you."

"Her uncle's?"

"Perhaps so! But, at any rate, the car from whom I should get the most money."

"And would not the restoration of a young girl to her own be a sufficient reward without anything else?"

"Not a bit of it. But to be candid with you, Jack. It will be best for us to row in the same boat."

"Oh! will it?"

"It will, Jack; believe me, it will."

"Well, go on."

"You're rather saucy, Jack; however, as I like you, I shall look over that."

"Oh! just as you like," said Sheppard, who felt that circumstances had placed him in a position to make free with Jonathan Wild. "Don't make me an exception to any of your rules, I beg."

Wild glared angrily at him.

"Go on with what you've got to say, but if you want me to take part against the young girl"—

"Yes—yes."

"You may save your breath, for I tell you once for all I'll see you jolly well d—d first."

CHAPTER XXXVII.

JACK SHEPPARD FOR ONCE IN HIS LIFE IS OUT-MANŒUVRED BY JONATHAN WILD.

JONATHAN started to his feet.

His face was inflamed with passion.

"How dare you?" he said, "I'll"—

But a second thought came across the mind of the politic thief-taker, and he, by a great effort, curbed his anger, and sat down in his seat again.

"Jack Sheppard," he said, "it is pretty evident you are a lad of spirit, and I like you; so I have put up without resenting it that which I would not have suffered from anyone else."

"I'm much obliged," said Jack.

"Now you are young and inexperienced, and have not seen so much of the world as I have, Jack. Now do for once take my advice."

"I am listening."

"Very well, then. It's natural enough that your sympathies are on the side of the heiress. My sympathies are there too."

The idea of Jonathan Wild having sympathy for anybody was rich in the extreme, and so thought Jack, if one may judge by the smile which rose to his lips.

"Ah! you may smile," said Wild, "but it's a fact for all that; but it is wrong to be carried away by your feelings, you ought to bring reason to bear upon the subject."

"It won't do, Jonathan."

"Now, there is one very important thing I should like you to take into consideration," continued Wild, unheeded by Sheppard's ejaculatory interruption; "and that is, that possession is nine points of the law."

"I know that well enough."

"Oh! you do? So much the better, then. Now, at the present time, Lord — What is his name, Jack?"

"That's just what I want to know."

"Oh! is it? Then I am sorry to say I can't tell you. However, as I was going to say, his lordship has possession at present, and there would be a good deal of trouble in ousting him."

"Perhaps."

"Perhaps? I am sure of it. And then consider further, his lordship has all his life been used to the luxuries of his present mode of life, and it would be cruel in the greatest degree to deprive him of them."

"Stuff!"

"Especially to put into his place one who has never been accustomed to such things, and therefore cannot feel the want of them."

"But that is not the question, Jonathan Wild."

"Stop a little longer, and you'll see it is. An affair of this sort ought always to be made pecuniarily advantageous to those concerned in it. Now, if you are only half as clever as I take you to be, you'll perceive that his lordship would give more to retain his possessions than the girl would be put into them."

Jack Sheppard rose to his feet.

"It's no good trying it on. I told you just now that I would not lift a finger to keep her from her rights, but, on the contrary, I would use my whole energies to restore her to them. As for telling you where she is, you will get no more from me, further than that she is safe, and where you will be unable to find her."

"Don't make too sure of that, viper," said Wild, as he, too, sprung from his chair, "I'll wring it from you before you are many hours older."

"Will you? I don't think you will. Good night, Jonathan Wild. Our acquaintance has been short, but quite long enough."

"Are you going, Jack?"

"I am," he replied, going towards the door.

"No, don't, Jack, for my sake. Pray stay. Ha! ha!"

Jonathan Wild had a strange habit of laughing on the most unimirthful occasions, or at all events when no one but himself could see anything to laugh at.

Jack Sheppard put his hand on the lock of the door.

At the same moment, though he did not perceive it, Jonathan Wild pressed upon a spring, which communicated with a bell in the lower portion of his domicile.

"One minute more, Jack," he said. "Let us, if we are going to part over this matter, part friends. Fill up your glass once more. I am very sorry I am going to lose you over a booby of a girl."

Jack did not know Wild yet, or he would have known that when he spoke gently he was most to be dreaded.

He saw nothing sinister in the fact of his asking him to drink, and besides, he was blinded a little with self-conceit.

Almost, however, before he could reach the table, the door of the room was thrown open and one of Wild's men entered the room.

"Secure him!" cried the thief-taker, with sudden vehemency, "secure him!"

Jack turned round with the rapidity of lightning, but he was too late; the men had already grasped him tightly from behind.

In vain he struggled to free himself. They were used to that sort of thing, and his struggles seemed to have no other effect than that of tightening the hold they had upon him.

His rage at being thus outwitted lent him double strength, too, but it was no use.

"Curse you," he said; "you shall repent this."

"Ha! ha!"

The laugh was even shorter and more disagreeable than usual.

"To the cells with him," he cried; "drag him along, I will follow you."

In obedience to his commands the two men began to drag Jack towards the door, but this they found rather more difficult than holding him.

"Be quiet, fool," cried Wild. "Can't you see it is useless to attempt to get away. Drop it, or it will be the worse for you."

But Jack heeded not his words, he was furious at the thought that he should thus be made a prisoner.

Jonathan Wild took up his cudgel from the corner by the fire-place, where he had been resting.

He swung it round just before Jack's face, who was not so blinded with passion as not to be able to see it, and understand what was meant."

He ceased his struggles.

He thought he might just as well save his scone as a not.

Down stairs and along the gloomy passage leading to the cells he was marshalled by the two men, Jonathan Wild, with a hideous grin distorting his lips, following in the rear.

Through the curious iron door, past the cell doors, to the very end of the passage, they went, as Wild had done on the occasion of his visit to Sir Marmaduke.

The secret door in the wall—a secret to all those who were not in the confidence of the great thief-taker—was opened, and they entered the gloomy corridor beyond.

The very next cell to that in which languished the unfortunate baronet, was the one destined to be the abiding-place of Jack.

The door grated back upon its hinges, and Jack was rudely thrust over the threshold.

They did not think it necessary to bind him in any way. They relied upon the strength of the dungeon itself precluding all possibility of escape.

Jack, who was unaware that the flooring of the cell was some two feet lower than that of the passage, fell heavily upon his face when he was thrust in.

Jonathan himself held the door almost shut, and through the crevice peeped into the cell.

"Ha! ha! Jack, my boy. How do you feel now? How do you like your new quarters? I tell you what it is: here you will have to stay until you choose to tell me where I know who is. You will, indeed. Ha! ha!"

To this speech Jack Sheppard deigned no other reply than a howl of rage.

Bang went the door of the cell, and then Wild set about securing it.

He first turned a key in the lock.

Then he shot two enormous iron bolts into their sockets.

And lastly put a thick oaken bar crossways over the door.

It was secure enough in all conscience one would think.

Jonathan seemed to think so, for he turned from it with an air that said as plainly as possible—

"Get out of that if you can."

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

SIR MARMADUKE HEARS A MYSTERIOUS VOICE, WHICH ADVISES HIM NOT TO SIGN THE DEED.

"YA—ah!" cried Wild, as he turned round and faced the two men who had brought Jack to the dungeon, "Ya—ah! what are you waiting for? Be off with you, I say, be off."

Upon hearing these words the two officers vanished with a celerity that seemed really marvellous.

Before he could have counted ten Jonathan Wild was completely alone.

The silence of the very grave was around him.

"Shall I go now," he muttered, "or is it too soon after my former visit? I am here now, though, and I think it will be as well."

From these words the reader will easily comprehend that it was to the unfortunate baronet, Sir Marmaduke Osborn, that he referred, and in whose fate, it is presumed, some considerable amount of interest is felt.

As he spoke, Wild made his way to the door of the dungeon, and, withdrawing the fastenings, threw the door open.

The faint rustling sound which would be produced by anyone slowly turning over upon straw reached his ears.

"Sir Marmaduke Osborn," said Wild, "I have come."

"Begone then, villain. Begone!"

"Not until I please."

"To stay here is useless. Thank Heaven I was able to resist the temptation to barter away my estates for my liberty. Hence, I say! I will never sign the deed."

"Your's is a brave spirit."

"Mocker! May the bitterest and most withering nurse of a wife—a mother—and children, cling to you now, and through all eternity! Curse you! Curse you, I say!"

Jonathan shook a little.

Superstition formed no inconsiderable element in Wild's mental composition, and he could not hear unmoved the just imprecations of the man he had so foully injured.

But he quickly recovered himself.

"Silence!" he yelled. "You had best be so, or I may adopt means of enforcing it which you will find more effective than pleasant. Silence, I say!"

Jonathan jumped down into the cell as he spoke.

He held the lamp which he carried in such a position that its rays fell with the greatest force upon the baronet.

This unfortunate object of Wild's avarice was extended at full length upon the straw.

When he spoke he had raised himself a little on one arm, but upon the approach of his arch enemy, he sunk down to a recumbent position.

The rays from Jonathan's lamp dazzled him.

"Get up," cried the thief-taker. "Get up, I say. Do you hear?"

"I do hear, and I comply," said the prisoner, as he sat up; "but I do so merely to escape your brutality, for I know you are cowardly enough to maltreat me, weak and defenceless as I am."

Wild growled out some half-articulate reply, and then he said—

"I told you yesterday I should visit you to-day, and you see, ha! ha! I am as good as my word. Quite funny that. Why don't you laugh, Sir Marmaduke? You have been expecting me, have you not?"

There was something grotesquely horrible about Wild's mocking tones.

The prisoner was silent.

Jonathan continued.

"I hope," he said, "you have come to the determination to accede to the terms which I propose. The little opportunity for reflection which I generously accorded you has been made use of, I hope."

"It has, Jonathan Wild."

"What is your resolution? To sign the deed, of course?"

"Oh! Wild! Wild! what have I done that you should persecute me thus?" Do not, oh! do not, for the sake of my wife and little ones, rob me of my all. Take a part, take a part. To secure my own freedom I would gladly give a moiety, but not all—not all!"

The piteous tones in which these words were spoken were, one would have thought, sufficient to make an impression on the most obdurate heart; but it was not so. Jonathan stood with his arms folded, looking at his helpless victim, while a grim smile of derision curled his lips.

"And so," he said, "this is the result of your reflections. I see, I have only had useless trouble after all. This is what one gets by being over thoughtful and indulgent."

"Indulgent!" repeated Sir Marmaduke, who seemed infuriated by the bitter mockery of his persecutor. "Indulgent? How? In what way?"

Jonathan held up his hands in affected astonishment.

"Do you pretend you are ignorant of my kindness to you? Well—well, we must not look for our reward on earth."

"No," exclaimed the prisoner; "but most assuredly will you meet with it in hell!"

"Ha! ha! That is a place to frighten children with. A bugbear that has for me no terrors. What I am I am. When I die my body will resolve into the elements, and all will be over. A future state—ha! ha! The idea is most absurd, though I give the man credit who was the first to broach it. A cunning priest was he."

Sir Marmaduke shuddered, as he heard the thief-taker utter such blasphemous opinions. He said nothing. He felt how useless it would be.

"But this is idle talk," said Jonathan, as he again took from his pocket the cunningly-worded paper the baronet was so near signing the day before.

"Come," he said, "delay no longer. Freedom is sweet to all men. Purchase it, ere it be too late."

"Purchase it! but at what a price!"

"Your name, Sir Marmaduke, will remain untarnished if you adopt this course, and surely you can feel the desirability of that."

"No—no, I cannot—I cannot. I should live, but to what end? To be cursed by my poor children. Fiend, are you deaf to all entreaty? Can no words, no supplications move you? Surely, your heart cannot be all stone!"

"Cease this: it is worse than useless."

"Will nothing move you?"

"Nothing but compliance with my demands."

"Oh! my God! my God!" moaned the unhappy knight. "What shall I do? How shall I act?"

"Ask yourself," said Wild, "and not an invisible, non-existing power. Be a man, and not a fool."

"And do you call that being a man?" asked Sir Marmaduke. "Do you call your actions manly? Are you a man? If so I should wish to be a demon!"

"Ha! ha!" laughed Wild, but he was clearly ill at ease. "It is amusing, most amusing, but I have had enough and too much of this. Here is the paper. Sign it, and be free!"

As he spoke, Jonathan thrust the paper into his hands. It was taken almost mechanically.

Who can tell what fearful struggles he had had when alone in the darkness and solitude of his cell? Who could tell what struggle was even then going on in his breast? Enviroed as he was by evils, turn in which direction he would, decision was impossible. The only thing of which he was properly conscious was that he did not possess the right, even if he had the will, to abalienate his possessions from his lawful heirs.

Still he hesitated.

And, let it be asked, under the circumstances, was it at all wonderful that he should? Alas! no. For a long time he had resisted all the specious arguments which Wild had urged—resisted them with a pertinacity which would elicit the greatest admiration; but in proportion as his bodily frame grew more and more enfeebled, so did his steadfastness diminish.

"Sign!" said Wild, again taking a pen from his pocket, which he forced into the prisoner's grasp; "sign and be free—free! Free to look again upon the glorious sunlight, to see the children of whom you are so fond."

"And would they," asked the baronet, in tones of mournful pathos, "would they be fond of me? No, no; rather would they call down the bitterest execrations upon their miserable parent."

"Phsa!" said Wild, "think not of that. Surely it would be better, bad as it might be, than to suffer a violent and ignominious death at the hands of the common executioner."

"Alas! that such should under any circumstances be the fate of a gentleman. It should be reserved for wretches like yourself—for whom, however, such a punishment is too good."

"That is entirely a matter of opinion. But, come, I have dallied with you long enough, and my patience is at an end. Sign—sign, I say."

There was a kind of stone bench or settle near that part of the dungeon where Sir Marmaduke lay upon the straw, and towards this place he crawled.

He spread the paper smoothly upon it.

Observing what he was about, Jonathan, with his whole countenance lighted up with demoniac exultation, picked up the lamp and directed its beams upon the writing.

Silently, too, he unhooked from the button of his coat an ink-born, which he placed upon the stone seat.

The poor prisoner's eyes were dim. Tears, too, which he could not control, suffused them. He made several vain efforts to decipher it.

He did not give it a thought that the document had been purposely written in a cramped and illegible hand.

"Never mind the words," said Jonathan, "why do you wish to trouble about them. You know their import; that surely should suffice."

"Yes, yes, as you say; what matters it? Give me the pen."

"You have it in your hand."

"Ay, so I have; I had forgotten. The ink!"

"It is beside you."

"Farewell to my once happy home and smiling grounds. Farewell to all happiness on earth. These few strokes of the pen will deprive me of them for ever."

As he spoke these words he seized the pen, and hastily affixed his signature.

But while he was in the very act, and before he had finished forming the characters, a strange voice, coming apparently from the roof, spoke.

"Do not sign the deed, Sir Marmaduke!" it said; "if you do you are lost indeed! Jonathan Wild will have you arraigned for treason, and executed all the same!"

CHAPTER XXXIX.

THE THAMES POLICE CHASE JONATHAN WILD.

Too late.

The pen fell from the nerveless grasp of Sir Marmaduke. But the warning voice came too late.

He had affixed his signature to the deed.

Jonathan Wild uttered a yell.

At first its tones were those of terror, but they quickly merged into anger.

He recognized the tones.

The shock upon the debilitated mind and body of the baronet was so great that, for a moment or two, he was bereft of speech and motion.

Wild was the first to recover himself.

He made a snatch at the document he had taken so much trouble to obtain.

The baronet was too bewildered to be able to prevent him.

Leaving him to recover as best he might, Jonathan, after thrusting the paper into his pocket, strode from the cell.

We have said that he recognized the voice, and he understood in a moment whence it had proceeded.

But as the reader does not, we must go back a little way.

When Jack was locked in the dungeon, he remained standing where he was without moving hand or foot, partly from the dread he had of walking in a strange place in the dark, and partly to listen to the receding footsteps of his jailers.

[JACK SHEPPARD SQUARES ACCOUNTS WITH JONATHAN WILD.]

There was apparently no other aperture to the cell than the door by which he had entered. Certainly there was none through which the faintest scintillation of light penetrated.

As he thus stood, he, to his surprise, distinctly heard a door open.

That is the one leading into Sir Marmaduke's cell.

Then he heard the voice of the villainous thief-taker.

Every word he spoke Jack heard with as much distinctness as he would have done if Jonathan had been standing at his elbow.

The baronet's reply followed.

Jack listened to the conversation which ensued with an interest that knew no bounds.

By a species of intuition, which formed a leading trait in his mental composition, Jack divined the whole of the affair from first to last, in all its ramifications.

And now he found that every moment his eyes became more and more accustomed to the darkness wherewith he was surrounded, and he was enabled to see, dimly and imperfectly, it is true, the different objects in his cell.

He was, however, at a loss to account for the plainness with which he heard all that was going on in the contiguous dungeon.

He placed his hands against the walls.

They were cold and slimy, and apparently of solid stone.

From this circumstance he was forced to the conviction that there must be somewhere in the wall, which divided his cell from that in which Jonathan and his prisoner were, an opening of some kind.

A more attentive auscultation convinced him that this must actually be the case, and that its situation must be somewhere near the roof of the cell.

In this supposition Jack was perfectly correct.

The series of cells in which he was placed communicated with each other by a square aperture.

This contrivance, insufficient as it was, was for the purpose of ventilation.

The beams of the lantern which Jonathan carried made the exact locality of this opening in the wall apparent, and Jack came to a sudden determination to try to reach it, and so be not merely an auditor but a spectator of what was going on in the adjoining cell.

He carefully estimated the distance, and shook his head.

He felt that to reach it without something to stand upon would be an impossibility.

The height from the floor to the bottom part of the aperture was at least ten feet, and although it was just possible that he might by a vigorous spring reach it with the tips of his fingers, yet he would not be able to take a firm hold.

He cast his eyes about him for some means of accomplishing his purpose.

But he could find nothing.

A quantity of straw, in a very humid state, littered down in one corner, was all there was to provide him with a bed.

To be sure, against the wall opposite to the door there was a kind of stone settle similar to that in Sir Marmaduke's cell, but this was of no service to him, since it was a fixture.

At last he found a pitcher, which had probably been used to convey water to some former inmate of the cell.

It was empty, and Jack thought that by turning it bottom upwards he would, by placing it under the hole he was so anxious to reach and standing upon it, be able by giving a spring to take firm hold of the stone-work with his hands.

He made the attempt, and was successful.

The muscles in Jack's arms and wrists were very strong, and his body light, so he was able, after shifting his hands a little, to draw himself up; a feat which he had seen frequently performed by mountebanks.

When he had done this, he found he was able to see what was going forward.

Sir Marmaduke had taken the pen in his hand, and was about to affix his signature to the deed.

Jonathan was standing behind him.

The lamplight fell upon his visage.

Its expression was truly awful.

It was at this moment Jack shouted out the warning to the baronet not to sign the deed.

But, as we have seen, he was too late.

Sir Marmaduke, with the rapidity of thought, signed his name.

The accents of Jack's voice were only too well-known to Wild, and he comprehended in a moment what had taken place.

Therefore, the cry of terror which first came from his mouth quickly changed its note to rage, and he rushed from the cell.

Clearly his intention was to pay Jack a visit, and wreak his vengeance upon him.

But Sheppard had found that the hole in the wall was large enough for him to force his slender body through, and, before Wild could get the fastening of his cell door undone, he had crawled completely through the opening.

To drop down then into Sir Marmaduke's dungeon was a matter of no difficulty whatever.

Jonathan Wild uttered another yell when he found the cell was empty.

He knew well enough there was no other means than the hole near the roof by which Jack could have left the cell, and he could scarcely believe it possible anyone could have got through such a contracted aperture.

With more rage swelling in his heart than he had ever before felt, the thief-taker rushed back to Sir Marmaduke's cell.

But Jack heard him coming, and was prepared to receive him.

The first thing almost that Jack saw on reaching the ground was the bludgeon Jonathan was so fond of carrying about with him.

He could scarcely contain his delight at the lucky chance by which so formidable a weapon had been placed in his hands.

He took a firm hold of it.

As for the unfortunate victim of Wild's rapacity, the unfortunate baronet Sir Marmaduke Osborn, he was in such a state of mental confusion that he could only partially comprehend what was taking place around him.

He huddled himself up into as small a compass as he could, and shrank close against the wall.

He clasped his hands together.

The predominant expression upon his features was mute and undefined terror.

Whether to look upon Sheppard as a friend or persecutor he knew not, and so remained helplessly awaiting the result.

But we have said when Jack heard Jonathan coming he took up a position to receive him.

That position was against the wall by the door.

With both hands he held Wild's formidable bludgeon above his head.

Blinded by passion, Jonathan made a rush into the cell.

There was a sickening thud—the sound that is produced by violently bringing down some hard and heavy instrument upon some softer object.

Jack had struck Wild on the head with his bludgeon.

He fell down like an ox at the shambles.

In all probability had such a blow alighted upon any other head than the thief-taker's, it would have been a fatal one.

But not only had prescient Nature bestowed upon Wild a skull of unusual thickness; he had adopted measures to guard against any such little contingency as that which had just happened.

This means was to have placed inside his hat a framework of steel, so cunningly contrived that it was almost as great a protection from a blow as a helmet would have been.

But the unexpectedness and suddenness of Sheppard's attack, coupled with the force of the blow itself, made him reach the floor in a state bordering closely upon insensibility.

Strong as the bands of steel inside his hat were, they were not strong enough to wholly exempt him from the effects of such an attack.

No sooner did Jack see his foe prone upon the floor than he threw away the cudgel and sprang upon him, intent upon recovering and destroying the deed Sir Marmaduke had signed.

With no little difficulty he rolled the inert body of the thief-taker over on to his back.

No sooner, however, did he accomplish this feat than he perceived Jonathan suddenly recover from his swoon.

Wild's first impulse was to clutch Jack by the throat.

But the latter, although no match for Wild, had an advantage that made him more—far more.

He was uppermost.

Quick as thought Jack caught hold of Jonathan by the ears and hair near them, and then, pressing his knee upon his chest, banged his head upon the dungeon-floor.

Crack! crack! crack!

Those were the ominous sounds produced by the contact.

Jonathan's hold relaxed.

Jack lifted his head up an inch or so higher, and brought it down with additional force, in order to give what the French term the coup de grace.

This time Wild was thoroughly insensible.

Jack now proceeded to look for the deed, and seeing a piece of roughly-folded paper projecting from Wild's pocket, he, making no doubt it was what he sought, transferred it to his own.

His next care was to look after Sir Marmaduke Osborn.

Still crouching, like some wild animal at the end of his chain, was this one of many victims of Wild's brutality.

Who, to gaze upon that trembling and emaciated form, would imagine it to be that of a gentleman of rank!

No one.

Jack Sheppard shuddered as his eyes rested on this piteous sight.

"A day of reckoning for work of this sort must surely come at last," he said, "and then will Jonathan have to beware."

He picked up the lantern as he spoke, and made a step forward in the direction of Sir Marmaduke, who, however, with a faint moan of terror, endeavoured to shrink closer to the wall.

His demeanour was abject in the extreme.

But in his lack-lustre eyes there came occasionally a fitful gleam, that told Wild by his cruelty and persecution had lighted up the fire of insanity in his brain.

Jack strove by speaking softly to reassure the trembling being before him.

"Sir Marmaduke Osborn," he said, "for such I gather is your name and title, accept all the assurances that I can give that from me you have nothing to fear."

"Fear—fear!"

"Yes," said Jack, in louder tones, "nothing to fear from me. Your enemy you have seen me overcome. He lies there bereft of power to do you harm."

Re-assured by Jack's words, Sir Marmaduke rose to his feet, and looked intently in the direction in which he pointed.

Jack held the lantern so that its beams fell chiefly on Wild's body, which they lighted up with a horrible distinctness.

For some moments Sir Marmaduke gazed upon his persecutor in silence, and then in a strange, hoarse, trembling whisper, he spoke.

His words seemed to be more addressed to himself than to his rescuer.

"Can it be true that he is dead at last?" he asked. "Can it be possible? No, no. He is not dead yet—he never will die. Fiends like angels are immortal!"

CHAPTER XL.

JACK SHEPPARD DESPAIRS OF AGAIN SEEING THE LIGHT OF DAY.

THIS thought was quite a novel one to Jack, and he glared at the speaker with considerable astonishment.

"I don't think he's dead, myself," he said, after a pause; "and I sincerely hope he is not. I have already quite enough to answer for, without that."

Sir Marmaduke advanced as far as his chain would allow him, in order to obtain a nearer and a better view of his arch enemy. He could scarcely believe it was really him who lay there so powerless.

"I should be very sorry to have his death at my door. But come. If he is moveless now, he will not long remain so. If we are to escape, our measures must be taken promptly."

There was something magical, one would think, in the pronunciation of that one word escape, for it had an effect which probably nothing else would have had. It called into being all the latest energies Sir Marmaduke possessed.

"Escape! escape!" he cried, wildly. "Who speaks of escape? That is music. The sweetest music ever drank in by my ears."

"I say escape!" said Jack, who had chivalrously determined not to leave the poor baronet behind him a prisoner. "I say escape! Rouse yourself! Shake off the vapours that obscure your brain. I will lead you to freedom!"

"But my fetters," cried Sir Marmaduke. "I am held fast here by a chain which would require a thousand times my strength to snap asunder."

"We will soon put that right," said Jack, cheerfully.

"Very soon—you'll see! It locks, I suppose."

"Yes—yes."

"Then you may depend somewhere about Wild's person is the key that will unlock it. I will find it and set you free from that, at all events."

Jack, as he spoke, knelt down beside Jonathan, and, after a brief examination of his pockets, brought out a small bunch of keys.

Carrying them constantly in his pocket had given to them a high degree of polish, and they glittered faintly in the lamp beams.

"Here you are," said Jack, as he rose, "Jonathan won't wake up just yet. Now, I will soon free you from that incumbrance."

With eager haste the poor prisoner held forward that portion of his fetters where the lock was situated.

Jack had to make a good many trials before he found the right key. They were nearly all small enough to go in the lock, but they would do no more.

At length, as he took the keys regularly one after the other, he came to the right one.

The bolt went back with a snap.

The chains which had so long cramped his limbs fell on the floor of the cell with a jingling sound.

"Summon to your aid," said Jack, as he led Sir Marmaduke towards the door, "summon to your aid all the strength you possess, for, rely upon me, you have need of it. Let the thought of so speedily rejoining your wife and children, of whom you profess to be so fond, nerve you to the utmost. You can defy the villain Wild now, and all his power. When you are once at liberty, you can take such steps as will enable you to successfully elude his fiendish malice. Come, come!"

"I will, my kind preserver," said Sir Marmaduke, who was rapidly recovering from the shock his mental system had sustained. "Be patient with me, my young friend, for young I perceive you are. It will not be possible for you to form any conception of the agony of all kinds I have gone through. Do not wonder that, with starvation superadded, I am the weak, miserable creature which you see."

"I can imagine easily, from my short sojourn in the adjoining cell, what you must have endured."

"You, too, then, were brought here a prisoner by that monstrous villain, Jonathan Wild?"

"I was."

"But you luckily escaped before the dampness of the dungeon sapped your life-springs. To see me now and to have seen me as I was a month ago, you would never believe it was the same being."

"A month?"

"Yes, such I believe is the time I have been incarcerated here, though to me it has seemed more like an eternity than thirty days."

"The time limps along but sluggishly under such circumstances."

"It does—it does, indeed. But, my young friend, my brain is confused; let that be my excuse for not having earlier attempted to find words wherewith to express the gratitude I owe you. Believe me I"—

"Don't say a word on that score," said Jack; "I have as yet done nothing except recovered the deed to which you, in a moment of weakness, affixed your signature."

"Ah! that deed of exheredation! Where is it? where is it? You have it, do you say?"

The manner in which these words were jerked out rather than enunciated testified to the anxiety of his heart.

"It is here," said Jack, as he thrust the paper he had taken from Wild into the baronet's hands; "Do not stay to look at it now," he added, as he saw he was about to unfold it, "put it in your pocket."

"Why not destroy it?"

"You can do so if you wish; but think what an important link it will be in the evidence against Wild."

"You are right, my friend, it will. You are youthful in appearance, but you have the wisdom of age. I will keep the deed."

"Do so, sir; but be careful not to lose it. You would find it an awkward matter for yourself were it to get into inimical hands."

"It would, indeed. There, it is quite safe now."

"You speak much better than you did."

"Oh! yes."

"That is well."

"I am much stronger. What you have said and done has reinvigorated me to a greater extent than I believed possible."

"I am most glad to hear it. But come, it is time we left the precincts of this place. Let me go first. I shall then be able to assist you to reach the passage."

"Thanks, my friend. But have you no name by which I can call you?"

"Oh! yes; mine is a very common sort of name."

"Let me hear it. It will always afford me pleasure to pronounce it. What is it?"

"Jack."

"John what?"

"No, not John; but Jack, plain Jack."

"But you have a second name?"

"I suppose I have."

"Then tell it me. Why do you manifest so much reluctance at doing so?"

"I don't know, I'm sure, but my name's Jack Sheppard, and now let us be off."

"Jack Sheppard?"

"Yes."

"Jack Sheppard! I repeat the name, my young friend, in order to imprint it the more deeply on my memory. Believe me, I shall never forget it, nor cease to feel grateful for!"

"There, no more of that," said Jack, rather brusquely. "It's really disagreeable to do anyone a good turn."

"My young friend," said Sir Marmaduke, who got stronger every moment, "my young friend, I like you none the worse for deprecating my gratitude. It is the sign of a good nature. But since the verbal expression of gratitude is so distasteful to you, permit me to make you a suggestion."

"I cannot refuse," said Jack, who could not help feeling some amount of awe at the dignity with which the worthy baronet spoke.

"I know nothing of your position or occupation in life, Jack Sheppard, but from your raiment I judge that it is no better nor so good as it might be. Now, when I am once free from this hateful place, I shall then be in a situation to make you some more tangible expression of gratitude than I could by mere lip service."

"Then let the offer stay till then," said Jack, as he sprang up into the passage, and held out his arms to assist Sir Marmaduke, who gladly accepted the proffered aid.

He stood for a moment to regain his breath, and then he placed his hand detainingly upon Jack's arm.

"You rise still higher in my estimation. Suffer me to speak. If you will permit me, I will see that your future lot in life is nearer what you wish than I am sure it is at present."

"Sir," said Jack overcome by the generosity of the man he saved, and the reflections to which his words had given birth, "Sir, I thank you from the bottom of my heart, and"—

"It is now my turn to interrupt," said the baronet, with a wan smile. "I can assure you any thanks from you would come with a bad grace, for you have nothing to be grateful for."

"Nothing!" repeated Jack. "If you but knew all, or that I had seen you earlier."

"Remorse tinctures your voice," said Sir Marmaduke. Surely, one so young and full of generous impulses as you are, can have done nothing serious of which you should repent."

"There you mistake," said Jack, whose thoughts reverted to the young girl who had so unequivocally displayed the affection she felt for him, and how deeply he was already stained with crime. "There you mistake. I am already criminal."

"Criminal!" said Sir Marmaduke, in accents of the most intense surprise. "Criminal? Impossible."

"And yet true," said Jack, mournfully.

His better angel was just then in the ascendancy.

"But how am I to reconcile such a statement with your behaviour to me?" asked Sir Marmaduke, with an incredulous air. "There appeared nothing of the criminal in that."

"Oh! believe me, sir," said Jack, "I have been forced by fate to be what I am. Not upon my head rests the responsibilities of my actions, but upon others who made me what I am."

"Your history must have been a strange one, and"—

"But this is no time to tell it," said Jack, suddenly recollecting his perilous position, of which, during the brief but interesting colloquy, he had been equally as oblivious as his companion. "We must turn our thoughts to the mode in which we are to leave Wild's house. We are, properly speaking, scarcely any freer than we were in the dungeon."

"Oh! yes—oh! yes," said Sir Marmaduke. "My mind is restored to me; my chains undone."

"I grant that, but Jonathan's house is not one which you can walk out of unquestioned; if we are to be free we must fight our way over many an obstacle before we can be so."

"I am ready, my young friend, to place myself entirely under your guidance, and act as you may think proper to direct."

CHAPTER XLI.

JONATHAN WILD RECOVERS FROM HIS SWOON, AND TAKES SOME RATHER ENERGETIC PROCEEDINGS.

"THEN," said Jack Sheppard, "the best thing we can do is to make sure of one thing."

"And what is that?"

"Why, if Jonathan Wild should wake up rather sooner than I expect, he will find it impossible to follow us very quickly."

"No, no; stay."

"For what?"

"Surely you cannot contemplate such a deed. Leave him to the punishment of his own guilty thoughts."

"Eh?" said Jack, who was quite in a fog.

"Spare his life. Surely you cannot murder him?"

"Murder him," said Jack; "bless you, I would not on any account cheat the hangman of his due."

"Forgive me," said Sir Marmaduke, "for doing you so much injustice as to think you capable of such a deed; and yet I thought your words implied as much."

"I meant no more than I said," replied Jack, "and this is it."

As he spoke, he shut the door of the cell in which Wild lay so motionlessly.

The key was in the lock.

To turn this was the work of a moment.

Then he shot the two bolts into their sockets.

Jonathan Wild was a prisoner in one of his own dungeons.

"There!" said Sheppard, with an air of the greatest satisfaction, "he'll have some little trouble in getting out of that, I rather think, or giving the alarm to any of his men."

"So I think; but now, my young friend, having disposed of him, what do you intend to do next?"

"That, sir, is more than I can tell you, beyond making the attempt to leave his house with all speed possible."

"Yes, yes; which is the way?"

"I am again at a loss," said Jack, as he held the lantern above him so as to diffuse its rays as much as possible, "I know no more of this place than I was likely to gather from being dragged into it a prisoner."

"It cannot much matter, said Sir Marmaduke, "which way we turn. I think it almost certain the passage cannot be of any extraordinary length."

"No, certainly not, so we should soon come to the end of it. Come, let us take the turning to the right."

As it so happened, this was turning away from the secret door that led to Wild's other cells, and as we stated upon a former occasion, Sir Marmaduke's cell was the last but one in the row, they were not long coming to its termination.

In fact, they saw the wall of which the end was composed without knowing what it was. Being of one uniform black tint, they took it to be merely darkness.

When they found, however, it was a complete and solid obstacle to their further progress, Jack said—

"Well, this has not been much trouble, has it?"

"Can you see no outlet?" asked Sir Marmaduke, anxiously.

"None."

"No door?"

"No. This, I take it, is the wrong end of the passage altogether."

"But what is that to your left hand?"

"Only one of the cell doors, I think. You will perceive it differs in no respect from the rest."

"I see now. Then you think at the other end we shall find an egress?"

"Yes, yes. Make haste. We have already wasted too much time."

Both now hurried along the passage with as much speed as they could, and in a few seconds they reached the secret door.

But it was a secret door on the other side only.

The spring by which it was secured was plainly visible.

Jack was just on the point of pressing on the spring when Sir Marmaduke stayed him.

"What is it?" asked Jack, with some impatience.

"My young friend, I have a proposition to make to you. If you decline it, well and good; if you accept it, as I think you will, it will be the means of raising you to a still greater height in my estimation."

"Speak," said Sheppard. "What is it?"

"This: I do not know whether there may or may not be in these dungeons some other unfortunates like myself, the victims of Wild's brutality. You have in your hand the key with which you locked my dungeon door. It will be the work but of a few moments to unlock all the other cells, and make sure that neither has an inmate."

"It shall be done," said Jack, "I ought to have thought of that myself."

"It is rather surprising neither of us thought about it earlier than we did. But, however, we have thought of it in time."

"Just so, and if we find in the dungeons only one prisoner, our work will not have been in vain."

"I am rejoiced," said Sir Marmaduke, as they both together made their way to the first of the cells, "to hear you speak of the matter as you do."

"I can feel for others in the same predicament as myself, and think what I should like some one else to do for me were they in my position."

"Exactly. That is a simple and a just method of looking at the matter."

"Hold the lantern, Sir Marmaduke," said Jack, "and then I shall be able to see what I am about."

"Willingly."

Jack now, having his hands quite unencumbered, drew back the bolts at the top and bottom of the door.

Then he fitted the key into the lock.

Or rather he attempted to do so.

He discovered that Wild had been too cunning to have the locks on the cell doors all made after one pattern.

"We are done," said Jack, as he rapidly tried in succession the other doors. "It's no go."

"I am disappointed."

"And I am vexed."

"Let us tap at the different doors."

"I don't much like that. It can't be an over-satisfactory way of assuring ourselves no one is within."

"What else can we do?"

"It's rather hazardous."

"Then don't attempt it."

"That would not deter me. The thought of what peril I might encounter never made me hang back."

"There is a difference between despising danger and being temerarious."

"I tell you what I am going to do."

"Well?"

"Jonathan Wild, I have been told, has a master-key that will open every lock in his house."

"Yes—yes. Go on."

"This key he wears always suspended from his neck by means of a steel chain."

"But—but—"

"But what?"

"You don't intend, surely, to run such a frightful risk as to re-enter the cell where the villain is, and attempt to take it from him?"

"I do, though; and, what is more, will have it."

"Oh! my young friend, be guided by me in this matter."

"The danger is not worth mentioning. Jonathan cannot possibly, in this short time, have recovered from my treatment, and when he does I fancy he will be disabled a little."

While speaking these words, Jack boldly enough unlocked and unbolted the door, and then flung it open.

Sir Marmaduke shrunk back.

But feeling deeply ashamed of this manifestation of timidity, he came quite up to the threshold.

"Hold the light, Sir Marmaduke," said Jack. "Do not descend yourself, it is perfectly unnecessary."

Jack jumped lightly down into the cell, and made his way direct to the spot where Jonathan was.

Now, this fearlessness of demeanour was, to a great extent assumed, for Jack knew Wild was quite cunning enough, when he heard them coming, to be quite still, and pretend to be insensible until he actually reached him, and, when quite off his guard, to spring up suddenly and take him by the throat.

So, although Jack knelt down beside the thief-taker with assumptive carelessness, yet he was on the look out for some such event.

Jonathan, however, lay profoundly still, and was still perfectly insensible.

It was easy enough to find the chain that Jack knew he wore round his neck, and he pulled it off rather roughly.

Wild roused a little.

But Jack, having the master key firm in his grasp, jumped out of the cell, and slammed the door.

Mingled with the sound, there came from the interior of the dungeon an awful sound, such as no human being could possibly be supposed to produce.

"All right," said Jack, as he fastened the door carefully. "He will soon get tired of that sort of fun."

"Yes, but think how jeopardous would have been our situation if he had recovered before you could have left the cell."

"It would, I confess," said Jack, "but he didn't, so it is not worth while to speculate about it."

"You take things lightly."

"Sometimes. But let us, if we are to examine the other cells, begin at once, because every moment that we stay only increases the difficulty we shall find in leaving."

"There are two we shan't want to look into at all," said Sir Marmaduke. "One is the cell you have just left, and the other the one in which you were confined."

The change that had taken place in Sir Marmaduke Osborn was really wonderful. He no longer looked the same being. The abject, squalid aspect that he had worn disappeared. He held himself erectly, and though very weak, walked with a firm tread.

From the wreck he then was, after having survived the horrors of so long a confinement in a pestiferous dungeon, it was easy to see what he had been.

The simple fact of his having borne in mind that Wild might have other prisoners besides himself and the desire he expressed that they should be set free, suffices better than a whole page of laudatory matter to show the goodness of his heart, the unselfishness of his disposition.

Indeed, we think that under the circumstances, few persons indeed would be found who would be able to think of what others were suffering at that very moment.

"Let us go to the end of the passage," said Jack. "You know where I mean?"

"Yes, where the wall is, and the door I spoke to you about."

"Just so. Let that be the first we open. We will then take the others in succession."

"Agreed."

"If we do this, it will leave us when we have done close to the secret door, which will save us going over the ground unnecessarily."

This was obviously a capital arrangement. So they walked straight to the door which the baronet had noticed.

CHAPTER XLII.

SIR MARMADUKE'S EVIL DESTINY STILL PREVAILS, AND HURRIES HIM TO DESTRUCTION.

THAT they now stood upon the threshold of making some very remarkable discoveries in connection with the cells beneath Jonathan Wild's house in Newgate-street, Jack Sheppard and Sir Marmaduke Osborn did not entertain a doubt.

But Jack did not stop to speculate upon what was going to happen next, but proceeded to act without delay.

Sir Marmaduke still had the lantern in his grasp.

This, therefore, left Sheppard with both his hands at liberty.

He held up the master key.

Now, as this was rather a remarkable-looking instrument, we think it no more than right that a line or two should be occupied in its description.

It was formed of two pieces of steel each about four inches in length.

These two pieces had been laid one over the other, rectangularly, and then welded together so that it was in the form of a perfect cross.

Each of the four extremities of this cross were wrought into the shape of a key, but they all differed widely from each other, inasmuch as that one could only be used for opening a very small box indeed, while the largest would fit into a regular door lock.

Of course, the impossibility of having a single key that would open indiscriminately locks of all sizes, must be at once apparent, but by having four master-keys of different sizes made into one instrument, Jonathan had every lock in his dwelling at his command, from the biggest to the least.

This instrument would of necessity be an invaluable auxiliary to the two prisoners in consummating their release, as well as enable them to inspect the whole of the series of dungeons.

A glance at the size of the keyhole was sufficient to show Jack which was the key to be used, so he fitted it in and turned it round.

The bolt of the lock shot back with the greatest ease.

Jack next proceeded to draw back the bolts, when he perceived to his surprise that they had not been shot into their sockets.

"That doesn't look as though any one was in here," said Jack, as he kicked the door open with his foot. "Stand aside a moment, Sir Marmaduke, and let the foul air, if there be any, escape before you attempt to enter."

It was well Jack thought of taking this precaution, for though they both retreated to the opposite wall, yet even then they were not free from the noxious vapour.

The lamp which they carried burned dimly, and gave forth but little light.

In a few minutes, however, the fresh air mingled with the foul, and when the lantern burned as it had done formerly they ventured to enter the cell.

Jack went first.

Sir Marmaduke, with some little difficulty, followed him.

On reaching the centre of this place they both, by common consent, paused to look about them.

There was little food for curiosity.

A glance showed them it was quite vacant.

In shape and size it was in every respect similar to the one in which Sir Marmaduke had been confined, probably enough they had all been constructed after one model.

"There's nobody here," said Jack, "that's clear enough now, there hasn't been for some time, I should say."

"No, as you say, there is no one here," repeated Sir Marmaduke. "Let us hope that we may find all the others without tenants."

"I do hope it, I can assure you," replied Jack; "not, however, from the same motive as you do."

"What is it, then?"

"Why, there is no disguising the fact that the presence of one or two prisoners would be a great impediment to our ultimate escape."

"Do you think so, my friend?"

"I am sure of it. Nevertheless, the thought of that would never have sufficient weight with me to make me leave any one here exposed to Wild's tender mercies."

"That is right, that is right. I will hold the light so that we can take one last look around this dungeon, and then we will depart."

Sir Marmaduke elevated the lantern as he spoke, and directed the beam of light which issued through the lens, successively upon every part—floor, walls, and roof.

Nothing but the bare damp walls met their gaze.

"Quick!" said Jack. "We must be more expeditious with the others, or we shall not be out of the place before Wild is missed. Quick! quick!"

He regained the passage as he spoke, and helped Sir Marmaduke to do likewise.

The next cell to that which they had just visited was the one in which Jonathan was in durance.

Jack could not resist the impulse to make some appeal to him.

He knocked sharply therefore upon the door with the master key.

A murmuring voice followed, as though Wild had made some verbal reply, but the door was too thick and strong to allow of the penetration of a human voice.

It was succeeded by a furious hammering, that threatened to break in the panels.

"What a horrible noise," said Jack. "I wish I could stop him. If he keeps that sort of thing going he will surely be heard by some of his janizaries."

"Come away—come away," said Sir Marmaduke, in a half-terrified voice. "Come away at once."

It was a lucky thing for Jack that he followed his companion's advice so quickly as he did, for the knocking ceased suddenly, and then a bullet came crashing through the door.

The report mingled with the sound, and if Jack had not just then stepped aside, the bullet would have assuredly have found a resting place in his body.

As it was it flattened itself against the stone wall opposite.

It is rather surprising that Wild did not fire a pistol through the door before, but his brain just then was not in a very lucid state.

Most unquestionably had he been in his ordinary state of mind, the first thing he would have done would be to reply to the knocking by firing his pistol in that direction.

But the hard blows Jack had given him had deranged his head-piece not a little. Indeed, it is something to wonder at that he recovered at all.

"Let us go, my young friend, let us go. Every moment now must increase the chance of our discovery. Indeed, the noise that has just been made cannot fail to have been heard by some of Wild's men."

"If they don't hear that," replied Jack, with a smile, "I rather think they won't hear any other noise we can make."

"Hasten, hasten," said Sir Marmaduke, whose nerves seemed to be again unbinged. "You don't know what may be the extent of that man's power even now."

"It strikes me," replied Jack Sheppard, "that it is confined to making a noise. But come, sir. Rouse yourself. Shake off your fears. Our danger now is very little, if any, greater than it was. We have yet to accomplish our task."

"True," said the baronet, recovering himself by an effort, "this is your cell door, is it not, and so there is no need of our entering that."

"None in the least, I can assure you."

They walked on now until they came to the next cell.

With all the speed possible Jack undid the fastenings.

When the door was opened, they again took care to stand and let the pure air disperse.

But this time they found mingled with it such a frightful odour, that it was full ten minutes before they could enter the cell.

"Hilloa!" said Jack, as he stood upon the threshold and peeped in, while Sir Marmaduke held the lamp over his shoulder. "Hilloa! I say, is there anybody here?"

A prodigious scuffling sound followed his words, and then all was still.

"Hilloa!" said Jack again, "we are friends come to release you. If there is anyone here, let them speak."

The echo of Jack's voice died away.

The silence of the tomb succeeded.

"This, too, is vacant," said Sir Marmaduke. "Let us try the next."

"No—no," said Jack, "did you not hear that strange noise when I spoke? What can it be?"

"Rats, perhaps."

"Most likely; but still," said Jack, "I should not like to leave this place until I had first satisfied myself by a personal visit that there was no one in it."

"Very well, my friend."

"Do not, however, Sir Marmaduke, I beg, fatigue yourself by descending too. If you will stand upon the steps with the lantern in your hand that will be all that I require."

"Be careful," said the baronet, as Jack jumped down in the dungeon, the floors of every one of which were between two and three feet below the level of the passage.

Jack's eyes were keen and accustomed to the very faint and dubious sort of twilight that filled the cell, and he uttered an exclamation as his eye fell upon some dark-looking object at its further extremity.

"What is it?—what is it?" asked Sir Marmaduke, hurriedly descending. "What have you found?"

Jack pointed to the dark object, and then slowly they both walked towards it.

There was something in both their dresses which seemed to tell them what this dark object was.

But neither gave utterance to their convictions.

A few paces more, and they reached it.

It was a dead body, but so horribly mutilated and disfigured that, had it not been for the shreds of clothing which hung here and there about it, they could not have more than guessed at what it was.

These shreds of clothing also served to tell them the sex.

The buttons that were in different places upon it, and the material, proclaimed it to be a male.

For a few seconds Jack Sheppard and Sir Marmaduke stood gazing upon these remnants of mortality, and then the latter spoke.

"Another victim of that accursed villain, Jonathan Wild. Good heavens! that such things should be allowed to happen with impunity is enough to shake one's faith in an all-presiding Power, for, if this was not a case in which to interfere, there certainly can be none."

"I wonder who he is," asked Jack, "for a he he is, beyond a doubt. Perhaps some infernal rascal as bad as Wild himself."

"No, no, that cannot be. Ferocious animals do not prey on their own species. Jonathan Wild is in antagonism only with the innocent and good."

"The rats have had a rare feast off him, that's certain," said Jack, who was more engrossed by the frightful spectacle before him than he was with his companion's reflections. "They have eaten his face right away."

CHAPTER XLIII.

JACK SHEPPARD AND SIR MARMADUKE EXPLORE THE SECRET DUNGEONS BENEATH WILD'S HOUSE.

"HORRIBLE, horrible, most horrible!" said Sir Marmaduke, as with a shudder he turned away. And it is from such a fate as this that you have doubtless rescued me. Oh! my young friend, how can I be sufficiently grateful to you? But my actions shall speak that which my tongue cannot."

"Poor fellow," said Jack: "I wonder now who he could have been, and why he was left to die such a death as this?"

"That, in all probability, we shall never know," replied the baronet, "unless the unfortunate man has left something by which we can trace out his identity."

"If he has done so I am afraid we are too late to find it. Almost everything appears to be destroyed. Lend me the lantern, sir, and let me take a closer look."

Sir Marmaduke gave the lantern to Jack, who, taking it in his hand, stooped over the prostrate form.

Narrowly, very narrowly, did Jack look about him for some such indication as he sought, but vainly. There was nothing.

The only piece of clothing that was really worthy of the name was the lappel of a coat, and though Jack could see the pocket in it yet he shrank from putting in his hand.

But it was only for about half a moment that this feeling had the mastery of him.

At the end of that brief space of time he, with an air of desperate resolution, stooped down and introduced his hand into the pocket.

Somehow the presence of the pocket in that position, and the fact that every other portion of the unfortunate prisoner's apparel had, with the exception of a few shreds disappeared, engendered the notion in his mind that in that pocket would be found evidence to show who it really was.

But in this anticipation he was doomed to be disappointed.

The pocket was quite empty.

He was about to rise after having given vent to an exclamation, when the rays of the lantern happened to fall upon the wall near him.

Some strange scratches were visible.

"A clue, Sir Marmaduke! A clue!" he said.

"Where?"

"On the wall here, sir. If you stoop over so little you will be able to see it."

Despite the repugnance which a man of such refined sensibilities as Sir Marmaduke Osborn would naturally feel at drawing closer to so loathsome an object as that before him, yet the intense curiosity he felt to gain some kind of information relative to Wild's victim submerged it.

He stooped.

He saw the scratches on the wall.

They were nothing more than scratches.

"Can you make out what it says, my young friend?" asked the baronet, for as Jack was the nearest, and besides held the light, he had the best opportunity of discovering the signification of the marks. "Are they words?"

"Yes," said Jack, "they are words, that's true enough, but I can't make them out. I can read too."

"Let me try."

"I was going to ask you, sir, only I did not like to confess myself beaten."

"I daresay I shall be able to decipher it," said the baronet.

He took the light as he spoke, and getting as close to the wall as he could, strove his utmost to discover what the scratches meant.

That they were intended to represent letters could be seen at the first glance, but they were made in such an eccentric fashion that it was next to an impossibility to tell for what they were actually intended.

They extended, too, for some distance in a devious way along the wall.

By confining himself to the study of one character at the time he was able to unravel the whole.

The instrument, whatever it might have been, with which the letters were indented upon the wall, was clearly ill adapted for the task.

Sir Marmaduke repeated the letters one by one as he made them out.

We have said they extended for some distance along the dungeon wall.

This would, of course, convey the idea that it was a sentence of considerable length.

But such, indeed, was very far from being the case.

The sentence was a short one, and its extent was caused solely by the straggling manner in which the characters were formed, and the distance they were one from another.

The words were as follows:—

"I die of starvation—a victim of Wild's miscreancy. My name is Robt" —

That was all.

Jack drew a long breath.

"What is his name?" he asked.

"I cannot tell further than those four letters."

"Are you sure there are no more?"

"Quite! It seems to me as though he had endeavoured to go on, but there is only a little stroke."

"But," said Jack, as he bent forward to examine the last word of the inscription. "What could be his name? That is what puzzles me."

"What?"

"I mean, what name is there beginning with Robt?"

"There you puzzle me."

"Are you sure it is not intended for an e? They would then be the first letters of the name Robert!"

"It would. But it is an I I am convinced of that. If you look you will see that it is, if anything higher than the b before it. Now, no one would think of making an e like that."

"Well, I suppose not," said Jack, in a half-satisfied tone. "I should like to have known his name, for all that."

"And so should I. In that respect I am equally as curious as yourself."

"It is so vexatious," said Jack, that he should have begun to write his name and then left off in the middle of it."

"You are right, and yet, perhaps" —

"Perhaps, what?"

"Death might, in some sudden shape, have come upon him and cut short his work."

"That is likely enough, or else he found himself without strength to write more."

"It was one of those, you may depend. How strange and terrible! Never before did anything so excite my curiosity."

"And no wonder," replied Jack, who was, if anything, the more inwrought of the two. "It is the most dreadful thing I have ever seen or heard of."

"You may depend, the house of that arch fiend in human form is full of horrors."

"No doubt—no doubt!"

Let us take one more glance around us, and leave the place. We can do no good here."

"None!" said Jack; "and, besides, our present position is full of danger. I forgot everything in the discovery we have just made."

This was true on the part of both. Already, for their safety, had they wasted too much time.

With this conviction pressing upon their minds, they were not long reaching the passage.

They paused here for a moment and listened, but all was still, with the exception of a hammering which Wild kept up with untiring energy.

However, as is not unfrequently the case, the precautions he had taken to prevent the penetration of sound through the door of that gloomy region now militated against him.

Jack Sheppard and his companion paid no attention to this. They knew well enough that it was out of their power to prevent Wild making as much noise as he thought proper.

To have simply asked him to desist would have been ridiculous, and the means, in all probability, of causing him to make more.

There was no small amount of satisfaction to be derived from the circumstance that no alarm had as yet been raised.

The other dungeons, which Jack would insist upon thoroughly examining, did not repay them for their trouble, for they were without occupants.

They were, however, at ease upon one point.

And that was, with the exception of the villainous thief-taker himself, there was no living being in any one of those cells.

Once more, then, they stood near to that secret door, which, however, was anything but secret on the side upon which they stood.

Before, however, Jack ventured to press upon the spring, he thought it would be only prudent to ascertain by listening whether the coast was clear.

He therefore applied his ear to the woodwork.

The hammering noise Wild was making rather confused him.

But he listened as attentively as he could.

To the best of his belief there was no one in the passage on the other side.

This locality has already, in a former chapter, been described, but yet we think there can be no great harm done by reminding the reader that this passage, having a secret door at one end of it, had a very massive one at the other.

Beyond this there was a flight of stone steps, which conducted to the hall of Jonathan Wild's house.

At the end of these steps was an iron-door, made after the fashion of a gate.

This door was very strong indeed, besides which, night and day, a man always sat there on guard, who was able at once both to see and to hear whether anyone ascended the steps.

That a person would be able to do so without attracting his attention was almost an impossibility, unless, indeed, he had been sound asleep.

But Wild, who omitted no precaution to prevent a prisoner's escape, and knowing full well that sleeping on their lonely posts was a thing his men were much addicted to, he took measures to guard against this contingency by making it out of the question for anyone to open the iron door without waking him.

This he accomplished by connecting his seat in such a manner with the gate, that if he sat upon it, while the door was opened, he would inevitably fall to the ground, which circumstance, it is only fair to infer, could scarcely fail of having the desired effect of arousing him.

Beyond this iron gate again was the street-door, at which, as we have often had occasion to state, a man was invariably stationed.

The street-door was always fastened, and the listenings themselves were of such a complicated description, that anyone not acquainted with them, would have no small amount of difficulty in removing them.

Truly was Jonathan deserving of some amount of praise for the cunning steps he had taken to prevent the escape of those who might be unfortunate enough to fall into his clutches.

The contemplation of such obstacles would surely have the effect of daunting anyone. To hope to overcome such a complication of defences must be little short of madness.

From this it will be apparent, that though Jack had actually made his way out of his cell, and knew the means by which the secret door might be opened, yet he was a very long way indeed from having achieved his freedom.

CHAPTER XLIV.

FRESH OBSTACLES RISE UP BETWEEN THE PRISONERS AND FREEDOM.

THE longer Jack listened at the panel of the secret door, the more certain he became that there was no one in the passage on the other side of it.

"All's well!" he said, as he once more assumed a standing posture.

"Are you sure?" asked Sir Marmaduke, anxiously.

"Sure of what?"

"That all is well."

"Yes. At least, as well as we could expect. There is no one in the passage."

"Then all is well, surely."

"So far, I say, it is; but there are other circumstances which require to be taken into consideration."

"Speak—speak!" said Sir Marmaduke, over whom there came a fresh access of his former terror. "Let me hear the worst at once!"

"Do not agitate yourself, sir," said Jack. "You must, if you wish to succeed in the present enterprise, be calm and cool."

"You are right, my friend. Time was when I should have taken the lead in an affair like this; but my long sojourn here, deprived of light and the common necessities of life, as well as suffering the most horrible persecution, has completely shattered me."

"Not so—not so," replied Jack, soothingly. "You have borne up bravely against it all. It is only by chance you lose command of yourself, that is all."

"But what were you going to say when I allowed myself to be so foolishly overcome with apprehensive dread? Speak, and let me know all."

"It is principally this," said Jack. "You hear what an incessant din Wild makes?"

"I cannot fail to do so."

"This secret door, you understand, by fitting so closely in its setting as it doubtless does, prevents the sound from going further than where it is, but the moment we open that door to pass out, we cannot at the same time avoid the sound escaping also."

Sir Marmaduke was silent for a moment, and then he said—

"It is, indeed, a serious matter, and one deserving of deliberation, and yet how to prevent it I cannot tell."

"Nor I, because there is not the faintest hope of getting Wild to desist."

"You think not?"

"I am sure of it. The only thing we can do is to open the door, and pass out as quickly as possible."

"But let us do this as quickly as we will, we cannot prevent the noise reaching the ears of some of his men, who would, of course, surmise that something was amiss."

"I know all that. But what is to be done? We cannot stay here."

"That is quite evident. Could you not manage, think you, to cause Wild to desist for ever so short a time?"

Jack shook his head slowly.

"I fear not," he said.

"And yet it is worth a trial; because, if you could only devise some stratagem to keep him quiet for a few seconds, we should be all right, and he could hammer away then to his heart's content."

"But what stratagem can we adopt?"

"There I am at a loss. I can see only the necessity of one of some kind; for, from what you have said, I think it is pretty clear our discovery is inevitable if we open the door while he keeps making that noise."

"I can only think of one plan," said Jack, after a minute or two's thought, "and that is so defective that it is as bad as no plan at all."

"Let me hear it, my friend; perhaps I can furnish you with a hint or two."

"It is this. I thought of showing you how to open the door, and then myself going back to the cell door, and endeavour to get Wild into conversation. In the meantime, you would open the door and pass through it. As soon as you had done this, I would follow your example, and perhaps be able to shut the door before Wild quite recovered from his astonishment. What do you think of it?"

[BLUESKIN INTERPOSES BETWEEN EDGWORTH BESS AND JONATHAN WILD'S MYRMIDONS]

"Why, that it has every chance of answering our purpose; that is, if you can succeed in attracting Wild's attention for a minute or two."

"I fear he will see through the whole manœuvre, and, in consequence, make more noise than ever. Still, as it appears to be our last chance, I think it had better be tried."

"Oh! by all means. And now, my friend, how does the door open?"

"Without the least difficulty whatever. All you have got to do is to press upon this portion of the spring, and it flies open at once."

"I see."

"You think you will be able to manage it."

"Oh! yes."

"Then I am off. Above all, mind you take advantage of the very instant he desists, and open it and pass through. You may depend upon my being at your side immediately."

"Leave that to me," said Sir Marmaduke, and now to do your portion, which is by far the most difficult and hazardous."

Jack Sheppard did not wait to say anything further, but seeing that all the arrangements were made, he ran along the corridor to the door of Wild's cell, taking care to make plenty of noise in his progress.

The perseverance with which Wild continued his hammering at the door was really surprising.

But he had a deeper motive than Jack at all imagined. What that was will very quickly be apparent.

It is very doubtful whether Jonathan heard Jack's approach, but if he did, it is quite certain he took no sort of notice, but went on as though he was working for his life.

Now Jack, on the former occasion, had seen the extreme peril and impolicy of standing before the door while he knocked at it, and he determined not to run the risk of a chance bullet, if Jonathan had taken it into his head to fire another at random through the door.

Jack accordingly took up his station with his back against the wall, so that by reaching out his arm he could reach the door.

Sir Marmaduke watched his motions with the most feverish impatience.

Jack took from his pocket the clasp knife which had done him such good service at the "Grange."

It was a large and formidable-looking affair with a very large bone haft.

The baronet's impatience merged into curiosity.

But he soon saw to what purpose he was going to put his knife.

Holding it firmly in his hand, with the butt downwards, Jack extended his arm, and knocked loudly at the cell door.

The sharp rapping sound, which he thus produced, made itself heard above the din.

Wild heard it.

He stopped at once.

Making a rapid motion with one hand to Sir Marmaduke to open the door and get through it, Jack knocked again three times, distinctly and deliberately.

Then he waited for a reply.

It came in the shape of a wild animal sort of howl, which, even through the thick cell door, could be heard with tolerable plainness.

"Jonathan Wild!" said Jack, in a loud tone, and then, turning to Sir Marmaduke, he added, in an emphatic whisper, "Quick! quick! open the door!"

"I cannot," groaned the baronet, "the spring does not act."

"Curses!"

"It is quite firm! We are lost!"

Another howl came from Wild's cell.

He could tell something unusual was going on, but what it was he could not exactly make out.

Besides, his head was by no means in that clear condition that it usually was.

Jack had no other resource, so he tapped again.

"Jonathan Wild!" he said. "Jonathan Wild! Do you hear me speak?"

"Yes," Jack heard him reply. "Who is it? Let me out at once!"

From this speech it was pretty clear that Wild did not recognize Jack's voice.

At least, Jack thought so, but after all Jonathan might only be playing some deep game.

He was at a loss what to say.

"I will pretend I have not heard him, and ask him to speak again, and then be off."

At this moment Sir Marmaduke pressed upon the spring in the right manner, and the secret door flew open.

He passed through it instantly.

"What did you say?" cried Jack. "Speak louder, I cannot hear you!"

Then, in accordance with his plan, he did not stop to hear his reply, but ran swiftly, yet lightly, to the secret door, and closed it after him.

One difficulty was overcome.

Both the fugitives crouched as close to the wall then as they could, and listened.

All was still.

The darkness in the corridor was, to some extent, dispelled by a large iron oil lamp, which hung from the roof, near the centre of it.

Of course such a mode of illumination could not fail to throw many confusing and perplexing shadows, so that had anyone come by chance into the place, they would most likely have seen neither Jack nor his companion.

But as soon as he had assured himself that the coast was clear, the former hastened along the passage to the massive door at its termination.

This, had it not been for Jonathan's master key, would have been an insurmountable obstacle, but, as it was, it was nothing.

Jack hesitated a little before he put the key in the lock.

"For what do you wait?" asked Sir Marmaduke.

"I am unarmed," said Jack, "that is all."

"And I, too."

"I must find a weapon of some sort," said Jack. "I ought to have thought of that before."

"You have a knife. I saw you with it."

"I know I have, but that would only be useful against one assailant. It is some weapon like a sword that I want."

"Look!" said Marmaduke, "there is a wooden bar which fits across the cell doors. Would not that serve you?"

"It is the very thing."

"And the prisoners who may be here?"

"Oh! they are not of importance. The authorities are aware of this place, so that none would be confined here without good reason."

Jack, as he spoke, took from its setting one of the cross-bars of wood, which were used as an additional fastening to the doors of Wild's cells.

CHAPTER XLV.

JONATHAN WILD GETS DESPERATE INDEED.

In the hands of a desperate man like Jack Sheppard this bar of wood was a deadly weapon.

In length it was about five feet.

In breadth three.

It was formed of some very hard heavy wood.

Jack swung it round his head.

"Now I am prepared," he cried, "for all assailants. Take the key, Sir Marmaduke, and open the door."

For convenience and safety Jack had slipped the chain over his own head, and the baronet took it off.

"It will be the largest key," said Jack.

Sir Marmaduke inserted it in the keyhole.

The effort was almost beyond his strength, but he did manage to turn it.

The lock was well oiled, so that scarcely any sound was caused by the process.

It was an anxious moment when Jack, who went first, pushed the door open just wide enough to allow his slim anatomy to pass through.

The staircase before him was profoundly dark.

At the very top, however, he could see a faint gleam of light, which no doubt proceeded from the lamp in the hall.

Motioning to the baronet to follow him, with the utmost caution and silence Jack mounted the stairs.

He reached the top.

He crouched down and looked about him.

The iron door was within reach of his hand.

As usual a man was seated there.

He was very still.

Whether he slept or not Jack could not determine.

Having seen this, he proceeded to look yet further in advance of him, not only for the purpose of making himself familiar with the position of the different objects, but to see what else he had to contend against.

At the street door he could see the dim, shadowy form of the man on the lock.

On that night all was very still in and about Wild's house. Not a creature seemed stirring, and only at occasional intervals could be heard the rumbling sound produced by some vehicle in the street as it rolled past the house.

Jack fixed his eyes upon the door.

On the other side of it was freedom.

But to reach this he felt was all but an impossibility.

He felt assured that after that night's work everything in the shape of coalition was at an end between him and Wild.

The alliance had been but a brief one.

Henceforth Jack felt that Jonathan Wild and himself would be enemies.

He shuddered at the thought.

It was only for an infinitesimal space of time that this thought influenced him.

He was recalled to himself by the imperative necessity there was for instantaneous action.

Not only did his own safety depend upon the events of the next few moments, but his companion's also.

Sir Marmaduke crouched close beside him.

Jack held out his hand for Jonathan's master-key.

The baronet placed it in his grasp.

Then holding the wooden bar firmly in his left hand, and in such a position that he could, if need be, instantaneously seize it with his right. Jack Sheppard rose up like a ghost.

If the man who had charge of the iron-grated door had turned his head in the least degree he must have seen him.

But he did not.

Surely he must have slept.

With as much silence and secrecy as he could, Jack, with a beating heart, put the key into the lock.

He could not avoid making a slight noise. Besides, he was so excited that his whole body trembled.

Slowly, slowly, with a steady, constant motion, he turned the key round in the lock in the hope that he might unfasten it unheard.

But after going quietly for some time the lock, as he feared from its construction it would do, went back with a sharp snap.

The man who was sitting so close to him uttered a cry of dismay.

But Jack, with great promptitude, the moment the bolt of the lock went back in its socket, dashed the door violently and suddenly open.

The consequence was that the man, before he had time to escape, found himself almost crushed to death between the door and the wall, for Jack pushed with all his might.

The man who was on the lock, or in other words, who had charge of the street-door, set up a loud shout, and drawing a pistol from his belt, he shouted,—"Stand where you are, or I fire."

Jack saw now that all was discovered, and that he would have to fight his way to the street.

Sir Marmaduke kept behind him.

Whispering a word of encouragement, Jack, who had come to a halt upon the sudden command to do so, swung the heavy wooden bar round his head, and dashed forward.

The man on the lock was as good as his word, for he fired his pistol instantly.

But it was done too hurriedly for him to take an aim, and the bullet went with a crash through one of the balustrades of the staircase leading to the upper portion of the house.

Ere the echoes of the pistol-shot could die away, Jack reached this man, and with one terrific blow with the bar, laid him prostrate.

Then a terrible sound smote his ears.

It was a hideous howling cry, and such as some wild and ferocious denizen of the woods might be supposed to utter upon finding himself in the toils of the hunters.

Jack knew that there was but one human being who could give vent to such a sound.

That one was of course Jonathan Wild.

How he had got out of his cell he could not imagine, but that he had done so was a fact quite patent.

Quick as thought Jack turned to the fastenings of the door. Could he get them undone all would be well.

Jonathan Wild, with his huge hanger in his hand, rushed up the staircase.

Never before was he, or had he been, in such a state of infuriation.

Blood and foam were on his face.

His coat was torn in many places, his hat and wig were off, and his bald cranium had clots of blood upon it.

But though Jack did not know how the thief-taker had contrived to escape from the cell, there is no reason why the reader should remain in a similar state of ignorance.

Upon first awaking from the swoon induced by the blows he had received from Jack, Jonathan was quite at a loss to account for what had occurred.

In fact, his senses had only partially come to him.

He was, however, half conscious that hands were moving busily about his breast, and then perception failed him altogether.

That was when Jack had taken the key from him.

This time he soon aroused, nor was he long in coming to a correct conclusion as to the actual state of affairs.

The first thing his hands touched, as he placed them on the floor, to assist himself to rise, was his bludgeon.

Quite a gush of delight came over him at once more having in his grasp his favourite and bloodthirsty weapon.

In fact, the possession of it went further towards restoring him to his senses than aught else.

In the first blind fury of the moment, he rushed at the door and commenced battering at it.

But, finding what folly it was to exhaust himself in a way that could do him no good, and being struck with a new idea, he dropped the bludgeon, and drew with great rapidity the heavy hanger which he habitually carried at his side.

Then with this weapon he renewed his assault on the door.

Of course he now stood a much better chance of achieving some beneficial result than he had done before.

The sharp steel sank into the wood.

Chips flew about in all directions.

He bruised his hands against the oaken panel in his frantic haste, but he heeded it not.

The splinters struck him in the face, but he did not cease his labour for a moment.

One idea only was present to his mind, and that was to escape from the cell with as much speed as possible.

Horrible curses, levelled at Jack Sheppard, came from his lips.

And so he kept on until, as the reader is aware, Jack tapped at the door with the hilt of his clasp-knife.

That it was either of the prisoners he did not for a moment imagine. It was about the last thing they would be likely to do.

But when Jack left him, the suspicion entered his mind, and renovated by the brief rest he had had, he set about his work with redoubled energy.

The task he had set himself was to cut a large enough hole in the door for him to crawl through.

This, with the weapon he held, had he possessed sufficient command over himself, and set about it coolly, would not have taken one-fourth of the time it did.

But the desperate state of Jonathan's mind required just then that he should have some means of expending his superfluous strength.

Harder and harder, faster and faster, rained the blows upon the door, until, at last, he had the satisfaction of seeing into the passage.

Having once made a breach, the rest of the work was much easier, and he cut away the wood in long strips.

As soon as ever the hole was large enough, and, in fact, almost before it was, he began to crash through it.

It was in this way that his apparel got torn in the way it was.

He wriggled himself through, leaving behind him in the cell the best part of his coat.

He raised himself to his feet, and, then struck with a sudden thought, put his hand into his pocket and produced a flask.

From the strong odour which it spread around when he unscrewed the top it was pretty evident it contained brandy.

He placed it to his lips and took a long draught.

The alcohol had the effect of endowing him with thrice the strength he had possessed a moment before, and uttering a yell, he rushed along the passage to the secret door.

To one so well acquainted with its mechanism as he was, it took not a second to fling it open, and he dashed through.

Along the corridor through the massive door, which Jack had incautiously left open, instead of closing and locking as he ought to have done, and up the stone steps went Wild with undiminished speed.

Then he uttered that one frightful, howling yell, which was sufficient to strike dismay and terror into the hearts of all who heard it.

CHAPTER XLVI.

SHEPPARD AND THE BARONET MAKE A TEMPORARY STAY AT THE "JOLLY SAILORS."

THE state of affairs in the hall of Jonathan Wild's house was both peculiar and critical.

The report of the pistol as well as the cries of the man on the lock had the effect of rousing those members of the thief-taker's gang who happened to be indoors at the time, and they hastened with all the speed they could to the scene of action.

Jack Sheppard fumbled at the fastening of the door.

A chain which was twisted and knotted into many convolutions puzzled him.

At last it gave way.

But before he could introduce the key into the lock and open the door, Jonathan was upon him.

Wild held in one hand the hanger which had done him such good service, and in the other he held a pistol.

"Surrender," he yelled. "Surrender, or I'll shoot you where you stand."

"Never," said Jack, whirling the heavy wooden bar round his head. "Never, villain. Come on if you are tired of your life."

As he uttered these words Jack dropped the master-key upon the floor, and whispered to Sir Marmaduke—

"Quick—quick. Open the door. It is only locked now. Quick, I say, and all may yet be well. I will keep them at bay for a few moments."

The baronet stooped and possessed himself of the key.

"Drop that," roared Wild, as he saw the action.

"Drop that, Sir Marmaduke, or I fire."

But, paying no attention to what he said, Sir Marmaduke Osborn put the key in the lock.

Jonathan fired.

At the same instant three or four men rushed down the staircase.

Wild saw them.

"Fire!" he cried. "Shoot them both. Neither must escape. Fire, I say."

But ere the men could obey this order the baronet had unlocked the door and it swung open.

"Death and fury!" said Jonathan, rushing forward, but Jack met him with the wooden bar which he used in the fashion of a lance.

He caught Wild full in the chest, who, uttering a hideous groan, toppled backwards on to the floor.

"Fly, Sir Marmaduke," cried Jack, as he ran to the door. "Fly—fly—or we are lost."

The men on the stairs who had hesitated to fire when Wild interposed his body between them and their aim, now discharged their weapons.

But they were too late to effectuate anything.

In fact, the whole of these occurrences, so startling in their character, had happened so quickly that they hardly knew what they were about.

Indeed, although it has taken some time to relate, yet it would be no exaggeration to say that not more than a minute elapsed from the time Wild uttered the yell on the stairs until Jack and Sir Marmaduke rolled down the steps in front of Wild's house into Newgate-street.

Yes, rolled, for both lost their footing.

Jack grasped the baronet by the collar and raised him to his feet.

"Speak—speak," he said, hurriedly. "Are you hurt?"

"I fear so."

"Alas! alas!"

"Do not think of it. It is nothing."

"Can you bear up against it for a few moments? If you cannot we are lost indeed."

"I will do so."

"This way then," said Jack, and, lending all the assistance in his power, he dragged him round the corner into Newgate Market before Wild's men reached the doorstep.

At that silent hour of the night the old market was dark and deserted, but Jack was familiar with its intricacies, and he led his companion onwards with the greatest confidence.

In a minute or two they emerged into Warwick-lane, then a more disreputable and unsavoury thoroughfare than it is now, and Heaven knows that is needless.

Urging the baronet to make his utmost speed, Jack continued down Ave Maria-lane on to Ludgate-hill.

In this region all was still.

Dim and dark, and casting a huge shadow upon all about its base, was St. Paul's Cathedral.

Jack crossed over to the palings and there stopped.

"We may rest in safety now for a few minutes," he said. "We are, I think, out of immediate danger. Where are you wounded, Sir Marmaduke?"

The baronet was glad to cling to the iron church palings for support, as he said faintly,—

"It is nothing, absolutely nothing, my friend. I will just stay to recover breath, and then we will proceed."

"But," said Jack, who was far from satisfied with his comrade's assurance, "tell me where you were hit. Is it bleeding?"

"Only a little. The bullet from Wild's pistol has grazed my ear and cheek."

"Is that all?"

"It is. At first I thought I was seriously hurt, but I am glad to say it is no worse."

"Then all is well. It is too dark here for me to see, but there is a lamp at the corner of Paul's Chain. Cross over and let me look at the wound."

This Sir Marmaduke was nothing loath to do, and, taking hold of Jack's arm, they immediately proceeded in the direction Jack had indicated.

For the benefit of those who may not be conversant with that portion of the metropolis, it will, perhaps, be as well to state that Paul's Chain is the name of a very narrow turning leading from the south side of St Paul's Churchyard to the banks of the river Thames at a point about midway between Blackfriars and Southwark Bridges.

As Jack had stated, there was at the corner of this street one of those miserable oil lamps which, by a stretch of imagination, were supposed to illuminate the streets of London.

But so far from doing this they only served, by the perplexing shadows which they cast, to make the surrounding darkness appear all the more obscure.

When, however, Jack stood close under this lamp, there was just light enough for him to see his companion's face.

As Sir Marmaduke had said, the bullet had merely grazed the side of his face. It had cut through the upper portion of his ear and furrowed up the skin along his cheek.

"You are all right," said Jack. "The blood has congealed over it, and it has now ceased to bleed. In fact, it can scarcely have bled at all."

"I am glad to hear that," said Sir Marmaduke, "for I am sure I have no blood to spare."

"No, indeed. In fact, it is a mystery to me how you have contrived to bear up so long as you have."

"It was the will."

"But you speak but faintly now, sir."

"Do I?"

"You do, indeed."

"I cannot wonder at it, for I am almost exhausted. Can you hear nothing of Wild and his myrmidons?"

"Nothing."

"Then perhaps there would not be much danger in our resting somewhere, and getting some refreshment."

"Very little. I was about to propose the same thing."

"But it is late. Where shall we find a place open?"

"Down nearer to the river's side, doubtless. But Sir Marmaduke, if you will take my advice, you will, with as little delay as possible, make your way homeward."

"That is what I should wish."

"Where is your abode?"

"At Tilburyness."

"Tilburyness? That is on the river bank, surely."

"It is, but it is some thirty miles from here."

"Make your way there at once. If you will be guided by me you will go by water."

"Why so?"

"Chiefly because you are more likely to elude Wild than if you went by road, besides which, in your present state, travelling by water would be best adapted for you, since it would be the easiest mode of transit."

"You are right."

"You may depend," said Jack, "that a terrible reaction will take place after this, and it therefore behoves you to be more than usually careful."

"Thanks, my young friend, for your caution! I will remember it."

During this brief dialogue, the pair had made their way at an easy pace down the street.

"We shall surely come to a public-house before long," said Jack, "where they have not yet retired to rest. We will halt there and take some light refreshment, for it would be most injudicious on your part now to make either a hearty meal, or partake of any strong liquors."

"I am well aware of that. A little bread soaked in wine and water will be, I should think, the best thing I can have."

"Undoubtedly."

"But," said Sir Marmaduke, after a moment's pause, "with regard to my getting to Tilbury."

"Well?"

"It is, as you must be aware, highly necessary that I should start off at once, and at this hour of the night, how are we to find a conveyance?"

"That will be difficult, no doubt, but we must see. If the public-house is anywhere near the water, the landlord will sure to be able to furnish us with every information."

"Of course—of course!"

"Come on then, sir. Let the recollection of the frightful perils we have passed through nerve you to fresh exertion. It is no slight thing to escape from the clutches of Jonathan Wild."

"It is not, as you say. And that brings more forcibly to my mind the value of the assistance you have rendered me. Not only have you freed me, but also obtained that document, which I was foolish and wicked enough to sign."

"The thought of having thwarted Jonathan Wild in one of his atrocious schemes, is for me a sufficient reward."

"I shall, though, feel offended and much grieved if you will not permit me to give you some tangible token of my gratitude for your exertions in my behalf. You are the saviour of myself from an ignominious death, my possessions from exheredation, and my family from want and ruin. In return for these inestimable services, the least you can do is to allow me, since I have the means of doing so, of seeing to your future welfare."

"To refuse the acceptance of your generous offer, Sir Marmaduke," said Jack Sheppard, in tones of deep emotion, "would not only be churlish but ungrateful. Heaven knows I have need of some strong hand to hold me back from the frightful doom towards which I seemed to be hurried along by the force of a malignant destiny."

CHAPTER XLVII.

THE FUGITIVES MEET WITH A SLIGHT SURPRISE.

SIR MARMADUKE OSBORN was not a little surprised at hearing such a speech from the lips of his companion, and he turned his eyes towards him with an inquiring glance.

But in the dark and narrow thoroughfare in which they were it was impossible for him to do more than just distinguish the dark outline of Jack's countenance.

"I rejoice," he replied, "not at you are so in need of help, but because it affords me an opportunity of showing you how highly I estimate your conduct in this affair. Throughout you have manifested a spirit of perfect unselfishness, a quality which is as rare as it is admirable."

Sir Marmaduke was quite right there. Whatever Jack's failings and vices may have been, he was truly and thoroughly unselfish, and so high a trait of character as that is sufficient to redeem many of his shortcomings.

But as the reader cannot fail to have seen, Jack Sheppard was purely a creature of circumstances, and it is by no means surprising that he should have imbibed the notion that he was urged onwards, without reference to his own volition, by fate or destiny.

But somehow he shrank from letting the conversation turn upon himself, so he hastened to change the theme.

"You speak louder than you did a little while ago. Do you feel better?"

"I spoke louder, my kind young friend, because of the spirit which actuated me. Believe me, my utmost wish now is to place you in a different and worthier position than that which you at present seem to occupy."

"Accept my thanks, sir, then for all that you have promised. But I must remind you that we are by no means out of danger. Jonathan Wild is not a man to go to sleep in such a case as this. You may depend he will try his utmost to get us once more in his power."

"I have more trust in heaven, and in the wisdom and evenhandedness of His dispensations, than to think that it would permit so base a villain to be triumphant, unless," he added, with a sigh, "unless it was by crowning all he did with success to make his downfall more bitter and tremendous."

"But that, to my notions," said Jack, "we should not be right."

"Why not?"

"It seems to me a very insufficient reason for allowing others to suffer so much misery. I know yours is the view the religious people take of such things, but I look upon it in a very different light indeed, and Providence, so far from being a beneficent power, is in reality an evil one, and rejoices more in bringing men to sorrow than it does in bringing them to joy."

"Those," said Sir Marmaduke, gravely, "are atheistic sentiments. They jar upon me. If you wish me to think well of you you will banish such opinions, which more befit a miscreant like Jonathan Wild than such as I would fain believe you are."

"At last!" said Jack, suddenly.

"What do you mean by that ejaculation?" asked the baronet, in tones of the utmost surprise.

"Why," replied Jack, "that we have reached that which we were seeking. Look before you on the right, and you will see a faint beam of light."

"I see it; and is that a public-house?"

"It is."

"How can you tell from this distance? You may be mistaken."

"No."

"You are confident?"

"I am, and for the best of all reasons."

"What is it?"

"I know the neighbourhood; I have had occasion to come here many a time. I did not know they kept open so late, but that light which you see proceeds from the front room of 'The Jolly Sailors.'"

"Is that the name of the house?"

"Yes; and that is all I know about it. I have noticed it as I passed, but I have never crossed its threshold."

A few steps sufficed to bring them to the doorway of the ancient hostelry.

The door was closed.

Jack knocked at it boldly.

Nearly five minutes elapsed before they heard the bolts withdrawn.

Then the door only opened to the extent of a few inches. It was stopped by an iron chain.

"We are travellers needing rest and refreshment for an hour or so," replied Jack to the gruff interrogatory of "Who was there?"

The man at the door was apparently satisfied with the reply, for he let fall the chain, and allowed the door to open.

"We are obliged to be careful at night," he said, "for so many desperate characters are about."

"I suppose so," said Jack, "but you see, my friend here, who is a gentleman, has been set upon and maltreated by thieves, and is at the present moment almost dying from the effects of the ill-usage he has received."

The man looked suspiciously at Sir Marmaduke and Jack, and well he might. Their appearance was quite sufficient to make him do so.

But Sir Marmaduke himself stepped forward.

There was a grace and dignity about him, as with an effort he drew himself up to his full height, which was visible through his tattered dress and disfigured features.

"You have no just ground for suspicion," he said, "though I am free to admit that our appearance is more than sufficient to excite it. But we have suffered frightfully. I wish to make no secret of my name. It is Osborn—Sir Marmaduke Osborn of Farleigh Priory, Tilburyness."

The man, who was really the landlord of the "Jolly Sailors," looked for a moment the picture of incredulity, but was visibly impressed, both upon the countenance and manner of Sir Marmaduke, as well as in the tones of his voice, that it was not possible for him to mistake them.

"Walk this way, sir," he said, respectfully. "You shall have every attention while you are beneath my roof."

"Our stay must be a very short one. It is imperatively necessary for many and important reasons, that I should reach my home with the least possible delay. Can you tell me of any means by which I may go down the river?"

"I dare say it can be managed," said the landlord, "as he ushered them into a large room where several nautic-looking men were seated. "What would you like?"

"Some hot wine and water, with a slice of bread sopped in it," said Sir Marmaduke. "I dare not partake of aught else. What will you have?" he added, turning to Jack.

"Anything you like."

"We have some cold beef," said the landlord.

"Bring that then," said Jack, "and a glass of hot brandy and water."

The landlord quitted the room to obey their orders.

The other occupants regarded Jack and his companion with the utmost surprise, but there was something in the countenance of the baronet that made it quite out of the question for them to offer him any rudeness.

The landlord returned with great expedition, and then Sir Marmaduke said—

"When I have eaten this, I should be glad if you would show us to a room where I can wash, myself, and bathe my wound. You see I have had a near touch."

"You have, indeed," said the landlord, obsequiously; "but you said something about starting to Tilbury."

"Yes. I wish to do so as soon as I am ready, which will be in less than an hour's time. Can you, do you think, find anyone to take us? Your guests here appear sailors by their dress."

"They are, but you must be aware it would be quite impossible to run such a distance as that."

"I know it. I want them to take me as far below bridge as they can, where doubtless I shall meet with some vessel which is about sailing down the river."

"If that is your intent, I think I can oblige you."

"How?"

"Four of the men here belong to a vessel that trades between London-bridge and Hamburg, where she is now at anchor. They intend to leave here at daybreak, and pull down the river, when they will at once set sail. The one you see nearest to the fireplace is the captain."

Sir Marmaduke and Jack looked in the direction indicated, and saw a man with a cheerful, good-tempered-looking countenance, complacently smoking a long clay pipe.

"Do you think," said the baronet, "that the offer of ten pounds would be sufficient to induce him to set off a few hours earlier than he intended and put me ashore at Tilbury?"

"I will call him here and ask him," said the landlord, "with your permission."

"Do so, do so."

The landlord beckoned with his finger, and the captain at once left his seat and came towards them.

The others looked on curiously, but the conversation had been carried on in too low a tone for them to hear a word of it.

"What cheer, messmate?" asked the captain.

"This gentleman and his companion," replied the landlord, "are very anxious to get down the river before daylight, and they want to know whether, in consideration of a ten-pound note, you would mind starting at once, and putting them ashore at Tilbrynness."

"Your honour's humble servant to command," he said, addressing himself to Sir Marmaduke. "I am ready and willing, too, for it is not often a sailor has a chance of making ten pounds."

"Very well then," replied the baronet, who had finished his bread and wine. "I am just going to wash the blood from my face and have my wound attended to, and then I shall be ready."

"All right, your honour. I'll be off at once. You'll find the boat at the bottom of the steps here. There may be one or two others, so when you get to the landing, call out, Ringdore—that's the name of my little craft, you must know—and we will reply at once."

Upon this understanding they separated.

It took Sir Marmaduke but a few minutes to make himself ready. The wound itself was scarcely worthy of the name, and all that was done to it was to sponge it clean with some warm water, and apply a little plaster.

This done, they, under the landlord's guidance, betook themselves to the landing-steps, which was situated just where St. Paul's pier is now.

The night was light, and when they turned the corner of the street in which stood "The Jolly Sailors," they could see the river, and the numerous boats at their moorings with great distinctness.

"Ringdore," said the landlord.

"Ay, ay, sir," was the reply. "Here you are!"

There were two boats at the bottom of the steps.

In one could be seen four dark forms.

Jack put a guinea into the landlord's hand, and then descending the steps, proceeded to assist his companion into the boat.

But while he was thus engaged he was startled by the sudden appearance of three other men, who made their way down the steps towards the other boat.

"Here you are, your honour; the best boat on the river, sir!"

"Curse you!" said a growling voice. Hold your row, and push off at once!"

"Jonathan Wild!" said Jack, as he sprang into the boat. "Row for your lives—row! Get free from him, and you shall have, not ten pounds, but fifty! Quick! Oh! quick, or we are lost!"

CHAPTER XLVIII.

JONATHAN WILD TURNS DOCTOR, AND UNDERGOES A LITTLE DISCIPLINE.

THE altogether unexpected appearance of Jonathan Wild was not, as Jack fancied, owing to his having traced them, but owing to a purely fortuitous circumstance.

To account for it, however, we must go back a little way.

It will be recollected that the last we saw of him was when, by one well-directed thrust, Jack prostrated him to the ground.

Two of his men at once stooped down and raised him to his feet, while the other two started off in pursuit of the fugitives.

But, as they had already turned the corner to the market, their prey was no longer in sight, nor was there anything to give them a clue as to the route they had taken.

Therefore they had to trust to chance entirely, and, as they fancied down the Old Bailey was the way they were likeliest to go, they set off in that direction at full speed.

Of course there search was resultless.

Full an hour elapsed before Jonathan recovered.

In fact, so death-like did he look, that Levee went out for an apothecary, who was in the habit of dressing Wild's wounds.

This man, whose name was Ebenezer Snoxall, lived at the corner of Skinner-street.

On his arrival, his first care was to dress Wild's wounds, before he attempted to revive him, for he knew how very violent he was apt to be.

He shook his head gravely and uttered such exclamations as "Hum! ha!" during the process.

At last Jonathan looked something like himself, so Mr. Snoxall held some pungent essence under his nostrils, which caused him to open his eyes at once.

He glared about him for some seconds, and clasped his hands over his head.

There was a horrible humming noise in that region, accompanied with the most splitting headache that could be conceived.

"Don't worry yourself, Mr. Wild," said the apothecary, in croaking accents peculiar to him. "You will require a long rest before you get over this. You will, indeed."

"Who are you?" roared Wild, springing up to a sitting posture.

"Murder!" said Mr. Snoxall, "murder!" Then he added, in defiance of grammar, "It's me—it's me."

The cloud about Jonathan's brain was gradually dispersing.

He remembered the voice of the apothecary.

He laid down again, and strove to think.

"Ha!" he cried, as he remembered what had taken place. "Blue—Blueskin, I say."

"He's not come in, if you please, Mr. Wild," said Levee, opening the door just wide enough to admit his head.

"Where's Sheppard and that—that old man with him. Caught and put back in their cells, of course. Ha! ha! they shall pay dearly for this prank."

Levee hesitated.

"What now, villain? Where are they?"

Jonathan's face assumed a bloodthirsty expression.

"Now pray don't excite yourself, Mr. Wild, pray don't," said the apothecary; "the consequences will be serious if you do. You will bring on brain fever."

"Silence," said Wild, as he carried his hand to his pistol.

"Yes, Mr. Wild, oh! yes," said Mr. Snoxall, precipitately retreating to the most distant corner in the room.

"Now, villain," yelled Wild, turning towards Levee, "why do you hesitate?"

"Hicks and Noble, if you please, Mr. Wild!"—

"Well?"

"They have pursued them."

"Ah!"

"But I don't know whether they have found them."

"Fifty pounds!—a hundred pounds for whoever brings them to me dead or alive! Do you hear that? a hundred pounds! a hundred pounds—pounds!"

Wild reeled and would have fallen to the floor had not Mr. Snoxall darted forward and saved him.

"Calm yourself, Mr. Wild, or I can't answer for the consequences. Calm yourself, Mr. Wild, I beg."

"Brandy!" roared Jonathan, recovering from the vertigo which had seized him; "brandy! brandy!"

"No, no, Mr. Wild," remonstrated the son of Galen; "no, no, it would be certain death to you to drink brandy."

"Am I master here? Brandy, I say. Ha! that is well."

Levee had taken from a cupboard in the room a bottle of brandy.

Jonathan took it with a smile of satisfaction, and placing it to his lips, drank off the greater portion of it. The apothecary stared aghast.

Wild drew a long breath, and then he said,—

"Fetch me some more clothes instantly, and a hat and wig."

Levee flew, rather than ran, to do his tyrannical master's bidding, and a few minutes after he had returned, Jonathan strode out into the hall, presenting something of his ordinary appearance.

But though he carried things off with a high hand, he was in reality suffering the most intolerable agony from the hurts he had received.

He had a purpose in view.

Just as he reached the hall the front door was opened, and the two men, Hicks and Noble, entered.

"Well?" said Wild.

"We can't find nothink of them, Mr. Wild."

"Curse you both! After them again. I wouldn't have them escape for a thousand pounds. Curses! You shall have a hundred a-piece if you bring them back, dead or alive."

"We're off, Mr. Wild."

"The two men were only too glad to avail themselves of this loop-hole to get out of the reach of his brutality. Wild's head pained him dreadfully.

A rather desperate remedy came into his mind.

"Levee," he said, in a milder tone than he had yet used. "Come with me. I want you."

Trembling in every limb, for he did not know what evil to apprehend from Wild's pacific demeanour, Levee followed him into the little yard at the back of the premises.

There was a pump here which supplied those in the house with water, and Jonathan walked straight up to it.

"Levee," he said, "I have had my head knocked about a good deal."

"You have, Mr. Wild."

"How do you know I have, villain?"

"Mr. Snoxall, if you please."

"Bah!"

"Yes, Mr. Wild."

"Now, look here. If I put myself in his care, I shall be laid up for a month, so I am going to try a cure of my own."

"Yes, Mr. Wild."

"I am going to hold my head under the pump."

"The pump, Mr. Wild?" repeated Levee, incredulously.

"Yes, blockhead, and when I do, you begin to pump the water upon it. Very slowly at first, until at last you get up to full speed, and don't stop till I tell you to do so."

Levee walked to the pump in anything but an enviable frame of mind. He knew his master's vicious temper, and that there was every reason, if he valued his skin, to be particularly careful.

Jonathan put his head under the spout.

Levee began at first very gently, and gradually increased.

The pain which the falling water occasioned was so great that Jonathan almost uttered a shriek of pain, but he controlled that impulse. He knew that the result of the treatment he was undergoing would be a complete immunity from pain afterwards.

Jonathan kept his head under for five minutes good, and then he snatched it away and stood upright.

He was wonderfully better—well, indeed, in comparison to what he had been.

So well satisfied was he that he resolved to try the pump discipline a second time.

This time, of course, he did not feel it so much, and when he rose, with the exception of a kind of numbness, he felt that all pain had gone.

He returned to the hall.

"Send out all the men," said Wild, "in pursuit. I cannot go myself, because I have even more particular business under hand."

What that business was the reader will speedily learn.

It will be recollected that after Lord Ingestrie's interview with him that morning, another visitor had been announced.

What actually passed between them it is not necessary to relate. Its results will be seen in Wild's actions.

That it was no slight matter may be gathered from the fact of his abandoning the search for his two prisoners, and delegating that important matter to his subordinates.

The fearful punishment which he had received, too, was not sufficient to make him postpone its execution.

Jonathan Wild entered his office, and, going straight to his desk, unlocked it, and took out the blood-bedappled diamond tiara, which he had taken from the coffin of the bride.

The business then was in connection with that.

Hastily cramming it into his pocket, Wild left the office, and, after giving a few more orders, made his way into the street.

The continued absence of his lieutenant, Joseph Blake, or Blueskin, as he was called, puzzled and alarmed him. He knew not what to think of so extraordinary a circumstance.

Wild went to the corner of the Old Bailey, and looked about him for some conveyance.

A hackney-coach came blundering along.

He hailed it, and told the man to drive to the nearest stairs where he could get a boat.

"St. Paul's-stairs," said the jarvey, "ain't the nearest eggzactly, but you're more likelier to get a boat there than at Blackfriars."

"Drive to St. Paul's-stairs then, in the devil's name, and make haste about it."

The clumsy vehicle rumbled over the stones.

The swaying and jolting made Wild's head none the better, nor had his reflections a soothing effect upon him.

"Curse that Sheppard!" he said. "He's as bad as his father was before him. I can do no good with either. He'll come to the same end, that's clear. Curse him! He shall suffer for the pains I am enduring. Sir Marmaduke, too. Just as I had accomplished that which had given me so much trouble. To have it snatched from me. The paper, too. Oh! they would like that, of course. Curse them both. As sure as my name is Jonathan Wild they shall rue this day."

At this moment the coach stopped.

"Here's a public-house, sir, where the watermen waits. Shall I tell them there's a job?"

"Yes; and be quick."

The man entered the house, which was only two streets off the "Jolly Sailors," and found there two men, who went down to the landing steps with Wild in the manner we have recorded.

CHAPTER XLIX.

JACK SHEPPARD AND SIR MARMADUKE OSBORN GET OUT OF SIGHT OF JONATHAN WILD, BUT BY NO MEANS OUT OF DANGER.

AND so after all it appears that the presence of Jonathan Wild at St. Paul's-stairs was entirely owing to one of those cross accidents and chance coincidences which occasionally happen.

Had Jack Sheppard only have had sufficient mastery over himself to remain quite quiet, instead of shouting out in the way he did, it is probable enough they would have pushed off into the stream undetected.

But as it was Jonathan recognised the voice, as the roar of anger and astonishment he gave sufficiently evidenced.

"After those in that boat," he cried. "Keep them in sight, and you shall have fifty pounds reward! They are traitors to the state! and I am Jonathan Wild, the holder of a warrant for their apprehension."

"All right, sir," said the two watermen. "We'll do it, won't we, Bill?"

"In course we will. That fifty's as good as earned, sir, I can tell you."

"After uttering the shout he did, Jack sprang into the boat, and the men, animated by his words, at once pushed off, and urged by eight oars, sped over the waves at a frightful rate.

Sir Marmaduke Osborn, when he heard the voice of his implacable, and, as he at that moment thought, omnipresent enemy, fell back into the boat in a swoon.

A very few words from Jack to the captain sufficed to put the latter into full possession of the facts of the case.

There was no mistaking the truthful manner in which Sheppard spoke. It went direct to the captain's heart.

His whole sympathies were naturally attracted towards Sir Marmaduke, and he cried to his men—

"Row! row like devils! Get out of sight of those in the other boat. Cheerily, cheerily! You," he added to Jack, "had better see to your friend. He has fallen backwards in a swoon."

Stimulated by the large sum of money Jonathan had offered them to keep the other boat in sight, the two men made the most incredible exertions.

Wild, however, was clear-headed enough to see that anything in the shape of an attack just then would be madness.

All he could hope to do, and scarcely that, was not to lose sight of them, but follow in their wake wherever they might go.

He would then be able to set his men on the track.

Like two spectral vessels, in that dim and misty light, went the two boats; but gradually, Wild could see, despite the desperate efforts the two men who were rowing him made, that they were falling rapidly into the rear.

"On—on," he cried. "Keep them in sight, keep them in sight, and the money shall be yours—ay, double the amount! Can't you get assistance anywhere?"

"I fear not, sir," replied the waterman who was seated next to Wild. "We'll keep them in sight if such a thing is possible. We might be able to get them stopped at the bridge."

"Try—try! They are traitors both!"

London-bridge could now be seen lowering in the distance. All, however, was dark upon it. Not a single ray of light peeped forth.

"We shall lose them in the shadow of the bridge!" exclaimed Wild, as he saw the boat he was pursuing disappear in the obscurity. "It has gone!"

"All right, sir," said the waterman. "We shall come in sight of it again on the other side."

With this assurance Wild was obliged to rest content.

Fortunately the tide was running out, which made their progress all the easier and more rapid.

London-bridge was gained, and the boatmen shipping their oars, the boat darted through it with great velocity. Wild looked eagerly about him.

The mass of shipping in the pool confused his vision. "Where is the boat?" he yelled. "Where is it? I cannot see it anywhere."

The waterman paused a moment, and glanced keenly ahead.

"Where is it, I say?" asked Wild, again, after the lapse of a few seconds. "Where is it?"

"Gone, sir; gone, as I'm a man!"

"A man!" said Wild, "a fool, an ass, an idiot, you mean."

"You'd best be civil, Mr. What's-your-name, or I'll jump me if I don't cast you overboard."

"Peace!" said Wild, mastering himself with a great effort. "Peace! They have doubtless got on board one of the many craft hereabouts, and if so all search after them will be useless. You shall be well paid for your night's work. Row on, with all speed, to Wapping, as at first arranged."

Wild flung himself back in the boat as he spoke.

His mind was in such a state of turmoil as defies all attempts of description. Everything had gone wrong with him. What did it portend? He, who had hitherto succeeded always in what he undertook, to have every one of his projects thwarted. It was strange indeed.

The boat, propelled by the lusty strokes of the two oarsmen, glided swiftly onwards.

"Wapping, sir," said the boatmen. "Where will you land?"

"Nowhere. Put me on board that lugger there with her sails spread, and then wait. I shall want you to take me back."

"Ay—ay, sir," said the men.

"Boat ahoy!" cried a man on board the lugger.

"All right, coming on board."

A beam of light from a powerful lantern was now directed upon the boat. It fell upon the countenance of the villainous thief-taker, who was instantly recognised, and a rope thrown for him to ascend by.

It was not the first time by some hundreds that Wild had visited this boat, and he climbed on deck with more agility than one would have thought such an unwieldy man possessed.

As soon as he stood on board, Wild said, in a low tone, to the man who had hailed him—

"Where's the skipper?"

"In his berth, sir. Shall I tell him you want him?"

"Yes, and look sharp, for I have not a moment to spare."

"Very good, sir."

Wild strolled along the deck of the little vessel, and looked about him with a critical eye.

As the reader has no doubt already suspected, this was the boat Wild employed to carry over to Holland and Belgium such property as he could not dispose of in England.

In a few minutes Jonathan was joined by a stout, burly-looking man, who had huddled on some part of his apparel.

"What is it, Mr. Wild, what is it?"

"Oh! that's you, Schilder, is it? Here."

Schilder, who was the man in command of the lugger, walked by Wild's side to listen to his orders.

"Are you all ready to sail?"

"At any moment, Mr. Wild."

"Get ready, then, at once; you must be off."

"Is there danger?"

"There is; and it is all the greater since you ought to have started off hours ago."

"Indeed."

"Curses on them, I have been detained by two villains I had in custody. Never mind, they shall suffer for it. Here is a diamond tiara which you must dispose of."

"Good."

"Secrete it somewhere on board in case you should be overhauled, which I think more than likely."

"Yah! yah! Mr. Wild, trust me for that."

"Get a good price, Schilder."

"What is its value, Mr. Wild—actual value?"

"Over two thousand pounds."

"Der teufel."

"You must get as much as you can. It ought to realize something handsome. Above all, be careful, for there has been a devil of a row about it. One of the parties came to me this morning, and from what passed then I judged it to be most advisable to part with it at once."

"Very good, Mr. Wild. Have you any further instructions?"

"None, Schilder—none at all."

"Very good; then I am quite ready, and at your service."

"That is well."

"You don't seem very well, Mr. Wild."

"I'm not, Schilder; I'm not. I have had enough hard knocks to kill any ordinary man, but I am alive, you see—alive."

"Yes, Mr. Wild. But you seem to have quite lost your spirits."

"They shall suffer for it when I regain them. You understand, Schilder?"

[JACK SHEPPARD AND BLUESKIN ENCOUNTER JONATHAN WILD.]

"Precisely."
 "I intended to have freighted you with some more goods, but they must wait until next time. What have you for a cargo?"
 "Dutch cheeses, as usual."
 "Then mind. It is by no means certain, but I think there is a strong probability that you will be overhauled before you pass the Nore, so be prepared for such an event."
 "Do not fear, Mr. Wild. You can rest quite easy upon that score."
 "Be it so. You must take care not to excite suspicion by delaying to bring-to if you are signalled."
 "I will attend to all that, Mr. Wild. You need not trouble at all."
 "I am anxious."
 "I know you are, but you can depend upon my taking it to the best market, and getting a good price for it."
 "Then I will go, Schilder."
 "Shall I put you ashore, Mr. Wild?"

"No, I have a boat waiting for me."
 "Very good."
 The skipper assisted Jonathan into the little wherry. The two men, who had had long enough rest to recover from their fatigue, cast off, and rowed swiftly. But ere they were a hundred yards from the lugger, another boat shot out into the stream, and a voice cried—
 "Pull up there, and let us come alongside. We command you in the king's name!"
 Wild looked behind him, and saw a dark figure standing up in the boat.
 "The Thames police," he muttered. "I would not have them know of my visit to the lugger for the world."
 Then turning to the two watermen, who had naturally, upon hearing such a command, shipped their oars, he cried—
 "Row for your lives. Those are not the police, but pirates. They fancy, no doubt, I carry a rich booty. Row—row, and you shall have your own price."

CHAPTER L.

JONATHAN WILD HAS A NARROW ESCAPE FROM THE PISTOLS OF THE THAMES POLICE.

"Ay—ay! sir, that's your sort!" responded the watermen. "Pull away, Bill; we shall make a good night's work of this."

"You will," said Wild, "if you will only take care what you are doing. Don't allow yourself to be overhauled by them."

"Oh! trust to us, your honour."

Wild shook his head.

"You said that when you were in chase of the other boat, and now where is it?"

The men were silent.

But they pulled all the harder at the oars.

"Stop your boat," said the voice again; "stop your boat, in the king's name! The Thames police want to come alongside of you!"

"On! on!" said Wild. "On! on!"

"Once more, like some huge cloud of vapour, old London Bridge came in sight.

The tide was now just at the turn, which made the passage of the arches a matter of no small difficulty, unless they went slowly and carefully through.

But Jonathan would not suffer the men to relax their speed.

It was running a risk, but he felt that doing so was giving him a chance of escape from his pursuers.

The boat shot under the arch with great velocity.

But just as it reached the piers a cross eddy caught it, and before the watermen were aware even of the circumstance, dashed the boat against the stonework.

A curse came from the lips of all three at this accident.

The pursuing boat gained on them, for it was full two minutes after they fouled before they could get clear.

Then one of the watermen standing up in the boat pushed them off.

At this moment those in the boat behind cried to them to surrender, and the one who stood in the prow fired a pistol.

In the darkness, however, it was without effect.

Jonathan crouched himself into the stern of the boat, which now being disengaged was propelled with great rapidity over the smooth water above bridge.

But the Thames police, for such they were, found the conduct of those on board of the boat full of suspicion.

They had seen them leave in a hurried manner one of the moored vessels.

At that time robberies from boats at anchor in the river were of constant occurrence. Indeed, to such an extent were the depredations carried, that a special body of police was organized, whose duty it was to scrutinize all craft upon the river that presented a suspicious appearance.

They had challenged Wild's boat, and the circumstance of no notice whatever being taken, seemed to show that this time their suspicions were well grounded.

Having been recently set about the work, they were anxious to show, if they had an opportunity, their efficiency, and this was an excellent chance.

Of course, if Wild had chosen to avow who he was, that would have been sufficient, but he was especially desirous to keep secret, if possible, his presence on the river on that particular night.

In the contingency of suspicion being in any way directed against him, it would be well to make out that he had received such injuries as to make it a matter of impossibility for him to go abroad.

A keen wind swept over the surface of the river, but Jonathan felt grateful for it; it cooled the feverish excitement of his brain.

The distance between the boats was now about the same as it was in the outset, though the probabilities were all against Jonathan maintaining it much longer.

"Get closer to the shore," he said, "so as to run in suddenly, and land me. I will make off, and you can tell them that you rowed in by my orders; say I said they were pirates in pursuit."

Pirates was the term applied to those who plundered the craft upon the river.

"Ay, ay, sir. We'll manage that. Where would you be landed?"

"Anywhere. It does not matter in the least, so that I get a few minutes' start of the rascals in that other boat."

"It's like their infernal impudence to cry out that they are the Thames police."

"That is the device they use, and a good one it is to get vessels to allow them to come alongside, and then they board them without difficulty."

The police-galley kept very pertinaciously in their rear.

"Have you a spare oar?" asked Wild, as he glanced behind him, and saw how close his pursuers were upon him. "If you have, give it to me, and I will help."

"We haven't one, sir. You get ready to spring ashore. We shall land you directly."

During the last few moments, the watermen had been directing the course of the boat obliquely towards the bank.

At last, with a sudden rush they reached the spot whence they had set out, namely, St. Paul's-steps.

"You will find ample payment for your night's work on the seat of the boat," said Wild, as he sprang on to the slippery stairs, and in a moment disappeared in the darkness of the night.

"Tim," said one of the watermen.

"Yes, mate."

"This is a precious rum start, isn't it?"

"It is."

"I can't make it out at all. Is the money on the seat?"

"Yes, here it is. A good heavy purse, too."

"So much the better. Now, mate, here comes the police-galley, for police-galley it is, in spite of all Mr. Wild's nonsense about their being pirates. What shall we say?"

"I don't know, I leaves it to you."

"Very well. Then I say don't make an enemy of Jonathan Wild, because if you do he is pretty sure to get you hung at Tyburn before you are many weeks older."

"Oh, lor!"

"Now we have been well paid, and we had better be content and keep his secret. He did not want them to know he was on the water to-night, and we won't say nothing about it."

"Boat there!" cried a loud voice.

"Ay, ay."

There was a grating noise as the police-galley came alongside.

A bull's-eye lantern was unmasked, and its beams directed upon the wherry.

"Who are you?"

"Watermen, your honour."

"Where's your badge?"

"Here."

"Oh! that's all right. Now, why didn't you heave-to when we called to you?"

"Because our fare told us you were river pirates, after him."

"Pshaw! and you believed him?"

"Of course we believed the gemman; didn't we Tim?"

"In course."

"Well, harkye, my fine fellows; I'm superintendent of the Thames police, and I have got your badge. Now, if anything turns out to have taken place on the river to-night, you will have to answer for it. Push off."

The police-galley shot out again into the river.

"I'm blest," said Tim, "if you ain't put us in for a good thing."

"What do you mean?"

"We shall be transported, that's certain."

"Not a bit of it."

"Well, you see."

"No we are in no danger, let what will happen, for, don't you see, Jonathan Wild will be sure to get us off to prevent our saying anything about his being on the river to-night."

"Oh! ah! I see."

"We're quite safe, and now let us go back to the 'Commodore's Head,' and have a drop o' summit hot and strong."

Jonathan, when he sprang upon the steps, made his way as quickly as he could through the mass of streets between the river and Ludgate-hill.

But in a very few moments, on finding himself unpursued, he abated his speed, and shaped his course for Newgate-street.

Muttering the most diabolical curses, he made his way along the Old Bailey.

"He shall hang!" he said, and he clenched his fists tightly as he spoke; "he shall hang, curse him! Does he think it nothing to cross me in my schemes? He shall rue what he has done, most bitterly rue it! Blueskin, too—my most faithful follower—he has weaned him from me! His absence looks suspicious, too. He must be disposed of; not by the rope, though. He knows too much. He must be put out of the way quietly!"

It was wonderful how coolly Jonathan looked at taking away a life. He spoke of it, and resolved upon it, as the most commonplace thing in the world. For the credit of humanity be it said, there have been few men so bad as Jonathan Wild.

He turned the corner into Newgate-street, and in a few minutes reached his own door. In obedience to long habit he put his hand into the breast of his waistcoat for his master key, and then he recollected Jack Sheppard had taken it from him.

The volley of oaths that came from his lips was something awful, and seizing the heavy knocker in his hand, he brought it down with such violence as almost to split the panel.

"What do you —?" said a voice fiercely, as the door was flung open; then when he saw who it was that had demanded admission, his behaviour underwent a remarkable change, and he added, "Oh! Mr. Wild, is it you, sir?"

CHAPTER LI.

JACK SHEPPARD AND LADY OSBORN SUSTAIN AN IRREPARABLE LOSS.

LEAVING Jonathan Wild to the perpetration of fresh iniquities in his gloomy domicile, we will now, for a short space, follow the fortunes of Jack Sheppard and Sir Marmaduke Osborn.

As the thief-taker had more than suspected, the boat, as soon as it passed under the arches of the bridge, stopped at the side of one of the vessels at anchor there.

That vessel was the Ringdove.

The men assisted the two fugitives on board.

Sir Marmaduke was still insensible. The efforts which Jack had made to revive him had proved of no avail.

The Ringdove was one of the largest of the vessels that traded between London and Hamburg. She was now all ready for performing the return voyage.

The captain caught Jack by the arm, and pointed across the water.

"Look," he said, "there is your foe."

"I see him."

"He has lost us, and is baffled to know how and where we have disappeared."

"The man is a perfect mystery to me," said Jack. "I have knocked him about enough to kill half-a-dozen ordinary men, yet there he is, looking as though nothing in the world was the matter with him."

The captain then gave orders to get the vessel under weigh, and in less than half-an-hour afterwards she was gliding slowly down the Thames.

Upon further examination they found that Sir Marmaduke had struck his head violently against some projection in the boat.

Between them, Jack and the captain brought him back to life.

But when he recovered he was so frightfully exhausted that he could scarcely lift his hand.

As they approached their destination he grew worse and worse.

The reaction which Jack foretold had come.

Moving at the rate they did, it was a long time before the vessel reached Tilburyness. Jack's impatience knew no bounds. She whom he loved had an enemy in Jonathan Wild, in addition to her villainous uncle.

Even at that very moment she might be suffering the greatest peril from their machinations. The bare probability almost maddened him, and his spirit chafed within him as he watched the sluggish progress of the vessel through the water.

Abandon Sir Marmaduke until he had seen him safely restored to his family he would not. He felt that to act otherwise would be base in the extreme.

But, as all things must of necessity have an end, so at last did the journey, and Jack was delighted beyond measure when the captain showed him in the distance the place for which he was bound.

It was now morning. The sun was high up in the sky, and shining brightly, making the wavelets on the river sparkle like diamonds.

Sir Marmaduke was brought on deck. His eye brightened, and he said, faintly—

"At last! Once more I see you, my own happy home! Oh! my young friend, my heart overflows with gratitude for the manifold services you have rendered me. Look among those trees: can you see the roof-tops of a mansion there?"

"Quite plainly."

"That, then, is Farleigh Priory."

"Your home?"

"My home and yours, too, Jack, if you will but share it with me."

"You are too kind and generous to me," said Jack. "You have not heard the story of my life; nor will there be time for me to tell it. However, there are circumstances which will compel me—at least at present—to decline your offer."

"But —"

"It concerns another. One like you, persecuted by her foes, but not so well able to do battle with them."

"A girl?"

"Yes; and one in whose welfare I feel the deepest interest."

"Well—well; you have a brave heart. I have already had proof of that. Nothing would be further from my purpose than to attempt to curb your inclination in any way. All I can say is, while I live, so long will you find a friend, and so long as a roof shelters me, so long will you be welcome to share it."

Jack Sheppard pressed the hand of the baronet in silence.

After a brief pause he spoke.

"Let us turn our attention to your own affairs," he said. "They require some consideration. What shall you do when you land?"

"Do? Go home."

"But you forget. You are not strong enough to walk. Besides, what effect may not your sudden and unexpected appearance have upon your wife?"

"True. I had forgotten. What do you advise?"

"If there is any house close to the shore, where you can remain for a time, I think you had better do so. I will then go on to the Priory, and prepare your wife for the surprise awaiting her."

"Thanks—thanks. There is a poor boatman's cottage a little lower down, the inmates of which are known to me. I will stop there, and you—you will —"

"I will go to the Priory, as I said."

"You can bring the carriage."

"I will."

"And now about the payment of the captain?"

"If you will permit me," said Jack, who had been furnished with money by Blueskin during their stay at the "Ship and Rainbow," in the Horseterry; "if you will permit me, I will see to that."

"I shall then be under another obligation to you, and one which I can easily repay."

Jack upon this spoke to the captain, and gave him the sum he had been promised, at the same time requesting him to put them ashore as near the boatman's cottage as he could, which was now only a few yards in advance.

This was done, and the baronet was assisted into the rude dwelling-place by some of the crew.

Having seen all perfectly safe, Jack proceeded to carry out his intention of visiting the Priory.

He needed no guide, for the upper portion of the mansion could be seen quite plainly; besides which, the lane, after winding through a copse, terminated at the entrance gates.

Every step Jack took filled him with delight. Brought up all his life in the midst of London, it is no wonder he should keenly appreciate the beauties of the country.

The lodge-gates were closed, and he was firmly refused admittance until he told the man that he was the bearer of intelligence of the safety of Sir Marmaduke to Lady Osborn.

Then they were flung open in all haste.

"He is alive! my poor master?" said the lodge-keeper, in a voice of emotion. "God bless him! there has been a sad house ever since he disappeared more than a month ago. We all feared he was dead."

With such like expressions he accompanied Jack to the Priory, which had a dismal look. The shutters of the windows on the ground floor were closed, and the blinds of the upper ones drawn down.

It was into a plainly-furnished room that Jack was ushered, and there he awaited the arrival of the Lady Osborn.

The intelligence that some one wished to see her who brought news of her husband filled her with agitation.

There was a flush of colour in her habitually pale face, and a sparkle in her eyes when she entered.

She paused, and strove to speak, but her voice failed her, and she was fain to clutch a chair for support.

"Calm yourself, madam," said Jack, respectfully. "I am not, thank heaven! the bearer of ill tidings. He still lives, and is waiting to see you."

Lady Osborn, at this confirmation of the good news she had heard, could not restrain her tears, and she sank down upon the chair, the back of which she had grasped.

"Oh! why—why did he not come to me at once? Oh! this is cruel in the extreme."

"Not so, madam; he feared the effect his sudden and unexpected appearance might have upon you. When you are composed and ready, I will take you to him."

"Oh! I am quite ready—and—quite composed. Take me, oh! take me, without delay."

"You are, by his instructions, to take the carriage."

"The carriage! Where is it, then?"

"Close at hand, madam."

"Why, then—Oh! he is hurt?" she said, a wild feeling of alarm thronging to her heart. "You did not tell me that. Where has he been to? Oh! I have so much to ask that I forget!"

"You must subdue your emotions, lady."

"I will try," she said.

As she spoke she rang the bell.

"Tell Price to put the horses in the carriage at once; I am waiting to go out."

"Yes, my lady."

"And now, sir," she continued, fixing her eyes imploringly upon Jack's face. "Tell me—oh! tell me more!"

"You must prepare yourself for evil tidings," said Jack. "He has suffered much since you saw him last. He was kidnapped by a villain, and kept in a dungeon, deprived of light and sustenance. But he has escaped, after many difficulties and much fatigue. From his own lips must you learn the story of his sufferings. He can relate them much better than I can. You must not expect to see him looking as he did when you saw him last. His sufferings have left their impress on him. Still he is alive, and, with the exception of being utterly exhausted, well!"

"Thank heaven! then," said Lady Osborn, "for I had lost all hope. Oh! sir, if, as I suspect, it is to you I owe the restoration of my husband, accept my warmest, my most heartfelt thanks! May God reward you, for I cannot!"

Strange to say, these words were distasteful to Jack. The reason was because his own heart told him how unworthy he was of such encomiums.

But he was relieved from his embarrassment by hearing the carriage draw up before the door.

Lady Osborn sprang excitedly to her feet.

"Come, come!" she said, "the carriage is at the door. Oh! have pity on me, and take me to him at once."

She took Jack by the hand, and led him across the room.

"Let me beg of you," he said, "to control yourself. I ask it no less for your own sake than that of your husband's."

"I shall be calm if you will take me to him, indeed I shall."

There was a very grave doubt as to whether this would be the case; but Jack, fearing to increase her excitement, thought the best thing he could do was to comply.

He therefore handed her into the carriage, and gave the coachman instructions where to drive.

She would insist upon his entering the carriage with her.

Jack felt awkward and uncomfortable.

It was the first time he had ever been in a carriage.

However, the demeanour of the baronet's wife soon put him at his ease.

The distance between the Priory and the boatman's cottage was soon accomplished.

On the way Jack did his utmost to soothe the mind of the unfortunate lady, as well as to prepare her for the sad spectacle her husband presented.

They drew up about a hundred yards from the cottage, and then both alighted.

Lady Osborn took Jack's arm, and they together walked towards the hut.

It was a strange position for Jack.

He could see the lady's agitation was extreme. She drew her breath painfully, and her face became alternately white and scarlet.

They reached the door.

Whispering a last injunction to her to be firm, he lifted the latch.

With a cry of joy she sprang into the cottage.

Sir Marmaduke had been accommodated with a patriarchal arm-chair by the fireside.

Despite his weakness he rose from his chair, and staggering forward, was caught in the arms of his wife.

"At last," she said. "At last. How you must have suffered. My poor—poor husband. Look up! look up! Smile upon me as you always did. Husband! husband! Speak—look—or I shall go mad. Oh! he is dying!" she shrieked. "He is dying! Help! help! He is dying!"

Jack rushed forward.

But one glance at the pale features was sufficient.

Sir Marmaduke Osborn was dead!

CHAPTER LII.

THE CUP OF BLISS IS DASHED FROM JACK'S LIPS BY WILD'S MYRMIDONS.

KEEPING close in the shadow of the houses—shrinking as much as possible from observation—glancing around uneasily—a dark form at dusk, that evening, glided along Drury-lane.

Near the low, old-fashioned doorway of the "Black Lion" Inn it paused, and assured, apparently, that it was unwatched, disappeared into the interior.

That form was Jack Sheppard.

After the sudden death of Sir Marmaduke Osborn, feeling that his presence was no longer required—that it could neither be of service to himself nor to the baronet—he spoke a few words of consolation, regret, and explanation to the bereaved lady, and then departed.

He was full of anxiety to know whether Edgworth Bess was in safety. From experience, he knew how much to be dreaded was Jonathan Wild, and he trembled at the thought, that then, at that very moment, she might be in his clutches, or, at least, in such a position as to need the assistance of a manly arm.

Such a feeling as this, as the reader may suppose, was just the one to make Jack hasten back to London; but, although it was not much past noon when he began his backward journey, yet, as we have seen, it was dark before he reached his destination.

Travelling in those days was a far different thing to what it is now, but it was all the better for Jack that night had come when he entered the city.

The whole of the way he proceeded with the utmost caution. He knew, in all probability, that Jonathan had spies posted in different places to watch for him, and he was extremely anxious that none of them should track him to the place where the young girl had found a refuge.

And so, like some malefactor just escaped from the precincts of a prison, he crept along Drury-lane, and then, watching his opportunity, disappeared through the doorway of the old inn.

His heart beat strangely, and his limbs trembled, as he walked along the dark, narrow passage towards the kitchen.

He entered hastily, and glanced about him.

It was vacant.

At least, such was his momentary impression, and then he heard a low and musical voice pronounce his name.

The revulsion of feeling that took place in his bosom almost overpowered him, when, turning round, he saw seated in the dark corner near the fireplace the object of his uneasiness.

She rose to her feet, and Jack, animated by an impulse which he could not control, sprang forward and clasped her to his breast.

For a few seconds he forgot everything except the fair young creature in such close contact with him; but then reflection came back, and he was almost terrified at what he had done.

Full of confusion, he strove to release himself, and would have done so had not his companion clung to him and prevented him.

She looked up into his face with some surprise.

"Oh! Jack," she said, "I am so glad you have come, for I feel safe now—quite safe. While you have been away so long I have been full of terrors, and I have started at the slightest sound; but now you are here I feel quite brave, because I know you can protect me."

As these words fell upon his ear, as he saw her countenance full of love, and her eyes, half-filled with tears, upturned towards his own, as he felt the soft pressure of his arms about his neck, Jack, for the first time in his life, was conscious of the reality of happiness.

And let not the reader be surprised that she should thus unreservedly exhibit her affection. She acted merely as nature prompted her; she had learned none of those artificialities existing in society; she saw in Jack one who, at the risk of his own life, had protected her from harm—had rescued her from death, which is ever a grim phantom to the young, and she sought not to conceal the pleasure which she felt in his society, because she knew no reason why she should. Hers, too, was one of those natures which demand something to love. All her life she had pined to find some outlet for her affection, but, until she met Jack, vainly. Is it wonderful, then, that having found an object, she poured forth all her love upon it, and that, too, without the least concealment or reserve.

As for Jack, he no more than anyone else could help loving her. One glance into her face was sufficient for that, without the confiding reliance she displayed in his ability to protect her from all harm—a feeling which more endears a man to a woman than any other.

Yes, Jack was happy, as many another has been under similar circumstances, and as many another will be.

It was Edgworth Bess—for it is by that name we shall call her—who first broke the silence. If she had not, there is no knowing how long it would have continued.

"Sit down, Jack," she said. "Sit down! I want you to tell me all that has taken place during your long absence."

These words aroused Jack from his abstraction.

He suffered himself unresistingly to be led to the seat Edgworth Bess had occupied when he entered the room.

The only light there was in the kitchen proceeded from the ruddy blaze of the fire, which, while it illumined several portions perfectly, yet left others in a shadow which, by contrast, seemed darker than it really was.

Perhaps the most obscure spot of all was where the lovers were now seated, and anyone entering the room would certainly not see them at a cursory glance.

Jack, who was emboldened by the behaviour of his companion, which was too unequivocal to admit a doubt that she loved him, passed his left arm round her waist and drew her towards him until her head reclined upon his shoulder.

"And what has alarmed you?" he asked in a whisper. "You must tell me all that has taken place."

"Nothing! I mean I have only felt in dread of something, without having any cause for doing so. I was anxious to know that you were in no danger."

Jack's face approached yet closer to his companion.

"Oh! Jack," she said, speaking very gravely—very earnestly, "I am full of alarm when you are away! Do, for my sake, abandon your present mode of life and those men you have consorted with. In the end, it can only bring trouble and despair. For my sake alter, and leave Jonathan Wild."

These words, from the young girl, though very gently uttered, dispersed Jack's happiness. They reminded him of what he was and what the young girl was! He felt in a moment how enormous was the injury he should do her—that she was not made for such as he was. Under these circumstances, his better nature told him that his duty was not to encourage, but to reason the poor girl out of the affection she had formed for him. Although brought up under similar circumstances to himself, yet her rank in life was far above his, and he could feel how base it would be to take advantage of her gratitude.

These and many thoughts of a like character passed through Jack's mind with inconceivable rapidity. A struggle which was none the less severe from the shortness of its duration took place in his bosom, but in the end, despite the overwhelming passion which he felt, duty conquered, and, slowly removing his arm from its position, he raised her head and drew back further on the seat.

Edgworth Bess looked at him with surprise and grief, and then, in a tearful voice, she said—mistaking entirely the motive which had caused Jack to act as he did—

"Do not be offended with me for asking you what I have—pray do not. I would not offend you for the world. If I have done so, forgive me and forget it, for I spoke only what I thought."

By a great effort Jack spoke, but his voice was husky and constrained—

"No, no," he said; "you have not offended me. Indeed you have not. How could I be offended with you for asking what you have?"

"Then—then," she replied, creeping closer to him, and taking both his hands, "tell me what it is. Do you no longer love me?"

"No one but myself can tell you the extent of it, but—"

"But what?"

"I forgot, and so have you forgotten, the difference there is between us."

"Difference?"

"Yes, difference. I should be base-hearted in the extreme to take advantage of your gratitude and win your love. Do you remember who you are? You have by right, if not possession, rank, riches, and estates, while I—I—I am—no matter what I am—unfit, at any rate, for you."

A sob came from the lips of Edgworth Bess as he spoke these words, and his heart smote him for having caused her pain; but he controlled himself, with a great effort, and went on—

"I have done wrong," he said, "already, but there is yet time to retract. That I love you is unfortunately too true, but it is not a selfish love. The object of my life shall be to overthrow the designs of those who have so long deprived you of that which you ought to have. I will restore you to your rights. You will then occupy a position among the greatest of the land. All I shall require or wish for in return will be a grateful thought—and that, too, is all I shall accept. When the time comes you will see that I have acted right, and think all the better of me for it. Besides, I would fain believe the feeling you have for me is merely gratitude, not love. Is it not so?"

"You know it is not, Jack. I do love you—always shall love you! As for my rights, I have never known luxury, and therefore cannot feel its loss. I am content to leave what I possess in the hands of those who have been so long accustomed to them, and who will feel more sorrow at being deprived of them than I shall joy in regaining them."

Jack shook his head.

"That is false reasoning," he said. "You would be doing wrong not to strive to get your due. And you shall have it. But then suppose I suffered you to love me! What would be said? That I had acted merely from the most sordid motives. That I had entrapped your young affections; in fact, that I had been selfish, and that is a fault of which I have never yet been guilty, and it is one which, however bad I may have been, I should never like to have imputed to me."

"Every word you utter, Jack," whispered Bess, gently, after a brief pause, "makes me love you all the more. Do not cause me needless unhappiness. You own you love me, or I should not speak as I do. Do not let any feeling or anything others may say stand between us. At least shall know it is untrue. Come, Jack, promise me that you will think no more of this."

The temptation was strong. He loved, he was loved in return; but, nevertheless, even that could not blind him to the fact that a union between them could not fail to be productive of disastrous and unhappy consequences to her.

But he had not strength to trample on his love, or to withstand her pleadings. He did not yield, but made a compromise.

"Let it stay," he said, "until you are placed in the position you ought to occupy. In the meantime, we will be friends only. If afterwards, when you have become fully accustomed to your change of station, you find your feelings have undergone no change"—

"They will undergo no change, Jack. I am sure they will not. Do not shake your head. Nothing will make me alter. All I ask is that you will quit your dreadful mode of life, that you will leave Jonathan Wild."

"I can readily promise that," said Jack. "I have, because I would not take part with him against you, made him my enemy. He confined me in a dungeon, but you see I have escaped."

"And you have done this for me, Jack," she said, and she clasped her arms about him. "Everything I hear makes me love you more."

Could Jack resist? He held out his arms, and pressed her to his bosom with a fervid embrace, and kissed the beautiful face so near his own.

But his bliss was doomed to be abruptly ended, for there was a sound of hasty footsteps in the passage, the door was flung open, and several men in the garb of police-officers rushed in.

CHAPTER LIII.

BLUESKIN APPEARS MOST OPPORTUNELY UPON THE SCENE OF ACTION.

EDGORTH BESS uttered a scream of terror.

Jack sprang to his feet, and plunging his hand into his pocket drew forth a pistol.

"There they are! there they are!" cried one of the men, who Jack saw was a member of Jonathan's gang. "There they are! Capture them!"

Bess clung to Jack. She was terrified, but yet she felt safe.

Jack Sheppard cocked his pistol, and presenting it, he said, in tones that left behind no doubt as to his sincerity—

"The first one that comes forward has this bullet through his skull. You may capture me, but if you do it will not be until one at least of you bite the dust. Which is the one willing to die in order that I may be taken prisoner?"

"Come, come, Sheppard," said the officer who had before spoken. "Give in quietly like a sensible fellow. You can't escape, so you may as well save all disturbance. We have orders to take you and the young woman alive, and we mean to do it."

"Come on, then, and try," said Jack. "I will fight to the last."

"Forward, then," cried the officer. "We'll soon stop his crowing."

"Hold!" cried a voice at this moment, in such stentorian tones that every one fairly jumped again. "Hold, I say. What is the meaning of all this?"

"Saved!" whispered Jack to his companion. "Saved! saved!"

The voice came from the passage, and now a tall figure, with a drawn hanger in his hand, strode into the centre of the room, taking up a position between Jack Sheppard and Edgorth Bess and their assailants.

It was Blueskin.

Of course he was immediately recognised by all present.

His arrival was most opportune.

"What is the meaning of this?" he cried. "Do you know who you are attacking? This is one of Mr. Wild's new hands."

"I don't care what he is," said Levee, for he the officer who had spoken was. "I don't care who he is, nor who she is either, but my orders from Mr. Wild himself were to take them both prisoners, unhurt if possible, and convey them to his house."

"Impossible. There is some mistake. Begone at once!"

"But"

"Do you hesitate?" roared Blake, threateningly; "do you hesitate? If you do, it will be the worse for you. You are under my orders, recollect; I tell you to be gone."

"But I have special orders from"—

"Are not your orders to obey me in the absence of Jonathan Wild? Answer me that. Are not those your instructions?"

"Yes, but"—

"Then go at once, or it will be the worse for you. I tell you there is some mistake; but whether there is or not I will be responsible for the whole transaction. You can go back to Newgate-street and say so."

"Mr. Blake," said Levee, who dared not set Blueskin's authority at defiance, since the standing orders were that in the absence of Wild he should be implicitly obeyed, "you don't"—

"I say will you obey or not? I tell you I will take all the responsibility. That ought to be enough, surely."

Levee could not say anything further against this, so he, with manifest reluctance, took his departure.

He went right out into the street, followed by his men, and then he stopped to think.

"What am I to do, I should like to know? I dare not go back, even though Blake does order me. Let me see; he has been away; this young Sheppard is a pal of his—he knows nothing about the row there's been. Of course, that's it; now I shall know how to act. Giles!"

One of the men stepped forward.

"You have seen what has taken place?"

"Yes."

"Run, then, at once to Newgate-street, and inform Mr. Wild. Tell him I could not refuse obedience, and that I am here on the watch. They won't escape. I dare say he will come back with you."

Giles started off at full speed, and then Levee very cunningly disposed his men close at hand, and took up a position himself just opposite the door of the "Black Lion," where he determined to wait and watch the course of events.

Having so far explained matters, we will leave him, and return to the kitchen where our friends were.

"I know all," said Blueskin, "so you need not waste time telling me. I will explain my absence when there is an opportunity."

"You arrived just in time."

"Fear nothing, we shall escape!"

"But Wild?"

"I quite agree with all you have done! Let that suffice! We have parted!"

"You and Jonathan?"

"Yes!"

"Hurrah! You have told him so?"

"Not yet! He will soon find it out in my actions. But we have no time to lose, if we wish to save our necks. Levee must have received very positive orders, and you may depend he is watching outside, while he has sent off to Wild."

"How, then, shall we escape?"

"Trust to me. There is no time for explanations. Be content to place yourself entirely under my orders, and then all will be well."

"I am willing! Cheer up, Bess! Do not fear!"

"I am not afraid," she replied, clinging more tightly to his arm.

"That's right."

"Johnson!" shouted Blueskin. "Johnson!"

"Here you are! What is it?"

"Go to the door, and see who there is about."

"All right!"

Johnson was only gone about a couple of minutes and then he returned.

"I don't see anyone; but you may depend they are only hiding."

"That's my impression. Now, I am going to try your friendship. I have quarrelled with Jonathan Wild."

"Blessed if I didn't think as much."

"He will be here shortly with an overwhelming force. We cannot go out into the lane, but we must leave this place. How will you manage it?"

"There is no back-way to the house."

"But, do you mean to say you have no other means of leaving the house than by the front door?"

Johnson looked around him, and then said in a whisper—

"I have; but it is a secret."

"All the better; we will keep it! I cannot stay to tell you all that has occurred, but I will do so. We must leave this place at once. Every minute that we stay adds frightfully to our danger."

"Then come on, M^r. Blake. Are you going to take Bess with you?"

"Yes; this is no longer a refuge for her, and she must be kept in safety."

"Well, I am very sorry that she's going, that's all. Bless her! She seems like one of my own."

"Yes, yes," said Blueskin, impatiently. "Which way are we to get out?"

"Follow me, and I will show you. Stop a minute, though, I must get a light."

Johnson provided himself with a lamp, and, having lit it, led them into the bar.

He closed the door carefully.

"I am going to put you in possession of one of the secrets of the old 'Black Lion.'"

As he spoke he opened a door on the opposite side, which led apparently to the cellars.

"Down there?"

"Yes. You go first, and I will hold the light and shut the door."

"Very good."

Still holding his hanger in his grasp, for he had not sheathed it, Blueskin went first down the cellar steps.

Jack and Edgeworth Bess followed, and then Johnson, the landlord, who closed the door, as he said he should.

The steps were only twelve in number, so the bottom was soon reached, and here the three fugitives paused for Johnson to take the lead.

The cellar branched off to the right and left.

Johnson turned to the left, holding the light above his head, so that those who were following might see their way.

This was highly necessary, for the roof was low in many places, which was owing to the peculiar manner in which it was built.

It was of tolerable size, and ranged round the walls were several barrels, some erect and some lying down.

Johnson paused before one of the former, saying—

"Take hold of the lamp a minute, Blueskin, while I move this cask."

Then, as Blueskin obeyed, and he had both hands at liberty, he moved the cask from its position, and from the ease with which he did it, it was pretty clear it was empty.

He stooped down over the place from which he had moved the cask—or rather butt, for such it was—and caught hold of a ring in a stone slab, which opened after the fashion of a door.

Blueskin was surprised at this.

Beneath this trap-door could be seen a rather precipitous flight of steps.

"There you are, Mr. Blake. You didn't know of this neat little arrangement, did you?"

"I certainly did not, and I am much astonished."

"They would be sometime before they found that out, I rather think."

"So do I. Where does it lead?"

"I was just going to tell you. At the bottom of these steps you will find a narrow passage. Continue along it until you come to another flight of steps like these. Ascend them. You will find at the top a flat stone slab like this. Do you understand?"

"Perfectly. Go on."

"Close to where this slab, then, fits into its setting, and on the right-hand side of the wall, you will see a small hole about the size of your finger. Put your mouth over it, and blow a good long, steady blast, and wait. In a few minutes the trap above your head will be raised."

"And then where shall we be?"

"Do you know White Hart-street?"

"Yes, it is the first turning to the left when you go out of your front door."

"Exactly. Well, do you happen to know a little public-house there, called the 'Fountain'?"

"Quite well."

"Then you know that, although my name is not up over the door, yet that house belongs to me, and the man who keeps it is put there by me."

Blueskin nodded.

"He will open the trap, and let you out. He will say nothing, but show you the way to the upper regions. Then, if you will take my advice, you will be off as soon as possible."

"Capital, Johnson, capital! This is more than I expected. We shall get off all right. Good-bye, old fellow. Wild is sure to be savage, but he can't do anything to you."

"All right. Be quick with you. You have no time to lose."

The three fugitives hastily descended.

"You must take the lamp, or you will not be able to find your way. I can easily get out of the cellar in the dark."

As he spoke, Johnson handed Jack the lamp, and then replaced the stone slab over the top of the staircase.

CHAPTER LIV.

JONATHAN WILD REACHES TYBURN-GATE JUST A LITTLE TOO LATE.

THE mode of communication between the two houses was certainly a most ingenious one. Those, too, who were inimical to the laws must have found it most convenient.

The close, shut-up air, however, in the passage was very disagreeable, producing as it did an unpleasant taste in the mouth, and a clammy feeling about the lungs.

Jack transferred the lamp to Blueskin.

"Haste, haste!" he said. "Saug as this place appears, yet I think the sooner we are out of it the better. Follow me."

So saying, Blueskin set off at a trot which soon brought them to the foot of the steps Johnson had mentioned.

Edgeworth Bess still retained her hold upon Jack's arm. She accompanied him composedly—a circumstance which arose from no bravery upon her part, but from the feeling of safety the presence of her lover engendered in her bosom.

At the top of the steps Blueskin found the circular aperture, and covering it with his lips, he blew into it as steadily as he would have done into a tube, which it in reality was.

No result, so far as he could tell, followed this. He expected to have heard some sound, but all was still.

It was rather an anxious few minutes which passed after giving this summons before they heard a faint noise overhead.

Immediately afterwards the slab was raised, and a man carrying a light appeared.

His face was quite familiar to Blueskin, who had seen him many times. The recognition, too, seemed mutual, for the man uttered an exclamation.

"All right, Barham," said Blueskin. "Johnson has sent us here."

"Come on, then. What in the world can be up, that you come this way? Hullo! there's a girl, too!"

"My friend," said Blueskin, quietly, "you will find it your best policy to hear, see, and say nothing, and show us the way into the street at once."

"Very well, sir," said Barham, as he placed his lantern on the top of a cask, "you must just stop a minute, while I put the place square."

"Don't be any longer than you can help, then."

"I won't, Mr. Blake."

The means by which the opening was concealed were precisely similar to those in the cellar of the "Black Lion."

Having restored everything to its ordinary appearance, the man who had been called Barham by Blueskin, preceded them up a flight of stone steps, at the top of which was a door opening into the bar.

Here he paused, and extinguished the light.

Then he opened the door cautiously, and peeped forth, to make sure no one was observing them.

Finding the coast clear, he stepped out, and motioned to the fugitives to follow him.

"Now, Barham," said Blueskin, "I want you to do me a little service, and I can assure you it will be nothing out of your way."

"What is it, Mr. Blake? Let me know what it is, and it is done at once."

"I rather fancy, then, that some of Wild's men are lurking about on the look-out for us. I just want you to see whether there is or not."

"Oh, very well. Of course. Just so," said Barham, confusedly. He could not understand what Blake had to fear from Wild's men.

But he went off, nevertheless, in a perplexed, absent sort of way, to do his bidding.

"Now," said Blueskin, "if Barham comes back to say all's right, I propose we leave London at once. Our first consideration must be to find a place of refuge for Bess here, and where we know she will be perfectly safe. After that we can make arrangements for the future."

"Street seems all right," said Barham, returning at this juncture.

"Very well, then. We are off. Here is a guinea for your trouble."

All four now made their way to the front door of the little public-house.

At the time of which we are writing London streets were, after nightfall, comparatively deserted, for it was positively unsafe for anyone to be abroad.

It was very dark.

Blueskin turned to the left upon issuing from the inn.

Before, however, he had taken a couple of steps, he heard the trampling of many horses' hoofs coming along Drury-lane, at a tremendous gallop.

He turned round, and looked, and saw a disorderly troop sweeping down Drury-lane, in the direction of the "Black Lion."

"Jonathan Wild!" he said. "Come along, Jack! We have got off only just in time. You must run with me as far as Long-acre, where I will get horses."

He did not wait for a reply, but set off with great rapidity, and Jack and Bess had much difficulty in keeping him in view.

The thought of the implacable foe who was so close upon their track nerved them to an exertion of which, under other circumstances, they would have been incapable.

By the route taken, Blueskin showed that his knowledge of the locality was in no way inferior to Jack's. Avoiding the main streets, he threaded his way through a number of courts, and, at length, emerged into Long-acre, just opposite the place to which he was bound.

This was the livery stables from which he had procured a horse on a former occasion.

An archway of some length led into the stable-yard, and under this the darkness was profound indeed.

Here Bess and Jack waited while Blueskin made his way into the stable-yard.

"Do not be afraid," said Jack to his companion. "All will be well. I have every confidence in Blueskin, as he is called—every confidence."

"I am not alarmed," said Bess, quietly.

"You do not speak as if you were, at all events. However, we are very far indeed from being safe."

"Jack—Jack!" said Blueskin in an undertone. "Jack—Jack!"

"Yes!"

"Come this way."

Bess would not let go his arm, so the pair went towards Blake, whose form they could just distinguish as being a trifle darker than the surrounding darkness.

"What is it? What is it?"

"Can you ride?"

"A little."

"Very well, then. We shall manage capitally. We can have a couple of splendid nags. I will take one, and you can take the other."

"And Bess?"

"She must mount behind you."

"That will do."

"Hush! Go again to the top of the gateway. I will come with the horses in a minute."

And he was as good as his word, for, at the expiration of the time he had mentioned, he appeared leading two horses by their bridles.

"Now," he cried, as he sprang into the saddle, "up with you, and let us be off."

Jack mounted, and then he found that without assistance he could not lift Bess on to the saddle behind him, so that Blueskin was obliged to get down again.

He took hold of her round the waist, and lifted her on to the horse's back with all the ease in the world.

"Sit firm," he said, "and clasp Jack with both your arms, and you cannot hurt. Are you ready?"

"Quite."

Blueskin was on the back of his own steed in a moment.

"Listen, Jack, to what I am going to say. I will go first, and all you will have to do will be to keep me in view."

"But where are we going?"

"I hardly know yet, except to some little distance from London. We shall have no difficulty in finding the sort of place we want."

"I hope we shall not, and that we shall not be chased by Jonathan Wild."

"That is a vain hope, then. He has people in his employ all round about London, and he will soon find which way we have gone."

"Then if that is the case, there is no time to lose."

"There is not. However, we have got the start of him. Now, off and away."

Blueskin darted out of the stable gateway at a good speed, and Jack followed him closely.

It was perceptible in a moment that they were two splendid horses, admirable both for fleetness and endurance, and they sped down King-street with a tremendous clatter.

Blueskin shaped his course for the Oxford-road.

The road he took was not the ordinary one, that would have made pursuit too easy. He traversed instead the wilderness of streets about Seven Dials and Soho, and emerged at length into the Oxford-road not far east of the spot where it is intersected by Regent-street.

This was open country then. A few gentlemen's residences could be seen here and there, but nothing more in the shape of human habitations.

The road was smooth and level, so they allowed their horses to go with increased speed, which, so far from being unwilling, they were only anxious to do.

The rate at which they now went was one that precluded all attempt at conversation. Blueskin still kept a yard or so in advance.

Riding was Jack Sheppard's greatest delight. He had not had many opportunities for practice, but all that he did have he took advantage of, and in the present instance his knowledge of equitation stood him in good stead.

As for Edgworth Bess, though at first and naturally enough terrified at the apparent insecurity of her position, yet in a little while she became used to it, and held on bravely.

Presently Blueskin drew up.

"What is the matter?" asked Jack.

"Nothing. But do you see that faint light just before us?"

"Yes. What of it?"

"That is Tyburn Gate."

"Oh!"

Jack looked about him with an uneasy sensation.

"The triple tree, then," he thought, "is somewhere close at hand."

"We must go at a slower pace, so as not to excite the tollman's suspicion. I will go first as before. You follow."

"Hark!" said Jack. "What is that?"

"What?"

"Listen. Cannot you hear the beat of horses' hoofs?"

Blueskin dismounted in a moment, and flung himself flat down in the roadway.

For a space of time, during which one might have counted twelve, he listened.

"I can hear distinctly the beat of the hoofs of four horses. They are coming along at a tremendous rate."

"Is it Jonathan?"

"It may be, but I should scarcely think it probable he can have tracked us here so soon."

"On, my friend, on."

"Not so," replied Blueskin, remounting, "we must go along at an easy pace. If we do not, the tollman will not open the gate, and then we shall be done."

"We should."

At an easy rate, then, they now advanced towards the gate.

[EDGORTH BESS TAKES SHELTER IN THE RUINED ABBEY.]

The pikeman, hearing the sound of approaching horsemen, left his little tenement, and leisurely proceeded to undo the fastening of the gate."

"Here you are, my man," said Blueskin. "Here's a crown for you. I'm rather in a hurry to-night, so I will call for the change the next time I come by."

"Oh! thin, your honour's a jintleman, and I hope you"—
 "Shut the gate!" roared a voice, "shut the gate. I am Jonathan Wild!"

"Och, then, you're a mighty big villin anyway," muttered the Irishman.

CHAPTER LV.

JONATHAN WILD MEETS WITH A VERY SERIOUS MISHAP ON THE WESTERN-ROAD, AND FINDS ALL HIS CUNNING COMPLETELY THROWN AWAY.

How on earth Jonathan Wild had managed to be so soon upon their track was more than either of the fugitives could conceive; yet by some means or another there he was.

"Shut the gate," he roared. "Stop them! Shut the gate!"

But Jack and Blueskin were already through.

They tore along the Great Western-road at a terrific pace.

The Irish toll-collector was evidently no friend of the thief-taker's. The words he had muttered were tolerably good evidence of the fact, but now what he did was even more unequivocal,

As soon as our friends were through he shut the gate, and fastened it, during which operation he muttered,—

"Jonathan Wild, is it? Oh! bad luck to you, you thief of the world. Wasn't it last session ye scragged the iligant O'Grady, fifth cousin, by the mother's side, to the O'Grady's, that's kings o' Connaught, if they only had their rights. Oh! bad luck to you!"

At this moment Jonathan Wild reached the gate.

The curses that came from his lips, upon finding his prey had escaped him, were of the most awful description.

"Open the gate!" he yelled. "Open the gate!"

Then came another volley of oaths, during the utterance of which his men arrived.

"Oh! now. Be aisy, will ye. Shure, didn't ye say, 'Shut the gate!' and, by the powers, haven't I done that same?"

"Open the gate, I say! Refuse at your peril! I am Jonathan Wild."

"I know that well enough," said the Irishman, in a whisper, as he undid the gate.

Jonathan did not waste any time in swearing at the toll-man after the gate was once open, but dashed through it at full speed, closely followed by four of his men, who were almost but not quite so well mounted as himself.

Although the delay did not amount to more than a minute and a-half, yet it was enough to give the fugitives a tolerable start, and the circumstance was, for them, a most favourable one indeed.

But if it enabled them to get out of sight, it did not enable them to get out of the hearing of their pursuers.

"On-on!" Blueskin cried, at intervals. "On-on, or we shall be overtaken."

The pace at which they went was really something alarming.

Edgworth Bess was terrified, and clung tightly to her preserver.

But so long as she did that she was safe.

It was along the Uxbridge-road they went at this terrific pace.

At last the sounds of their pursuers no longer reached their ears.

"We have distanced them," said Jack, as he reined in a little, for his horse had begun to show signs of distress. "Pull in a bit."

Blueskin did so, and listened.

Not the faintest tramp was perceptible.

"Can you hear anything?" asked Jack.

"No. I am puzzled."

"Why? We have come along at a furious rate. I have hardly been able to get my breath at times."

"I can't understand our getting out of earshot of them. Something has happened."

"So much the better then; but come, while we walk the horses up this hill—and they will be quite knocked-up if we don't—just tell me what is your plan of operations?"

"Jonathan being so soon at our heels has disconcerted me. The best thing we can think about, Jack, in my opinion, is to get as far away as we can."

"But where shall we go?"

"That I must think about. And now, don't you run away with the idea that Wild has given up the chase, because, if you do, you will be very wrong indeed. So long as we keep on the road he will follow us up."

"I suppose he will."

"You may depend upon it. If you will be guided by me, you will keep on at a good speed. The road is smooth and dry. Jonathan will soon make himself heard in our rear; but, having distanced him, as we appear to have done, we had better maintain the advantage we have gained."

This, supposing that they had really outstripped Wild, was the best possible advice, but neither of them put a proper estimate upon the cunning of their foe.

It was a mistake that they fell into, as will be shortly seen.

The top of the hill was soon reached, and the horses were much refreshed by the kind of rest they had had. They were really first-class animals, as was shown by the readiness with which they obeyed the impulse to set forward again.

Blueskin resumed his former position, and down the hill they swept like the wind.

They paused now and then to listen, but all behind them was quite silent.

The more Blueskin thought upon this circumstance the more he was puzzled, and, to tell the truth, alarmed.

No one perhaps knew Jonathan Wild better than he did, very few so well, and from his conduct on this occasion he felt there was everything to dread. It was part of his policy to lull his victims into a state of false security.

But he thought, whatever he may attempt, the best thing to do is clearly to make as much speed as is possible.

With this conviction upon his mind, he urged his horse forward, and as the bargain was that he should be kept in view, Jack had to follow his example.

In the far distance a few twinkling lights came in sight.

"What is that?" cried Jack at the top of his voice.

"Ealing," was the reply. "We will pull in a little as we go through the village."

They reached the outskirts of it in a few minutes, and reduced their gallop to a canter.

The high street was quite deserted.

Lights gleamed from many of the windows, showing that the inhabitants had not yet retired to rest.

But, without attracting anything in the shape of observation, they emerged into the bleak country beyond.

And now the moon, which was only a few days beyond the full, rose above the mass of clouds on the horizon, and lighted up the landscape with a silvery misty radiance.

"Forward, Jack!" cried Blueskin, again touching his horse with the spur. "Forward! forward! We are, as yet, a great deal too near London to be safe."

Scarcely, however, had his horse resumed its former pace than he pulled up with great suddenness.

"Halt! Jack!" he cried. "Look to your pistols! We shall have to fight for it yet."

Jack Sheppard gave a hasty glance before him, and then, uttering an exclamation of astonishment, did his companion's bidding.

By the aid of the moon he saw, at a short distance, four men completely blocking up the road.

"Surrender!" cried a voice, which reached them with the utmost distinctness. "Surrender! or we fire!"

The voice was Jonathan Wild's.

Yes, impossible as it might seem, there was no mistaking it.

Jonathan Wild, whom they thought they had left in the rear, was actually before them, barring their further progress.

They heard, too, his discordant laugh, and if any doubt as to his identity had been lingering in their minds, that would have at once dispelled it.

"Surrender!" he cried again. "It is your only course. If you give in quietly you shall have no ill usage."

Jack made no reply, but crept closer to Blake.

"What shall we do now?" he said. "It strikes me it is all over with us."

"I am a fool," replied Blueskin, "worse than a fool! I have allowed myself to be entrapped by Wild. There is only one course open to us. To retreat would be madness, because we should be sure to be intercepted by some more of the band. We must ride through them."

This was rather a bold course, but yet as he had truly said, it was the only one open to them.

Jonathan still maintained his position.

Surely he was playing some very deep game, or he would have dashed forward to attempt their capture.

But no. There he remained.

He called out again.

His object was to keep their attention occupied.

He would have succeeded had it not been for Edgworth Bess.

"Look, look," she said, in Jack's ear. "Look over the hedge to the right and to the left."

He turned and did so.

"By heaven! Blake," he said, "we are done. The remainder of his band, in two positions, are crossing the meadows on either side of us."

Blueskin only gave one hasty glance, and that sufficed to enable him to comprehend all the danger of their position.

"On, on," he said. "We are forced to it now. Fix yourself firmly in your saddle. Be ready with your pistols. By making a sudden charge we shall be able to force a passage right through them. Be ready at the word."

"All right, Blue."

"Now."

With an impetuosity scarcely to be conceived, the two horses sprang forward in obedience to the sharp application of the spur.

So utterly unexpected was this manoeuvre that, as Blueskin had rightly enough conjectured, Wild was for a moment completely taken aback.

But a man so used to sudden surprises as he was would sure not to be long recovering himself.

"Fire!" he yelled, as he drew a pistol from his holster. "Fire! Down with them! Shoot them both! Fire, I say!" A succession of reports followed his words.

But no execution was done. All were too much flurried to take a correct aim.

And now the men who had been perceived by Bess crossing the meadow reached the high road, and they tore along with all the speed they could induce their horses to make.

Wild and the other three men made a desperate but abortive attempt to check our friends.

Blueskin and Jack, as if by common consent, pointed their pistols at the thief-taker, and, as they swept by him, both fired.

The two pistols made but one report.

A hideous shriek came from Jonathan's lips, and his horse, rearing at the unusual sound, threw him heavily into the roadway.

This was an event that produced the utmost consternation in the minds of his men, and they rode their horses against one another at a loss how to act.

But when the others came up they dismounted, and went in a body to where he lay.

He was quite insensible, or else dead; which of the two it was they could not take upon themselves to say.

Levee was the first to recover himself, and take the responsibility of action.

In fact he had something of a personal feeling against Blake, which may go a long way towards accounting for it.

"Mount, four of you, and follow me. The remainder had better attend to Mr. Wild, and convey him to Newgate-street. Now, then, off and away."

But the time that had elapsed since Jonathan fell from his horse was sufficient to permit the fugitives to get both out of sight and hearing.

CHAPTER LVI.

JACK SHEPPARD IS ALARMED AT FINDING EDGORTH BESS HAS BEEN WOUNDED BY A PISTOL SHOT.

The appearance of Jonathan Wild in the road in advance of the fugitives looks a little mysterious, and lest the reader should fall into the mistake of supposing him ubiquitous, we will proceed to account for that rather peculiar state of affairs.

After the little cross accident at the turnpike he felt that his prey had got too good a start for him to be able to come up with them without a very long chase into the country, which was a thing he by no means desired.

They must be intercepted.

But how?

The strategic brain of the great thief-taker was not long in devising a means.

We have before had occasion to remark on the intimate knowledge he possessed of London and its environs. It had been acquired at the expense of a great deal of time and trouble, but its value to him was immense.

In the present instance he knew that the road curved very considerably round to the left, being, in fact, bow-like in shape.

But this was scarcely apparent to any one upon the road itself. The radius of the curve was too great for it to be appreciated unless by some one viewing the country from above.

The idea, then, at once entered Wild's mind that if he took to the fields and pushed forward in a direct line at a good speed, he would be able to steal a march, so to speak, upon those of whom he was in chase, by getting in advance of them.

To be sure he ran the risk of losing them altogether, if they happened to take to the fields or any one of the cross-roads diverging from the main one, but a mode of preventing their escape by this means quickly occurred to him.

Taking three of the men with him, he directed four others to keep in the meadows on the north side of the road, and four more on the south, for by the time the altercation with the pikeman was over the remainder of the band had arrived.

Having made these dispositions, then, and in an incredibly short space of time, Jonathan set off at full speed over the open country, quite heedless of the damage he might do.

Jonathan calculated, too, that hearing no sounds of pursuit might lull the fugitives into false security, and cause them to proceed at an easy rate.

In this, as the reader is aware, he would have been perfectly right, had it not been that Blueskin felt the safest course was to get as far from London in as small a space of time as he possibly could.

Jonathan Wild, followed by his men, took his course most undeviatingly across the open country, with apparently nothing whatever to guide him.

At last he reached the cross-roads just above Ealing turnpike, and there he drew up.

His joy was great when the faint trampling of horses' hoofs reached his ears.

He was in time.

The eight men in the meadows, he calculated, would be very close indeed behind them.

So far all had gone well, when a little circumstance occurred which he had omitted to take into account, though, if he had, it would have amounted to much the same thing.

The moon broke forth.

Yes, that was the contingency that had been overlooked. The moon rose above the clouds, and he was discovered sometime before he intended to be.

He was in hopes that his sudden appearance right before their very faces would fill them with a momentary panic, of which he would take advantage.

The men in the rear would have prevented all retreat.

Had things turned out just as he wished, the position of our friends would have been perilous indeed; but, as it so happened, they saw him in time to save themselves.

Any ordinary man, one would have thought, would in Wild's place have even then dashed forward and attempted to capture them, but this he felt would be most impolitic until his men were behind them.

Then the affair would have been easy.

It would have so turned out had not Edgworth Bess happened to see the men crossing the fields on both sides of the road.

A bold action now alone could save them, and what could be bolder than attempting to force a passage over Wild and his three men?

The very audacity of the proceeding went a long way towards crowning it with success, for certainly nothing was further from Wild's expectations.

We have seen how it succeeded, and how, by a pistol bullet, he had been laid low.

Having thus far explained matters, we will return to the fugitives, whose perils were by no means over.

"Speak!" said Jack Sheppard, anxiously turning round towards his companion. "Speak, dearest, are you unhurt?"

"It is nothing."

"You were hit, then?" said Jack, as he brought his horse to a stand-still.

"What are you pulling up for?" asked Blueskin, turning towards them. "You must be mad! On—on!"

Bess is wounded," said Jack.

"No—no! I hope not!" said Blueskin in tones of alarm, and reaching the side of Jack's horse with a bound.

"No—no! I hope not! At least, not seriously."

"It is nothing, believe me," said Edgworth Bess. "Do not stay. Oh! do not. Fly—fly!"

"But not if you are wounded. A trifling wound is made a dangerous one by inattention. Where were you hit? Speak quickly, in order that there may be no more delay."

"On my neck."

Blueskin leaned forward, and then saw that the back of the young girl's neck and her shoulder were quite covered with blood.

"This is a serious hurt, I fear," said Blueskin.

"No—no," cried Jack; "do not say that—do not say that."

With great speed now Blueskin took from his pocket a handkerchief, and with it wiped away the blood as well as he could, in order to discover the nature of the wound.

He trembled, in spite of himself, as he did so.

To his intense relief he found, however, that the wound was nothing more than a scratch along the back of her neck, and scarcely more than skin deep.

This would account for the profuse manner in which it bled, it being the characteristic of such wounds.

"A very close touch," he said; "but as it is, there is not much harm done."

"It is not dangerous, then?" said Jack, with a sensation of the utmost relief.

"Certainly not; all that is requisite is to stop the flow of blood. Take off your cravat, and I will form it into a bandage, and then matters will be all right until we can give it a little more attention."

Jack tore off his cravat in a moment, and handed it to his friend, who, having again wiped away the blood, bound it tightly about her neck.

"There," he said, "you will do now. It is a good thing you spoke when you did, or the consequences might have been serious indeed."

"Thank heaven," said Jack, "that you have escaped. I shudder when I think that a difference of two inches in our position, at that critical moment, would have bereft me of all I hold dear in the world, for, without you, I should not care to live. My life would have no purpose."

These words were, as the reader may suppose, spoken by Jack, in a whisper, to his companion.

Blueskin was listening for sounds of pursuit.

"They follow us, yet," he cried. "Forward, Jack, all is well now. We have an excellent start. Let us take care to keep it."

"Is Jonathan dead, I wonder?" asked Jack. "I heard him yell out."

"He was hit certainly; but whether killed, is more than I can say. His horse reared, and threw him to the ground."

"He will be incapable of continuing the pursuit in person, then. There is some hope in that. On—on."

"One minute," said Blueskin. "When we get far enough to be completely out of earshot of our foes, we will leave the high-road, and strike across the country to the right, where I am in hopes of finding you shelter, if Bess can keep up so long."

"Oh, yes—yes. Do not think of me, I beg, except that I am willing to endure anything to escape."

"You have a brave spirit, like your father."

"My father? You knew him, then?"

Blueskin was silent. He had, in an unguarded moment, said that which it was his intention to remain locked up in his breast for the present.

"Tell me. Tell me. My father? Oh, speak."

"I did know him. But this is neither the time nor the place for explanations. On, if we are yet to escape."

There was so much obvious truth in this that the young girl curbed her intense desire to know something of her parents, and continued silent.

The reader, however, must not suppose they had been standing still during this brief dialogue. Such was not the case. They had been going at an easy gallop, but now they put their horses to full speed.

Once more did the trees and hedgerows seem to flit by them, like objects in rapid motion. Once more did the beat of the horses' hoofs upon the hard road break the stillness of the night.

It was full three-quarters of an hour before Blueskin slackened speed, and then it was because he had reached the point where he wished to leave the high road; but before he did so it was necessary for him to ascertain whether his pursuers were within hearing.

He adapted the plan which he found serve his purpose before, namely, to place his ear upon the road and listen.

This time all was still.

Not the faintest sound which might be construed into heralding the approach of his foes made itself apparent.

"All is well," he said; "I really believe we have distanced them this time."

"Unless they have taken to the meadows."

"That is a point we can ascertain."

"How?"

"You are young and agile. Yonder is a tall poplar; ascend it, and from that elevation you will be able to command a view of the country for many miles."

"I will do it," said Jack, as he at once rode towards the tree spoken of, "I shall manage it easily enough."

"So much the better."

The feat of climbing up a tree was nothing to one whose muscular system was so well developed as Jack's was, and in less time than one could have thought possible, he was amongst the topmost branches of the tree.

From this advantageous position he took a long, steady look about him, but nothing save the various objects which composed the landscape met his gaze.

Feeling, then, tolerably confident that their foes were not very close at hand, he descended.

"All is well?" said Blueskin, interrogatively.

"I hope so. I can see no one."

"Mount, then, and we will be off; but as we have yet to go some distance we will not distress our horses by making too much speed."

"They are splendid animals," said Jack, "and have served us well."

"All the better reason to take care of them. Come on."

With these words he turned down a narrow lane, leading in a north-westerly direction from where they then stood.

"Cheer up, dearest," said Jack, as he followed his comrade, whose position was now so different to what it had been.

CHAPTER LVII.

THE THREE FRIENDS FIND A REFUGE FROM JONATHAN WILD IN THE RUINS OF TYLNEY ABBEY.

Two hours after this our friends came to a halt.

During that time they had heard nothing of their foes. There were no indications of the coming day.

The moon had attained her greatest altitude and brilliancy, for not even one of those beautiful white misty clouds, so generally seen on moonlight nights, speckled the heavens.

"We are in Oxfordshire now, Jack," said Blueskin.

"We passed the boundary a little while ago."

"Indeed, I had no idea we had come so far."

"Few have accomplished the distance in so short a time as we have. It is a good forty miles from here to London. And now look round. Can you on your right, at about a mile distant, see a mass of trees?"

"Yes, it seems quite a large forest."

"That, then, is our destination."

"The wood?"

"Exactly. But if you look a little more carefully you will see the top of an old ruin."

Jack Sheppard, whose curiosity was instantly aroused, strained his eyes, and then saw, dim and indistinct, something which, aided a little by the imagination, did look like a ruin.

Edgworth Bess, too, looked curiously towards the place which it appeared Blueskin had selected as being a safe place of refuge.

"What ruin is it?" asked Jack. "What place is it? Why are you so mysterious?"

"One question at a time. Walk your horse; there is no occasion for hurry now, and I will tell you."

"Will this road lead us to it?"

"No, you must take the first lane to the right. I will show you. And now to reply to your question. That ruin which you see yonder is all that remains to show where Tylney Abbey, one of the grandest ecclesiastical edifices in all England, once stood."

"I have heard the name."

"No doubt, no doubt. The place, as you see, is now surrounded by a wood. By some means or other the place has got an evil reputation, and the consequence is that not one of the inhabitants of this district can be, under any circumstances, induced to approach it."

"I see. And so you think from this very fact it will be a safe place of refuge?"

"I do, until a better can be found. I have no hesitation in saying that their supernatural terror is without adequate cause. Some accidental occurrence has given rise to it."

"I am not frightened," said Jack, hesitatingly, "but I do not know how Bess would be."

"With you safe and content anywhere," she whispered.

Jack was delighted with this reply, and regretted that their positions were such as to make it impossible for him to clasp her to his heart, which he had the greatest possible inclination to do.

"Bess," said Blueskin, who of course did not hear her reply, "is, I am sure, possessed of too much good sense to be alarmed upon such needless grounds."

"It's all right," said Jack, "she says she don't mind."

"I knew she would not, especially if she took into account all the advantages there would be in staying in such a place. We might count upon absolute safety, for that we should rest somewhere is absolutely necessary."

"I am quite willing to be guided by you," said Bess; "besides which, I am most anxious to hear what you know about my father."

"You shall hear it. We will also take measures of some kind to rescue your possessions from your unnatural uncle."

"I am very curious to know several things," said Jack, after a short pause.

"Defer them until we arrive. Talking now is far from an agreeable occupation, besides which, I wish to tell you what I intend in a straightforward manner."

"One question," said Jack; "how long do you think of staying at this abbey? What is the name of it?"

"Tylney."

"Yes, Tylney Abbey. How long are we to stay there?"

"That will depend entirely upon circumstances. At present it is out of my power to say."

A few minutes now served to bring them to the boundary of the wood which surrounded the abbey ruins.

It was evident, from the manner in which Blueskin took the lead, that the place was by no means unfamiliar to him. Jack observed it, but said nothing. He knew that all would be fully explained at a fitting opportunity.

A broad, leafy glade, which seemed like some well-kept avenue in a nobleman's grounds, stretched out before them. The turf beneath their feet was soft and springy, and the horses' hoofs made no sound as they came in contact with it.

Upon most occasions this spot was in darkness, but now, owing to the altitude of the moon, it was lighted up with great distinctness, and presented a spectacle of magic beauty very rarely indeed met with.

As they proceeded, however, it grew gradually narrower, and consequently darker.

Upon reaching its termination, Blueskin spoke.

"Dismount," he said. "You will no longer be able to proceed on horseback. I will lead the way."

Jack obeyed, and assisted Bess to alight.

Both were glad, after having maintained one position for so long, to make this change.

With his horse's bridle over one arm, and the other arm supporting his fair companion, he followed Blueskin along a narrow and mazy footpath.

It was only with difficulty that they could see about them now, and at every step they took the darkness seemed to deepen.

But no words could possibly convey an idea of the intense silence that prevailed in that deserted place at that lonely hour, nor can the imagination, without reality, form a due conception of it.

More tangled became the path at every step they took, and more difficult to travel. Luxuriant undergrowth encumbered the ground, while projecting boughs from the trees and shrubs on either side of them formed almost an impenetrable barrier.

But when it seemed as though really they could force a way no further, a light appeared before them, and, in another moment, they emerged into a kind of courtyard in the abbey ruins.

This place, seen by the chastened light that then illumined it, was, indeed, most beautiful, and such as neither Jack nor Bess had ever seen or heard of.

The inclosure in which they stood was about a hundred yards in length, by forty or fifty in breadth. It was surrounded on all sides by tall, crumbling walls, their gray-looking surface being in many places relieved by dark patches, where the ivy, and other climbing parasites, embraced them.

Many windows and quaint-looking doorways were visible—the former all light—the latter deep shadow.

It was, however, but a hurried and transient view that Sheppard and his companion had of this place. Calling to them to follow him, Blueskin made his way in a direct line across it, and under a dark archway.

On the other side of this was a small paved court, not dissimilar in appearance to the one they had just left.

Beyond this there was another and another, which served to show Jack the vastness of the building.

At length Blueskin paused before a low arched door.

The stout oak wood of which it was composed had, like the walls, resisted time. It was clamped heavily with iron, which doubtless contributed not a little to its durability, for it now presented an appearance of great strength.

"It is a fine place, Jack, is it not?" said Blueskin. "A little ghostly-looking, but I like it all the better for that."

"I should think we should be safe here?"

"Safer than anywhere in England. Even if they knew we were secreted here, and that is a piece of knowledge they are not likely to get, they would have a great deal of trouble in capturing us. There are a thousand turnings and windings and secret places in the ancient fabric that would puzzle them, for the monks who built this place in olden times had cunning spirits."

"You seem to know all about it, Blue?"

"Do I?"

"Yes. Have you ever been here before?"

"Wait a bit. I'll tell you all presently. Bess, my dear—you must excuse me, you know—are you not very tired and badly in want of a rest?"

"I am indeed."

"Very well. Jack, just hold my horse a minute, and then I shall be able to unfasten the door."

Jack hastened forward, and took Blueskin's horse by the bridle, while that individual, after a minute's search in his pocket, produced a picklock.

Long practice had made him skilful in the use of such articles, and the bolt of the lock flew back in a moment.

The door creaked dismally as it swung open upon its hinges.

Blueskin took his horse again and led him through the opening.

Jack Sheppard, with Bess and his horse, followed.

It was in a kind of garden that they now found themselves, or rather what had at some remote period or other been a garden. Now it was merely an enclosed place, overgrown with tall, luxuriant grass.

A great portion of this place was in shadow, for the walls were so high as to intercept at least one-half of the moon's rays.

Jack Sheppard and Edgworth Bess could not help looking about them with the greatest curiosity and interest. To the young and uninitiated taste there is always something entrancing in the contemplation of such scenes.

"This place will do for the horses," said Blueskin, as he turned his loose. "They cannot stray from here, do what they will, for there is no outlet except by that door yonder, and that we can keep closed."

As he spoke, Blueskin raised his arm, and pointed to a small door in the wall nearly opposite the one by which they had entered, and which had been carefully secured again.

"And where does that lead to?" asked Jack.

"To the interior of the ruins. Hitherto you have seen nothing but the outer courts."

"It is an extensive place."

"You have had no means of judging of its vastness, for what you have seen forms but a small portion of the venerable pile. But come, I will show you the interior."

With the help of the picklock Blueskin opened the little door.

He stood on one side to allow his companion to pass him.

Then he secured the door.

"Keep straight along the passage. There is no obstruction, and it is only a few feet in length. There is a flight of steps at the end."

But although this assurance had been given him, Jack felt rather disinclined to walk along a place so profoundly dark as that was, so he would have Blueskin to precede them.

It was not for his own sake though, that Jack Sheppard was so careful. It was for his companion's.

Blueskin advanced without hesitation to the foot of the stairs he had spoken of.

"It is an awkward place in the dark for those who are unaccustomed to it, so I will get a light."

"Will it be safe?"

"Oh! yes. If any of the peasants saw it they would set it down to the ghosts."

The ascent was a fatiguing one, the steps being upwards of a hundred in number.

At the top Blueskin turned round, and ushered them into a small chamber.

"This is at the top of the north turret," he said, "and here we are quite at home you see."

CHAPTER LVIII.

BLUESKIN GIVES EDGORTH BESS AND JACK SHEPPARD SOME ACCOUNT OF HIS PROCEEDINGS.

THAT portion of the old abbey ruins which was known as the north turret derived its name no doubt from its position, forming, as it did, the most northerly portion of the edifice.

The room at the top really did look as though they would be at home in it. To Jack's astonishment he found several articles of furniture in it, which could only lately have been placed there, while in a primitive-looking grate a quantity of wood was piled up, which would soon burn up into a good fire.

These things were rendered visible, not so much by the lantern Blueskin carried as by the light of the moon, which poured in through the window in a perfect flood, and lighted up every corner with the greatest distinctness.

"Here we are quite at home, you see," said Blueskin again, as he closed the door; "you did not expect this, did you? Stop a moment until I have lighted the wood, and then see how different the place will look."

"It's a strange thing to find it in this condition, but I suppose it is your doings."

"No." "No! There is a story attached to the whole affair which you shall know at the earliest opportunity. I know you are curious, but if you will let me be I will tell you all that has taken place since we parted. There, now, that is something like."

Blueskin had opened the lamp and set fire to the wood.

It blazed up bonnily.

"It is," replied Jack Sheppard; "and now Bess, sit down. Here is a chair. I am sure you must be weary in body and mind after all you have gone through to-night."

Edgorth Bess smiled faintly. She bore up well, but in reality she was all but exhausted.

It must be borne in mind that although she had not lost any serious amount of blood, yet she had lost enough to weaken her to no small degree.

The bandage which Blueskin had placed around her neck had effectually stanchd the effusion of blood.

It was really surprising how comfortable the old place looked after the space of two or three minutes, and when Blueskin went to a cupboard which they had not previously noticed and took from it some provisions their comfort was quite complete.

All were hungry, and made a hearty meal of the substantial fare before them; but as soon as the cravings of hunger were appeased, Jack turned to Blake, and said,—

"I am dying with curiosity to have an explanation of all this. I am puzzled beyond measure. Do not keep us any longer in suspense, but tell us at once."

"Such is my intention. In the bottom part of the cupboard you will find some wood. Put some on the fire, and we shan't have to interrupt to do that. Then I will begin."

Jack gladly enough executed this commission, and piled the wood on the fire in such a way as to make it readily catch light.

But as he did this, his eye rested upon the bandage round Bess's neck, and he recollected that her wound had not been attended to, as it ought to have been, first thing.

"Forgive me," he said, and his voice proclaimed how much he was vexed. "Forgive me for being so careless and forgetful; but I have been so much occupied by the sights here, that I forgot to look to your wound."

"Oh! yes," she replied, "so had I."

She carried her hand to her neck as she spoke.

"Then if that is the case," interrupted Blueskin, "it shows that it is nothing of any account. I am glad of it."

"But that is no excuse for me," said Jack. "It might have been dangerous."

"If I myself forgot it, I think you may be excused for doing so. Until you spoke, I had forgotten it."

With trembling fingers Jack undid the bandage, and when it was fairly removed his delight may be imagined, when he found the bullet had done nothing more than scratch the skin for about two inches.

The bleeding must have ceased immediately the bandage was tied over it, for it was scarcely stained.

"Thank heaven!"

Bess smiled.

All three now seated themselves round the fire, while Jack, taking his fair companion's hand in his, with her awaited the commencement of Blueskin's narrative.

"In the first place," he said, "about these ruins."

"Yes—yes. How did you come to know of them?"

"From one of Wild's men."

"One of Wild's men? How, then, can we be safe? Will he not search this place thoroughly?"

"Wait a bit, until you have heard all. This man's name was Geoffrey. He was a great friend of mine. He is dead, now. Jonathan had him hanged the sessions before last."

"Indeed."

"He did. One day he took me so far into his confidence as to tell me of this place, though he assured me that he had never before hinted at its existence to any one. He always intended it in case of danger as a place of refuge to which he could fly and remain undetected."

Jack nodded.

"It was he, then, who managed at odd times to furnish the place as you now find it. He also laid in a splendid supply of fuel in the shape of wood. In his conversation, he very accurately and minutely described the whole of it, so that when I came here yesterday to verify his story, I had no difficulty from his description in finding my way hither."

"Yesterday?"

"Well, perhaps it would be more correct to say last night, for it was night when I got here. I learned a very important fact, namely, that Lord Donnull—for such is his name—had had an interview with Wild."

"I guessed as much from what Jonathan said to me."

"Oh! indeed. Now, however, I am overrunning my story. I ought to have told you when speaking of Geoffrey that it was only two days after he told me about this place that Jonathan had him committed to Newgate on a charge of robbery, and seven days afterwards executed at Tyburn."

"Good heavens! Can it be possible?"

"It was, and so you see there is a pretty fair inference that I am the only person to whom this place is known. I mention this in order that you may have no groundless alarm about it."

"Very good, and now you say you learned that Lord Donnull had had an interview with Jonathan?"

"Just so."

"Then what had that to do with your coming here?"

"His lordship I knew could only have seen Wild upon one subject, and that was relative to his niece. He would offer a large sum for Jonathan to place her in his hands."

"I think he did."

"You remember, then, that the last I saw of you was when I left you speaking to Wild in his own room?"

"I know it was—the villain! Where did you go?"

"To the 'Maggie and Stump' opposite, and who should I find there when I entered but Quilt Arnold, who, in the course of some talk we had together, told me that Lord Donnull had had an interview with Jonathan."

"I see."

"Well, I waited a long time at the 'Maggie,' for where I sat I could see the door of Little Newgate, and I made sure I should see you come out, but you never came, and at last I thought, as the hours slipped by, that you must have slipped out when my attention was withdrawn, though I hardly thought it was possible."

"I was in one of Wild's dungeons then, my friend."

"Never mind now. Tell me your adventures when I have done. I thought at last I would go over and inquire whether you really had left. Tonks was on the lock, so I asked him. He told me you had been gone more than a couple of hours."

"The villain!"

"Wild had no doubt told him to give that answer to anyone who might inquire for you. I was far from satisfied. I went to the 'Black Lion,' and found you had not been there. Then some suspicion of the truth entered my mind."

"I suppose so."

"However, I was rather at a loss how to act, for I did not know who was in the most danger, you or Edgworth Bess; but I reasoned thus: you were better able to defend yourself than she was, and so I made up my mind to find her some secure place of retreat, where she would run no risk of being found by Wild, and then turn my attention to you, for I made up my mind that you should suffer no injury at the hands of Wild."

"Thanks for that. It shows you are a friend."

Blueskin took no notice, but went on.

"While casting about for a place, this old abbey came into my mind. I did not decide upon it all at once, but thought of several other places. In the end, however, I decided upon this."

"So far, of course, all was quite right, except that I had only Geoffrey's word for such a place being in existence. Bess I knew would be safe for a few hours longer where she then was. So I mounted and rode here to see whether all was as had been represented to me."

"I begin to see now."

"Of course you do. Although then I had my doubts, yet I felt pretty sure that I should find things just as he described them. Still, as there was a doubt, I thought it would be impolitic to take Bess away from the 'Black Lion' until I had satisfied myself, as, by so doing, I might perhaps be taking her into unnecessary danger."

"You were thoughtful."

"No harm, I considered, would ensue if I took down with me a good stock of provisions, so I did so. Came here—found the place as you see it now, and stowed the provender into the cupboard."

"Capital. Really, the more I hear the more indebted I become to you."

"Just stir the fire and listen. Having succeeded so far I turned back to London. The first place I went to was Drury-lane. Johnson was standing at the door. I asked whether Bess was all right, and on telling me she was, I went without delay to Newgate-street."

"You were indefatigable. And you did all this for me?"

"Partly for you, partly for her. For the pair of you I would gladly do ten times as much. It was early morning when I reached Wild's house: in fact, about an hour before dawn. I found the place in the utmost confusion. Joe White had been killed by a blow on the head, and two prisoners had escaped. I soon found they were you and some other person."

"Sir Marmaduke Osborn."

"Wild was furious, and out somewhere, as they supposed, in search of you. As this was several hours after you had made your escape I felt pretty sure that you had got clear off. At all events I did not see how I was to be of service to you, so I went to bed, for I was utterly worn out."

"I should think you were."

"I do not believe I could have kept up an hour longer. I went to bed then, and never awoke until about an hour before you saw me."

"Indeed; what did you do?"

"I learned Wild had come home. I felt that you and him and Bess yonder would be enemies to the death. I could not serve both, so I followed my inclination and sided with you."

"And you will?"

"To the last day of my life. Jonathan and myself are now as great enemies as you and he are. The interview I had with him was a rather stormy one, and he made an attack upon my life. In the brief struggle that ensued, though, I proved myself the stronger, for he was badly hurt."

Jack laughed.

"I left my mark, I know."

"It was you then that had mauled him so, was it? Never mind, I got off all safe, and arrived at the 'Black Lion' just in time to save you."

"You did, indeed. Without your interposition we should both have been inmates of Wild's house."

"Not a doubt; and now you know all."

"Not all," said Edgworth Bess, quietly, who had never uttered a word during the explanation, "not all. You promised to speak to me of—of—my father!"

CHAPTER LIX.

IN WHICH BLUESKIN RELATES THE STORY OF HIS LIFE, AND ADVISES EDGWORTH BESS TO PURSUE A PARTICULAR MODE OF ACTION.

"So you did, Blueskin," said Jack Sheppard, "so you did. I, too, am full of anxiety to know that. I will tell you my adventures afterwards."

A remarkable change came over the face of Joe Blake, but this circumstance only inflamed Jack's desire.

"At last," he thought, "I am going to hear that which he has before so resolutely refused to tell me."

Blueskin spoke, and both the young people became eagerly attentive to the words he uttered.

"I have already told you the name of your unnatural uncle. It is Lord Donnnull, but the title, like the estates, is not lawfully his, although he has so long held possession of them."

"But he shan't much longer," said Jack, impetuously.

"My whole energies shall be employed in wresting his ill-gotten gains from him."

"It is rather singular, but I have to tell you both about your fathers. Strange, too, neither of you can remember them."

Upon hearing these words Jack trembled violently; then, starting to his feet, he stood by Blueskin's side and whispered in his ear,—

"When you speak of my father do not allude to—to"—

He could not complete the sentence. "His ignominious fate," he would have said.

"I understand," said Blueskin, "don't be afraid; I would not speak of it before her for the world."

"That is well."

Jack, whose mind was now at ease, resealed himself. Edgworth Bess looked at both with great surprise, but to Jack's relief said nothing.

"They are two rather singular things," continued Blueskin. "However, you must know about twenty-two years ago, Jack's father—Tom Sheppard his name was—and myself were in the employ of Lord Donnnull—not the present lord—his brother."

"My father?" said Edgworth Bess.

"Just so. I was at that time eighteen; Tom Sheppard four years older; that is, twenty-two. The situations we relatively occupied were coachman and valet. Tom was the former, I was the latter."

"Indeed."

"A very great friendship subsisted between us, and had done for years. Our master was a kind and indulgent one, and the place was everything we could wish."

"It was soon after this that your father, Jack, married, and in less than a twelvemonth after that our master married too."

"There were grand rejoicings on the occasion, of course, and none entered into them with apparently greater zest than master's only brother, Abel."

"The one who is now lord?"

"Yes."

"Go on—go on."

The narrative was one that made them feverishly impatient to hear the sequel. Already the dire domestic tragedy was shadowed forth before them.

"All went well, and then, Jack, you were born. Two years afterwards she who now sits by your side came into the world."

"Just before the accouchment I happened to catch a glimpse of Mr. Abel, for so he was called, as he came out of the library. His aspect frightened me."

"Still, at that time I did not connect the two events at all, though I afterwards had good cause to do so."

"I know that it was master's hope that the child about to be born should prove a boy, but in this he was disappointed. It was a girl."

"But whatever regrets he might have felt upon this account were quickly banished by the alarm, the serious and even dangerous aspect which his wife's illness assumed, for he was more attached to her than husbands are to their wives generally.

"The poor lady never rallied. She lingered for some time, but, in spite of all that medical science could do, she died, and her husband became disconsolate."

"Upon thus hearing the fate of the mother she was destined never to know, the tears thronged thickly in the eyes of Edgworth Bess and trickled down her cheeks.

"The little one, however, which, unlike its parents, was healthy and robust, still lived, and this afforded the bereaved husband the greatest consolation, and, as she grew older, centred in her the affection he had previously felt for her mother. He doated upon her in the fullest acceptance of the word."

"My poor—poor father," said Edgworth Bess, with a fresh outburst of sorrow. "And am I never to know him?"

"He is dead," said Blueskin, avoiding a direct reply to her question.

A pause now of some few moments duration ensued.

It was Jack who spoke.

That probably was because he was the one least under the dominion of painful emotions.

"Come," he said, "do not be so downcast. Go on, Blueskin. Let us hear the rest."

"The worst part of the story is now to come," he replied; "by far the worst part, as you shall hear."

These words caused Edgworth Bess to look up with renewed curiosity.

"It will disclose that which I have never uttered to mortal—what has made me what I am. What I refused to tell you, Jack, on more than one occasion."

"I know you did."

"Lord Donnull, my master, then, doated on his daughter, but adverse fate had not yet done with him. One morning the child disappeared."

"Disappeared?"

"Yes, and no trace was left to show where it had gone. My master was like a madman. In vain every means which could be tried was made available, all was without result, except that suspicion fell upon two persons."

"Two persons?"

"Yes, Tom Sheppard and myself."

"And how was that?"

"By the machinations of Abel Donnull. We were had up, but, although nothing could be proved against us, yet the suspicion which had been attached to our characters was unremoved. We were forced to quit that service in which we had been so happy. Vainly we both tried to elsewhere obtain employment. The story spread—we were refused—and, to save ourselves from starvation, were driven into crime."

"Good heavens!"

"I need not tell you that we were innocent both in thought and deed. Unwearied were our efforts to find the lost one, for we hoped, in the event of our succeeding, all would yet be well; but all was vain, and at last we gave up the search in despair."

"You are both now in possession of facts of which I was then and for long after ignorant. Grief prematurely hurried Lord Donnull to the tomb. You have already learned the conditions of the will. His brother Abel is now in possession of the title and estates."

Edgworth Bess and Jack Sheppard now comprehended all.

"Then this uncle of mine must be a very wicked man," she said.

"He and I have an account to settle," replied Blueskin, "and woe to him when the day of reckoning arrives."

The tone of his voice was gloomy and threatening.

"He has much to answer for," he said. "Thank God, that part of his villainy which doomed you to death was unfulfilled!"

"Between us we can surely overthrow him," said Jack Sheppard.

Blueskin shook his head.

"The task will be a difficult one," he said, "a very difficult one. He is bold and unscrupulous himself, and will obtain bold and unscrupulous agents. Unfortunately, we are not so well situated to defend her as we might be."

"You have already done more than ever I can repay you for—much more," replied Edgworth Bess, "but there is one thing you have not told me, and that is my name. Is it Elizabeth?"

"It is Lady Elizabeth Donnull."

The title sounded strange to her, and when he heard it Jack seemed to feel a barrier rise up between him and the object of his affections.

"I hope," she said, for with a woman's quickness of perception, she read what was passing in Jack's mind. "I hope that to both of you at least I shall never be anything but Edgworth Bess."

"You have your mother's disposition," replied Blueskin. "She was an angel! May your fate be happier than her's."

Alas! this was a hope that was destined not to be fulfilled. However, our readers must peruse the strange story of her fortunes to the end, when one of the most terrible of domestic tragedies will be made patent to them.

"Do not let me ask this of you in vain?" she continued. "Promise me, Jack," she said, as she put her hand upon his shoulder, "promise me that you will never think of or call me by any other name."

"I will—I do!"

"I don't know whether it's right of Jack," said Blueskin, "to make love to you in that kind of way. You must recollect that his position in life is very different to yours."

"Yes; that is it," replied Jack. "I too can feel that it is not right."

"Jack," said Bess, reproachfully, "I do not deserve this; I recollect only that he is my preserver from death, or some still worse fate."

"Well, I hope you will be happy. You will be, if I can make you so! I can tell you this though, Jonathan Wild is a man who is to be dreaded as an enemy."

"Pho! pho!" said Jack. "I don't feel afraid of him; I have always beaten him yet. Listen. I will tell you what took place after you left me with him."

Jack Sheppard then, without further preface, proceeded to relate those facts with which the reader has already been made acquainted. How Jonathan endeavoured to persuade Jack to join him in the nefarious scheme against the heiress, how he had refused, how he had been cast into a cell. Then how he overheard the conversation between Wild and Sir Marmaduke Osborn. The manner in which he entered the baronet's cell, overcame Wild, and set free the unfortunate victim of his rapacity. Their singular adventures on the river, and at last the baronet's decease. To all this Blueskin listened with the greatest conceivable interest, and when Jack concluded his narration, he said—

"For all this, and the wound he received to-night, Wild will seek a bitter vengeance. I tremble for the result."

"Pho! pho!"

"You will find it no light matter. He is a desperate villain!"

"I do not fear him!"

"I never doubted your courage, but you must admit that I know him much better than you do."

"Granted."

"Then I say to you, in all earnestness, beware! We have a difficult and a dangerous part to play, and the chances are all against our being successful."

"Not for the sake of all the riches in the world, then," said Edgworth Bess, "shall you incur this danger on my account. You have done enough already."

"No—no! besides which, we fight for justice. My poor master's memory, although he died thinking badly of me, demands it. By doing this, is the only way of atoning for the crimes of which I have been guilty."

"I am content to leave my inheritance in the hands of those who hold it," said Edgworth Bess. "I have never known wealth and luxury, and therefore do not feel their loss. Let him remain."

"And do you think," said Blueskin, solemnly, "that by such a course as that you are acting rightly. I mean with justice to yourself and your dead parents? No, I am sure you do not. Right is right! but wrong is no man's right."

[BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD EXPLORE THE PASSAGE BENEATH THE NORTH TURRET OF THE RUINED ABBEY.]

CHAPTER LX.

BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD CAME TO AN UNDERSTANDING.

"THAT is true," said Jack Sheppard. "It is a duty you owe to society, to yourself, and to your deceased parents, to strain every nerve to gain possession of that which is yours, by all laws, human and divine."

"I cannot but be convinced of the truth of what you say," said Edgworth Bess; "and after all you have both done for me, it would be unkind and ungenerous upon my part to longer hold out against you."

"That is well," replied Blueskin, rising from his seat. "But look, the new day has already come. While the sun is above the horizon we have but little to fear, and as we must all take rest in the shape of sleep, that is obviously the best time for us to do so. We will then defer all further talk for some few hours. The accommodation is but rude. This room, Bess, we will leave to you, Jack and I shall be able to find a place below."

This proposition was so warmly seconded by Jack, that Edgworth Bess was compelled to accede to it.

"You may consider yourself in perfect security," added Blueskin, as he left the room. "Do not suffer anything to alarm you. We will keep such good watch at the foot of the stairs, that you shall be effectually shielded from all harm. Not, however, that I apprehend anything, but still, we shall take care to be prepared."

Then, without waiting to hear the thanks of the young girl, whose position without two such staunch and true adherents as they proved to be would have been sad indeed, Blueskin closed the door and descended the turret stairs.

"I don't know where we are to find sleeping accommodation," he said to Jack; "but I suppose you, like me, will not be very particular."

"I shall not; besides which, I do not feel at present particularly in need of rest. Do you?"

"Well, no, I can't say I do. When I have a good long sound sleep it lasts me for some time."

"So it does me. Now nearly all day yesterday while I was returning from Tilburyness in a lugger I was asleep, so you see I am not very much in need of it."

"Here, then, is the bottom of the stairs. What do you propose to do?"

"I leave that to you. Is there any outlet to this place save the one by which we entered?"

"Oh! yes. I noticed two small doors."

"Where do they lead?"

"That is more than I can tell. My knowledge of the place is confined to the places you have already seen."

"Then you do not know what is on the other side of those doors?"

"No more than you."

"Then I shall not feel comfortable until I do. I am very curious and restless in that respect."

"Well, we will look if you like. It will serve to pass away the time."

They now paused before one of the doors of which Blueskin had spoken. It was a surprising thing that the wood should have resisted decay in the manner it had, for, although it must have been some centuries old at least, yet there it was firm and strong upon its hinges.

The lock, however, was a very rude affair, with a key-hole large enough to put three fingers into, so that Blueskin unfasted it with the greatest ease.

"Ah! Jack," he said, "people are beginning to understand locks a little now. When this was made they had a notion that the larger the lock and the heavier the key the more secure it would be. That was a grand mistake, and some day people will find that a small lock is a better defence for a door than a large one."

He pushed open the door as he spoke, and crossed the threshold with Jack close at his heels.

Neither were exactly prepared for the magnificent spectacle which now presented itself. The little door led into what was evidently the chapel of the abbey. It was in an excellent state of preservation.

The red gold tints of the rising sun lighted it up with magic splendour. There was a magnificent oriel window—or rather the remains of one, for much of the fine carving and the whole of the glass had disappeared—in the eastern portion of the chapel, and it was through this that the sun's rays came.

It would have been impossible for anyone human to gaze upon such a scene as that was without the keenest sensations of delight, and Jack, who had a warm appreciation of the beautiful, was especially enchanted.

Blueskin, too, who beneath the rough exterior he had assumed carried a mind that had been well informed and a nature almost as gentle as a woman's, was scarcely if any less pleased.

Had it not been for the unfortunate chain of circumstances which had conspired to fix upon him the abduction of the young heiress, how different in every respect would he have been.

He had now, though, the consciousness that he had an important duty to fulfil. He would devote his life to the restoration of his master's daughter to her lawful rights, and, as he reflected upon the strange events which had made her acquainted with him, he fancied he recognised in them the finger of that mysterious power called Providence.

May he succeed! The task, though, would be one of fearful difficulty and danger. No one knew how much the power of Jonathan Wild was to be dreaded better than he did, and he could not help trembling for the result.

Lord Donnull, too, as the reader has seen, was not a man to stick at trifles where so important a thing as ousting him from his estates was concerned. He had all the resources which abundant wealth ever places in the hands of its possessor, while they were fugitives from the laws.

Bitterly, most bitterly, did Blueskin repent that he had led Jack into crime. But it was now too late. The mischief was done.

Such is a summary of the train of thoughts that passed through his mind as he gazed upon the ancient chapel. Jack noticed his abstraction and spoke of it.

"It is nothing," he said. "Come, we have, I fancy, seen all there is in this place to be seen. Let us return. There may be no danger, still we ought not for a moment to leave her unguarded."

This was quite sufficient to make Jack turn back, and hasten to the foot of the turret-stairs. All was still there, however, and just as they had left it.

The second door was now opened. The lock was so corroded with rust that it for a long time resisted all Blueskin's attempts upon it. At last however, it yielded.

"Hullo!"

"What now?"

"Why, look, the place is as dark as pitch. It must be the way to the vaults."

Jack peeped over his friend's shoulder, and certainly the black-looking space on the other side of the door did look as though it led to the vaults. A damp, earthy smell, too, was perceptible.

The turret-staircase itself, which was of course a circular one, received ample light from the loopholes, which were at regular intervals let into the stonework, so that the comparison between the two places was very great indeed.

"You have got a lamp, Blueskin, haven't you?"

"Yes."

"Light it, and then, perhaps, we shall be able to see what kind of place it really is."

"I was just going to do so when you spoke. Stop a minute."

The little lantern was quickly lighted. It was a bull's-eye, and a broad bright ray of light issued from the lens.

"Why," said Blueskin, "it is just a continuation of the turret-stairs."

"So it is," replied Jack, as, leaning forward, he convinced himself of the truth of what his friend had just said.

"Where they lead to of course I don't know. Somewhere underground. The cellars, most probably."

"Is it worth our while to go down?"

"I hardly knew. Are you inclined for an exploring expedition?"

"I am; and independently of that, in my own opinion, I think it ought to be a kind of duty upon our part to make ourselves thoroughly acquainted with every nook and corner of the place, and all its intricacies, in case at any time, we should be attacked here."

"You are right. Not that I much fear such a thing. Still it is possible, and in the event of it, why such a knowledge as you speak of would prove most serviceable."

"I am glad you think as I do."

"It would hardly be possible, on such a point as that, to hold a contrary opinion."

"How differently you talk, and how differently you seem in your manner to what you did when I first knew you."

"Do I, Jack!"

"You do, indeed."

"Then it is because I am more like myself. The other was assumed. The truth is, I was sick and weary of the world. I hated it because it had so unjustly persecuted me, but now that I have found my master's daughter I have something like a purpose in living, and so you see the mask is slipping off my face, and I am becoming more like I once was."

"I am glad of it."

"Well—well! Let us leave it. Are you ready?"

"Quite!"

"Then follow me."

"You think we can leave the turret in safety."

"Oh! yes. I do not think we have anything to fear. Leave the door open and come on."

Blueskin at once began the descent of the winding steps. He held the lantern so as to diffuse as much light as possible.

As they got lower and lower, however, the dampness and chilliness of the place perceptibly increased.

The walls, when the light fell upon them, were seen dripping with wet, while in many places they were overgrown with a kind of green moss.

After descending some thirty steps, Blueskin came to a halt.

"There seems no end to this place," he said. "How much lower do the stairs go, I wonder?"

"That I expect we shall only be able to ascertain by going down."

"I shall try twenty steps more, and if we don't reach the bottom then, I shall feel inclined to give it up."

"Nonsense. Let us explore the place thoroughly."

Blueskin set off again, and after going about six steps lower, he found he reached the bottom of the steps.

They both laughed at this.

The steps terminated in a kind of vaulted chamber, octagonal in shape, and only just high enough to stand upright in.

From this there branched off no less than seven passages.

"Why, this is like a rabbit-warren. Jack, it will take too long for us to explore such a place as this."

"I am afraid so, but we will not go just yet."

They both advanced into the centre of the octagonal apartment, and looked about them.

The entrances to the subterranean passages were all just alike, or so nearly so, that they could detect no difference.

There was nothing to choose between any of them so far as that went.

"Let us go down this one," said Jack, pointing to the opening just opposite him.

"A little way, but I don't think it will be much use, for from the look of the place I should say it was used for the burial of the dead."

"Oh! who knows? Come on."

"Not without some precautions, Jack; I have heard a great deal about such places as these, and how heedless persons have entered and never found their way out."

"Nonsense."

"It is quite true; they are all made just alike everywhere, so that by the time you have made one or two turnings you cannot tell in what direction you are actually going."

"What shall we do then?"

"There is a means," said Blueskin, "if you still wish to enter and explore them. You must get me a piece of mortar somewhere out of the wall."

CHAPTER LXI.

RELATES THE STRANGE THINGS WHICH WERE SEEN IN THE SUBTERRANEAN PASSAGES BENEATH THE NORTH TURRET.

"A piece of mortar?" repeated Jack, "what in the world for?"

"Get it, and I will show you."

Jack had very little difficulty in picking a tolerable-sized piece of mortar from between the interstices of the stones. It was sticky and soft, but it was all the better for that.

"You take the light," said Blueskin, as Jack handed him the lump of mortar, "and lead the way."

About half-a-dozen steps inside the passage he called to him to stop.

"Hold the light down, so that I can see the floor."

Jack did so, full of curiosity to know what it was his companion purposed doing.

He soon comprehended, and was delighted with it.

The floor of the passage was of hard, dry earth, and on this, using the piece of mortar as a substitute for chalk, Blueskin drew an arrow, with the point turned towards the stairs—that is, in the contrary direction to that in which they were proceeding.

"Capital," said Jack.

"It is a good device, and one that is often practised. At every dozen yards or so, I shall draw one of these arrows, so that we shall have no difficulty in returning, or, at any rate, no hesitation as to which is our right course."

"I see. Come on."

The passage, as Blueskin had anticipated, was uniformly the same in its general appearance. It wound about in a serpentine fashion, and occasionally they came to where other passages either branched off or led into it. Whenever this occurred he was particularly careful with the arrows.

"I do not wonder at people losing themselves in such a place," said Jack, as they emerged into a chamber resembling the one they had just left. "If I did not know it was impossible, I should say this was the spot we started from. Look, there are six openings, and the one we have just come out of makes the seventh. Here, too, is a door, with steps beyond it."

"Ha! ha!"

"Why do you laugh?"

"At you, to be sure, for supposing this chamber to be one resembling that we have just left. Why, it's the same."

"Impossible."

"One would think so. I should have been of that opinion, but we can easily convince ourselves. Look, here is the passage we have just come out of."

"Yes."

"Well, I will draw an arrow. Now, there it is. If it is not the same chamber as the one we left, we shan't find the arrow on the floor. We can't mistake one for the other, because this is at the very beginning of the passage."

"I see."

"And the other is about half-a-dozen steps in, is it not?"

"It is."

"Very well, we will take them in succession, and rely upon it we shall soon find it."

Jack could not bring himself to believe that his comrade was right. He did not think it possible that they could have taken such a circuitous course as to come out at the spot from which they started.

Such though, extraordinary as it seemed, proved to be the case. Just inside the third turning to the left of the one from which they had emerged was the one they had entered such a short time before. The arrow which Blueskin had drawn dissipated all doubt.

He very much enjoyed Jack's astonishment, and he said—

"I have often read of such things as this, and so the result was to some extent expected by me, but it will serve to convince you of the necessity of taking the precaution I did, in order to find our way out again."

"It is wonderful," replied Jack. "I can now scarcely realize it."

"I can understand that, and now let us try another. From what has happened, I feel almost sure that there is here some secret mode of exit. If we can find it the advantages will be more than we can correctly estimate, for not only may it prove of service to us, in case we should have to escape, but also as a mode of entrance, for if I mistake not we shall find the outlet at some considerable distance from the ruins themselves."

"I am ready, then," said Jack, "and I only hope your supposition may be confirmed."

As he spoke these words, he followed his companion down another of the passages.

The resemblance that was preserved was really wonderful. This passage was the exact counterpart of the others.

For a long time they went on and on, until at last Jack began to think there was no termination.

Blueskin led the way.

Suddenly he trod upon some treacherous substance, which crunched beneath his feet, and, before he could recover himself, he fell at full length on the ground.

The lamp flew from his grasp, rolled for a foot along the floor of the passage, and then disappeared.

In an instant all was utter darkness.

Jack Sheppard uttered a loud cry of astonishment and alarm, which sounded dismally in the cavernous place.

"All right!" said Blueskin, scrambling to his feet. "Stand still, Jack. Confound it; but it is no more than I deserved. I ought to have been more cautious."

"But the lantern," cried Jack; "what has become of it? This darkness is awful."

"The fall doubtless put it out. Be careful not to move. We shall find it. That's better."

Blueskin took a match from his pocket and ignited it.

There was for a moment a bright flash of light, and he held it low down on the ground.

The first thing that met his gaze was the substance which had caused his fall.

"Good heavens, Jack!" he cried, "this is a skeleton."

"A skeleton?"

"Yes; all but crumbled to dust. It was treading on it that threw me down."

"Can you see the lantern?"

"No. I will crawl forward a little way."

He went down on his hands and knees.

In his right hand he held the match, which, being composed of some ceraceous substance, burned for some few moments.

His left hand he used to feel the way.
All at once he found the ground give way beneath his hand.

A rushing noise as of earth falling down a well followed.

Then the match went out.

He could not restrain a groan, and the perspiration of intense fear broke out over him.

His left hand grasped nothing but vacancy.

The horrible truth flashed in a moment through his brain.

"What is the matter, Blake?" asked Jack. "Speak. Are you hurt?"

"No, thank God! Do not stir hand or foot for the world."

"What is it?"

"Stop, and I will get a light."

Trembling in every limb, Blueskin assumed a sitting posture.

He drew forth from his pocket the box of matches.

But his hand shook to such an excess that he could hardly light one.

At last he did so.

The tiny flame fell full upon his face.

Jack was astounded at its ashy paleness.

"Speak, Blake," he said. "What has happened? You look frightened to death."

"And well I might. Hold the match a moment for me. I have in my pocket some pieces of candle which are used to burn in the lantern. I will light one of them, and then we shall be better able to see what we are about."

This was quickly done.

Of course the light it gave now was nothing near so bright as it was when in the lantern, but still they were able to see tolerably well with it.

Blueskin rose to his feet, and grasped the smooth wall of the passage for support.

He could not control his agitation.

"You are not so frightened at a skeleton, are you?" asked Jack.

"No," he replied in a hollow voice. "It was the narrow and miraculous escape I have just had from a frightful death."

"A frightful death?" repeated Jack.

"Yes. Come forward carefully, and I will show you."

The piece of wax-candle had now fairly caught light, and burned freely.

Blueskin held out his hand as far as he could before him, and took two steps forward.

Jack followed.

"Stop!" he cried. "Look there."

Jack strained his eyes, but saw nothing.

"Look where?" he asked.

"On the ground before you."

Jack Sheppard glanced down near his feet, and then, to his horror, found he was standing upon the verge of an abyss.

The first shock over, he proceeded to look more carefully about him.

The disappearance of the lantern was at once accounted for.

The floor of the passage abruptly terminated at the brink of a pit.

Of its extent forwards he could form no idea, but it reached from one wall to the other.

It was now Jack's turn to feel sick at heart, as the imminence of the peril from which he had escaped became palpable to him.

He turned to his comrade.

"What does this mean?" he asked.

"You may well ask that, and be thankful for the accidental circumstance which was the means of preventing our falling down that frightful place."

"I am thankful."

"But for the presence of that skeleton, and my accidental fall over it, our doom would have been sealed. Nothing could have saved us."

"Nothing, I fear."

"The perils of this place are even greater than I thought they were. I have heard before now of such places contrived by the subtle spirits of the monks. This pit has evidently been contrived as a trap to destroy those who wandered in this place unpossessed of its secrets."

"It is awful."

"Who this poor wretch is we shall, I suppose, never know, nor how it was he perished where he did. Little did he think that his crumbling remains would, perhaps a hundred years after his decease, be the means of preserving two human lives."

"Let us retrace our steps," said Jack, "with all the caution possible. We will no longer tempt our fate. Come!"

"In a moment. Where we are we have nothing to fear. The danger of this place consisted in the fact of the existence of the pit being unknown. Once aware of it, the peril ceases."

CHAPTER LXII.

SHOWS HOW THE REMAINDER OF THE DAY WAS SPENT AMONG THE OLD ABBEY RUINS.

"I DON'T pretend to gainsay that," replied Jack, "but the sooner we get back again I think the better."

"So do I. Your nerves, like mine, are unstrung. I confess I never in my life experienced so terrible a sensation as I did when I found the earth give way, and my hand slip into the pit."

"I don't wonder at it."

"I am vexed the lantern has gone, we should then have been able to make a better examination of the place. I should be loath to leave it now until I have satisfied my curiosity. Lie down and crawl forward, and I will hold the light. We then shall be able to see a little more, I hope."

Curiosity was a strong feeling in Jack's breast, and now, as he recovered from his shock, he was quite willing to examine the place.

By adopting the means proposed there was little fear of falling over.

They crawled forward until their heads and necks hung fairly over the edge of the pit, if such it were.

But, although Blueskin held the little piece of wax candle down to the full extent of his arm, they could see nothing more than the side upon which they were.

This was composed of dark, shiny rock, and went down perpendicularly. They could not, however, see anything like the bottom.

Jack felt about him for a stone, which would enable him to form some estimate of its depth, by the time it took to fall.

He soon found one.

It was a piece of rock, about two pounds in weight.

Blueskin saw what he was about, and said—

"Throw it forwards, and we shall have an idea of its diameter."

"That is what I was going to do," replied Jack, as he let go the piece of rock.

It disappeared instantly in the gloom, and then directly afterwards they heard it strike against the rock on the opposite side.

Having struck, it glanced off, and then continued to rebound from side to side until the motion grew so rapid that they were unable to count the strokes.

A faint splash followed.

Then all was still.

"A frightful depth," said Jack, with a shudder.

"Come away. We can know no more, now."

"We cannot. Jack, my friend, our death would have been certain if we had fallen down that place."

"I shudder when I think of our narrow escape. Let it be a lesson to us to be careful. Oh! if we had fallen, what would have become of Bess?"

"Do not unman yourself by speculating upon that. We are saved, but by little short of a miracle."

They both rose as Blake thus spoke.

"Have you another piece of candle?" asked Jack. "If you have, light it, and let me carry it. We shall then see better where we are going."

"Yes, I have several pieces. I always take care to supply myself well with them, in case of accidents or circumstances occurring to make it impossible to get them just at the moment they are required."

"It is a wise precaution," said Jack. "In future I shall take care always to adopt it."

"You should never, under any circumstances, be without having the means about you of readily procuring a light. Think what our position would have been if I had only provided myself with one piece of candle. We should have been starved to death in these passages, for to have got out in the dark would be utterly impossible."

"You reconcile me to our position," replied Sheppard, "by showing me how much worse it might easily have been. I shall never forget this."

"Nor I. But before we go, let us look more attentively at the poor remains, which, by throwing me down, saved my life and yours."

Only a few bones were on the floor of the passage, and they were in the last stage of decay. The least touch, and they would have crumbled into dust.

There was nothing to indicate the age, sex, or position in life of this skeleton; and having convinced themselves of this, they made their way along the passage towards the octagonal-shaped room.

How pleasant it was now, by an occasional inspection of the arrows Blake had drawn, to feel sure that they were pursuing the right direction, and not involving themselves in the mazy intricacies of the place.

Both drew a long breath of exquisite relief when they, after a little while, emerged into the octagonal chamber, from one side of which ascended the steps leading to the turret.

"Thank goodness!" said Blueskin, "we are safe at last. It is by no means the first time in my life that I have had a narrow escape from death, but still it was always in some encounter. I fairly tremble now when I think we might both have walked into the abyss, and only become conscious of having done so when we found ourselves falling headlong down."

"Such a death would be awful indeed. But the peril is over now. Let us ascend. I feel no desire to run any further risk by an exploration of this place."

"Nor do I. Besides which, we have been quite long enough absent from the turret-stairs. We ought to assure ourselves that all is well with our young charge."

"You do not fear anything?"

"By no means; but that is no reason why we should leave her unguarded."

"No, no; we have been wrong, I think, to absent ourselves at all."

As he made this remark, Jack sprang up the winding flight of steps, and soon reached the level of the earth.

Blueskin was immediately behind him, and, as he emerged from the vaults, he shut the little door after him as he said—

"I don't think I shall be tempted to venture down there again."

"I am sure I shall not, and yet it would have been a great satisfaction if we could have found some secret mode of entering and leaving the place."

"You are right; but we must abandon the idea, at all events in that quarter. I think, too, that we may rest pretty well assured that we have nothing to fear in the shape of attack. Few people would visit this place, and none less likely than Jonathan Wild."

"All seems right," said Jack, after a pause, during which he had listened intently at the foot of the stairs.

"Yes, if silence is to be taken as a token of it. Let us go up. Bess must, by this time, have had sufficient rest."

Jack did not need to be told this twice, and he mounted with an agility and speed that soon left Blueskin in the rear.

On reaching the door he tapped gently at it, and said—

"Bess—Bess! Is all well?"

Jack heard a hasty movement, and then the door was opened.

"Oh! Jack!" said the young girl, "I am so glad you have come. I have sat here until I have grown quite frightened. I came to the door once, and called, but I could not make you hear."

By the time this little dialogue was finished, Blueskin entered the turret-chamber.

Edgworth Bess had suffered the fire to go out, and, as the evening was now creeping on, Blake thought the best plan would be to light it again.

This he soon did, and by the time it was fairly dusk, they were all three seated in pretty near the same positions as on the preceding night.

Bess was refreshed by a long, deep sleep she had had, albeit her couch was by no means of the softest; but then, when one is thoroughly weary, that is but a slight inconvenience.

As for her wound, it was now quite well. There was an ugly mark reaching across the back part of her shoulder, but she was quite willing to put up with that when she thought of what a narrow escape she had had of being dangerously wounded, perhaps even killed.

The conversation, as on the preceding night, very quickly turned upon her fortunes, and Blake was called upon to furnish yet some additional particulars, but as they were upon trivial matters it is not worth while to repeat them here.

However, from the narrations of all three a very good and distinct idea of her whole position could be obtained.

There was one point, however, that would be rather difficult, and that was proving her identity. It was all very well for such facts to be asserted, but then something more was needed, and that was proofs.

These it seemed pretty certain rested in the hands of the unscrupulous Lord Donnull, who would, of course, take every care not to do or say anything inimical to his own interests and friendly to hers.

Jack and Blueskin, too, were so placed as to make it almost a matter of impossibility for them to give evidence, besides which, Jack could only say that he overheard a conversation, which would amount to little or nothing.

The people, too, who lived in Charles-street, Drury-lane, into whose charge the heiress had been given, were dead, as was also the man who had so placed her.

In fact, the more they considered and thought over the case, the more difficulties and obstacles presented themselves to their view. Bess herself was quite dismayed, and Blueskin would never have persevered had it not been from a strict sense of duty.

Many and various were the plans proposed during their long and important conference, but every one of them, after mature consideration, were abandoned as impracticable.

And now, suddenly, as Jack was making some remark, he paused.

He fancied a slight sound reached his ears from the direction of the staircase.

He listened, but as all now was silent, he concluded that his sense of hearing had deceived him, and went on with the sentence he had begun.

But before he reached its end, they saw most positive proof that some one was on the staircase.

Blueskin and Jack sprang to their feet, and drew their swords.

But before they could perform another movement, the little door leading into the turret chamber was burst violently open, and a party of men rushed in.

CHAPTER LXIII.

LORD DONMULL AND STEGGS ARE BENT UPON THE YOUNG GIRL'S DESTRUCTION.

At the precise period of time at which the incidents recorded in the last chapter took place, there sat in a gorgeously-furnished apartment in a west-end mansion a well-dressed man.

Without the air was chill, but within that chamber it was of an agreeable warmth.

In the polished grate burned a sea-coal fire, and as its flickering light fell upon the fire-irons and thick crimson hearthrug, it produced an appearance of extreme comfort.

The room was furnished consistently throughout; that is to say, the different articles in it harmonized in their appearance and colour.

That colour was the richest of all—crimson.

Some would have said the effect produced was rather monotonous than otherwise, but that could be merely a matter of opinion.

A rich, downy, velvet-like paper of the brightest crimson covered the walls. It was relieved in places by gilt devices, while a neat gilt cornice running completely round the walls at their junction with the ceiling, presented not only a pleasing contrast, but also gave an air of great magnificence to the whole.

The chamber itself was spacious, but it lacked height, which was a great detraction; at any rate, it would be considered so to-day, though then they were considered "the thing."

Very rich crimson curtains, with bullion fringes, and cords and tassels of the same material, were drawn before the two latticed casements.

The antique sofa and the massive high-backed chairs were made of rosewood, and cushioned with crimson velvet.

A cloth of some similar material covered the large table in the centre.

From the ceiling, which was of carved rosewood, depended a chandelier, carrying a large number of wax candles.

Each of these was enveloped in a kind of glass sheath, faintly dyed with crimson, so that the light itself, which was diffused, was of a rosy character.

The effect of this harmoniousness was rich beyond all expression, but chiefly of all was it suggestive of comfort and enjoyment.

But, strange to say, the inmate of this chamber possessed neither of those blessings.

As he leans back in the large comfortable arm-chair, a look of great care and uneasiness of mind is apparent in his countenance.

The soft, mellow light with which the place is filled prevents the ghastly pallor of his countenance becoming apparent. It has now the hues of health, or rather seems to have them.

Evidences of wealth were visible about his person; for a hundred years ago the differences of station were more marked than they are now.

His attire was of the costliest material.

As he is seated there in deep and anxious thought, one hand plays nervously with the arm of the chair.

It is a long, thin hand, and on two of its fingers glitter rings of great worth and lustre.

But, as we have said, with everything around him conducing to happiness and repose, with everything calculated to soothe the feelings, yet there he sat troubled, agitated; the only thing in the magnificent apartment that was out of keeping with the rest.

No one to have looked at him, environed by luxury as he was, would have envied him.

The age of this man we have taken such especial pains to introduce to the reader was verging upon fifty, but, in the open street, he looked ten years older at least.

His lips moved slightly, as though his thoughts were so intense that he was all but compelled to give them verbal utterance.

Then he suddenly sprang to his feet, and walked up and down the room with rapid tread.

Upon the soft carpet his feet made not the slightest sound.

Between the two windows was a massive sideboard.

Ranged upon it with marvellous taste were many pieces of gold and silver.

In the centre was a stand for wines and spirits.

It was before this that the man paused, after having taken some thirty or forty turns up and down the room.

He took up a crystal goblet that would contain almost a pint of liquid, and filled it with brandy.

A few bright beads clustered round the edge.

He held it up to the light.

His hand was trembling and unsteady.

Then he drank the greater portion of the fiery spirit at a draught, and resumed his hurried walk.

Unconsciously he gave utterance to the thoughts that weighed so heavily upon his brain.

"How will it end?" he said. "How will it end? To think that after living all this time in such a state of perfect security as I have, that obstacles and cares and perplexities should arise now! All, too, through the bungling agent I employed to do my work. Had he performed his part of the contract as I performed mine, all would have been well, I should have nothing to fear. Now, what shall I do? what shall I do?"

He flung himself down in the chair as he spoke.

The words he had uttered will enable the reader to recognise him.

Lord Abel Donnull.

Yes; that is the man.

The unnatural brother.

The usurper of his niece's wealth and broad domains.

The man of bad, bold heart, and many crimes.

Vainly did he strive to conceal from himself the fact that a day must some time come when his deeds would be visited with a just retribution.

Like most bad men, he was a coward at heart.

No emotion of pity could possibly be shown for him.

He was surrounded with parasites, with menials, with tools, by which he wrought his evil purposes, but among them all there was not one heart who, in the hour of tribulation, would have said, "God bless him!"

But he clung to wealth at first because of the natural ephemerality of his soul; now, because it had grown into a kind of second nature to be surrounded by it.

To obtain it had he not stained his hands with crime? Was it likely, then, that he would relinquish it?

It is ever the curse or fate of such men as Lord Donnull to find at their fingers' ends a spirit to tempt them still further into evil.

That evil spirit was the man Steggs.

Who he was Lord Donnull knew not. He had come to him with the death-bed confession of the man Williams, and from that moment they had been hourly companions, actuated apparently by the same motives, working to the same end.

Whether they were or not remains to be seen.

And now, on this particular evening, as he sits in the large arm-chair, a sharp knock at the door reached his ears; but, before he could recover himself sufficiently to cry "Come in," the door was opened, and Steggs glided in like an apparition.

There was a great show of respectful submission in the way in which he stood just upon the edge of the hearth-rug.

"Sit down, Steggs," said his lordship, "sit down. What is the news?"

"There is none, my lord."

"None?"

"None."

"Have all your efforts been unsuccessful?"

"All, my lord! I have searched in every direction. I have employed men to scour the whole of the country round London in search of her, but to no purpose."

Lord Donnull let his head fall between his hands.

"Don't give up, my lord; all is not lost yet. I have faith still in Jonathan Wild."

"I tremble at his name," was the reply, "and if he knew the real facts of the case I should consider myself lost indeed."

"But he does not! the lad Sheppard and he are deadly enemies."

Again did Lord Donnull spring in an agitated manner to his feet.

"I shall go mad if this continues," he said; "I can feel now such wild confusion in my brain that I am scarcely conscious of my actions."

"Try some brandy, my lord," replied Steggs; "it is a sovereign remedy in cases of that sort."

"I will follow your advice," he replied, as he gulped down the remainder of the spirit in the goblet.

"You are better?"

"I—I think I am."

"I am sure of it, my lord. Sit down and calm yourself, we will talk matters over quietly."

"Quietly!"

"Why not?"

"There is too much at stake. But what did you say about Jonathan Wild?"

"That I had faith in him."

"Why?"

"Because when he says a thing, however impossible it may appear, he always keeps his word."

"And he promised to put—put—Elizabeth in our possession."

"He did."

"But when he does, Steggs—supposing he does—what must be done?"

"That will be for your lordship to decide. Two courses will be open to you; but, if I might advise, I should say wait till then."

"And when did you see Jonathan Wild last?"

"When we visited his house together."

"Not since?"

"No, I have been to Newgate-street many times, but without being able to see him."

"This frightful suspense will kill me, if it lasts much longer," cried his lordship. "I am like one walking upon the crater of a volcano, expecting every moment an eruption."

"Your nerves are out of order. Once let Jonathan place the girl in my hands, and I will answer for it, that you have no further trouble with that affair."

"Do so, Steggs," said Lord Donnull, as he clasped his rascally accomplice by the hand. "Do that, and you may name your own reward!"

CHAPTER LXIV.

JONATHAN WILD IS IN A VERY BAD WAY INDEED.

THE four men Levee had left to attend to Jonathan Wild, while he with the rest galloped off after the fugitives, held a brief consultation as to what they had better do.

One after another they examined the prostrate body of the great thief-taker.

He was to all appearance dead.

Very little blood, though, could be seen upon the road.

There was an ugly wound in the upper part of his jaw, but whether sufficient to cause death was rather a debatable matter.

The subject under dispute was not so much whether Jonathan was dead or whether they should obey Levee's orders and take him to Little Newgate, but rather in what way he should be conveyed there.

It seemed pretty conclusive that one of the four would have to surrender his horse, for Jonathan's steed, when it reared and threw him, dashed off along the road toward London before any one could stop him.

Now they were all equally disinclined to do this, but as there appeared to be no prospect of settling the dispute by other means they agreed to draw lots.

The job fell upon one of the men named Matthew Flood, as ferocious a villain, perhaps, as ever graced the gallows at Tyburn, which interesting event occurred in a little more than a twelvemonth after these events.

This Matthew Flood, then, upon finding that the lot fell upon him, uttered some very diabolical and awful curses, which it is by no means our intention to repeat.

However, he had to submit.

Jonathan's body was lifted rather roughly on to the back of this horse.

Not one of these four men had been without suffering some brutality or other at his hands, and now that he was in such a condition as to make it impossible for him to defend himself, they paid off some of the grudges they had against him.

To be sure it was very cowardly of them, but then what could be expected from such base spirits?

In a Mazeppa-like fashion Jonathan was placed upon the back of the horse, and bound to it, partly with the men's belts, and partly with the rope they always carried about them.

The chief part of this tying business came to Flood's share, and the way in which he knocked Wild about was really awful to behold.

At length all was ready, and the strange cavalcade set out on their return to London.

Matthew Flood walked by the side of the horse.

The thief-taker gave no signs of life.

In this way, then, they some hours after arrived at the door of Wild's house in Newgate-street.

Flood had not walked the whole of the distance, but induced his companions to share that duty with him.

St. Sepulchre's church chimed half-past two as one of the men hammered loudly at the door.

The man on the lock allowed them to enter.

Still exhibiting no sign of returning consciousness, Wild was carried upstairs, and put into a bed-room on the second-floor, which he, whenever he slept on a bed, used as a sleeping-chamber.

One of the four men had started off for Ebenezer Snoxall, to whom the reader has been introduced already.

He was not very pleased to be aroused from his slumbers at that unreasonable hour, but when he was made the recipient of the very startling intelligence that the great Jonathan was dead, he hurried on his clothes without another word, and was out in the street in a trice.

On reaching Jonathan's bed-side he made a long and careful examination of him, and the nature of the hurts he had received.

Then he shook his head.

"How do you bring it in?" asked Flood.

"Ha! I—a—rea—"

"Where is he?" cried a rather thick voice at this moment, and a female of huge proportions rushed into the room. "Where is the lamb? Oh! oh!"

The large female flung herself upon the bed, and began howling at a great rate.

"Oh! my poor lamb," she said, "my poor lamb. Have they murdered you at last? Oh! I'm a lone widder now!"

These last words will at once have the effect of informing the reader of the kind of relationship that was supposed to subsist between her and Jonathan.

Yes; she was the great thief-taker's wife.

She would have doubtless earlier than this made the acquaintance of the reader, but the fact is, about a month before this narrative commenced, a rather serious quarrel had taken place between Wild and his spouse, which terminated by her being kicked into the street by her lord and master, and being strictly forbidden ever to cross his threshold again.

This injunction she had obeyed until this particular evening, when, having imbibed sufficient cordial compounds to raise her courage, make her forgiving, and rather amorous, she very boldly and in despite of all opposition, forced her way in.

Upon being told Jonathan was out, and having satisfied herself by searching the place that such was really the case, she sat down in the thief-taker's own sanctum, and announced, with many expressive yet not elegant flowers of speech, her intention to wait there until the "dear lamb" came home.

There was something exceedingly droll about the idea of a remorseless villain like Jonathan being called a lamb!

Most certainly there was nothing lamb-like in his disposition, except in comparison with hers.

A man who is thus spoken of by his biographer:—

"The name and memory of Jonathan Wild will be ever held in abhorrence. . . . The single history of the arts, deception, cruelty, perfidy, and crimes of this man filled a volume, and should we occupy more room in our epitome than may be deemed necessary, we have only to observe, that scarcely would the whole catalogue of other crimes exposed in our chronology, centred in one man, produce a parallel with this complete thief-taker and finished thief."

But bad as he may have been, yet it seems to be on all hands conceded that this woman, whom the above-quoted historian describes as being well known "as one of the most notorious pickpockets and abandoned prostitutes on the town," was a very great deal worse, and the fact that she made him what he was, and first led him into crime, is pretty well established.

Such was the woman, then, who pretended to be so overcome with grief at Jonathan's decease.

They were a precious pair.

In vain did Mr. Snoxall entreat the lady to remove from her position, and allow him to ascertain whether he was really dead. She answered him only with renewed howls, which so disgusted Flood that he left the room at once.

The idea of attempting to remove her by main force never found a place in the apothecary's mind for a moment; he had too much dread of her fistful powers.

But a result ensued which was rather unexpected.

Jonathan was not dead!

No, despite the really dangerous wound, and all the harsh treatment he had endured at the hands of his own men, life was not extinct.

The caresses of Mary Milliner, for such was the name of the woman who passed as his wife, aroused him.

Only partially though did he regain his faculties, and the consequence was he fell into a very natural mistake.

Feeling some one above him he made sure it was an enemy, a foe making an attack upon his life.

Without, then, waiting to see who it was—as for the correctness of his supposition, he had no doubt whatever about that—he uttered a terrible roar which would have befitted some wild and ferocious denizen of the wilderness, and springing up, he clutched the unfortunate woman round the neck with a grip like that of an iron vice.

So suddenly was the pressure applied, that she had no time to utter a cry for help.

The only witness was Snoxall, the apothecary, and he was speechless and aghast.

A struggle of a very terrible nature now took place between Jonathan and his spouse, which, as a probable enough result, terminated in the pair rolling together off the bed.

The crash was so tremendous that the whole house was shaken, and in another moment there was a hurried trampling of feet, and a body of the gang rushed in.

They saw what was amiss at once, but dared not interfere.

Their presence, though, aroused Wild from his insane fury, and he looked about him.

His eye fell upon his assailant.

Then he uttered a yell, caused in part by seeing who it was, and in part because his hurts just then began to make themselves felt.

With an effort of strength he freed himself from his companion, and scrambled to his feet.

Then dealing her a heavy kick, he prostrated her upon the floor.

"What is all this, eh?" gasped Wild, as he clutched the bedpost with both hands for support. "What is all this, I say? Speak! Are you all deaf?"

"If you please, Mr. Wild" —

"Bah!"

Mr. Snoxall came forward, and then another accession of pain in the lower part of his face forced itself to Wild's notice.

He began to comprehend.

"Lie down on the bed, my good sir, and let me attend to your wound. You will soon be better."

Jonathan complied silently, but only because such a frightful sensation of pain and weakness came over him, that he found it impossible to stand up any longer.

CHAPTER LXV.

MARY MILLANER, JONATHAN'S PRESUMPTIVE WIFE, COMES IN FOR A SHARE OF HIS BRUTALITY.

BUT although the thief-taker fell backwards on the bed in the manner recorded in the last chapter, yet he did not again lose his consciousness.

It seems incredible that any human being could have borne up against such frightful injuries as Wild did, but the fact was, not only did he possess a frame and constitution as hard as iron itself, but an indomitable mind to correspond.

And so between the two he suffered with impunity what would have been sufficient to kill any ordinary mortal. To be sure he suffered some temporary inconvenience, but that was all.

He controlled himself so far as to be quite still while Mr. Snoxall, whose skill in the treatment of wounds was very great, made an examination of his injuries.

The apothecary probed about with a disagreeable-looking steel instrument, but Jonathan made not the least sign of additional suffering.

He was trying to recollect what had taken place, and account for his present desperate position.

By thus diverting his thoughts, he was able to bear the pain with greater fortitude.

By slow degrees he remembered all that had taken place up to the moment Blueskin and Jack Sheppard fired at him.

After that, of course, he knew nothing, until he woke up and found his discarded wife bending over him.

He had just reached so far when Mr. Snoxall spoke—

"It is a very narrow touch," he said. "I never knew such a thing before in my life. However, as it is, there are no bones broke, so you will soon be all right again."

Upon hearing this assurance, Wild felt better at once, and he raised himself upon one arm.

"One moment, Mr. Wild, if you please," said the apothecary: "let me put a bandage on it."

To this Jonathan submitted with pretty good grace, but as soon as the operation was concluded he sprang to his feet.

"Brandy!" he cried; "give me brandy!"

"Murder!" said Snoxall, terrified at the idea.

But Jonathan walked to a little cupboard by the side of the fireplace, and brought out a black-looking bottle.

This he placed to his lips and took a long draught.

The apothecary watched him with wonder. It was by no means the first time he had seen Wild do such a thing, but he could not get over the surprise of it.

There was a marked difference in the tone of Wild's voice as, putting down the bottle, he pronounced the one word—

"Better!"

"Yes, Mr. Wild."

Jonathan's eye fell upon the form of Mary Milliner, who had just recovered from her swoon, and raised herself to a sitting posture.

Although stupefied with the liquor she had drank, she was able to recognise her husband.

"My poor lamb," she howled, "they told me that you was dead, and I was a lone woman; but the poor lamb is spared."

She got upon her feet as she spoke, and made a wild drunken rush at him.

"Hold off!" cried Jonathan, as stepping aside he avoided the encounter; "hold off, woman, or it will be all the worse for you."

But blinded by drink, and unheeding what he said, she turned and made another staggering rush at him.

Jonathan's face assumed a terrible expression.

He drew his sword from its sheath, and projected it before him.

"Keep back!" he said, "or you'll have this in your vitals! Keep back, I say; do you hear me?"

The loud tones of his voice seemed to reach her understanding, and she brushed the hair back from her face.

But the good lady was not to be so repulsed.

For the third time she attempted to clasp him in her arms.

Jonathan saw her coming, and stepped back a pace.

Then holding his sword straight before him, he received the wretched woman on the point of it.*

She felt the steel enter her skin, but she could not stop herself, and the sharp weapon passed completely through her chest and out at her back.

Uttering a loud and fearful cry of anguish, she fell backwards on the floor of the room weltering in her blood.

"Curse you!" he said. "You would have it. And I hope you are satisfied."

Now Mr. Snoxall, although present when this took place, never made the least attempt at interference. He had too much good sense to interpose his body in conjugal quarrels.

Having thus got rid of his unfortunate wife, Jonathan strode down stairs.

As he reached the hall some one knocked loudly at the door.

The man on the lock, who had seen Wild come down the stairs, opened the door with marvellous celerity.

"How's Jonathan?" said a voice, which that individual himself recognised as belonging to Levee, so he shrank still closer in the shadow of the wall in the hope of hearing something. "Have they brought him in dead this time, or how?"

Now, the man on the lock happened to be on friendly terms with Levee, so he had all the inclination in the world to put him upon his guard against saying anything imprudent, by letting him know that Jonathan was in the hall.

But it was quite out of the question for him to do so without Wild being aware of it.

"How is the old villain?" He hasn't cheated the hangman, has he? I hope not, for I live in hopes of seeing him tucked up at Tyburn some day. So do you, Wilkinson, don't you? It would be a brave sight! Ha! ha!"

Wilkinson echoed his companion's laugh with a groan.

But ere Levee could remark on the subject somebody else laughed.

A horrible laugh.

Discordant.

Fiendish.

A laugh which he had too often heard not to immediately recognise.

The blood seemed to stand still in his veins, and the perspiration of intense fear broke out over his whole body.

* This incident is strictly true. "His accomplice and reputed wife, Mary Milliner, having on some occasion provoked him, he straightway ran her through with his sword."—LIFE OF JONATHAN WILD.

[JONATHAN WILD TRIUMPHS, AND CAPTURES JACK SHEPPARD AND EDGORTH BESS.]

"Good God!" he gasped. "It's Jonathan!"

"Ha! ha!" said Wild again. "Ha! ha! Levee! I've cheated the hangman, you see. Ha! ha! but I don't fancy you will much longer. Ha! ha! Levee! Not much longer, I know!"

Most devoutly did the unfortunate man curse his own indiscretion. Most devoutly did he wish that the earth beneath his feet would at that moment yawn open, and swallow him up for ever.

The remainder of the men who had accompanied him in his unsuccessful chase after the three fugitives, stood just on the steps of the door, huddled into a dense throng, of course enjoying the scene mightily.

Now, so far as Jonathan himself was concerned, this was a lucky incident, for it had the effect of restoring him to his usual spirits.

But it boded no good for Mr. Levee.

"Come in, John," said Wild, for that was Levee's Christian name. "Come in, John! Don't be afraid! It isn't my ghost! Ha! ha! I shall outlive more than one of my acquaintance! Ha! ha!"

Levee walked into the hall.

The remainder of the band followed.

Wilkinson closed the door.

Then, by the dismal, sickly light of an oil-lamp, which was suspended from the ceiling of the hall, they saw Jonathan standing near the foot of the stairs, with his hand upon the balusters.

For a moment, in his jocularity, he forgot what errand Levee had been upon, but when he saw the other members of the band enter a remarkable change took place.

"Where are they?" he yelled. "Have you let them slip through your fingers? Villains, I will make you rue this day."

"Mr. Wild."

"Well, wretch, what have you to say?"

"When you were thrown from your horse"—

"Ha! I was thrown?"

"You were fired at by Blueskin and Sheppard, Mr. Wild, when they made the sudden dash through us."

"Go on—go on."

"Seeing you fall I dismounted, for I feared you were killed."

"Feared?"

"Yes, Mr. Wild."

"Hoped, you mean. Go on, villain."

"I found you bleeding and quite insensible, so I ordered Flood and three others to take you home, while I pursued the fugitives."

"Well, and what then?"

"By the time I gained the saddle they were not only out of sight, but out of hearing also."

"Fool! why did you not follow them at once?"

"I acted as I thought for the best."

"Then you pursued and captured them."

"We pursued them, Mr. Wild."

"Of course."

"But we could not find the least trace of them. When we assured ourselves that such undoubtedly was the fact, we turned back, and here we are."

"And so Blake fired at me?"

"And Sheppard too."

"Curs! that devil's brat; it is he that has brought on all this mischief. But he shall swing—he shall swing. I swear it; and when I swear a thing I never fail to keep my oath. Jack and Blueskin both shall die at Tyburn. Ha! ha! they have triumphed so far, but I bid them beware, for Jonathan Wild will have his revenge—revenge—rev—"

His voice failed.

His legs gave way beneath him.

Jonathan fell like a log on the floor of the hall.

CHAPTER LXVI.

LORD DONMULL LISTENS TO JONATHAN'S INSIDIOUS ADVICE.

NATURE succumbed beneath Wild's terrible excitement. It is wonderful that he should so soon have recovered his strength as he had. It was the brandy that did it, and now that its effects had evaporated, he was left weaker than before.

Again were the services of Mr. Snoxall called into requisition, but this time when Jonathan recovered he turned over, and fell almost immediately into a deep slumber.

"That's right," said the apothecary, as he poured some narcotic down his throat. "Just let him sleep for twelve hours, or so, and then when he awakens ten to one if he is not all right."

Having thus spoken, Snoxall left the room quietly and shut the door, leaving instructions that his patient was on no account to be disturbed.

He then turned his attention to the woman, Mary Milliner, whose condition was certainly much worse than that of her rascally husband.

During, then, the remainder of that night, and the whole of the following day, during which time the three fugitives talked over their affairs, and had the strange adventures we have recorded, Jonathan slept.

Slept, one would have thought, to gaze into his countenance, the sleep of innocence and peace, so deep and dream-like did it appear.

But it was exhaustion produced that effect, for, generally speaking, Wild was rather troubled with disagreeable dreams.

It was just as the shadows of evening were beginning to dusk the different objects in the room in which he lay, when Jonathan opened his eyes.

He still felt rather faint and dizzy, and his eyes rested languidly upon the familiar things by which he was surrounded.

This state of things he only endured for a very short space of time, for his brain began to assume its wonted action.

The pain of the pistol-wound in his face began to make itself felt.

He sprang off the bed, for he had only been lying on the outside of it he found, and going to a large pitcher and basin near the window, he poured some of the contents of the former into the latter, and plentifully bathed his head, neck, and face with it.

Jonathan had great faith in the therapeutic qualities of two agents.

One was brandy.

That was the inward application.

The other was cold water.

That was the outward one.

They were simple enough, in all conscience, and they always had the effect desired.

The intensely cold water soothed the irritation of his skin, and took away the dull oppressive feeling that was about his brain.

By the time he had finished, the twilight had given place to darkness, but he was well acquainted with the topography of his domicile, and he had no difficulty in finding his way down into his room on the first floor.

He seated himself in his accustomed chair in the chimney-corner, and then rang the bell.

Tonks appeared in answer to the summons.

He trembled when he first entered, but he gathered courage from the fact that he did not look so demoniacal as usual; in fact, that his face had rather a ghastly appearance than otherwise.

But it was not the less hideous on that account.

"Did you please to ring, Mr. Wild?"

"Of course I did, idiot, or else you would not have heard it. What is the time?"

"Five-and-twenty minutes to nine, Mr. Wild, sir, if you please."

"Ya—ah! Who has been here to-day?"

"A good many, sir, but they were all told to come to-morrow, owing to your serious indisposition. There is one gentleman just come."

"Who is he?"

"He would not tell me his name, Mr. Wild, but he told me to give you this letter, and ask for a reply."

Jonathan stretched out his hand, and tore open the envelope.

Inside there was nothing but a bank note for five pounds.

He turned it over, and on the back he saw the one word, "Donmull."

A shade of vexation crossed Jonathan's features, and crumpling up the note as though not of the least value, he thrust it into his pocket.

"And the gentleman that gave you that is waiting to see me, you say, Tonks, eh?"

"Yes, if you please, Mr. Wild."

"Of course I please, scoundrel! Ask the gentleman to step up, and let me advise you to be civil."

Rarely, indeed, was Wild in so temperate a mood, and Tonks took care to vanish while his shoes were good, as the saying is.

Two minutes afterwards he returned, and having ushered his lordship into the apartment, withdrew with great alacrity.

Steggs, of course, glided in after his employer.

Jonathan condescended to rise and motion them to a seat. Then he sat down again.

There was an awkward pause.

Lord Donmull broke it by saying the one word—

"Well?"

"I wish it was well, my lord."

"How do you mean? Speak. Tell us how you have got on. We have come to know whether you have fulfilled your promise."

Wild scowled.

"I have as yet got more peril than profit in the business. Curse it all! I have had them all but in my power, when a shot brought me to the ground."

Jonathan pointed to his bandaged face.

"I have only just recovered," he continued, "from the swoon."

"It is not very serious, I hope, Mr. Wild."

"No—no. The one that caused me this pain, though, shall suffer for it with interest."

"That is well."

"But come, let us to business. If you will excuse me, I should prefer our interview took place alone."

"Alone?"

"Just so, my lord."

"I have no secrets from Steggs."

"None," said that individual, who looked very angry at the very idea of his being sent away from the conference.

"That is very likely," replied Jonathan, dryly, "but I have."

"But, Mr. Wild."

"If you want to speak to me, my lord, I can only repeat what I have just said—our interview must take place in private, and I am sure Mr. Steggs would not wish to intrude."

Few could be more polite than Jonathan Wild when it suited him to be so.

Some whispered conversation now took place between his lordship and Steggs, which terminated in the latter leaving the room.

Jonathan touched the concealed handle of the bell.

Tonks appeared.

"Show this gentleman out, Tonks. Come back in an hour, Mr. Steggs."

Rage, impotent rage, swelled in the heart of the villain Steggs, as he followed Tonks down the stairs.

The idea entered his mind of bribing Tonks to listen to what took place between his lordship and Wild, but upon second thoughts he abandoned the idea.

As soon as the door was fairly closed, Lord Donnull turned an inquiring glance upon Jonathan Wild.

"You are surprised at my not allowing your confederate to be present. You will not, though, when you know my motive."

"Speak, Mr. Wild, speak!" cried his lordship, his guilty soul in an agony of apprehension. "What is your reason?"

"Simply this. He is not to be trusted."

"Not trusted?"

"You need not feel surprised, I know all."

His lordship turned several degrees paler than he usually was, and sank back in his chair.

"All what?"

"Your motives for wishing to obtain possession of this girl. Believe me, it would have been much better for you to have been candid with me at once."

"But—but—"

"There are no buts in the case! My lord, I am a man of few words, and those words are to the purpose. You will find it to your interest to trust me; I can be of great service to you. I will, too, be faithful, so long as you pay me well. But that fellow who has just left us has other designs in view."

"How do you know that, Mr. Wild?"

"I can read it in his face, my lord, without much attention. As a friend, and whether you go any further with me in this business, I say to you, beware of that man!"

Lord Donnull, in accordance with his usual nervous habit, when anything disturbed him, sprang to his feet, and paced up and down the room.

Jonathan eyed him with eager satisfaction.

"How much do you really know of this affair, Mr. Wild?" asked his lordship, pausing abruptly in front of the thief-taker.

"I have already told your lordship that I know all, and to convince you of the truth of my assertion, I need only say the girl you seek, and who is well known to me, is your eldest brother's only child, who was stolen from him in her infancy, and to whom he bequeathed the whole of the estates which you now hold. You wish this girl in your possession. Beyond that I seek to know nothing."

Without appearing to close his eyes, Jonathan Wild gazed narrowly into the countenance of his lordship, who little thought that he was then venturing upon still more dangerous ground.

Upon hearing this confirmation of his assertion that he did know all, Lord Donnull cast himself into the chair he had just before quitted.

"What are your terms, Mr. Wild?" he said, "supposing I made up my mind to employ you to carry out this business?"

CHAPTER LXVII.

THE NOBLEMAN AND THE THIEF-TAKER COME TO AN ARRANGEMENT WITH EACH OTHER, AND LEVEE IS CROSS-EXAMINED.

A SICKLY sort of smile distorted the visage of the thief-taker when this question was propounded to him. He knew he had another victim in the toils.

"I should be entitled to your lordship's consideration upon too many distinct grounds," he said, avoiding a direct reply.

"Indeed. How so?"

"In the first place, there is catching the girl and placing her in your hands."

"Yes, yes."

"And in the second"—here Jonathan sank his voice to a whisper—"keeping to myself the secret of who she really is."

Lord Donnull shuddered, but he did not think in what a powerful position Wild would be placed if he obtained possession of the girl and kept her back from him. He would then be able to dictate what terms he chose.

"As for Steggs," said Wild, "I will undertake to dispose of him. You do not know me yet. From constant observation, and from the opportunities I have had of studying all kinds of people, I am generally able to read a person's character at a glance. My lord, that man is plotting against you. Instead of him being your tool, you are in reality his, and he will so manage matters as at last to get you completely into his power."

"If—if," stammered his lordship. "If I really thought you were right?"

"You are free to use your own judgment. Now, from the way in which you first came to me, I thought your business with the girl was a mere passing fancy you had taken for a pretty face, but in a couple of hours afterwards I was acquainted with the actual facts of the case."

"Is it possible?"

"Now, my lord, you would have found it by far your best policy if you had come to me and explained the whole matter fully, and then asked my assistance and advice."

Lord Donnull put his arms upon the table, and let his head fall upon them.

He was only half convinced of the truth of what his companion had just said. A vague sense of coming danger oppressed him, but whether he would escape it by deciding with or against the thief-taker he could not tell.

"You have not named your price, Mr. Wild," he said at length.

"Nor shall I, my lord. When I have performed the service, I shall leave my recompense for it to your own generosity."

"That sounds fair."

"I am glad you think so. Do you accept? If so, say at once. There is no time to lose. If you decide in the affirmative, and that, I can assure you, will be the best course for you to pursue to further your own interests, I shall set about the business without an hour's delay."

"But your wound?"

"That will not signify."

"You have a dauntless spirit and iron energy, Mr. Wild. Would I had—would I had."

"You naturally feel the precariousness of your situation. I can understand your anxiety; but make your mind easy. Leave all to me, and I will undertake that all shall turn out well."

The positive tone in which these words were uttered inspired Lord Donnull with a momentary gleam of hope.

Wild went on.

"It is now getting night. I am recovering from my wounds. In half-an-hour I shall be in pursuit of them."

"You are a wonderful man, Mr. Wild."

A smile of gratified vanity appeared upon the thief-taker's lips.

"Stop a moment, my lord. I will call in one of my men; and I will question him in your presence."

"And Steggs."

"My lord, I leave that matter entirely in your own hands. To me it is no matter which way you decide; but as a piece of friendly advice, which you will excuse my giving, as you have employed me in this matter, I say, for your own safety's sake, get rid of that man."

"But how—how?" asked his lordship, anxiously; "he knows all."

"There are means," said Wild, with grim significance, "by which his knowledge may be made of no avail."

"What do you mean?"

"Never mind. If you agree with what I have said say the word, and I will guarantee that Steggs never troubles you again."

Lord Donnull shuddered as he said—

"You would murder him!"

"That is an ugly word, my lord; I will put him out of the way."

"Enough, enough!"

"Do you consent?"

"I do."

"Then let me say disinterestedly you are wise. Just think; with your plans accomplished, and that man hanging upon you, what sort of life would yours be? No enviable one, certainly. Now when I am employed in a matter I expect to be paid upon its completion, and then I forget all about it."

"I leave it to your hands, then; heaven knows I have nothing to be thankful to him for. Before he came I was secure and happy, and now"—

"Now I suppose you possess neither! Do not despair, my lord; I will carry out this affair for you, and then all will be well again. I shall rely upon your gratitude as a recompense."

"You will have no cause for complaint, Mr. Wild. In a matter of this sort I should not be particular to a trifle."

"That is agreed, then; and now, as I said, I will call in my man, and you shall hear what he says in answer to my questions."

As he spoke, Wild again pressed the concealed handle of the bell.

"Send Levee up," he yelled, as Tonks just put his head inside the room.

There was a few moments' delay, and then Levee, in anything but an enviable frame of mind, made his appearance.

"I want to ask you some questions."

Levee glanced at Jonathan's visitor inquiringly as he replied—

"Yes, Mr. Wild."

"You went with me in search of three persons."

"I did, Mr. Wild."

"We chased them along the Western-road, and, when near Ealing turnpike, the horse shied and threw me."

"That was when you were shot, Mr. Wild."

"Who fired?"

"Blueskin and Sheppard both."

"And what took place then?"

"They galloped on down the road. We did not follow them, but dismounted to look after you."

"What then, Levee?" asked Wild, with a hideous grin.

"Finding you were either insensible or dead, I gave orders for four of the band to take you home, and then remounting, the remainder of us set off in pursuit."

"Well?"

"We galloped on for hours, and kept the sharpest lookout, but they were not in sight or hearing when we started, and we failed to capture them."

"You hear," said Wild to Lord Donnull.

Then turning to Levee, he said—

"Where would they be likely to go. Have you any idea?"

"No, Mr. Wild, I haven't; but"—

"But what?"

"I think Wilkinson has."

"Why? how?"

"He dropped a hint to that effect, if you please, sir, and said if you would send for him he would tell you what he knew."

"That will do, then. Get ready half-a-dozen of you, and get me a horse. I will see if I cannot root them out. Send Wilkinson up at once."

Levee withdrew. The interview was a very different one to what he expected.

"This may be important, my lord," said Jonathan, as the door closed. "Wilkinson would not venture to send such a message unless he had something to communicate."

"I am glad of it."

"However, you shall listen to what he has got to say; but let things be how they may, I shall set off in pursuit."

"Mr. Wild!"

"My lord!"

"Should you object in any way to my forming a portion of your party?"

"By no means if you wish it."

"I do wish it, then. I think the excitement would do me good, and I should not be so full of suspense as I should be while waiting for intelligence."

"As you please. If this man can in some way put us on the right track, so much the better. Our task will then be easy; but, at any rate, I will scour all the country until I find them."

"I am glad you are so in earnest over the affair."

"I am determined. Not only is there your business to carry out, but I have a personal account to settle with those who are with her."

"As you please."

"That is nothing to you, my lord. I will put the girl in your hands; then I shall be done with it. I will take the two men, and you will be done with them."

"Exactly. One of them is, I think, the rascal that so assaulted me and robbed me of my watch."

"He is. But don't trouble about that. He shall acquit in full all obligations."

There was a momentary pause, and Wild again touched the handle of the bell.

Then both listened.

A rapid step ascended the stairs, and then some one tapped gently at the door.

"Come in!" roared Wild, "come in!"

In obedience to this command the door was opened, and Wilkinson crept into the room like one who was going to his death.

It was wonderful what a state of subjection Jonathan managed to keep his men in; but the fact was, there was not one who did not live entirely upon sufferance. He had the power of handing them over to the authorities, and then their conviction and execution or transportation followed as a matter of course.

And so Wilkinson, although he had important intelligence to communicate, trembled lest it should not be well received.

CHAPTER LXVIII.

WILKINSON GIVES JONATHAN WILD SOME VERY IMPORTANT INFORMATION AS TO THE WHEREABOUTS OF THE FUGITIVES.

"SHUT the door," said Wild, "and then tell me what you have got to say."

"Yes, Mr. Wild."

"You told Levee that you thought you could form some idea of the place where the three fugitives have gone to?"

"I don't know about that, Mr. Wild; I will leave it to you, sir, if you please, as being the best judge."

"Go on," said Wild. "Let us hear what it is."

"I will, sir. You remember, of course, Geoffrey, as was tucked up two or three sessions ago?"

"What of him?"

"Why, he was always very great with Blueskin, and one day I happened to overhear what they were talking about."

"Well?"

"Geoffrey, if you please, Mr. Wild, was saying how he had arranged a secret place of refuge he would be able to fly to in case of any danger. It was a place, he said, where they would never think of looking to find him, and was quite a secret."

"Then what made him tell Blueskin?"

"Because they were friends, and he thought he might as well have the benefit of it as him, so he gave him a very particular description of it."

"Which you heard?"

"Which I heard, Mr. Wild."

"Be careful," said Jonathan; "this promises to be important. Tell me, what was this place?"

"It's called it Tylney Abbey, Mr. Wild."

"Tylney Abbey, Tylney Abbey," repeated Jonathan. "I have heard that name. Where is it?"

"Just on the borders of Oxfordshire, I believe, sir."

"Well, you have not told us all now."

"No, Mr. Wild, I haven't. He described how you had to get to the ruins through a very large wood, and through the courtyard to the north turret. At the top of this north turret was the room he had prepared for the purpose of hiding in."

Jonathan sprang to his feet.

"This is news," he said, "indeed."

"From all I can hear," said Wilkinson, "they appears to have taken the direct road to this place, and I fancy it is just there where they would hide."

"You may depend upon it," said Wild. "Get ready to accompany us. We shall start directly. Order a horse, too, for this gentleman."

"If what you have said turns out to be right," said Lord Donnull, "I will take care you do not go unrewarded."

"Bah!" said Jonathan. "Be off."

Wilkinson disappeared.

Wild rubbed his hands gleefully, and an exultant smile appeared upon his features.

"We have them, my lord," he said. "We have them."

"You are confident."

"I feel I am right." It is just the place they would think the best to hide in."

"I only hope we shall be lucky enough to capture them, Mr. Wild. This fearful anxiety is killing me."

And no one to have looked in the haggard countenance of his lordship would have doubted his assertion, that it was indeed acting most prejudicially upon his health.

"Console yourself with the idea that your anxiety will soon be at an end."

"I hope so—I hope so."

"Are you ready, my lord?"

"Quite."

"Then we will start at once. You cannot think what a satisfaction it will be for me to get her companions into my power. But before we start let us defend ourselves against our long journey. Drink that!"

Jonathan, as he spoke, went to the cupboard and produced a bottle and two glasses.

He filled one for himself and one for his visitor.

"Let us drink success to our endeavours," cried Jonathan.

The two villains lifted the glasses to their lips, and emptied them at a draught.

Then Wild led the way down stairs.

On reaching the street they heard the clattering of horses' hoofs in the quiet street, and the next moment Levee and the band rode up to the door.

There was a spare horse for Wild, and one for Lord Donnull.

These worthies sprang into their saddles at once.

"Now, Wilkinson," cried Wild, "where are you?"

"Here, sir, if you please."

"Very good. Keep close to me, and direct us."

At a sharp trot they took their way along Holborn to the Western-road.

This was a pace that enabled them to get over the ground at a very fair rate, without much exhausting the horses.

It was a long and weary ride, but at last they came in sight of the wood, and the tops of the ruins peering above it.

"According to the description, Mr. Wild," said Wilkinson, in reply to some remark the thief-taker had made to him; "according to the description I heard Geoffery give to Blueskin, that must be the place."

"We will inquire, if possible. Can you see a house hereabouts?"

"There is a cottage, yonder, if you please, Mr. Wild."

"Very good. Call at it."

The cottage turned out, on a nearer approach, to be one of those small country inns which are met with so frequently in England.

Its inmates appeared to be upon the point of retiring for the night when the party arrived.

Wild deemed it advisable to make a bit of a halt here. The horses would be all the better for a few minutes' rest and refreshment. There was the return journey to be made.

Ale was provided for the men, and Wild, by means of a few adroit inquiries, managed to elicit the information he required.

Not only did he learn that the ruins in the wood were those of Tyney Abbey, but also that the place was haunted by evil spirits.

Observing Jonathan smile contemptuously upon hearing this, the landlady, in confirmation, stated how during the past two nights a mysterious light had been seen in the north turret.

This seemed conclusive that the fugitives were really there, for that there was anything supernatural Wild did not for a moment believe.

"And I daresay," said the landlady, rather indignantly, "if you go to the door you will find the light visible. It was just at this time last night that we saw it."

"Oh! indeed," cried Jonathan. "Then I'll pay you for what we have had, and go to the door and see."

He did so, and the landlady rather triumphantly pointed to a stream of light which issued from the highest part of the ruins.

"There," she said, "that is the north turret, and there is the mysterious light. This is the second night of its appearance, and I know on the third something terrible will be sure to take place."

"I don't doubt that for a moment," said Jonathan.

"Good night. Forward, forward!"

The little cavalcade was quickly in motion.

As they drew nearer to the wood, the light increased in brightness.

The reader is aware that this proceeded from the fire Blueskin had lighted.

Little did those three persons think, in whose well-doing we feel so great an interest, that they were upon the threshold of so much danger. They fancied themselves secure when they were really in the most peril.

So well had Wilkinson listened to and kept in mind the description given by Geoffery, that he was able to lead Jonathan and his party to the place with as much precision as Blueskin had.

So great was the exultation of the villainous thief-taker, that he had the greatest difficulty in concealing it.

Through the court yards of the old ruins they took their way.

Presently they came to the little enclosed garden where the two horses had been left.

If there had been any doubt lingering in Jonathan's mind, the discovery of the cattle in this place would have dispelled it.

They were on the right track now.

Whispering a command to his men to maintain as profound a silence as possible as they followed him, Jonathan crept stealthily to the door leading to the circular staircase at the north turret.

This door was not much of an obstacle to those who now wished to pass through it. With the aid of their tools they very quickly had it open.

Lord Donnull, when he thus found the enterprise he had come upon almost crowned with success, trembled so excessively that he could scarcely stand.

A draught of brandy from a flask Jonathan took from his pocket, and made him drink at the bottom of the steps, served a little to steady his nerves.

With a tread as silent as though they had been a band of spectres, they all with great caution ascended the turret steps.

It will be recollected by the reader that Jack suddenly interrupted himself in what he was saying, because he fancied he heard a slight sound from the direction of the staircase.

That was Lord Donnull, whose heel struck against the stonework.

Feeling that they were almost, if not quite, discovered, they bounded up the remainder of the stairs.

The door was dashed open.

Then, as stated at the end of a previous chapter, a number of armed men rushed into the chamber.

It required but one glance for Blueskin and Jack Sheppard to realize the extent of their danger.

Jonathan Wild—that foe they had upon every account so much occasion to dread—had discovered the secret of their hiding-place.

CHAPTER LXIX.

EDGORTH BESS FALLS INTO THE HANDS OF HER WORST ENEMIES.

To place themselves in an attitude of defence was but the work of a moment.

Edgorth Bess uttered a shriek, and shrunk for protection behind her defenders.

Blueskin, as soon as he saw what an overwhelming force was opposed to him—that all possible retreat was cut off—gave up all hope.

That they could prove victorious was quite out of the question.

Nevertheless, he drew his hanger and pistols, and so did Sheppard, who had the same unpleasant conviction forced upon him.

They resolved to fight, and defend the young girl to the death.

Upon seeing his prey before him, like rats in a trap, a howl of rage and triumph burst from Jonathan's lips.

"Down with them!" he cried. "Take them prisoners, all. Down with them, I say."

Jonathan's heavy and sharp sword was in his grasp, and, as he uttered these words, he precipitated himself upon our two friends.

In this attack he was backed up by his men.

Jack and Blueskin stood shoulder to shoulder firmly, and repulsed the assault as well as they were able.

In obedience to previously given instructions none of Wild's men used fire-arms. His object was to take all three prisoners.

The clashing of swords—the trampling of footsteps, and the hoarse cries of the combatants—were terrific, and made the old ruin positively tremble beneath them.

Lord Donnull stood without.

Either from cowardice or else shame at the foul part he was playing.

But such a combat as this, where the advantages were all on one side, could not be of long duration.

Blueskin opposed himself to Wild.

The former was cool, steady, and determined.

The other seemed maddened with fury.

"Die, wretch!" he cried, as he lifted his sword, and grasped the hilt with both his hands. "Die, villain!"

Blueskin put up his weapon to ward off the blow, but it was impossible.

The mere force with which it was brought down was more than sufficient to break through all guard.

Down came Jonathan's sword upon Blueskin's head.

His sharp edge cut through his cap and scalp.

He fell down as though he had been struck with a sledge-hammer.

Blood in an immense quantity gushed from the wound; and dyed the floor.

At the moment he fell, the men who had been struggling with Jack closed upon and captured him.

But he struggled fiercely in their grasp.

It was, however, unavailingly.

Joy sparkled in the eyes of Jonathan Wild, as, darting forward, he clasped Bess in his arms.

It was in vain she struggled to free herself.

She uttered shriek upon shriek.

But in the arms of the thief-taker she was like a dove in the talons of a hawk.

Seeing her thus taken filled Jack with the utmost fury, and the attempts he made to extricate himself were really superhuman.

For a moment he did succeed in getting his right arm free.

He struck out furiously with it.

But before he could achieve any advantage it was again held behind him.

"Ha! ha!" said Jonathan, as he dragged his shrieking victim through the doorway. "Ha! ha! Jack, you see what you get by setting yourself up in opposition to me. Ha! ha!"

To this speech Jack deigned no reply.

"Bring him along, bull-dogs," yelled Wild, as he began the descent of the stairs; "bring him along, and if he escapes you shall all swing for it—mind that."

This threat, which they well enough knew was no idle one, made them tighten their hold upon Jack.

A pair of handcuffs were with professional dexterity slipped over his wrists.

Then a belt, which one of Wild's men took from round his waist, was passed between Jack's back and elbows and buckled tightly.

This left him utterly defenceless, if we may except his feet.

They dragged him down the staircase after Jonathan Wild.

Blueskin they left for dead upon the floor.

It was scarcely possible for any one to survive such a blow upon the crown as that was.

So suddenly had all this taken place that Jack had some difficulty in fully realizing the change of circumstances which had taken place.

As for Jonathan, his delight knew no bounds.

He had succeeded better than even he anticipated.

When the men who had Jack in charge reached the little enclosed garden they found Jonathan waiting for them.

Bess had fainted.

"Villain!" cried Sheppard, his voice husky with rage and emotion; "villain, you have killed her!"

"Ha! ha!"

There was something horrible in the way Wild made this reply, and Jack felt the blood boil in his veins as he heard it.

"You triumph now," he said, "but it will not be for long. The time will soon arrive when you will bitterly repent what you have done to-night."

"Go on," said Jonathan, with a coolness that made Jack almost mad; "go on; I like to hear you. One thing is certain—you won't have the chance of crowing much longer."

As he spoke, he gave the word to his men, and they set off through the wood.

On reaching its outskirts they mounted.

Edgworth Bess was still insensible.

Jonathan gave her in charge of one of his janizaries for a moment while he mounted, and then he placed her on the saddle before him.

Jack now commenced another desperate struggle, but it was in vain.

Despite all the resistance he could offer, he was lifted on to the back of one of the horses.

A cord was placed round his ancles, and his feet drawn together by it under the horse's belly.

He was then perfectly helpless.

One of the men, however, got up behind him.

His chances of escape were few indeed.

"Forward!" cried Mr. Wild. "Mind your prisoner. If he escapes you know the penalty. My lord!"

"Yes, Mr. Wild," replied Lord Donnull.

"Ride close to me. You see I am right. I have succeeded."

"You have. And now what is next to be done?"

"That point is for your own consideration. We can talk of it as we go."

Lord Donnull was silent.

A multitude of thoughts came thronging through his brain.

After the pause had lasted some time Wild spoke.

"Will you excuse me," he said, "if I make you a suggestion?"

"What is it, Mr. Wild?"

"You will not take it amiss, I hope."

"I cannot do that. I am already deeply indebted for your advice. What were you about to say?"

"This. But you must promise to keep a secret."

"Agreed."

"I have in my house in Newgate-street, or beneath it I ought perhaps to say, some cells."

"I have had as much whispered to me."

"Indeed. By whom?"

"Steggs."

"Oh! never mind. I was going to tell you in one of those cells this girl may be safely and secretly deposited until such time as you make up your mind concerning her."

"Be it so, Mr. Wild. It is the very thing I should have desired."

"I am glad my suggestion meets with your approval, my lord."

"Treat her gently, Wild; treat her gently. I am not so bad as to wish unnecessary pain inflicted on her, nor—"

"What?"

"Do I wish her death?"

"You do not?"

"No. If she could be induced in some way to legally transfer the estates to me I would spare her life, and not only that, allow her a good yearly income."

"You will have time to think upon it, for, as I understand, you have determined to place her for a short time in my keeping."

"I have, Wild, I have. If you will carry out my instructions."

"That you may rely upon."

"Treat her, then, with no unnecessary rigour. Let no one know of her existence. It may be that the solitude of a dungeon will induce her to comply with my demands."

"It is probable, and well worth a trial."

"I think so. And now, Wild, good night. We perfectly understand each other. I can trust you to take her to your house in safety. Good night."

"Good night, my lord."

Lord Donnull rode off in the direction of his residence.

"Fool!" muttered Wild, as he looked after him, "fool! I have you now completely in my power. You shall yet learn what Jonathan really is. Fortune smiles on me to-night. I shall do well out of this. Forward, there, with the prisoner!"

CHAPTER LXX.

JACK SHEPPARD FOR THE FIRST, BUT NOT FOR THE LAST TIME, SEES THE INTERIOR OF NEWGATE.

DAY was just about to dawn when Jonathan and his band with the two prisoners trotted up Snow-hill.

He first directed his course to his own residence.

Levee knocked at the door, and then sprang to Wild's side to assist him with his burden.

As soon as he reached the ground Jonathan again took the young girl in his arms. It was evident he considered her a possession of no small value.

Jack, meanwhile, was forced to remain motionless upon his horse.

He would have shouted for assistance had he the power, but they had taken care to gag him securely before they entered London.

They left him the use of his eyes, and he watched Jonathan carry Edgworth Bess into the gloomy precincts of that house from which he had with so much difficulty and danger escaped.

The agony he then endured was beyond all expression, and upon finding himself so utterly powerless, can it be wondered at that despair took possession of his heart.

He was quite at a loss to think why he was kept in the street; why he, too, was not hurried into that mysterious abode.

He soon knew, and the knowledge made him still more downcast than before.

We will follow Jonathan.

Stalking down the passage, he called out for the iron grating leading to the cells to be thrown open.

Then he descended the steps, and pursued that route which must be already familiar to our readers.

At the door of one of the cells he paused, and taking a key from his pocket, he opened it.

It happened to be situated in the immediate vicinity of the oil lamp that was always kept burning in that underground passage, so that when he threw open the door some of the beams from it found their way into the dungeon, and revealed its cheerless aspect.

Comparatively, however, it was much more comfortable than many of the dungeons were. The walls and floor were tolerably free from moisture, and in one corner was a quantity of clean straw.

Upon this he rapidly and carefully deposited his insensible burden.

It was impossible for Jonathan to conceal his intense exultation.

Plans of aggrandizement, of power, flitted quickly through his brain, and the more he reflected, the more pleased did he seem.

But having assured himself that her swoon was nothing but a fainting fit, induced by flight, he left her to recover herself.

He closed and locked the door of the cell, and then hastily made his way to the door.

"Dismount," he cried. "Take care of the prisoner."

The men at once flung themselves from their horses, and unbound Jack, but they took care to keep a tight hold of him.

"This way," yelled Wild, as he walked down Newgate-street towards the Old Bailey, "this way. Come on."

They hurried after him.

Jack shuddered when his gaze fell upon the huge black prison.

The door by which prisoners entered was quickly reached.

Jonathan himself knocked at the portal.

The sliding shutter that covered the small grated aperture was, according to custom, dashed aside.

Some angry question was doubtless upon the top of his lips, but the light of the lamps that hung over the doorway fell upon Wild's face, and enabled the man to see who the applicant for admission was.

The door was opened with astonishing quickness, for Wild just then was held greatly in awe by all the Newgate officials.

In fact, the governor of the prison and Jonathan were in collusion together, and it was well-known that a complaint from Jonathan was sure to be the means of getting them into trouble.

Hence he was treated with a civility and deference that he would never, under other circumstances, have received.

Jonathan, as soon as the door was opened, walked into the vestibule, and beckoned his men to bring their prisoner up the steps.

This was done, and then the door was closed with a bang.

It seemed to Jack as though it shut him out entirely from the world.

"Send for Mr. Noakes," cried Wild, in his most ferocious tones, "and tell him to be quick, curse you!"

The man vanished.

Mr. Noakes was the name of the then governor of Newgate.

Now this gentleman happened just then to be in bed; but, upon hearing it was Jonathan Wild who had summoned him, he hastened to put on his clothes.

Five minutes later, and rather picturesquely attired, he made his way into the lobby.

"Look here, Mr. Noakes," said Wild, "here is a young man I want you to take particular care of."

"Very good, Mr. Wild. Of course. Pope and Bain, see to Mr. Wild's prisoner."

Pope and Bain, two of the turnkeys, took charge of Jack, and they found him by no means easy to hold.

But they were used to that sort of thing.

"And now, Mr. Wild," said the governor, "what is the prisoner's name, and what is the charge you have against him?"

"One question at a time," said Wild, as he produced his pocket-book and wrote something on the leaf. "His name is John Sheppard. The charge against him is a burglary."

"That's quite sufficient, Mr. Wild, quite sufficient. Put the prisoner in a strong cell, and see that he does not make his escape."

"Yes," added Jonathan, "use every precaution. I can assure you, you will find him a very troublesome customer."

"All right, Mr. Wild, I'll see that he is taken care of. I'll wager my head he don't get out."

"What? Will you?" said Jack, speaking for the first time.

"Wager your head I don't get out."

"What do you mean by talking to me?"

"Ask my elbow. But I'll bet my hand against your stupid old head that I do get out of here. Come now!"

The top of the governor's nose grew quite purple with rage at this audacity upon the part of the prisoner.

"Off with him," he cried. "Load him with irons! Escape indeed! I'll see about that."

Wild in his heart was rather amused, though he did not allow his countenance to give token of it.

"I would advise you to keep a sharp eye upon him, Mr. Noakes," he said, as the turnkeys hustled Jack off down a passage.

"A sharp eye. Confound his impudence to wager his hand to my head! He's inexperienced yet, Mr. Wild, or else he would know better than be at enmity with the governor."

"Well," said Wild, "from what I know of him I firmly believe he would not care a jot either for your friendship or your enmity. He has too independent a spirit by half. I would give a trifle to bend him to my schemes. He would be invaluable, but there is little hope, I am afraid."

"Of course that's your affair, not mine," replied the governor. "What do you intend to do with him? The sessions will soon be on, you know."

"They will, I'll take care about that. There is my authority to keep him in charge. I will take him before the magistrate to-morrow morning."

"All right, Mr. Wild. Good night."

"Good morning," growled Jonathan, as he passed through the wicket into the Old Bailey, and walked towards his own house.

In the meantime, Jack had been hurried along a number of passages, and up and down numerous flights of steps, until his brain grew bewildered in the attempt to remember the route by which he had come.

They paused at length before a small but massive door.

The wood of which it was made was oak, strengthened in every way the imagination could suggest by bands and rivets of iron.

It was fastened by means of an iron bar, two huge iron bolts, one at the top and one at the bottom, and a lock that must have weighed a quarter of a hundred weight at least.

The key that the jailer produced to unlock it with was really quite a formidable-looking piece of metal, and, in desperate hands, would have formed an effective weapon.

This huge key was then inserted into the still huger lock, and Bain, applying both his hands, and putting out the whole of his strength, shot back the bolt.

The other fastenings were then undone, and Jack was very roughly thrust into the dungeon.

But he expected some such trick to be played him, and was on his guard accordingly; but in spite of that, he reached the hard stones with rather a heavy fall, for his hands, being secured together as they were, were unable to save him from the effects of the fall.

Bain went the door, and then Jack was half conscious that the bolts were shot into their sockets, and the bar put up.

But the force with which he came into contact with the stones deprived him partially of the use of his faculties.

He soon recovered himself, however, from the effects of that, and he raised himself painfully to his feet.

He knew when he last looked up at the sky that the dawn of the new day was visible, but all around him now was as black as the very grave itself.

In a few minutes afterwards he saw a light shining beneath his dungeon door, and heard the sound of voices and feet in the corridor without.

CHAPTER LXXI.

THE STRONGEST CELL IN ALL NEWGATE PROVES NOT STRONG ENOUGH TO RETAIN ITS INMATE.

JACK SHEPPARD had for the moment quite forgotten the governor's instructions about the irons, and that those instructions had not been carried out, so he was at a loss to know the meaning of this sudden visit.

When he saw them enter his cell, he immediately remembered it, and comprehended.

He was too much hurt by his fall to make much resistance to the irons being riveted upon his limbs, but still he took care not to let them see he was in any way injured.

The operation of putting on the fetters was very quickly performed.

Jack was freed from the handcuffs, and also from the belt that confined his arms behind his back.

For this he felt thankful, and his irons were almost pleasant in comparison.

No one who has not known what it is to have the arms bound tightly in one position for many hours can tell what a dreadful feeling it is.

Just as the last rivet was put in and the smith picked up his tools, the governor entered the dungeon, in order to assure himself by personal observation that his commands had been properly carried out.

He even walked up to the prisoner, and felt that the joints were all secure.

"You needn't take so much pains, it will amount to the same thing in the end."

"What do you mean?"

"You are evidently afraid that I shall win my bet, and so I shall!"

"Then you will have a little more trouble, that's all," said the governor, with a coarse laugh at his own wit, in which, of course, out of compliment, the two jailers and the smith heartily joined.

"You may laugh;" said Jack, "but when you find yourself with your ugly old head off, you'll change your note, I'm thinking."

"Come away," said the governor. "Come away, and leave him to it."

"Good-bye, then, for I tell you, you won't see me again until I come to claim the stake."

The door was banged, shut, and then the three retreated.

When they had fairly gone, a great change took place in Jack's behaviour.

A few rays of daylight now struggled in through the grated window, and made the different objects in the dungeon visible.

He seated himself upon the stone bench that was in it, leaning his head between his hands.

There he was loaded with so much iron as to make the least motion almost impossible, in the strongest cell in the strongest prison in England, with people doubtless keeping a sharp eye upon his movements.

But it was not so much of himself as of his companion, Edgeworth Bess, that he thought.

There she was in peril, doubtless of her life, surrounded by those anxious for her destruction, while he was powerless to help her.

This was a thought that drove him almost to distraction.

Then his mind reverted to Blueskin, the only other person in the world that the young girl could look upon as a defender.

Where was he?

A bleeding corpse. Another victim to Jonathan's brutality. The sole occupant now of the little chamber at the top of the turret in the old abbey ruins.

Jack fairly groaned as all these things forced themselves upon him.

"What shall I do?" he cried, as he threw himself back upon the hard stone seat. "What shall I do? Escape! Yes, that is it. In a moment of bravado I said that I would escape, and I will keep my word."

A great deal is actually accomplished when we make up our minds to anything, and so Jack found.

He had firmly resolved to escape, let the difficulty be what it might.

As well as he could, he looked about him at the different objects in the cell.

The walls were composed of immense pieces of stone, upon which had been engraved initials and the names of celebrated characters who had found there a temporary resting-place.

A step led up to the strong door, which on the inside was covered with one sheet of iron tightly secured by innumerable rivets to the wood.

To have looked at such an obstacle to freedom would, one would have thought, have daunted the most sanguine.

From this door Jack's eyes roved to the window.

It was as high up in the wall as it well could be, and was divided into little squares by horizontal and perpendicular iron bars.

Through this came the first rays of the coming daylight.

There was little encouragement to be got from that—so little, that Jack turned his gaze upon the door again.

He rose to his feet.

"The door," he said; "that is the only chance I have. Curses on the villain Jonathan! But he shall repent when I am free. How came he to discover our retreat?" he added. "He walked up as though he knew exactly where to find us. Can it be possible that he has the power of knowing what is going on without seeing it? No, no; I will not think that."

As these words reached his lips, he reached the cell-door.

He looked at it in every part with the closest attention. Then he passed his hands over it, especially the sides.

He tried to shake the door, but it did not move the least in its setting.

A calm spectator of the scene would at once have pronounced it an impossibility for him to get free, even though he was provided with tools best suited to the purpose.

[JACK SHEPPARD TAKES HIS FIRST STEP TO ESCAPE.]

But Jack himself was of quite a different opinion. "I'll do it," he said, "but the first thing necessary will be to get rid of this jewelry."

He strode back to the stone-bench, and sat down again. Then, diving his hand into his pocket, he produced a small, strong file.

Now, before he was placed in the dungeon, in accordance with the invariable custom of the prison officials, he had been thoroughly searched, and his pockets emptied.

How came he, then, with the file?

It was owing to a little manual dexterity.

While the smith was busily engaged in riveting on his irons, he had managed to steal the tool, and put it into his pocket unseen.

A smile of triumph overspread his face, as he examined the file, and found what a good one it was.

"With this," he cried, "I would make my way out of a thousand Newgates. The governor will lose his bet; but first let me get free from these fetters."

His first care was to find out which was the weakest part of the iron-work, and this he was not long in doing.

It was there he determined to commence, but he found, as he drew the sharp edge of the file rapidly across the iron, that a sound was produced which sounded most alarmingly distinct in that quiet place.

He paused, and the perspiration started out in large drops upon his forehead at the thought that some turnkey might be in the passage without, and heard the sound.

He listened with the utmost intendment.

To his great satisfaction, he found the silence unbroken by the least sound indicative of the presence of his jailors.

"That's well," he said, in a tone which showed how greatly his mind was relieved, "that's well; I must try to prevent the noise if I can. A little grease now would be the very thing, but its no good thinking about anything of that sort; I must hit upon some other plan. Suppose, now, I was to sing; I should think that would be the best way to drown the noise of the file."

No sooner did the thought occur to him than he proceeded to try it.

I struck up one of those flash ballads of which there were so many about the middle of the last century.

His voice was a powerful one, and he exerted it to the utmost.

As might be expected, the noise of the file was quite inaudible.

Perceiving this, he worked away with right good will, maintaining his singing with uncommon vigour, and very soon, to his delight, he found the file had made quite a deep dent in the soft iron of which the fetters were composed.

At the rate he was going on, of course he soon had one of the bands all but divided.

Then he paused, and began at another place.

So he went on until he was convinced that in less than five minutes he could quite free himself from them, though to a casual glance it would seem they were quite secure.

By this time day had fully come, and the interior of his cell was tolerably light.

"It would have been better," he thought, as he glanced up at the grated window, "to have waited until night before I began. However, it can't be helped now: I must wait! I'll hide the file somewhere, and then trust to concealing how I have worked at my fetters, for I am sure to have some visitors in the course of the day."

He found it, though, a very difficult job to hide it, for the floor, like the walls, was composed of solid stone, and did not permit of its being buried.

He wasted at least an hour fruitlessly, when the sound of approaching footsteps warned him to be prompt.

One corner of the cell was in much deeper shadow than the rest, so he made his way there, and stuck the file upright in the corner.

This, it must be confessed, was a very artificial hiding-place, and where, if any search was made, it would be certainly found, but still it was the best there was.

He sat down again quickly, and then, the fastenings having been undone, the door of the dungeon was thrown open.

CHAPTER LXXII.

JACK SHEPPARD CARVES HIS NAME UPON THE NEWGATE CELL, AND THEN SETS ABOUT MAKING HIS ESCAPE.

JACK SHEPPARD displayed a good deal of skill in the manner in which he managed to dispose himself upon the seat, so that the state of his fetters should not be perceptible.

But on this occasion, at least, his cleverness, as a great deal often is, was thrown away, for the man who came to the door, and whose duty it was to supply the prisoners with food, just put a loaf and a stone-pitcher inside, and, without even looking at Jack, departed.

In the silence of the place, he heard the man visit several other adjoining cells.

The sight of the food, coarse and untempting as it was, provoked Jack's appetite, and as he knew he could not hope for success if his strength failed him, he made a hearty meal, and drank plentifully of the water, which he found to be tolerably fresh.

"I only hope now," he said, "that, in their amazing civility, they won't come troubling me with any more visits. If they don't, I shall be all right enough. Curses on Jonathan Wild, but he shall live to repent this night's work. When I think that Bess, too, is in his power, and in that of her rascally uncle, I feel as though I was going mad. Will night never come?" he added, as, unable to sit still any longer, he rose, and paced the cell. "I am out of all patience."

But, alas! his patience was destined to be put to a more severe trial. The day had but just begun, and many a weary hour must necessarily elapse before night came again.

He knew too well the utter futility of attempting to make his escape, except under the cover of darkness, and so chafed and fretted like some wild animal confined in a cage.

As the day advanced he grew calmer, and was able to take an exact survey of his present position.

How many stirring and exciting scenes he had gone through since that night when, with wild curses and threats of revenge, he had left his master's roof! How greatly was he changed!

About mid-day, the governor, Mr. Noakes, paid a visit to the cell.

He found the prisoner to all appearance in a state of the greatest possible dejection.

This was partly real, partly assumed.

Jack feared that if he seemed too bold it might result in an examination being made of the state of his fetters, which was the thing he had most of all to dread.

"Well, my spark," cried Mr. Noakes, "not gone yet, I see! But I'm not afraid, and I should not have come now only to deliver a rather important message."

"A message?" repeated Jack.

"Yes, and as I say, an important one."

"Who from?"

The governor looked round carefully, and then said in a loud whisper—

"Jonathan Wild!"

"Curse him, I say, curse him!"

"Will you listen to the message?"

Jack was silent.

The governor chose to interpret his silence as consent.

"Jonathan Wild," he said, "has commissioned me to say to you that he did not come to-day to take you before the beak, because he was desirous of giving you an opportunity of having a little calm reflection."

"How kind!"

"He hopes you will have wisdom enough to come to terms with him to-morrow, when he will make some proposals to you. If you consent, why of course you will be set free, if not"—

The governor made an expressive movement with his fingers across his throat, uttering a clucking sound at the same time, intended to intimate the consequences that would result from Jack's refusal.

"Tell him I'll think matters over, according to his request," said the prisoner, at length; not that he had the remotest intention of coming to any arrangement with Wild, only he thought it would afford him a better opportunity of making his escape.

"That's right and reasonable," said the governor; "you'll find it your best plan. Jonathan speaks of you in the highest terms, and, let me tell you, if you value your neck you had better be friends with Mr. Wild than enemies."

This was a gratuitous piece of advice which Jack did not deem worthy of a reply, and observing his silence, Mr. Noakes turned on his heel and left the place.

"That's over," said Jack. "Jonathan, I'm much obliged to you. All I want now is darkness."

But many hours yet he knew must pass before he could have what he required.

He strove to sleep, but his thoughts were too busy to allow him to do so.

He did, however, by maintaining a recumbent posture, and resolutely closing his eyes, manage to fall into a doze.

A long weary time to him seemed to pass, and then a thought entered his mind.

He rose to his feet.

"I will leave something behind me to show I have been here," he said. "I wish I had thought of it before, it would have found me something to do. Still it is not too late."

While speaking these words, Jack went to the corner where he had deposited the file.

Then he glanced at the walls around him.

Just over the stone bench on which he sat there was a smooth piece of stonework.

"That's the place," he cried. "Plenty more have cut their names on the old walls, and why shouldn't I? I will, too, or my name's not Jack Sheppard! This file has got quite a sharp point, and it will do the business beautifully!"

His next proceeding was to kneel upon the stone bench.

"Let me see," he said, "there's plenty of room, so I will begin here, and in case they should be deaf, I'll make the letters a good size."

With a laugh at what he was pleased to conceive his wit, Jack Sheppard commenced his task.

He found the stone gave way easily before the file, and before many minutes elapsed he had scratched an enormous capital J upon the wall.

He scraped away most industriously, being fully determined that the marks should not wear out in a hurry.

Having finished the J, he paused awhile to contemplate his handiwork, and feeling satisfied therewith, set about the next letter with great energy and good will.

In something less than an hour he had managed to cut, in great straggling letters, the name—

JACK SHEPPARD.

Then, getting down off the bench, he retired to a little distance in order that he might see the name to the greatest advantage.

"Ah!" he exclaimed, in a tone which showed how gratified he was with what he had done. "It will be many a long year before that wears out, I know, if ever it does. Bravo! How well the name looks, to be sure; but there's plenty of room to put something else. Let me see. What shall it be now? Oh! I know," he added, after a moment's thought, "that is a capital idea?"

Away he went to work, and cut the letters, "escaped from this cell September" — and then he stopped.

"Whatever, now, is the day of the month? Let me think. Oh! yes. Its the eighth. I'll put September the eighth!"

A gigantic figure 8 now made its appearance on the wall, and then followed the year, so that, in its entirety, the inscription ran thus, though, of course, not in very well-formed letters—

Jack Sheppard escaped from this cell September 8, 1721.

"Now," he cried, "I think that about as daring a thing as ever anyone did, for I am a long way from having escaped yet, though I must do so, or else they will have the laugh against me. Thank goodness, its dark at last."

The shadows of evening were now creeping over the cell, and by the time he had taken one more look, the last rays of lingering daylight faded quite away.

But for all that it was not time for him to begin any active operations. The night rounds had to be made; but that over, all would be well.

Fortunately he had not long to wait, for they were made always soon after sunset, and then again at midnight, so he counted upon having four hours undisturbed.

Some more bread and water was put into the cell, and a glance given to the prisoner, to see that he was safe.

So he was, to all appearance, and they left him.

No sooner had they gone, than Jack sprang to the door.

"Its no good trying to get through that," he said. "Its a great deal too strong for anyone to think of such a thing, but I don't think it will be so very hard to get under it. Here goes for a try, at any rate."

We have before had occasion to remark, that the cell was paved with large stone flags.

With the point of the file, then, Jack began to pick out the mortar from between the interstices of the one immediately under the middle of the door.

The dampness of the place had had the natural effect of softening the cement, so that he found the job easy enough, and in a few minutes he had dug completely round the stone, so that all which now remained was to raise it from its position.

Finding all quite silent, he proceeded to disencumber himself of his fetters.

Half-a-dozen strokes, in as many different places, was sufficient to do this.

He placed them carefully on the floor.

Selecting, then, the longest piece of iron in all the lot, he went to work to cut it out.

His intention was to use it as a crowbar.

This, too, was a quickly-performed operation, which he had wisely deferred until the present moment. The sharp steel file cut into the iron, as a saw would into wood.

At the expiration of half-an-hour, he found himself in possession of a piece of iron about ten inches in length, and three-quarters of an inch in diameter.

By the aid of this he calculated upon raising the stone. The only fear he had was that it would bend beneath the weight of it.

This apprehension he soon found was groundless. He inserted one end into the crevice, and by using the lever gently, contrived to lift the stone, so that he could pass his fingers under the edge of it.

Exerting, then, all his strength, he, although the weight of it was tremendous, fairly lifted it up, and turned it at once on to the floor.

With some anxiety he now struck at the earth with his file, and was rejoiced to find it was of a tolerably soft character. He was afraid he would find it too hard to force a passage through.

But it was merely stones and earth tightly packed.

A laborious task, nevertheless, was before him.

His intention was to dig quite under the door, and then, by lifting up another stone, emerge into the passage beyond.

And all the tools he had with which to execute this arduous task were a file and a piece of soft iron, not a foot in length; yet he confidently looked forward to success.

CHAPTER LXXIII.

JACK SHEPPARD SUCCEEDS IN ESCAPING FROM HIS CELL, AND HAS AN ENCOUNTER WITH A TURNKEY IN THE PASSAGE.

As though he had some mortal enemy beneath his dagger, Jack stabbed fiercely with his file into the hard impacted ground.

When he considered he had loosened a sufficient quantity, he set to work with his hands to scoop it out.

And so, with unwearying perseverance and untiring energy, he continued at his work for full an hour, at the end of which time he had made an excavation large enough for him to creep under the door.

He had feared that he should find, connected in some way with the foundations of it, some impediment that would have obstructed his escape. But no, there appeared to be nothing of the kind, or if there was he had dug beneath it.

His task could scarcely be said to be half accomplished. The most difficult portion of it by far was yet to come.

The incredible exertion he had made compelled him to desist awhile, and regain his breath.

He wiped the perspiration from his head and face. To have looked at him, one would have thought he had but just emerged from a vapour bath.

Not for long, though, did he allow himself to remain inactive. There was no time to lose, and the amount of peril and hard work he had yet to go through, were sufficient to appal anyone.

He sprang into the hole again, and began his work.

Fortune at last seemed to favour him.

The earth under the stones in the passage was not near so hard, nor was it so full of small flint stones, as that beneath the dungeon floor.

The consequence was that in a short time, and without much adding to his fatigue, he had the satisfaction of seeing the under surface of one of the stone slabs above his head.

He next proceeded to seek for the crevice round it.

This found, he carefully picked away the mortar on three of the sides.

Then, standing upon the mound of earth, he put his back to the slab, and mustering all his strength, slowly and steadily raised it from its position.

In his hands he held two different portions of his fetters, which he placed under the stone as he raised it, so as to prevent it falling back into its former setting.

By this means he managed to get it so far raised as to be able to squeeze his slim body through.

A sickly sensation came over him as he did so, for the thought occurred to him that, should the mass of stone slip, a frightful death would be the result.

But he got through in safety, and stood in the corridor of the old prison comparatively a free man.

"So far all is well," he said, resting against the wall to recover himself again. "I have escaped from the cell at any rate. They will be rather struck when they come in the morning and find that last hole there, and wonder how I made it."

"And now," he added, "what step shall I take next? If I turn to the left that will take me to the door at the end of the corridor through which they brought me. That will be well secured, of course. I must get through it somehow, unless I can find an easier way out by turning to the right. I will try, at any rate."

This passage, it must be understood, was in profound darkness, but yet, from having been so long in it, assisted, perhaps, by some peculiarity of vision, he was enabled to see dimly about him.

He crawled stealthily and slowly to the right along the passage.

"Oh!" he said, "if I only had a light. I should think it as easy as possible then. But its no good wishing for what I can't have, so I must do the best I can without it."

Just as he spoke these words he reached the end of the passage.

He moved his hands carefully over the smooth surface in the hope of finding a door, but nothing save the cold smooth stones met his touch.

"That's the end of the passage, I suppose, and getting through that wall would be quite out of the question."

So he thought.

But he never made a greater mistake in his life.

Oh! if some friendly power had whispered in his ear the intelligence that if he had set to work upon that wall, and made a breach in it, it would have taken him into the cell beneath Wild's house, in which she whom he loved more than life itself was deposited, how quickly and energetically he would have set about it!

But there was nothing to tell him this.

He was quite ignorant of what part of the prison he was confined, and whether the wall before him was in the north, east, south, or west portion of it.

It was in the eastern portion.

Little did he think, as he stood there, passing his hands over the stonework, that a distance of a few inches only intervened between him and Edgworth Bess.

But it often happens in life that when we are nearest the object we most desire we know it not.

Convinced that there was no egress in that direction, Jack Sheppard turned and retraced his steps along the passage until he reached the door of his own cell.

Then he knew that about forty paces onwards would bring him to the strong, iron-bound door at the entrance of the passage.

Stepping with as much care as possible, on he went.

When the jailers had conveyed him to the dungeon he had taken particular notice of the different objects in his route. He thought then such attention would not be thrown away, and the result proved that he was right.

He remembered, then, that when he passed the corridor door he had descended a short flight of steps.

Consequently he would have these to ascend.

This made him so cautious in his progress. He was afraid he should come upon them unexpectedly and fall, which might, perhaps, not only give the alarm, but also do him so much injury as to incapacitate him from fully achieving his escape.

He lifted his feet only the least bit in the world, and slid them over the stones.

At last his toe struck against the bottom step.

He was all right now, and he ascended the little flight of steps rapidly and easily.

They were five in number.

Upon reaching the top one he put out his hand and touched the door.

"I wonder now," he thought, as the idea occurred to him, "I wonder, now, whether there is anyone the other side of the door? If there is it will be awkward—very awkward indeed! I will listen."

He stooped, and placed his ear close to the panel.

At first all was silent, and he was about to rise, under the conviction that there was no one on the other side, when a faint sound, like the shutting of a door, reached his ears.

He again put his ear to the panel.

Then he heard distinctly a heavy tread, which sounded dismally in that tomb-like place.

It was the footsteps of one person only.

The tramp was measured and regular, as that of a person well acquainted with the place.

Nearer and nearer it came. Evidently in the direction of the door.

Jack retreated down the steps.

Then, as his eyes were on a level with the flooring of the passage beyond, he could see what appeared to him a bright line of light underneath the doorway.

Through the monstrous keyhole, too, the light came in a long pencil, and made a small, bright spot on the stones.

"Some one is coming through the door, I think. Luckily it is only one person, so it may after all turn out a favourable circumstance for me, and yet there may be others within hearing. Never mind, I must risk that. Ah! he comes."

The heavy footsteps, which during the last few seconds had become very audible, paused at the door, and then followed the rattling of the key in the lock.

"I will crouch down here at the bottom of the steps," thought Jack, and he suited the action to the word. "He won't be looking down at his feet, and he will fall over me as sure as fate; and once down I shall have him at my mercy."

This was a good idea of Jack's, and one that had every chance of success.

Hardly, however, had he disposed himself in the position which he thought would be most effective, than the fastenings having been undone, the door was thrown wide open on its hinges.

Jack was so placed that he could without moving see who it was that thus approached.

By his dress he was evidently a turnkey.

In his right hand he held the bunch of keys which he had just used to open the door.

In the other was a lantern, which to Jack seemed to emit an unusually brilliant light.

But that was only a little optical delusion caused by his having been so long in darkness.

He was almost tempted to rise, for he naturally fell into the mistake that the turnkey would be sure to see him—that, indeed, he could not fail to do so.

Luckily, however, he remained where he was.

In the most careless manner imaginable, the man came through the doorway.

Surely fortune befriended Jack.

The man turned, and closed the door behind him.

The fear of an alarm being given was now at an end.

Not paying any attention to where he was going, for the man had so often traversed the passage he could have done it blindfold, he came down the steps.

That he should meet with anything at the bottom in the shape of an obstruction never once occurred to him.

The consequence was just what Jack had expected.

He did not trust, though, to the man falling over him, but just as he put his right foot on the bottom stair he caught hold of his leg near the ankle, and by a vigorous snatch brought him at once to the ground.

The man uttered a yell of fright, and then his head reached the hard flagstones with a terrible crash.

Then all was still.

The lantern had rolled from his grasp, but was not extinguished.

Jack rose instantly and took possession of it.

Then, observing that the man lay without speech or motion, he ventured to approach and examine him.

He was either insensible or dead, which of the two it was he could not determine, nor did he take much trouble to do so.

He was powerless to do any mischief, and that was all he cared for.

"Its a settler, I think," he said, as he saw the blood oozing slowly from a cut in the turnkey's temple. "I hope not," he said; "but I must either have done what I did, or else suffered myself to be again made prisoner."

CHAPTER LXXIV.

JACK SHEPPARD'S ESCAPE IS DISCOVERED, AND THE ALARM-BELL TOLLED.—THE GOVERNOR'S APARTMENTS AND THE WINDING STAIRCASE.

THIS was so self evident a proposition that it did not admit of a moment's dispute, and so Jack dismissed the affair altogether from his mind, looking upon it as a necessary evil.

The circumstance of the jailer coming to pay a visit to the cells, looked at first sight rather an unfavourable one, but it turned out to be quite the reverse.

At any rate, it was an event that had not at all entered into Jack's calculations, but he seized upon it with avidity, and resolved to turn it to the utmost advantage.

His first step was to take possession of the huge bunch of keys which the man carried in his hand.

Upon examining his girdle he found two other bunches, similar in all respects, and these he took as well.

Thus provided, many of the doors in the old prison, if not all, were at his mercy. The lantern, too, would enable him to see his route.

"He is bigger than I am," remarked Jack, pursuing a new chain of thought. "Suppose I was to take off his clothes and put them on over my own? Why, I should be disguised then effectually, if I took his cap as well, and I might pass muster at a distance for being him. That is a capital thought. I will do it. Fortune is, indeed, my friend to-night. I only hope, after favouring me so far, that she will not be fickle enough to turn the tables."

Jack rapidly divested the turnkey of his apparel as he gave utterance to these reflections, and as fast as he did so put them on himself.

The operation was one that consumed but little time, but when it was over the transformation was complete.

"That will do, I rather think," he said, as he buttoned the large coat over him. "No one now would take me for Jack Sheppard."

He was right enough there, for what with the garments being too large for him, and the odd shape of the fur cap, which he pulled as far down as he could over his eyes, he looked grotesque in the extreme.

He took one more glance at the form of the prostrate turnkey, and then seeing him quite still, he turned round and mounted the steps.

A great many keys, all pretty much the same size, were upon the bunch he held in his hand, and he was a long time before he found the right one.

In his attempts he took care to make as little noise as possible, for fear that some one might hear the many trials made, and suspect that something was wrong.

At last he found the right key, and turning back the bolt, he opened the door boldly, and stepped into the passage beyond.

Then he closed the door carefully after him, and locked it again.

A hasty glance which he cast around, showed him that he was quite alone.

Impressed now with the importance of being as rapid in his movements as possible, and that he had not a moment he could afford to lose, Jack strode forward and examined the place he was in.

It was a kind of chamber in which he stood, from which opened three other doors besides the one through which he had come, and all of the same make and fashion.

He hesitated, for he knew not which to choose.

Chance alone could guide him, so he stepped towards the one nearest to him.

Before he ventured to try any of the keys, he listened as he had done before, to assure himself that there was no one on the other side.

But, even while he was thus engaged, he was startled by hearing some one thrust a key into the lock of the door at his left hand—not the one at which he had been listening.

Discovery seemed all but certain.

He had but one faint chance, and that was that he might be able to find the key that fitted the lock the first he tried, and then he would be able to pass through, and so avoid coming into contact with the person who, in another second, would have the door open.

Jack seized a key at random, and thrust it into the lock.

Could it be possible?

It proved the right key.

The lock yielded.

Jack pushed the door open in a moment, and passed through, but not before the other person, whoever he might prove to be, at the other door had entered the chamber or vestibule.

"Hullo!" he cried, in gruff tones, as he caught sight of Jack's retreating form. "Who's that?"

Jack shut the door, and locked it instantly.

Then listened.

The turnkey, whose duty it was to accompany the one who lay in the inner passage in a round through the cells, but who, for some reason or other, was late, could not afford the time to look who it was he had seen, but went on.

In fact, he only called out upon the surprise of the moment, upon finding anyone there at all, and chiefly because the door through which Jack had passed, was one never used by the prison officials, as it led direct to the private portion of Newgate, which was used as a residence for the governor of the prison.

But this, of course, Jack knew nothing about.

Still he listened at the keyhole.

He heard the new comer open a door, and pass through it.

"If now," Jack thought to himself, "he has opened the door leading to my cell, he will very quickly make a discovery. I will wait here a moment, and then see; for if he finds the jailor stripped and insensible, he won't be long in making an alarm."

Jack was right enough there, for a loud shout came to his ears.

He drew a long breath.

"There's no time to lose now," he said, "and no mistake. I may not, after all, get free, but I will make a desperate effort. Where, I wonder, does this passage lead to?"

"Help! murder!—murder! help! An escape! Break jail! Help!—help! Oh! murder! Fire!"

"Bang! bang! bang! came some heavy blows on the very door on the inside of which Jack's was.

The mental agitation of the turnkey must have been very great, or he would at once have unlocked the door, for he carried keys with him.

But his object just then was to raise an alarm.

"Confound him," said Jack, "I wish I could stop his voice!"

But that was a thing just then not to be thought of, so he ran along the passage as fast as his legs would carry him, until his further progress was stopped by another door.

This one was covered over with green baize, and studded round the panels with brass-headed nails.

Then Jack guessed in a moment that beyond it were the governor's apartments.

Now this passage was one contrived for the special use of the governor and sheriffs, or other high civil functionaries who were desirous of reaching the cells.

Jack's situation was a ticklish one.

The lantern he carried showed him that the door had no fastening of any kind, but swung either way on spring hinges.

There was, however, a brass handle, which was used to pull it open, and thus, having deposited the lantern on the ground, Jack caught hold of it, and just pulled the door a little way open, so that he was able to see what kind of a place there was beyond.

It must be borne in mind that though it has taken us some little time to describe all this, it actually occurred in the space of a few seconds.

The man still continued hammering and shouting.

On the other side of the green baize door all was in darkness, so Jack picked up the lantern, and slipped through it, and observing a strong brass bolt on the inner side he shot into the socket.

He was well enough pleased to find that the sounds were very much fainter. He could just distinguish them, and that was all.

On looking round about him, he found he had quite a choice of routes.

Straight before him, and within reach of his arm, was an ordinary looking chamber door.

There was another on his left hand.

On his right was a flight of narrow winding stairs, but whether it led into the prison or into the sleeping apartments of the governor he could not tell.

He saw this, but felt there was no time to hesitate about routes, for he heard at that moment a sudden rush of footsteps, and an attempt made to open the baize door.

Preparing himself for the worst, he turned the handle of the door facing him and opened it.

As he did so a sudden blaze of light reached his eyes, and some one uttered an exclamation.

Jack just saw that it was a comfortably-furnished room, and that it was tenanted, but that was all.

"The devil!" he said, and shut the door with great expedition.

Crash went the green baize door, and he saw the bolt start from its position.

Then arose the terrific din of a clanging bell.

It was the alarm bell.

The intelligence that a prisoner had escaped would be made known to every one within the building, and all would be on the alert in consequence.

Another rush against the green baize door, and it would give way.

The springing up of so many difficulties all at the same moment, for a second or two had the effect of depriving Jack of the power of motion, but quickly recovering himself, he sprang up the narrow stairs just as he heard the men effect the demolition of the door.

The door of the room, too, into which Jack had looked was also opened.

Owing to the shape of the staircase half-a-dozen steps up it took Jack round a corner, and quite out of sight of any one in the passage.

He had slipped the lantern under his capacious coat, so that no beams from that might betray his presence.

Upon reaching this turn in the staircase he paused, and, stooping down, cautiously peeped over the balusters.

His gaze rested upon a scene of great confusion.

On the threshold of the chamber door, which was now thrown wide open, his burly figure boldly delineated by the bright light behind him, was the governor of Newgate.

Before him, and all speaking at once, were some half-dozen turnkeys.

"Ha! ha!" laughed Jack Sheppard, silently. "Ha! ha! There is going to be a bit of sport, and I will stop and see it out."

CHAPTER LXXV.

EDGORTH BESS AWAKES TO THE FULL CONSCIOUSNESS OF HER SITUATION, AND RECEIVES A STARTLING COMMUNICATION IN HER CELL.

If Jonathan Wild possessed a heart—and we think the question a very doubtful one indeed—but if, as we say, he did possess a heart, it must assuredly have been filled with exultation when, after having given his instructions to the governor in the manner we have recorded, he descended the steps which led from the door of the prison into the Old Bailey, and directed his steps towards his house—we were going to say home, but we felt it would be profaning so sacred a word to apply it to the thief-taker's residence.

The street was quite deserted at that early hour, but if any one had met him, the faint light that was in the sky would have shown that his scarred and hideous features were distorted with a grin of intense satisfaction.

All was well.

Success had crowned his every effort, and as he took a rapid mental survey of his position, he saw himself completely master of the field.

The grin changed to an odd chuckling sound, deep down in his throat. The more he thought the more good tempered he grew, and in his extreme delight he quite forgot the pain he had endured, and was still enduring from his wounds.

Blueskin, once his faithful servitor and second self, the man he had treated with thrice as much consideration as any one, afterwards to turn his foe, was now dead. The terrific blow he had given him upon the head with his heavy hanger at the termination of the conflict in the old abbey ruins, was, he was well assured, a fatal one. No mortal man could possibly survive the effects of such a stroke.

So far, then, all was well. He felt that while his ex-lieutenant lived, his position would be most precarious and full of danger. During their long companionship he had confided many secrets of great importance to him.

But now he was dead.

Yet it is certain that Jonathan would have been better pleased if he had left life in some less agreeable manner, but he was forced to rest content and console himself with the reflection that from him, at least, he had nothing more to fear.

Had it not been for the fear he would disclose his secrets, Jonathan would have liked to have had him regularly brought to trial, condemned, and handed over to the mercies of the hangman; but if Blueskin had escaped this death, there was no reason why Jack Sheppard should. He was safe a prisoner, and he had sworn an oath that he would bring him to the gallows.

So much for Jonathan's revenge.

It was in a fair way of being glutted.

Then the young girl, Edgworth Bess. She, too, was in his hands. He could do with her as he could wish. That matter he deferred for future consideration.

Lord Donmull. How should he act towards him? Treacherously, of course! It was not in the villain's nature to do otherwise. He would so manage events that he alone should reap the benefit. Steggs, too: a man with all the inclination to be as great a villain as himself? His fate he had already resolved upon. Two in the same trade he knew would never agree. His interest with his lordship would counteract his. He would interfere with the execution of his designs. Therefore he must be put aside.

But much as the reader may detest Jonathan Wild, we can scarcely expect him to feel any deep emotions of sympathy for Steggs. His villainy was of the worst order. He had no excuse. Overcome in his dying moments by remorse, the man Williams, the poor tool of Abel Donmull, who had been charged with the murder of the heiress, had called Steggs to his side, and with his expiring breath, discovered the whole matter to him, told him that his heart had failed him—that the young heiress still lived—and though steeped in poverty, existing in an atmosphere of crime and vice, that she yet was pure and virtuous, and entreated him, for his soul's sake, to make known his confession, and strive his utmost to restore the poor girl to those rights of which she had been so cruelly and unjustly deprived.

Steggs promised, and Williams, the man of guilt, resigned himself to die, with a lightened soul.

But how did Steggs keep the promise he had so solemnly made at so awful a moment?

The reader has seen.

So, for these reasons, it cannot be expected that much if any pity can be felt for him.

With his hands clasped behind his back, his head bent down, and his chin resting heavily upon his breast, Jonathan, full of deep thought, made his way to his own domicile.

In accordance with his custom, he put his hand into the breast of his waistcoat for the master-key, and then he recollected with an oath that Jack had stolen it from him, and he vowed fresh vengeance on his head.

"He shall die!" he said. "Curse him—he shall swing as his father did before him! And yet," he added, as he banged furiously at his door, and strode into the hall, "and yet he is a young, brave spirit, and would be invaluable to me. My revenge will keep, and be all the better for it. I will try to bend him to my purpose, will drag him still deeper down into the abyss of crime, and when he feels that his soul is lost—lost irredeemably—and he is no further use to me, he shall die! Then, and not till then, shall he grace the triple tree at Tyburn."

The duty of keeping the front door of Wild's house was, as we have before had occasion to remark, taken in turn by his men.

This time Flood was "on the lock."

He opened the door, and closed it without a word, and Jonathan, still muttering his diabolical intentions towards Jack, kicked open the door of his office.

The place was in perfect darkness, but he was sufficiently well acquainted with the position of the different objects in it to dispense with a light, so he walked straight up to the fireplace, and took off the chimney-piece his bull's-eye lantern.

He ignited it in silence.

He had an errand to perform which made him full of thought.

The reader can guess to what portion of his house he was going, to require a light.

The cells.

A part of it that was always in darkness.

Having the lantern fairly alight, he emerged into the hall again.

The man at the grating, seeing him approach, opened it, to allow him to pass through.

It will be remembered that the cell in which he had placed Bess was the one in about the centre of the rest.

This was the one he unfasted.

His hand shook a little.

"How is the girl, I wonder," he muttered; "Is she still in a faint? I should think not. She is young, and Nature ought to bring her to without assistance."

Thus speaking, he entered the cell.

The poor persecuted girl was lying upon the straw just as he had left her, but the noise he made in entering, and the light of the lantern which he carried aroused her, and she sat up.

Jonathan Wild looked at her in silence. He knew that at first her mind must be in a state of great confusion, and he waited until such time as she should be able to recall her thoughts and realize her present position.

Her beautiful countenance assumed an expression of alarm as she saw the kind of place in which she was.

Then her eyes fell upon the thief-taker.

She recognised him instantly, and with a sudden rush the memory of all that had occurred came back to her, and she uttered a piercing shriek, which echoed and re-echoed in the vaulted corridor without.

So distressing were all the circumstances, that for a second time she almost relapsed into a state of unconsciousness; but the harsh grating tones of Jonathan's voice aroused her, and, making a great effort, she sat up and looked him as calmly as she could in the face.

For the life of him Wild could not bear that gaze, and he was forced to abase his eyes.

"Villain!" she exclaimed, "you shall repent of this. Blueskin and Jack will save me."

"Ha! ha!"

There was something very horrible and cold-blooded about this reply, and Bess shuddered.

"Ha! ha!" said Wild again. "Ha! ha! They will save you, will they? I doubt it."

"But I do not," she replied, "and I have faith in heaven."

"Good again, good again. That, I fancy, will be all you will have to trust to. Blueskin—the traitor Blueskin—ha! ha! is dead. I slew him with my own hand, and so you will get small help from him."

"I will not believe it," cried Bess, passionately. "I have too much faith in the mercy of Providence to believe that it would deprive me of a defender, and leave me to the mercy of a villain like yourself."

"Then, as for your fancy man, Jack Sheppard," continued Wild, unheeding her words, "he is safely lodged in Newgate, and when he leaves it it will be in a cart, and he will take a little journey out of town. Ha! ha!"

Wild was tickled with his villainous wit.

"What do you mean?" asked Bess, who, beyond the idea that Jack was in some danger, did not comprehend him. "What do you mean?"

"What I say. He is a prisoner on a charge of burglary, which I shall bring against him. He will go through the form of a trial, be condemned, and swing at Tyburn."

"No—no!" she cried piteously, as she threw herself on her knees at Jonathan's feet. "No—no! You will not, cannot do such an awful deed."

"Ha! ha!"

"Tell me that you are only threatening me for some ulterior purpose—that you do not really mean what you say. Speak to me—speak to me!"

"Are you willing to listen to reason?"

"Yes—yes! Oh! God; yes! Speak—speak!"

"Be calm, then. Jack has no doubt made you acquainted with the secret of your life."

"He has. He told me, too, that you had joined my enemies, and were against me—that you had tried to bend him to your will. But you failed—you failed."

"Knowing this, then, you must be aware that it is merely by the orders of another that I act."

"My cruel uncle?"

"Exactly so."

"And what reward?" cried Bess, a fresh hope springing up in her mind; "and what reward does he offer you for doing this? Tell me its amount, and I will double—ay, treble it—if you will put me in possession of my own."

Jonathan smiled grimly.

"You cannot."

"Cannot what?"

"Double the reward."

"Why not? Surely I have enough for that."

"No," said Wild. "My reward will be the sole and undisputed possession of all your wealth and estates."

"Impossible!" cried the young girl, with a startled look. "My uncle could not be so foolish."

"You are green," said Wild. "When you are older you will know better. Look at my position," he cried, in an exultant tone of voice. "Blueskin is dead. Jack a prisoner. You a prisoner too, and your uncle so deeply and wholly in my power that he exists but at my pleasure, and I can compel him to act just as I choose."

CHAPTER LXXVI.

A MYSTERIOUS AND SORROW-STRIKEN OLD MAN SEEKS AN INTERVIEW WITH THE THIEF-TAKER.

As Jonathan spoke these words he drew himself up to his full height, and looked defiantly around him.

Edgworth Bess gazed upon him with the utmost surprise and terror.

"You know now," said Wild, after a brief silence. "That is what I meant to tell you. I shall leave you now, in order that you may perpend what you have heard. I shall return in a few hours, and then—ha! ha!—then, my dear, I have a little proposal to make to you."

A hideous leer accompanied these words.

What did he mean?

Bess was terrified, though at what she knew not.

"A little proposal which you will do well to accede to, I can assure you, for if you comply with my wishes, I will do what you wish in return. While I am gone think over all I have said, and make what you can of it."

Jonathan left the cell, and, closing the door behind him, fastened it carefully.

Edgworth Bess listened to the sound of his retreating footsteps along the passage.

Then, groping her way back to the straw, she flung herself upon it, and clasping her hands over her eyes, strove to think.

Jonathan's words and mysterious behaviour filled her with undefined dread.

That he had some deep and hidden motive in paying her the visit he did, she knew enough of him to be certain.

But she found all attempts to speculate upon it fruitless.

Then the current of her thoughts changed, and with a burst of sorrow she thought of the sad fate of her friend and protector, Blueskin, and the reflection that it was to her that he owed his death, added fresh poignancy to her grief.

Jack Sheppard, too, who despite his criminality, she loved with all the fond devotion of a true woman's heart. He, too, was in a scarcely better position, for had not Jonathan told her he was doomed to die—to die the most shameful and ignominious of all deaths.

There she was alone and undefended, without a friend to aid her at the time when a strong arm and a willing heart were most needed to protect her.

Truly was her situation a wretched one indeed, and can it be wondered at that she gave herself up entirely to despair.

Let her turn her mental vision in whatever direction she would, she could see not the faintest glimmering of hope.

The sobs and tears, as bit by bit the forlornness of her condition forced itself upon her, were really heartbreaking.

There was but one source from which she could draw consolation.

She knew the indomitable energy of Jack's disposition, and from that knowledge argued that he would make a powerful effort to escape and rescue her from the grasp of her persecutors.

And so, in a state of mind at times bordering upon madness, but at all times wretched, the day passed away.

Jonathan Wild, when he left her cell, went up into the hall, and, after a moment's reflection, out of the front door.

"Flood!"

"Yes, Mr. Wild. What did you please to want, sir? I am here at your service, Mr. Wild."

"Ya—ah! Silence. I shall be back in an hour."

"Very good, sir. Oh! yes, sir."

Jonathan descended the steps, and Flood, as he closed the door, muttered—

"The villain. I did hope he was done for, curse him! I wish I had hit him a little harder than I did."

It will be recollected that Flood was the name of the man who had knocked Wild about so when they conveyed him to London.

On this occasion Jonathan's business was of a very ordinary and every day kind indeed. The fact was he wanted something to eat.

His household was carried on under rather strange principles, and whenever he took a meal there was always one eating-house where he went to eat it.

This eating-house was in Giltspur-street, facing the east end of St. Sepulchre's-church, and was kept by a creature of his.

Towards it he now made his way. Many hours had elapsed since he had taken any food, and now he felt himself sick and faint for want of sustenance.

The hour was an early one, and few people were in the streets; still fewer shops were open.

But Wild knew his wishes were always attended to with the utmost alacrity, let him appear at what hour he would.

He found a man taking down the shutters. He seemed only partially awake, and he stopped in his work every now and then and yawned in such a frightful manner that his head seemed in imminent danger of falling off.

But it is hardly worth while to be so minute as to follow Wild into the eating-house, when we have so many stirring and important events pressing upon us for speedy recital. Let it suffice to say, that having eaten enough to satisfy a small regiment, he, in something less than an hour, reached the door of his own house again.

As he crossed the street, he turned his head and looked up at the church clock.

It was a few minutes past seven.

"I will go and have three hours' rest," he said. "I feel badly in want of it. Then I shall be able to attend to business in my office properly. I have sadly neglected it of late, but thank the fates things will go on a little smoother now."

What a mistake.

But we will not overrun our story, but merely describe events in the order in which they happened.

In pursuance, then, of his expressed intention, Jonathan made his way to the bed-room on the second floor, and flinging himself upon the bed, dressed as he was, fell into a profound slumber.

Then he moved and got his neck bent in some odd way, and began to snore in a frightful manner.

The door was then cautiously pushed open, and a head thrust in.

Satisfied apparently that he might safely venture to enter, Mr. Ebenezer Snoxall, the apothecary, did so.

"Ha!" he said, in a whisper, as he reached the side of the bed. "He's asleep now, and no mistake. I had better take the opportunity of dressing his wound, or there will be no bearing him when he awakes. What a horrible noise. I'll shift his head a little, and see if that will stop it. Oh! ah! yes. That's it. Capital!"

Jonathan's nasal concert ceased.

The apothecary now, with trembling hands and gentle touch, set about the very unpleasant task he had to perform.

But Jonathan's sleep was too profound for it to arouse him, though he several times shouted and moved about uneasily, to the great terror of the man of physic.

"That's over," he said, at last; "and now, Jonathan Wild, you can sleep as long as you like."

He glided from the room like a phantom.

When Wild threw himself upon the bed and fell asleep, it was with the mental resolution to awake in three hours' time.

It was just striking ten when he opened his eyes.

He felt wonderfully better than he had for some time.

His hearty meal, sound sleep, and careful dressing of his wound had all conspired to produce this effect.

He rolled off the bed, adjusted his clothes a little, and then slunk down stairs with the stealthy tread of a cat.

He was in hopes, by coming unexpectedly, to catch some one "on the hop," as he called it, by which expression he meant doing or saying something which he would not be desired to witness.

But his rascally crew were too wide awake to be up to anything just then. They every moment expected to see him make his appearance.

Scarcely had Jonathan seated himself at the desk than Wilkinson tapped at the door, and just showed the end of his nose.

"A visitor, Mr. Wild."

"Come in."

"Yes, Mr. Wild,"

Wilkinson did not know whether to feel pleased or not, but he obeyed.

"Who is it?"

"I don't know, sir. He's an old man, and seems to be in very great distress about something. He has been here a great many times, and says his business with you is of the utmost importance."

"Is he well dressed?"

"Not very, Mr. Wild."

"Never mind, I will see him."

Wilkinson, as the Americans, in their peculiar vernacular, would have said, "made tracks" for the door.

"Stop!" cried Wild.

He had his hand on the knob of the door, but he stopped at once.

"Wilkinson, come here."

"Yes, Mr. Wild," he replied.

He dreaded this pacific demeanour on the part of his employer boded him no good.

His conscience, too, accused him, for he had been mixing himself up in some little affairs which, if they came to Jonathan's knowledge, would assuredly put his head in the halter.

Trembling, then, in every limb, and white as ashes, he approached the railings in front of the desk at which Wild was seated.

"Wilkinson!"

"I am here, Mr. Wild."

"You don't seem very well."

"Me, sir? Why—a—yes—a—that is to say"—

"And confused! But don't be afraid, Wilkinson. I believe you are faithful to me, and I don't want to be unjust."

"No!" groaned Wilkinson, and that was all he could say.

"You gave me some very important news about the ruined abbey, and, what is more, the information turned out to be perfectly correct."

"Yes, Mr. Wild," said Wilkinson, brightening up a little, and losing much of his dread.

"I succeeded in that important business, which I shouldn't have done so easily if it had not been for you."

"Oh! Mr. Wild," exclaimed Wilkinson, with a hypocritical whine.

"So, to reward you, and encourage you to tell me anything else you may think I should like to know, there's a twenty pound note, Wilkinson. Put it in your pocket, and say no more about it."

"Oh! Mr. Wild," gasped Wilkinson, as he clutched the crisp bit of paper. "Oh! Mr. Wild, you are too good!"

"The intelligence was important. Let it be an encouragement to you. Hold your row!"

"Yes, sir."

"Where's this old man you spoke of?"

"Waiting in No. 2, sir."

"Very well. Bring him in here at once, and don't say another word."

Wilkinson closed the door.

"Oh! I'm blowed!" he muttered, and he looked at the note which had been given him, and found it genuine. "Johnny's grateful. The blessed world will come to an end after this, and no mistake. What a fool I was to be a frightening myself like that about nothink at all."

He opened the door of the little waiting-room which was called No. 2.

Seated in an arm-chair by the fire-place, his face buried in his hands, and wearing every appearance of the utmost sorrow, was an old man.

What could he want with Jonathan Wild?

CHAPTER LXXVII.

RETURNS TO THE LONELY CHAMBER AT THE TOP OF THE NORTH TURRET OF THE RUINED ABBEY.

NOTHING would please us better than to at once answer the question, but our attention cannot any longer be diverted from some other events replete with interest.

The reader must exercise that most commendable of all virtues, patience.

But we promise to keep him no longer than we can help.

[BLUESKIN IMPLORES THE POACHERS TO SPARE HIS LIFE.]

Leaving, then, the sorrowful and mysterious old man upon the point of being introduced to Jonathan.

Leaving Edgworth Bess in the silence, solitude, and darkness of her cell beneath Wild's house.

Leaving Jack Sheppard in his very perilous position upon the winding staircase in that part of Newgate devoted to the governor's use.

We turn to one whose condition was, if possible, worse than all, and of whom we have for so long lost sight.

We allude to Blueskin.

It will be recollected that on the occasion of Wild's sudden irruption into the turret chamber, a conflict had taken place between them.

The result of that conflict is already known to the reader.

With one terrific heavy blow of his hanger, Jonathan had beat down his guard, and inflicted a ghastly wound upon his (Blueskin's) head.

He fell as though struck by lightning, and was left extended on his back for a dead man.

The fire died out.

Gradually as she sank towards the west, the moon's rays ceased to shine through the grated windows.

The chamber was in darkness.

Presently the sun rose, and gilded with its first rays the crumbling walls of the old ruin, investing them for a time with a more than magic beauty.

Then, as the god of day climbed still higher and higher in the sky, the golden tint departed, and an ordinary white one took its place.

At last, even as the moon had done on the precedent night, the sun shone through the turret windows.

His warm, revivifying beams revealed a frightful spectacle.

His hair matted with blood, which had coagulated round his head, and so stopped the hemorrhage; bereft of all motion, his eyes wide open and vitreous, the pallor of death upon his face, lay Blueskin!

But he was not dead, though life clung to him by but a feeble tenure.

Still, he gave no signs of life, and no one who gazed upon him could have come to any other conclusion than that he was a corpse.

Higher and higher rose the sun, brighter and warmer became his rays, but yet that mutilated form stirred not.

Oh! could but some kind Samaritan have been made aware of the desperate condition of a fellow-creature, he would have hastened to his assistance, bound up his wounds, and brought him back to life.

But in that lonely foot-deserted place, what hope was there that any one would come to tend his hurts?

Alas! none.

His recovery must then be left in the hands of nature.

The cool autumn day fades away.

Hope fades with it.

The deathlike trance has now continued upwards of eighteen hours.

Had it not so chanced that the blood congealed over the wound, and so stopped its further flow, he must inevitably have bled to death.

As it was, though, he had lost no inconsiderable quantity of the vital fluid, yet it was not enough to endanger life.

Obscure and obscurer grew the different objects once again, until it was impossible to distinguish the form which lay so stark and still.

No signs of returning animation.

A north-east wind sighed with a melancholy cadence through the abbey ruins.

The leaves of the ivy and other parasitic plants that clung to the time-worn stonework for support rustled ceaselessly.

The gigantic owls, who had for so long found there a safe and unmolested home, uttered at intervals their strange unearthly cry, too-who, too-who.

Dense masses of clouds overspread the heavens, and shut out the radiance of the queen of night.

But the wind, as it increased in power, sent them scudding away until they piled themselves up in a huge bank on the opposite side of the horizon.

Then the silvery moon and pale, twinkling stars, were brought to view.

The moon was exactly at the full.

Through the window in the turret streamed with full force her light, revealing its interior with a seemingly greater clearness than the sun himself.

In broad and picturesque masses of light and shade it fell.

The body of Blueskin, looking like some statue, so still and corpse-like looking was it, could be once more seen.

In the long interval of time no change had taken place.

His eyes were fixed, and staring blindly upwards.

The arms outstretched.

The limbs rigid.

Is he to die?

And as the pale pure beams of the full moon rest upon him there starts up, unbidden to the imagination, the horrible superstition of the vampire.

That phantom, the bare idea of which coids the warm life-blood about the heart, and causes a clammy moisture in the brain.

That phantom which perpetuates a loathly life by sucking the life-blood from the veins of the young.

That phantom, immortal, though liable to death like any human being, yet who, upon being exposed to the moonlight, takes presently a new lease of existence.

That phantom to whom the moon is a god, from whom, from time to time, he draws fresh life and vigour to continue his unholy work.

Yes, such is the superstition which a contemplation of that prostrate form cannot fail to bring before the mind.

The silence and solitude of the place.

The immobility of that spectral-looking shape.

The bright moonbeams shining with unnatural lustre upon him.

All these circumstances would lead to such a thought, without any great stretch of the imagination.

And that idea having once taken firm possession or any-one, how they would have felt the heart still its pulsations—how they would have felt the healthy action of their lungs impeded, and the breath sent forth in sudden and fitful gasps—how they would have felt the blood creep through its channels like water, when they saw the deathly object make a slight, almost imperceptible movement.

Could it be possible that the lunar light contained some resuscitative power?

It would seem so.

The slight movement was repeated.

It was a strong convulsive shudder of the whole body.

Then the arms moved, and at last the seemingly dead man raised himself upon one arm, and looked about him.

All round do his eyes wander, and then, as if under some powerful fascination, they rest upon the moon's disk.

Very ghastly indeed was the aspect of the countenance.

A groan came from the white lips.

Then the factitious strength which had enabled him to rise departed, and he sank down again upon his back.

But this time he was in possession of his faculties.

His head was racked with an intolerable pain, which seemed now as if a fiery arrow had pierced his brain, and then as though his skull was falling asunder.

The effort which he made to recollect who he was, and what had happened last, aggravated these symptoms frightfully.

Still he did not give up.

A natural impulse made him carry his hand to his head.

It was sticky, cold, and wet.

"I have been wounded," he said. "I have been wounded. How did it happen, I wonder? Am I still alive, or is this death?"

He again struggled to a half-sitting posture.

This time he was much stronger.

He had about his brain a dim consciousness of what had occurred, but that was all. Nothing at all resembling distinct recollection.

Then all at once he became seized with the idea that he was in some imminent danger where he was, and that it was imperative he should escape at once.

That was delirium.

In obedience to this instinct, and finding his strength wonderfully increased, he made all speed he could towards the door.

On his hands and feet he crawled, leaving behind him a track of blood as he went.

Down the narrow, dark, and steep stone staircase, missing a dozen times by a hair's breath a fall that would then and there have finished his career.

Through the little door and out into the mazy intricacies of the abbey ruins he went.

Paying no heed to his course—climbing with incredible labour over obstacles he could easily have crawled round—possessed but with the idea that by keeping on he was escaping some great peril, he did not stay for breath, but hastened on.

The exertion caused the wound in his head to break out afresh, and the hot blood trickled down on to his neck and face.

Not heeding this in the least—indeed, it is questionable whether he was aware of it—he emerged from the ruins, and plunged into the wood surrounding them.

Still maintaining the same onward course, vainly exhausting his strength, he forced his way through the thickest of the undergrowth.

The gorse bushes wound his hands, the prickly thorn and wildbriar lacerate his flesh, but he cares not, feels not, so that he still goes onward.

His sense of hearing, too, is stretched to the utmost, in expectation of hearing some indications of pursuit.

But in that lonely place all is still.

And now he reaches the margin of one of those open spaces, which are met with in all woods of great extent.

He wipes the blood from his face with his hand, wondering the while what it is, and listens.

His pulse begins to slacken.

He can hear sounds which fill his heart with dread, and convince him his foes are close upon his track.

The trampling of feet.

The murmuring of voices.

Close at hand, too, they seemed.

With the energy of despair he made a desperate effort to force his way further through the bushes.

Then he heard the loud report of a gun, and simultaneously felt a slight shock.

"I am shot!" he gasped, and then he sank down upon the earth, having looked, as he firmly believed, for the last time upon the face of nature.

CHAPTER LXXVIII.

BLUESKIN ESCAPES BUT FROM ONE PERIL TO FALL INTO ANOTHER.

AND now, from the shadowy sides of the small open space, upon the borders of which Blueskin had fallen, there emerged several dusky forms.

With slow, stealthy steps, and as though animated by one impulse, they made their way to the centre of the enclosure.

As they reached it, and stood there in a dense, silent throng, the moonbeams revealed their garb and features.

Almost without exception they were attired as farmhouse labourers, only there was an air and manner about them which showed they were not those peaceful people.

The large slouching felt hats which they wore upon their heads concealed a great portion of their features, but what could be seen was forbidding enough.

Each man carried a musket.

They looked anxiously around them, whilst some assumed listening attitudes.

"All is well, I fancy," said one, in hoarse, guttural accents. "I can hear nothing. I think I had him."

"What was it?"

"I know not. Some spy, I should think; but I hope I have put an end to him, though. It was some one sneaking through the underwood, and who would do that but a spy?"

"That's right enough," said another. "But why don't you go and see what it is?"

"Why don't you?"

"Oh! you fired the gun, didn't you? Go and see yourself. Ha! look there. Hark! What is it? Oh! what is it?"

The other men, upon hearing these words from their companion, and seeing him raise his arm, looked immediately in the direction in which he pointed.

They shrunk back and got closer to each other.

Some held their guns butt ends upwards in attitudes of defiance.

Then a miserable-looking object, which looked scarcely human, crept out of the shadow of the trees into the patch of moonlight.

It was Blueskin.

When he fell down, as recorded at the end of the last chapter, it was under the firm conviction that he was mortally wounded.

But this he quickly found was not the case.

Our readers suspect what had happened.

The men in the wood were poachers, and hearing some one forcing a way through the brake, they had taken it to be a spy, and fired in the direction of the sound.

The gun was only loaded with small shot, only a few of which struck Blueskin on the leg. The remainder flew harmlessly over him.

Still, in the state in which he then was, the idea that he was killed would be the one most likely to take fast hold of his imagination.

But, as we have already said, he soon found he was unhurt.

And now a result occurred which might have been expected.

The flow of blood from the wound had dispelled the delirium from his brain, and he recollected with the greatest suddenness all that had occurred.

He rose, although his weakness was excessive.

He could hear the sound of voices, and he made his way slowly and painfully towards the place from which they came, with the intention of asking for relief.

Crawling on his hands and knees, and dragging with the greatest difficulty one leg after another, he came.

"Help! help!" he cried. "Mercy! mercy! Do not strike me. I am wounded, I fear, to the death, and cannot raise my hand in my defence. Save me—save me! Mercy—mercy!"

It was only feebly that he could utter these words, although he strained his voice to the utmost.

And all the time he spoke he crawled nearer and nearer to the men.

But as they saw him draw so close they raised their guns threateningly, and with hoarse cries warned him off. They feared it was but a snare—a portion of some deeply-laid plan for their apprehension.

"No—no!" said Blueskin, in a weaker voice, "you cannot be so inhuman as to refuse me what I ask. Help! help!—oh! help! Help me, or I die!"

"Hold off!" cried the poachers, "hold off! We can do nothing for you. Hold off, or it will be the worse for you!"

Blueskin looked up as these unfeeling words reached his ears.

His gaze met only stern and angry faces, and weapons lifted menacingly above him.

He strove to speak.

He could not.

With his right hand he clutched his throat, as though he could have torn away the impediment to speech.

He made another frantic effort to raise his voice, but a whisper only issued from his lips.

"Gold!" he said, "gold! I am rich! Gold—gold—to those who help me! Mercy! mercy! I—I—help—ah!—he—"

Uttering these words in a hissing whisper he fell like a log of wood to the ground.

The poachers looked into each other's faces in alarm and doubt.

"Poor wretch!" said one at last.

"Let's finish him," cried another, a huge, bull-necked fellow, "we should do him a kindness by putting him out of his misery. What do you say, mates?"

He swung his gun, which he had hold of by the barrel, two or three times round his head, in order that he might bring it down with greater force.

And bring it down he assuredly would—for the remainder of the gang, looking up to him as their leader, made no sign of dissent—had not a stalwart young fellow sprang forward from their midst, and caught the descending weapon in his hands.

"No, no," he cried, "I won't stand by and see a helpless wounded man murdered if I can help it. I'll tell you what it is, Jack Adams: hard times, bad masters, and misfortunes may have driven me to be a poacher, but my heart is not dead yet!"

"Let go of my gun!" said the tall ruffian, who had been called Jack Adams; "what do I care whether your heart is dead or not. Let go of my gun, I say, or I'll make you."

"Never, until you promise to let this man be."

"Ho! ho! hark, mates! How long has this young cock been your captain, I should like to know?"

"I say I won't see this man murdered!"

"He is a spy, I tell you," cried Jack Adams, "and it's a trap to catch us! Death to the spy! Isn't that it, mates?"

"Yes, yes," cried the others, "down with them both—down with them both!"

"Hold!" cried Adams: "now I know your minds, all right. Hold off a bit; the man on the ground can't hurt us for a minute or two, and as this is a little personal affair between George and myself, why we'll settle it."

"Bravo, Adams! That's fair! Give it to him! We'll stand by! A ring—a ring! Make a ring!"

Such were the vociferations which saluted Jack Adams's proposal.

Anything in the shape of a personal contest was something very congenial to their dispositions, and as the intending combatants were the two strongest men in the gang, they looked forward to this one with unusual interest.

As for the young man, George, he exhibited the utmost willingness to settle the matter in the manner proposed.

It was not the first difference he had had with Adams.

A ring was quickly formed and seconds appointed.

With great speed the men now proceeded to divest themselves of the upper portion of their apparel, and in a minute or two they stood facing each other in the moonlight, stripped to the waist.

Both were strong, well-formed men, and tolerably matched in all respects save height and length of reach, in both of which Adams had the advantage.

After a little cautious sparring they flew at each other with the utmost fury, and some heavy blows were exchanged.

Then both combatants fell to the ground.

They were quickly raised by their seconds.

Scarcely waiting to draw breath and wipe the blood and dirt from their persons, they again rushed at each other.

This time the encounter was fierce and more protracted, but it ended by both kissing the earth as before.

A rest of a few minutes now became imperative, but when the combatants were again placed face to face, all present felt certain that this, the third round, would decide the battle.

Both appeared to be much injured.

But their blood was up to fighting point, and they went at it like demons.

The poachers looked on with the most intense delight, and so absorbed were they that they quite forgot the cause of the duel.

Backwards and forwards, round and round went the two men.

It soon became evident George was getting the best, and Adams the worst of it.

This fact seemed to press itself upon the observation of the latter, for he fought with positive fury.

George still maintained his calmness, and then, having watched his opportunity, he struck his opponent a tremendous blow on the mouth, and down he fell senseless.

George was the victor.

Two or three stooped over their vanquished captain, but the majority surrounded George, and overwhelmed him with congratulations.

"Where is the poor man who asked for help?" he cried, although he was so much punished that he could hardly stand. "Where is he?"

"Here, George, and as dead as a nut."

"No, no, not dead. Pick him up, some of you; I wouldn't trouble you if I could help it. Pick him up, and carry him carefully to my cottage. 'Tain't far from here, you know."

"All right, George; we'll do it, my lad. You've got a rare pluck, and no mistake."

Blueskin accordingly was raised as gently as their rough hands would permit.

The movement aroused him.

"Save me," he cried. "Gold! heaps of gold to those who save me! A doctor—send for a doctor, or I shall bleed to death!"

"All right, guv'ner. Come along of us. George has licked Jack Adams, so we're going to take you to his cottage. Come on, its all right."

More dead than alive, as people say, Blueskin was taken by a narrow, winding pathway through the trees, to a miserable hut in which George and his wife and family dwelt.

With great care he was laid on the only bed there was in the place.

George, before he entered, swilled himself well under a pump, so that his wife should not see what had taken place the moment he entered.

"A doctor—a doctor!" moaned Blueskin.

"Here's old Ann," said one of the men, as a decrepit old woman approached the bedside. "Here's old Ann! She knows more about hurts nor any doctor in the kingdom. Don't you, Ann?"

"Get away with you. Get away with you all," said old Ann, in a shrill tone of voice. "Leave me alone with him, and then, if it is possible for a human being to save his life, I'll save it! Be off with you all! There must be sport found to-night."

In obedience to these words the poachers withdrew, leaving the old woman and George's wife alone with Blueskin.

Between them they carefully washed and bound up his wounds, to which the old woman applied a dark-coloured ointment, which she assured him would heal the wound in a short space of time.

When this was over she forced some narcotic down his throat, and in less than ten minutes from the time it was administered, Blueskin was in a deep sound sleep which would go far towards recruiting his exhausted energies.

And here again we must leave him for a time, while we direct the reader's attention to other scenes of the deepest interest.

CHAPTER LXXIX.

THE MYSTERIOUS OLD MAN REVEALS HIMSELF, AND MAKES A STRANGE COMMUNICATION TO JONATHAN WILD.

"Now then, sir, Mr. Wild is waiting to see you," said Wilkinson, in more civil tones than he usually made use of; but the fact is the twenty-pound note Jonathan had given him had had a soothing effect upon his system; "now then, sir, if you want to see Mr. Wild."

It was to the dejected old man who sat by the fireplace in the waiting-room that he spoke.

Upon hearing these words the old man subdued the ward manifestations of his grief, and rose to his feet.

As he thus stood, the most casual observer could not fail to notice that he bore about him the impress of a gentleman.

But his hair and attire were in disorder. His face and hands unwashed.

On the little finger of the left hand sparkled a ring, and his soiled and torn clothes were of the best workmanship and material.

What could so strange a being want with Jonathan Wild?

Not to unbosom his sorrows to him, one would think.

Wild was hardly the sort of man to sympathize with anyone's misfortunes save his own.

Patience, reader. The conversation which took place between the strange pair will explain it.

Wilkinson led the way to the door of the thief-taker's office, and having ushered in the mysterious old man he withdrew.

Jonathan Wild bent a keen glance upon his visitor, and was struck with his peculiar appearance.

On his part, the old man, with a diffidence that seemed native to him, advanced to the railings of the desk, and said tremulously—

"Mr. Jonathan Wild?"

"That's my name, sir; what's yours? Excuse my way, but I have a great deal of business to do, and no time to spare."

"Just so, sir; my name is Joseph Stansbury. The business I come upon is of a very important and serious character."

"Then if it is in my power you shall be served. Will you be good enough to explain, sir?"

"I will in as few words as I can."

"Good."

"But I must first ask your advice. I am by no means certain that you either can or will aid me. What is your fee?"

"I make no charges," said Wild; "I am quite ready to hear all you have got to say."

The strange old man, and who we may as well in future call by his name, Joseph Stansbury, looked at Jonathan in some surprise upon hearing this announcement. He did not know his peculiar mode of carrying on business.

"Of course, Mr. Wild," he said, "I have heard a great deal about you"—

Jonathan bowed.

"And your extraordinary skill in tracing stolen goods."

"Well, sir, what of that?"

"It occurred to me, Mr. Wild," replied Mr. Stansbury, with difficulty repressing a sob, "that as you were so successful in finding property, you might be equally so in finding persons."

"You must explain more, sir. I have particular sources of information."

"So I have heard, Mr. Wild. Well, to be brief, I want you to find my son."

"Your son!"

"Yes; my only son—my darling! My dear boy! My only child, William!"

"Ya—ah!"

"Sir!"

"Nothing! But how old is this son? How did he disappear? As yet, you will remember, you have given me no particulars."

"I have not; but I am so bowed down with grief that I hardly know what I am saying, or what I am about. He is twenty-three years of age."

"A young man, then?"

"Even so."

"Ha!" said Wild, with a feeling of greater interest.

"I fancied all the while it was a little child which you had lost."

"No—no. My trouble is greater than that. He is a young man, just as we may say upon the threshold of life."

"How did he disappear?"

"He came up to London. I sent him on business of my own. Would that I had come myself. Alas! alas! could I but have known, and then this would never have happened."

"He came up to London, you say?"

"He did; and from that hour to this we have never heard aught of him."

"You must tell me all the particulars, and then I think, from my knowledge of the city, I may get upon his track. From what town did he come, and how long ago?"

"He came from Abingdon, Mr. Wild. That is where I live. Do you know the place?"

"It is a little village not far from Oxford, is it not?"

"It is—it is! At Water-farm, Abingdon!"

"And when did he leave?" said Jonathan, taking up a pen, and dropping it in the ink. "How long is it since?"

"A weary time. Let me see; I have it here in this pocket-book. On the 12th of last July he left the farm."

"Nearly two months ago, then," said Jonathan, making a note. To tell the truth, accustomed as he was to hearing all kinds of strange revelations, there was something in this affair that aroused his curiosity.

"Nearly two months! It seems to me like two years!"

"Indeed. Now, Mr. Stansbury, let me tell you it is a very extraordinary thing for a young man of the age you describe to come up to London and then never be heard of again. Let me hear all, and then I may perhaps be able to arrive at some conclusion respecting it. Now I confess myself quite unable to do so."

"Well, you must know, sir, I had a sudden demand made upon me for the payment of a large sum of money."

"Yes—yes!"

"It was not more than I could pay, you understand, but pretty nearly all I had was then at my bankers, and as it was wanted immediately, and I was very unwell, I sent my son up to London instead."

Wild nodded.

"My poor, darling boy. You must know, Mr. Wild, that it falls to the lot of few fathers to have a son like my William; very few indeed. Have you a son, sir?"

A terrific scowl distorted Jonathan's countenance as this apparently simple question was put to him. He had a son—but no matter—he controlled himself, and simply said, in a constrained tone of voice—

"Go on. What of your son?"

"He was all that a parent could wish. I loved his mother, Mr. Wild, for I have a loving heart; but in gaining a son I lost a wife."

Mr. Stansbury paused from excess of emotion.

To what point did this strange story tend?

It was impossible to imagine.

Jonathan hurriedly bid him to proceed. The simple question he had been asked about his son touched him in a place he thought invulnerable, for Jonathan had a son, of whom the reader of this narrative will yet learn something new and startling.

"Three days, Mr. Wild, before I sent my son on this disastrous journey he married a young girl to whom he had been long betrothed. I am entering into all these particulars in order that you may the better comprehend the whole story."

"It is well to be explicit," replied Jonathan, "but try to be brief at the same time."

"I will. As his journey would be one of business only, and as he would make it in the shortest time possible, he left his bride behind him. It would, he thought, be unkind to fatigue her with such a journey. Alas! she has never seen him more."

Jonathan drew a long breath.

The case was growing more complicated, and the clue he fancied he had found he lost again.

"Have you any evidence he reached London?"

"Yes, the driver of the coach, by whose side he sat all the way, remembers his alighting at the inn in Piccadilly, where they stop."

"Indeed; that is enough. And now about the money. Did he get that?"

"He did sir. Of course, when we found he did not come back we grew alarmed, and I started off forthwith. My first visit was to the banking-house. A clerk there remembered his calling and receiving the money."

"What was the amount?"

"Six thousand four hundred pounds."

"When did he receive it?"

"On the 14th of July."

"He started on the 12th?"

"He did."

"No time was lost then?"

"None, you see."

"And he left the bank with the money in his possession?"

"Yes, I have every reason to believe he did."

"And then?"

"After that, Mr. Wild, I can find nothing whatever of him. All trace is gone."

"Extraordinary."

"Look at me, Mr. Wild; I came up here six weeks ago. In all that time I have rested neither night and day, but have searched for him unceasingly."

"And without result?"

"Without result; and so in despair—as a last resource, in fact—I came here to you to ask you if you could assist me to find my poor boy."

"It is a pity you did not apply to me earlier. I should have stood a much better chance of success then. As it is the scent is cold. Still, do not despair. I feel, I can assure you, a more than common interest in this case, and if he is in London I will guarantee to find him."

"You fill me with fresh hopes," said the old man, as tears trickled down his cheeks. "Use your best endeavours, Mr. Wild, not only for a father's sake, but for the poor girl who loves him, and who has not ceased to lament his inexplicable disappearance."

"But what bank was it?"

"The Bank of England."

"Good! Now sir, give me as complete a description of your son as lies within your power."

"I thought you would want that," said Mr. Stansbury; "so while I was waiting for you yesterday I wrote it out. I put it in this pocket-book. Here it is."

"Very good," said Wild, "that will suffice. Rely upon my doing my utmost for you. I do not think I shall want anything more. I shall send out my agents to make inquiries at once, and you had better call here every day to know the result."

"And what will that cost, Mr. Wild?"

"Wait until the job is completed," said the crafty thief-taker. "If I restore your son to you, I can rely upon your gratitude to reward me."

"You can—you can indeed. I hope and trust your efforts will prove more successful than mine."

Wild summoned Wilkinson in his usual fashion.

"Show this gentleman out," he said. "He will call again to-morrow."

With a lighter heart than he had had for some time past Mr. Stansbury left Wild's house.

As the door closed behind him, Jonathan rested his chin in the palms of his hands, and gave himself up to deep thought.

"What am I to think of this affair? I am puzzled. Still I am glad it has been put into my hands. It will afford me an opportunity of making a great stir about doing good, and it is only by resorting occasionally to such means that I can hope to succeed in blinding their eyes to these other practices. I will set about it now."

Wilkinson is again summoned.

"Where is Pinching Tom?"

"Here, Mr. Wild."

"Send him in."

Our old friend, of whom we have not heard for so long, entered.

Jonathan called him to his side, and gave him his instructions in a low tone of voice.

What they were will be developed.

"I quite understand, Mr. Wild. It shall be done, though it is a queer thing altogether."

CHAPTER LXXX.

LORD DONMULL'S REMORSE AND REPENTANCE—THE BUT OF SHORT DURATION.

"Come in!" roared Jonathan, in reply to a faint tap-tap upon the panel of his office-door, about ten minutes after Pinching Tom had taken his departure, "come in."

"Quilt Arnold, Mr. Wild," said Wilkinson.

"Has he his prisoner?"

"Yes sir."

"Tell him to take him to No. 7, and there leave him until further instructions."

"Yes, Mr. Wild."

"Is anyone else waiting for me?"

"The gentleman who went with us last night."

"Send him here, then; but stop a moment. Did he see Quilt bring in the prisoner?"

"No, sir, I took care of that. He is in No. 2, with the door shut."

"Right; I'll come myself."

Jonathan got down off his stool, and stalked into the passage.

The first thing that there met his view was the prisoner Quilt Arnold had brought in.

Who that prisoner was the reader can perhaps guess.

It was Lord Donmull's accomplice, Steggs.

A glance of mutual hate passed between these two men, but as he was gagged Steggs could not speak, and as for Jonathan he disdained to do so.

"Take him to No. 7, Quilt."

"Yes, sir; he has given us a great deal of trouble."

"Ha! ha!"

"He has, indeed."

"I don't doubt it, Quilt, only I laughed 'ha! ha!' because I thought, just as you spoke, how soon his troubles would be over."

"Ho! ho!"

Arnold thought he had better laugh at Wild's pleasantry.

But he soon repented it.

Jonathan had his cudgel in his hand, and he hit him a rather sharp crack with it, as he said—

"Don't laugh when I do, Quilt; recollect that in future. Into No. 7 with him."

Quilt rubbed his head, and dragged the struggling prisoner off, whose doom Jonathan considered quite sealed.

As soon as they had fairly departed, Wild went to the door of the little waiting-room, and opening it a few inches peeped in.

Lord Donmull was looking out into the street as well as the smoke and dirt-begrimed panes would let him.

"Good morning, my lord," said Wild. "Sorry to keep you waiting. Come upstairs."

Abel Donmull followed Jonathan up the stairs to the room in which he had sat during a former interview.

He glanced uneasily around, and sank into a chair.

"You don't look well, my lord," said Wild, as he, too, took a seat, and noticed the ghastly paleness of his lordship's countenance. "What is there amiss now?"

"Nothing more—nothing more."

"Then all is well. Pour out some brandy, my lord; you will be better then."

"The girl?"

"She is safe underneath this house," was the reply.

"Where," he added, in a lower key, "for a consideration she can remain until such time as you may think fit to order her release."

"Wild, Wild," said Lord Donmull, remorsefully, "my life is a miserable burden to me. I am racked by a thousand hopes and fears. If this state of mind continues I shall wear myself into the grave."

"Beyond all doubt you will if you do not rouse yourself from these gloomy fancies and baseless fears. Pluck up your spirit, for now is the time to do so. You have all in your own hands now! You can secure yourself in any way you may think proper."

"Wild?"

"Yes, my lord."

"She is quite safe, you say?"

"Quite."

"How does she seem, Wild?"

"What do you mean, my lord?"

"Do you think, do you think that if I went to her, Wild, and told her what I had done—do you think she would forgive me, and be content to receive back her own?"

"Are you mad?"

"No, no, not mad, but sick at heart. Show me where to find her, Wild, and I will make the attempt."

"Calm yourself," said Jonathan, with a derisive grin.

"Calm yourself. You must be mad to think of such a thing. Besides, I cannot allow you to make such an offer."

"What?"

"Do not storm. It will have no effect. I simply mean what I say. I cannot allow it."

Lord Donmull looked at Wild with speechless surprise.

"You seem to forget, my lord, the little bargain between us. I cannot afford to waste my time to no purpose, and if you resign your possessions, how are you to fulfil your contract. Cease to think of it. My lord, you are wholly in my power."

"Lord Donmull sat aghast when he saw how deeply he was committed to the villain before him.

He repented of his misdeeds.

Would have made all the reparation in his power.

But, like many others, his repentance came too late.

"To-morrow," continued Wild, after a pause, "you will be calmer, and then you will feel thankful to me for having acted in the way I have. The excitement of the past few days have been too much for you. You must have rest and quiet for a time, and then all will be well. You can have nothing whatever to fear so long as you keep your word to me. The girl's safe custody I will answer for."

"Where is Steggs?"

"He, too, is quite safe. Drink, my lord. Success to yourself—confusion to your foes!"

Jonathan pushed a brimming glass of brandy across the table.

Lord Donmull took it with a quivering hand, and, putting it to his lips, drained the contents at one draught.

The effects of so large a quantity of raw spirit were just what might have been expected.

His remorse vanished, and he became the bold unscrupulous man he had ever been.

Jonathan watched him anxiously.

He was playing a very deep game, was Wild. The stakes were high, for, as will be seen, he aimed at the possession of the entire estates.

Therefore it would not suit his purpose to let Abel come in contact with the persecuted heiress, much less in the humour he then appeared to be.

"I am old, Wild, now," he said; "I have no children of my own; I cannot hope to retain much longer the estates and wealth I have held wrongful possession of for so many years. Therefore I wish, ere it be too late, to atone for what I have done."

"Still harping on the same string."

"I cannot help it! God knows, I cannot help it!" cried the wretched man, as he sprang nervously to his feet and paced the room.

Surely what he then saw ought to have made Jonathan aware that there is such a thing as retribution for evil deeds in this world, and that punishment of sins begins on earth; but he did not. He only mocked at his companion's weakness, for so he termed it.

"I shall have some trouble with him yet, I am afraid; curses on his pusillanimity. I will make another attempt, and see how far I am successful."

Lord Donmull had again thrown himself into his chair.

"Look here, my lord. Listen to me."

"What is it?"

"You are out of health. The harass of the last few weeks, coupled with the fatigue you have undergone, has worn you out. A few days' rest will put all right again, and then I shall hear you thank me for persuading you to act as I do."

"What do you advise?"

"In the first place to make a strong effort to dismiss the whole of this business from your mind."

"I cannot."

"You must try."

"I tell you I cannot."

"But what have you to dread?"

His lordship was silent.

"Drink, my lord, and listen. Including our two selves there are six persons acquainted with your secret!"

"Six persons! What?"

"Wait and hear me out. From yourself and from me you ought not to dread anything. That reduces the number to four."

"Well?"

"Blueskin, or Blake, as I believe his name was, is dead. You saw me strike him down with my own hand."

"I did—I did! I shudder now when I think of that night's work!"

"Pho—pho! That, then, reduces the number to three. Now listen, and I will tell you the situation of those three persons, and show you how powerless they are to do you any mischief. Are you listening?"

"I am."

"First, then, there is Steggs. For his fate, let it be what it may, you cannot possibly feel any compunction. He is my prisoner. I hold his life in my hands. Do you fear him now?"

"No," replied his lordship, shuddering, "No."

"Of course not; and the number is reduced to two. One is Jack Sheppard, the young villain who mauled you so, and prevented your succeeding in your first attempt."

"Curse him, yes! he stole my watch, too, which I would not have parted with for a hundred guineas."

"Ha! ha! my lord, you get the better of your fears when you think of your revenge! It is only natural. I, too, have a score to settle with that individual! At the present moment he is a prisoner in one of the strongest cells of Newgate, charged with the commission of a burglary, which charge I can substantiate. His fate may be looked upon, then, as settled; so the six persons who hold your dangerous secret are reduced to one, and that one is a poor weak girl, also a prisoner in my power. Say, then, would it not be cowardly in the extreme to give in when all is so secured within your grasp. Am I to have all the trouble of bringing things to their present successful point for nothing? You could not wish such a thing! Say but the word, and your niece shall be removed from your path by death, or if taking her life is repugnant to you, she can remain as long as you think proper in her present habitation. Or steps may be taken to induce her to sign a legal transfer of all her estates to you. But you are not equal to the task of deciding now, therefore I say let things remain as they are awhile; they can safely do so."

"I will, Wild, I will!"

Lord Donnull rose as he spoke.

"Oh!" he added, "if I had a mind, a heart, a head like yours, I should be happy."

"Shake off your groundless fears! Seek change of scene, do anything to keep this from your recollection, until, feeling calmer, you can return to me, decide what is to be done, and the matter will be then entirely settled."

"I will! I am much better and firmer now. Good day, Wild, good day."

"Good day!" replied Wild, as he showed him out. "The weak-headed fool!" he added, mentally, "but he deserves to perish, and perhaps it is better as it is. My path may be all the easier and smoother for it. I must have a few hours quiet thought before I shall be able to decide upon the best mode of action. But the estates shall be mine, wholly mine! I swear it! I will then quit this mode of life, for I am getting sick of it, and if I am not careful the government, whose ready and unscrupulous agent I have for so long been, will turn against me, and I shall perish! But I will guard against such a contingency as that, for with such wealth as I should then possess I should be able to defy them all. I will think—I will think."

Jonathan seated himself at the table, and, clasping his head in his hands, he gave himself up to profound and lengthened thought, and took a survey of his present and future prospects.

CHAPTER LXXXI.

JONATHAN WILD PROCEEDS TO EXECUTE A FOULER CRIME THAN ANY OF WHICH HE HAS YET BEEN GUILTY.

It is night in Jonathan Wild's house in Newgate-street. From no window in that wretched habitation beams forth the faintest ray of light. All is as dark and cheerless as the minds of the poor prisoners who languish in his cells.

The oil lamp in the hall is burning dimly. It casts around it strange, oddly-shaped, moving shadows, such as would fill the nervous with alarm.

Tonks is on the lock.

He is not actually asleep, but in a half-conscious state, from which the least sound or motion would be sufficient to arouse him.

At the iron grating leading to the cells is, as usual, seated another of the gang.

Down the dark staircase which creaks beneath his tread comes a human form.

His steps are stealthy, but the two men on the watch hear them, and are on the alert accordingly.

The dark figure finishes the descent of the stairs, and stands in the gloomy hall.

The iron lamp gives out sufficient light to reveal him plainly, and one ray in particular falls upon the face—that face which it would be impossible to mistake.

Jonathan Wild.

He sees Tonks is awake, and turning to the man at the grating, finds him awake also.

"A lantern," he said to the latter, "quick!"

The man took from under the seat upon which he sat a lighted bull's-eye lantern, which he gave into his employer's hand.

Then he unlocked the grating, and held it open to allow him to pass through.

Wild's errand was to the cells.

But why did he choose that lone and silent hour of the night to execute it?

That was best known to himself.

For certain is it a villainy of no ordinary kind that he meditates; for as he creeps along the corridor, his limbs tremble, and he difficultly draws his breath in short unequal gasps.

Is the cell in which Steggs is confined his destination?

No, for in his progress the light falls upon the door of No. 7; not there does he pause, but keeps on and on until the middle of the passage where the lamp hung is reached.

There he stops.

All around him is very still. Without any great effort of the imagination, he could fancy himself the sole inhabitant of some subterranean city of the dead.

He can hear his own breathing, and the rapid and irregular beating of his own heart.

He takes from his pocket a rather large-sized key, and, holding it in his grasp, approaches one of the cell doors with it.

His hands shake.

The key rattles in the keyhole.

The lantern casts strange moving shadows on the walls.

The tremulous motion of Jonathan's hands gradually communicates itself over his whole body, and he trembles from head to foot.

What can it be that bold bad man is about to do?

Surely one would think there was no crime or evil deed, the commission of which would produce such an effect upon him.

But that such was the case there was abundant evidence.

From this it must be certain that the guilt is of more than ordinary blackness.

At length, after some fruitless efforts, he controlled his nervous agitation, and succeeded in introducing the key into the lock.

The bolt was shot back.

The door flung open.

Then a faint cry of affright and aversion reaches his ears from the interior of the cell.

The voice was feminine.

The cell which he thus entered, then, at that dead hour of the night was the one in which Edgworth Bess was confined.

Jonathan, casting from him all remnants of human nature, then strode into the cell.

He placed the lantern on a little bracket high up in the wall, in such a position that its light was tolerably well diffused about the dungeon.

Edgworth Bess had upon his entrance risen to her feet, and shrank back as far as she could into one corner of the cell.

The shadow of some frightful coming evil, which it would be out of her power to avert, had cast itself over her soul.

Wild contemplated her for some moments in silence, and then he uttered the one word—

"Well?"

Bess fixed her eyes upon his face, and, by an effort, commanded her voice.

"Why do you come here?" she asked. "Seek not to tempt me. It will be of no avail."

"Ha! ha!" laughed Wild, reassuming his ordinary brutal manner to a great extent. "Ha! ha! You do not know what good is in store for you. Ha! ha!"

"Good?" said Bess, "that I am sure can never come from you to me, for we are enemies!"

"You don't know that, girl," said Jonathan, approaching her. "Don't shrink back. You have nothing to fear! After the little explanation which I gave you this morning, and which of course, by this time, you have attentively considered, you will be able, without any difficulty, to understand me!"

"I do not wish to do so. I am here your prisoner, and as I am well aware, in your power!"

"Ha! ha! You admit that?"

"I do, but yet I will not believe that all the rest is as you have told me, but cling with my latest breath to the belief that Jack or Blueskin will rescue me from this place."

"I am not afraid of them," said Wild, "knowing well how very safe and out of all power of doing mischief they are. Listen to me; I have thought much, and have come to a determination from which neither heaven nor hell shall move me."

"Impious villain!"

"Ha! ha! you shall know it, my dear—you shall know it, for I can assure you it very intimately concerns the pair of us. Ha! ha! Guess, now, what it is! You women are quick in taking hints, and clever at arriving at conclusions by intuition. Ha! ha! What do you think is my determination?"

"I do not wish or care to know; but that it is rascality of some description I already know you well enough to feel confident."

"We are complimentary to each other. All this, however, is folly and waste of time. Come here, girl, I say, and listen! Your uncle is wholly in my power, and he only lives at the present moment because it suits me to let him do so. I can prophesy that he will not live to be a patriarch."

Bess shuddered, and strove to shrink yet further away, but Wild, springing forward, caught her by the arm, and drew her towards him.

Shriek upon shriek came from her lips as she found his hand upon her, and she struggled violently to get free.

So shrill were the tones, that Jonathan could not make his voice heard above them.

"Silence!" he yelled. "Silence! or I will do you a mischief. Do you hear me? be silent!"

Her dread that he might lay his hands upon her more than he had already done made her quiet.

"That is reasonable of you, and still further display your good sense by listening to me. If it is possible I should like to use you gently, but if you provoke me to violence the consequences must be upon your own head."

Bess deemed it prudent to obey him. Indeed, so great was her terror that she was scarcely aware of what she was about.

This compliance with his demand pleased Wild.

"You know as well as I do," he said, "that you are the heiress of immense estates and wealth to no inconsiderable amount. You are the last of your race. Now I alone have the power of restoring to you your possessions. It is impossible for you to obtain them except with my assistance. This assistance I am ready and willing to afford you if you will accede to my proposals. Speak! will you do so?"

"What are they?"

Wild hesitated when the question was put to him.

Bess noticed it, and wondered what infamy there was behind his proposition.

She repeated her question.

"I may as well tell you at once," said Wild. "The proposal is a very easy one. It is that you become my wife!"

"Your wife?" repeated Edgworth Bess, shuddering with horror at the bare idea. "I your wife?"

"Yes; Mrs. Wild, you know! Mrs. Jonathan Wild! Come, my dear. When you know me I am sure you will like me better than that young villain, Jack Sheppard. Come, say yes, and all will be well. You shall quit this wretched cell for a place suited for you."

"Silence!" cried Bess. "Never could I have believed that you would have had the audacity to make so barefaced a proposal to me. Let one word suffice. Know that I reject your terms with the utmost disgust and contempt. Leave the cell!"

Jonathan's brows lowered.

His countenance darkened, and assumed a demoniac expression.

"Beware!" he said, in a deep, hoarse voice, "beware! You seem not to remember that I am master here—that you are wholly and entirely in my power!"

"I care not! My resolve is unchangeable! Rather than consent, I would die a thousand deaths!"

"Beware!" said Wild again, and still more ominous and awful became the expression on his face. "I have told you that it was my wish to act gently towards you. I have offered you fair means. You have scorned me. The result will be that I shall have to use force—foul means to compel you to comply with my demands. If you repent afterwards the fault will be no one's but your own!"

"Heaven help me!"

"You have need of such a prayer. Be wise, and yield at once. I am determined to achieve my purpose. You shall be my wife, and the Donnull estates and wealth mine—mine!"

"Help! help!" shrieked Edgworth Bess, as though there was the horrible consciousness upon her soul that there was no help for her. "Help! help! Mercy! mercy!"

"Do you consent?"

"Never—never!"

"Then, as I have told you, the consequences will be upon your own head. I can force you to yield, and I will do so. Do not look for any consideration from Jonathan Wild! Consent, then, to be my wife, or ere you are another hour older, you shall implore it as a favour at my hands."

With a great effort Bess preserved her consciousness, but it was only the conviction that if she swooned she would be wholly at his mercy that enabled her to master the feeling, and with a boldness that surprised even herself she repeated her refusal.

"You must take the consequences, then!" said Wild, and he seized her in his powerful arms.

In his grasp she was like a child in the hands of a giant.

Still she struggled as well as she could, but, alas! vainly.

The villainous thief-taker forced her down.

But just when he was about to achieve his purpose, he heard the hasty rush of footsteps, an exclamation, and then some one seized him by the throat.

CHAPTER LXXXII.

JACK SHEPPARD RATHER ASTONISHES MR. NOAKES AND THE TURNKEYS.

We think it quite time we returned to Jack Sheppard, whom we last left in such a ticklish position in Newgate.

It will be recollected that he only ascended the stairs far enough to take him round the first turn in them, and then he had crouched down and peeped cautiously over the balusters at the scene which was taking place below.

The governor, with an air of great bewilderment, was standing on the threshold of the room, the door of which Jack had opened.

In the passage were some half-dozen turnkeys, who, having completely demolished the green baize door, were endeavouring to tell him what had taken place.

Then Jack had made a mental remark about there being some sport, and had announced his intention of staying where he then was in order to see it out.

Now, however daring this resolution might be, and however much it may be admired on that account, yet it is very certain that it was anything but a prudent one.

But Jack had very little prudence. On the contrary, a reckless bravery and insane contempt of danger were two prominent features in his mental composition, and so they continued to be throughout the whole of his extraordinary and unparalleled career.

[JACK SHEPPARD ASTONISHES THE GOVERNOR OF NEWGATE.]

As all know, it proved his downfall in the end.

Now Jack, on this occasion, thought it the finest thing in the world to do as he did. He looked upon it as a capital piece of fun.

The thought of how much he might jeopardize his chance of escape never troubled him for a moment.

So, leaning over, as we have said, he looked with the greatest curiosity and interest on the actions of his enemies below.

He took especial care, though, not to make any slight noise, or permit any glimmer of the lantern to escape that might betray his presence.

"What is it?" roared the governor, as he looked at the turnkeys and the demolished door. "What is it, I say?"

"Break jail, Mr. Noakes! break jail! Smythies is in the corridor with all his clothes stripped off him, and his head smashed."

"Who has escaped? Somebody opened my door just now, peeped in, and then shut it again."

"Jack Sheppard's escaped! He's dressed in Smythies' clothes, and I saw some one like him come through the other door just now."

"Jack Sheppard escaped!" yelled Mr. Noakes. "Fools! why was he not secured properly? Some one must have aided him; he could never have escaped by himself!"

"He must be close at hand," said a voice.

"Search, then, and don't stand there like fools! Divide, and search for him. If he has escaped from his cell, he has not got out of Newgate!"

As soon as he heard these instructions given, Jack thought it was high time he retired, so he set about doing so at once.

But he moved slowly and cautiously.

And well it was he did so, for on the topmost stair was some object, which, if he had come upon it unawares and suddenly, would certainly have thrown him down and made discovery certain.

That object was one which, on the staircases of idle and untidy people, is often found, to the great peril of those who might be ascending or descending.

It was an iron pail.

Jack could not at first make out what it was that stood in his way, but there came up sufficient light from the hall below to show him upon a second glance.

Then an idea darted into his head that he might with it disconcert his enemies, who, he could hear, had already commenced to mount the staircase.

He put down the lantern, and took up the bucket.

By the weight it evidently contained some liquid, but what he did not care.

To descend about half-a-dozen of the stairs and peep over the balusters took him but a second.

"Hoy!" he cried at the top of his voice.

The effect of this was to make those who were ascending pause suddenly upon the impulse of the moment.

Then, before they could recover from their surprise, he caught hold of the bucket by the handle and the rim at the bottom of it, and flung the whole of its contents in their faces.

The water came from a sufficient height to dash with a considerable degree of force into their faces, and they staggered back.

Then, to complete their discomfort, Jack threw the bucket down, and without waiting to see where or upon whom it alighted, sprang up the stairs, caught hold of the lantern, and seeing the staircase led up to another story, mounted it without hesitation.

The cries of those who had had this unexpected attack made upon them quickly brought others to the spot, and, instantly surmising what had happened, they rushed up stairs in a body after the escaping prisoner.

Jack had just reached the landing on the second story when he heard them.

He paused, undecided.

"I shall have some trouble now," he said; "I am like a rat in a large trap, and it will be no easy matter for me to find an outlet. What shall I do?"

There were several doors opening from the landing upon which he stood, and also a narrower flight of stairs leading apparently to the top rooms in the house, for it was in that part of Newgate which was specially set aside for the domestic requirements of the governor that he now found himself.

Whether it would be better to ascend the remaining stairs, or to seek some hiding place in one of the rooms on the second story was rather a serious question.

But he had no time for consideration.

His pursuers in a moment or two would be upon him. Therefore it was necessary he should immediately decide.

A little circumstance occurred which at once caused him to make up his mind.

The turnkeys who were pursuing him stopped on the first floor to search the rooms, so as to make sure their prisoner should not escape them by hiding in any one of the chambers.

"They will stay to search these, too," Jack said, alluding to those on the second floor, "and if I go up higher I shall have all the more time."

His premise was one that might easily be deduced.

The attic stairs, for such they were, he reached the top of in a very short time indeed.

Here he found the doors of two rooms only.

He looked up, thinking that in all probability he should find a trap-door leading on to the roof, as is usual in all London houses.

But nothing of the kind met his view, so he opened the door nearest to him, and entering the room, silently closed it after him.

His first care was to look to the fastenings of the door, so as to be in a position to guard against a sudden surprise.

But he found the only thing that served to secure the door was a common latch—there was not even a bolt.

"I don't know that it makes much difference," he muttered; "such a door as that would be no obstacle to them."

He turned round to see whether the place afforded any capabilities for concealment.

In one corner was a little bedstead with white hangings, such a one as would be used for children to sleep in.

A few chairs were placed around the walls.

On one side were several good-sized boxes.

The fireplace and the window completed the catalogue of visible objects.

The prospect was not encouraging, but Jack Sheppard was not one to allow himself to be dismayed by a few obstacles. He set about making the best of his position.

The window he thought would be the best chance for him, so he made his way to it.

On the floor, however, he saw a piece of twine, which he stooped and picked up.

Then, threading it through the ring at the top of the lantern, he tied it round his neck.

This left him with both his hands at liberty.

It is necessary to caution the reader against falling into the mistake that these events, which from their nature have taken us some time to describe, were really long in happening. Jack was very nimble in his movements, and when he reached the window the men had just begun to ascend the attic stairs.

It was a little latticed-casement with diamond frames set in lead.

It opened with a touch.

Outside all was darkness.

Not one single individual object was he able to distinguish.

There was nothing to guide him.

He naturally hesitated, but he heard the men almost upon the threshold of the little room.

"I must risk it," he said. "I can but lose my life, and better be killed by a fall than swing at Tyburn!"

This last consideration determined him, so he got on to the table, and let himself slip feet foremost out of the window.

He kept a firm grasp upon the woodwork.

At last he lowered himself till he hung at the full extent of his arms.

Then, cautiously shifting one hand, he clutched the outside portion of the window sill.

The next thing was to close the window.

This being merely like a door, was easily and silently done. The only thing was he could not fasten it.

To his delight, however, he found that from some cause or other—damp, probably—it fitted tightly in its setting, so that the probability was that being shut they would not notice it was unfastened.

Scarcely was this done than the door was opened, and Jack saw the room, as he thought, brightly illuminated.

"Not here," said a voice, with a curse appended, which we do not think it worth while to repeat. "We shall lose him, after all!"

"Won't Jonathan be wild?" said one who fancied himself a wag, and in consequence never missed an opportunity, no matter how unseasonable, of displaying his wit.

CHAPTER LXXXIII.

JACK SHEPPARD HAS SOME HAIRBREADTH ESCAPES IN NEWGATE, AND MAKES A BURGLARIOUS ATTACK ON WILD'S HOUSE.

It is scarcely possible, we opine, to conceive anyone in a more perilous position than Jack Sheppard.

His life depended upon the grasp he kept upon the window sill.

To lose it was certain death.

But there was little fear of this. We have before remarked the extraordinary amount of muscular strength which Jack had in his arms, enabling him to perform many mountebank feats.

His body, too, was only a light weight to sustain.

He thought it would be most prudent to move along the window sill, so that his head should not be in the way, in case the men who were searching the room should open the window.

This he did easily, by moving one hand after the other.

It was perhaps quite as well that he did not know the awful depth he would have fallen if he had chanced to miss his grasp. The knowledge would have unnerved him, for the attic window looked out into a paved yard that was, at the very least, fifty feet below him.

We ought, too, to explain how it was that when he looked out of the window he saw nothing. Few nights are so dark that one cannot distinguish large objects, however dimly.

But the fact was, the yard into which the window looked was only like a square pit, of which the prison walls formed three sides.

These reached to a considerable height above the window, so that what he saw were the black stones which could not have been more than six feet from him.

We mention these circumstances, which may be deemed trivial, but it is our desire to leave nothing unexplained.

We now resume.

Jack moved along the stone until he reached its extremity.

There he stopped and waited.

It was well he did, for the window was flung open.

"He's disappeared, I tell you!" said a voice. "What in the world's the good of looking out there? You know it looks into the little yard, and that's fifty feet down, if it's an inch!"

"So it is!" said another voice. "But don't let us waste time here; he must be in the place somewhere, only we have missed him. Come on!"

"Perhaps he's jumped into the yard."

"Not a bit of it!"

"I don't know that! Look, there's some one in the yard with a light! Call out to know who it is!"

There was some one down in the yard, as the little moving star-like light sufficiently evidenced, and a gruff voice replied—

"What's the row?"

"Oh! it's Clarke!" said one of those at the window, who happened to recognise the tones. "Clarke!" he cried, in a louder voice.

"Hullo!"

"Is there anyone in the yard? Just look about you, and call out if you see anything suspicious; there's been an escape!"

These words filled Jack with dread.

He was fearful that the man in the yard would, when he looked up, perceive him.

He clung as closely as he could to the wall, covering the lantern with his body.

He was getting exhausted, too. Holding up his arms so long had drained all the blood out of them.

The next words he heard were a great relief to his heart.

It was Clarke who spoke then.

"There's nothing here," he said.

"I told you so!" cried the man, triumphantly, who had from the first disbelieved that Jack had jumped out into the yard. "He ain't the sort to do that."

"You think yourself d—d clever, I know!" replied the other. "He aint here, but he can't be far off."

Then, to Jack's joy, they left the window.

Clarke, too, had passed out of the yard.

But Jack's position seemed scarcely better than it had been. In his exhausted state, how was he to leave the window-sill, except by letting go his hold?

He endeavoured to cast an anxious glance around.

It is wonderful how soon the eyes become accustomed to darkness. At first he was quite unable to do so, but now he could define the gloomy prison walls.

He found that the end of the window-sill upon which he hung was close to one of the angles where the walls of the governor's house joined that of the prison.

In that angle was a leaden rain pipe.

He found he could reach it easily.

Then he looked up.

The roof of one part was only a few feet above him.

Recollecting his perilous adventure at the Grange, when a similar pipe had been of such assistance to him, he resolved to try what he could do with this one.

It was an awful and desperate attempt, but he resolved to make it.

Very cautiously, for his arms were tired and stiff, he shifted his grasp from the stone to the pipe.

It was about three inches in diameter, and far enough from the corner to enable him to take a firm hold of it.

He clutched with his other hand.

As he committed his whole weight to it, he felt for one moment the most horrible sensation imaginable.

His heart turned sick.

The pipe bent and gave way at the same time, creaking and cracking dismally.

He made sure it would precipitate him into the yard. But it did not. It gave way so far, and then stopped. Finding this to be the case, he took heart again and began to climb.

The ascent was difficult.

But he was climbing for his life, and it is really wonderful what can be done under such a feeling.

He felt himself endowed with fresh strength when he found he had escaped this great danger.

Up he went with the agility of a monkey.

The most difficult part of his task was now before him.

How would he draw himself over the parapet?

It would have been utterly impossible had not fortune favoured him.

The pipe did not come from the roof of the governor's house, but from the top of the prison, which, just in that part, was some feet higher.

So he was able to climb up until he could put his feet upon the parapet, which he was very glad to do.

He remained just in that position for a minute or two, in order to recover himself; a little more, and he would have been utterly exhausted.

But his having so far succeeded in his hazardous attempt encouraged him to make fresh efforts.

He stepped off the parapet on to the roof, which was flat and covered with lead.

He still kept the lantern carefully concealed beneath the ample coat which he had taken from the turnkey. He would have extinguished it, only he did not know what circumstances would arise to make it useful, and he had no means of relighting it.

He considered it would be best to run the risk of its being seen.

What he should do next was rather an anxious question.

He had escaped from his cell, it is true, but he had not got free from Newgate, nor was it very clear how he was going to do so.

It would do no good, though, to remain where he was. He could see a great deal of confusion was going on in the prison, and it would not be long before they searched the roofs.

In fact, they would have done so earlier only they knew there was no means of reaching them, besides which, the idea had firm hold of them that Jack was secreted somewhere inside.

The roof was a flat one, and Jack crossed it without any trouble.

Finding a place where it was practicable, he mounted to the higher portion.

As he stood there he could see the dome of St. Paul's cathedral towering above all objects, and looking nearly thrice its ordinary size in the murky light.

That was the index he wanted to show him the direction he ought to take, for all that he had so far done had been performed with a definite object in view.

What that object was the reader can no doubt guess. If he cannot, he must wait until events develop it.

Having, then, seen the dome of the cathedral, he made his way across the roofs to one particular point.

Many obstacles presented themselves before him in his course, but he overcame them, one and all.

More than once he reached a place from whence a view of some of the yards could be obtained, and even a time that this occurred, and he looked down, he saw people with lights hurrying backwards and forwards.

At length Jack reached that portion of Newgate which abuts upon Newgate-street.

An indefinable impulse made him peep over.

Below him was the by day busy, but now silent street.

In the centre of the road was a row of officers, who had been placed there to insure the impossibility of his leaving the prison.

Jack smiled at the precaution, and moved onwards. Evidently he had no thought of descending into Newgate-street.

There could be no doubt, now, as to his destination, for on reaching that portion of the parapet which runs from Newgate-street at right angles, he first looked over carefully, then climbed over it, and dropped on to the roof of the adjoining house.

That gloomy, rambling, dilapidated building, which simple people looked up to with a shudder as they passed.

That house in which was contained so vast an amount of villainy, cruelty, suffering, and sin.

That house, whose tenant was an arch fiend in human form.

That house the reader of this history so well knows.

Jonathan Wild's house.

It was on to this roof that Jack Sheppard alighted, and without loss of time set about the task of discovering some means of entering it.

This he was not long in doing.

In the tiles was the covering of a large trap do

Jack stooped down and tried to raise it.

It was fast.

CHAPTER LXXXIV.

JONATHAN WILD'S SECRET ENTRANCE TO THE CELLS IS DISCOVERED BY JACK, WHO AVAILS HIMSELF OF IT.

WITH a sudden wrench, and putting forth all his strength, Jack caused the door to partially give way.

The woodwork of which it was composed was old and rotten.

Another such an effort, and he would be able to enter.

To enter! How strange it seemed, after using such incredible exertions, going through so many perils, having so many hairbreadth escapes of death and capture, to leave one prison, that he should voluntarily enter another—for such Jonathan Wild's house indisputably was.

But Jack had an incentive powerful enough to make him willing, nay, anxious, to endure all danger that could possibly exist.

He had not forgotten that the last time he saw the girl he loved so well, and who so unreservedly returned his affection, was when Jonathan had borne her struggling into his dwelling.

Since then what had occurred to her he did not dare to think of. Her enemies he knew were dead enough to all human pity to hesitate to take her young and innocent life, and he trembled and sickened at the thought that even at that very moment she was no longer of this world.

If this was so, he felt that life would have no further charms for him.

The only sunshine it had ever known was shed upon it by her presence, and if he lost her he felt he should lose all that made existence at all endurable.

But despite all he knew of Wild's capabilities to commit any atrocity, he could scarcely reconcile himself to the belief that he would be able to slay her.

Oh! could it but have been whispered to him that the danger which menaced her was a thousand times worse than death itself, what prompt and effectual measures he would have taken to prevent it.

Jack raised the trap-door, and laid it back upon the tiles.

A square of pitchy darkness was at his feet.

Now was the time the lantern which he carried would be valuable, and it was in anticipation of some such event as this that he had taken the pains and run the risks he had to keep it burning.

Cautiously kneeling down on the tiles, and screening the light to the utmost of his power, so that no wandering beam should indicate his presence, he drew the lantern from beneath his ample overcoat, and lowered it into the abyss.

He could see the floor.

It was about six feet below him.

This was enough.

Replacing the lantern, he took up the trap-door, and, at the lower portion, fixed it in its place, then let it fall, and to his pleasure saw that, to a casual glance, it bore no traces of being tampered with. This done, he raised the upper end a little way, and slid his body through feet foremost.

Then holding for a moment by the framework with his hands to steady himself a little, and feeling sure the flooring could not be above six inches from his feet, he let go his grasp, and dropped the distance.

As he did so the trap-door fell into its proper place, though the feat was performed at the expense of the skin on the back of his fingers.

The noise he encountered in alighting was very trifling, but yet he thought if he had only taken the precaution to pull off his boots, it would not have endangered his being heard by any one.

It was not too late to act upon this hint. It might be of the utmost importance to him that his footfalls should not be heard, so he immediately sat down, took off his boots, and stuffed them into his coat-pockets.

Then, partially masking the lantern with his coat, he stole forward upon tip-toe to the head of the staircase.

Here he listened for a moment, and finding all was still, descended with the silence of a spectre.

The upper portion of Wild's house was but little used. Of this fact, however, Jack was ignorant. Had he not been so, he might have been spared some trouble.

To be over-cautious, though, was but to err on the right side.

"She would, of course, be taken to the dungeons," thought Jack, "but in what way am I to reach them?" Not by the ordinary mode, that is quite certain, for there would sure to be a man at the grating. How shall I manage it? My best course, I should fancy, would be to get to the back of the house. If I find the yard, I may stand a chance of discovering some means of getting in!"

These were the reflections that crossed Jack's mind as he crept down the second flight of stairs.

Hearing and seeing nothing, he ventured to take out his lantern, and look about him.

Facing him on the landing was a little window, which, from its position, he felt certain looked out on the back of Wild's house.

He covered the lantern again, went towards it, and silently opened it.

To have now shown the light, although it would have been of great service to him, would be too hazardous, so he contented himself with straining his eyes to see what was outside.

Below him he could faintly distinguish the roof of some outbuilding, but it was too far off for it to be safe for him to drop from that window upon it.

But he calculated that he should find on the landing beneath a similar window, and such proved to be the case when he descended.

As he expected, he found the tiled roof of this outbuilding was in its highest part just about level with the window.

This was the very thing, so he cautiously got through, and closed it after him.

On his hands and knees, and clutching tightly to the tiles, he crept down.

When he reached the bottom, he found he should have no difficulty in reaching the yard, which he could see was one of unusually limited dimensions.

In fact, as the quondam mistress of the house, Mary Milliner, had many a time in days past, when speaking upon the size of it, elegantly remarked that it "wasn't large enough to swing a cat in."

Jack reached the ground in perfect safety.

From no one of the windows he could see came the least light.

The inmates of all had apparently retired to rest.

Perceiving this, he ventured to take out his lantern to make an examination of the place.

The first thing that he noticed was a door in the wall. It was secured with two massive bolts—one at the top and one at the bottom.

A long time must have elapsed since they were used, for they were rusted in their settings.

Now, whether this door would lead him at all in the direction he wished to go, or whether it was merely some disused mode of exit from Wild's house, Jack could not tell, and the only way by which he could arrive at such knowledge would be to withdraw the bolts and see.

This he did at once, though it gave him a great deal of trouble.

At last, however, he got the door open.

No words could convey an adequate idea of the anxiety with which he proceeded to look where the door led.

He felt somewhat, but not altogether disappointed.

His last surmise was the correct one.

The door opened into a long, narrow passage, and the odour that saluted his nostrils was sufficient proof that it had a direct communication with Newgate-market, which was then in a much worse sanitary condition than it is now.

"Good," said Jack ; "this, I hope, will furnish me with the means of making my retreat in case I should succeed in what I am about. I may want to leave in a hurry, so I will leave the door open as it is."

This determination he at once acted upon, and then turned his investigations in another direction.

It should be observed that Wild had, from time to time, made some very considerable alterations in the back part of his house, and all that Jack saw was quite new and strange, and altogether unlike any other house which he had previously seen.

There was one other door, but that led into the outhouse kind of place, the roof of which had enabled him to reach the yard.

This door he did not attempt to open. From its position he felt quite sure it led into the ground-floor, which was the part of the house, above all others, to be avoided.

He next turned his attention to the floor of the yard.

It had once been paved with large flagstones, but now they were completely hidden by the accumulation of rubbish upon them.

This he somehow thought owed its presence there more to design than accident, and he began to remove some portion of it.

In doing so he found in one of them an iron ring.

What he sought, then, he imagined was in his grasp, and, seizing the ring with both hands, he endeavoured to raise the stone.

But it remained immovable.

The thought then struck him that the ring might be so constructed as to turn round, and so undo the fastening.

To have such a thought, and then to set about trying whether such was the case, were simultaneous events.

His supposition proved correct.

The ring turned as the knob of a door might do.

Then he once more essayed to raise the stone.

This time he raised it with the greatest ease.

His heart beat violently when he found a flight of winding steps were disclosed.

Before he descended them, however, he took care that the stone slab was so placed that it could not by any accident fall back into its setting. When he had done this, he went down without hesitation.

It terminated at the bottom before a stone wall.

But Jack knew well enough that such a staircase would not be constructed without an object, so he looked closely and carefully about him for some indications of a secret door.

For a long time nothing met his gaze, until at last he noticed on the bottom step a small iron knob.

This he pressed upon, and one of the stones in the solid wall moved aside.

He was about to crawl through the opening, when a succession of screams of the most awful character reached his ears, and seemed to drive him back.

CHAPTER LXXXV.

JACK SHEPPARD, AFTER ALL HIS TROUBLE, ONLY CHANGES ONE DUNGEON FOR ANOTHER.

FOR only an instant, though, was Jack under the dominion of this feeling.

He recognised that voice.

It was Edgworth Bess.

He dashed through the opening like a madman, and, with the cries still ringing in his ears, made his way along a passage which he knew instantly, being the one in which Sir Marmaduke's dungeon was situated.

How he opened the secret door communicating with the outer series of dungeons he knew not, and did not pause to see. It was sufficient that it did open, and he passed through.

Another second, and he was at the dungeon door, which Jonathan, when he entered, had left open.

To his horror and amazement he saw Edgworth Bess struggling in Wild's arms.

It was Jack Sheppard, therefore, who, uttering an exclamation, dashed forward and grasped the thief-taker by the throat, as related in the eighty-first chapter of this history.

This attack was so utterly unexpected, that Wild was taken by surprise, and, in the confusion of the moment, let go his hold upon his prisoner.

Who his assailant was he could not conceive.

He wrenched his head round.

A cry of rage and astonishment burst from his lips as soon as he beheld Jack Sheppard.

"Wretch!" he yelled, grappling with him, "to-night you have signed your own death-warrant! How you came here I cannot guess, but you shall never leave it again in life."

"We'll see about that," cried Jack. "Cheer up, Bess! Do not be afraid."

"I knew you would save me," she replied, placing herself behind him.

"Ha! ha!" laughed Jonathan Wild, making a sudden effort to throw his adversary; "you are both now more completely in my power than you ever were."

Not another word was spoken, for the two commenced in good earnest a deadly struggle.

With a quickly beating heart, and ejaculations of fear, poor Bess watched the conflict.

Alas! Jack stood no chance with Jonathan Wild, even at the best of times. Now he was terribly exhausted by the incredible hardships and exertions he had already undergone.

Still he stood up bravely, and summoned all his strength, but he quickly found himself getting weaker and weaker, while his foe at the same time seemed to be gaining fresh strength.

At last, Jonathan, taking a firmer hold, forced him backwards, so that, to save himself from falling, he had to sink upon his knees.

Seeing this, Bess herself sprang forward, and strove to interpose her form between the combatants.

"Fly! Bess, fly!" exclaimed Jack, between his teeth, while the perspiration ran down his face like rain-drops. "Fly! He will conquer me, but leave me to myself. Fly! fly!"

"Never without you," she replied. "Never—never!"

"Take that, then, for being a fool!" said Wild, ferociously; and, as he spoke, he raised his heavy foot, and kicked the poor girl with it brutally, so that she was forced to let go her hold, and shrink back shrieking with pain.

This was an act that filled Jack with fury. Instantly he felt himself endowed with the strength of a dozen men.

He once more struggled to his feet, and, for a moment, he seemed as though he would gain the mastery over his foe.

But, alas! for both of them, the factitious accession of strength which he experienced departed almost as quickly as it came, leaving him all the more exhausted in consequence.

Again did Jonathan force him down.

This time Jack felt perfectly assured that he would never be able to rise again, without some extraordinary event happened to change the current of events, and so he called to Bess, who was moaning with pain.

"Bess, darling!" he cried, "if you love me, do as I direct; it is the only chance we have. Fly, and leave me! Fly, I implore you, and escape! I will try my utmost to keep this fiend from following you. Let this be the test of your love. Fly, dearest! Turn to the left when you leave this place, and keep straight on. You cannot miss your way. I have left all the doors open. You will find yourself in Newgate-market. There you will meet some one of whom you can ask succour. Fly, dearest! fly, I entreat you!"

These words were jerked out rather than spoken, while he continued his struggle with Wild. It would have reached an earlier termination—for Jonathan would not for a moment have hesitated to take his life—only, before he descended to the cells, he had divested himself of all his arms, not for a moment anticipating that he would have any use for them.

It was to this simple circumstance that Jack, on that occasion, was indebted for his life.

Adjured as she thus was, Bess could scarcely do otherwise than obey, though it was with extreme reluctance that she did so.

"Fly with all possible speed," said Jack, as he saw her about to depart; "your life and freedom depend upon your fleetness!"

A perfect howl of rage came from Wild's lips when he learned by the words Jack spoke that the secret exit from the cells was known to him.

It was, he thought, a secret whose existence was locked in his own breast, and he was furious at the thought it should have been discovered. It had cost much time and money in construction. He had intended it as a means by which he should be able to escape, should things so change as to make it necessary for him so to do.

Now it was known, and, consequently, valueless, for the worth of such a thing depended entirely upon its being kept a secret.

Jonathan, too, was much enfeebled by his wounds, or Jack would have never been able to prolong the struggle as he did. Wild had lost a vast quantity of blood, and though he moved about his house as usual, yet he was very far from being so strong as he appeared.

Jack anxiously estimated the time it would take for Bess to get quite clear of Mr. Wild's house.

He clung all the time with such tenacity to Jonathan that he was unable to shake him off.

But at last the limit of Jack's strength and endurance was reached, and Jonathan forced him with his back to the ground.

The thief-taker knelt with one knee upon his breast and clutched him by the throat.

At that moment consciousness left him. He swooned from exhaustion.

For a second or so Wild thought he was dead, and released his grip.

Then he saw what had happened.

He caught him again by the throat as though he intended to convert that seeming death into a reality.

But at that moment a change came over his intentions.

"He will keep," he said, in a significant tone, as he rose to his feet. "The girl cannot have gone far, and I will go after her. Curses on the young viper; had it not been for him I should by this time have achieved my purpose. How came he out of Newgate? Curses on their negligence. But I will have it seen to."

While he muttered these sentences, Jonathan left the cell, and, locking the door after him, placed the key carefully in his pocket.

Then he hurried along the passage to the secret door leading to the second lot of cells. Through this he passed and slammed it after him; then through the hole in the stonework which led to the little winding staircase.

This he also closed. He was not desirous of making any more people acquainted with the secret, and those who did know it he determined should pay for that knowledge with their lives.

Up the staircase, into the yard—taking the same pains to conceal the mode by which he had made his exit—down the passage and into the old market he went, with all possible speed.

But when he reached it all was dark and deserted.

The intricacies of the place were very familiar to him, but he hesitated which way to take.

"She would run straight on, no doubt," he muttered; "and that is the course I will follow. She cannot get far away, and I shall be sure to find her."

But in this he miscalculated.

About a minute and a half brought him into Warwick-lane.

There no one was either in sight or hearing.

It would be folly for him to attempt to pursue her, for he could have no possible idea of the route which she had taken.

He rested his chin on his hands in deep thought.

If he summoned any of his men to his assistance, and he could have done so without any further trouble than blowing a whistle, which he carried suspended round his neck, they would not only be surprised to find him there, but the intelligence that they were to search for an escaped prisoner would at once open their eyes to the fact that there was some mode of leaving the cells with which they were unacquainted.

Jonathan swore awfully.

"It's that Jack Sheppard, curse him! Until he came to me I never had this trouble in executing my designs. But he shall pay the full penalty for his interference. The girl has gone. But how came he out of Newgate? I must see to that; but I must first go back by the way I have just come and make all secure."

He turned on his heel as he spoke, and retraced his steps through the market to the cells.

He did not pause at Jack's cell door, though he had half a mind to do so. He was quite safe there, he thought, so he let him be.

Moreover, he had been for a long time absent and thought best to return.

The man at the grating, hearing his approach, let him through.

"I will go to Newgate," said Wild, as he walked to the front door of his house. "I cannot understand how Sheppard could have got here. I will go and see. There must have been great negligence, or else they have connived at his escape."

He went round the corner of the Old Bailey as he spoke, and then, upon arriving at the prison wicket, knocked at it with such fury as almost to split the stout oak iron-studded panels.

CHAPTER LXXXVI.

BLUESKIN STARTS FOR LONDON, AND IS ROBBED ON THE HIGHWAY.

UNDER the care and skilful treatment of old Ann, Blueskin gradually recovered from what was as nearly a mortal wound as any wound could possibly be.

But the fact is, the iron bands, which were placed triangularly in his hat, shielded him in a great measure from the blow, and, in addition to this, he happened to possess a skull of tolerable thickness.

Nevertheless, the blow had been enough to fracture it.

Fortunately none of the splinters of bone pressed upon his brain. Had such been the case, either death or insanity would have been the result.

His constitution, too, was strong, and so, in what might be termed an incredibly short space of time, he was able to leave his bed and move about.

After that his recovery was rapid.

When trying to think back upon the past he was much puzzled to separate the real from the unreal. The last circumstance he could recollect with anything like distinctness was the sudden interruption of Jonathan Wild and his myrmidons into the turret-chamber.

Nor was he able to imagine by what means the thief-taker had become acquainted with the secret place of refuge in the old abbey, though, as the reader knows, that information came to him in about the simplest manner possible.

But Blueskin was firmly under the impression that Geoffrey had confided the secret to no one else, and yet Jonathan walked in as though he was perfectly aware of his exact location.

He was forced at last to give up the attempt in despair.

As soon, though, as he was well and strong enough, he made his way to the ruins, but without acquainting anyone with his purpose. He fancied that there he might find something that would afford him a clue.

Of his recovery from the death-like trance in which he had lain for so many hours, and his insane flight into the wood, he recollected nothing, for when those things happened he was under the influence of delirium. He could, however, hazily remember his encounter with the poachers, and the appeal he made to them for his life. All after that was a blank until he woke up in the cottage.

It was a glorious morning when he started on his visit to the abbey. The sky was clear, the air pure, and the sun diffused a comfortable warmth. In the trees the birds sang sweetly, and all seemed beautiful. It was, in fine, one of those fine autumnal days which come, perhaps, once or twice during the season, in order to recall to our minds a more vivid idea of what the departed summer was like.

It was a day which could not fail to brace the nerves and invigorate the frame of the invalid, and Blueskin found it made a great difference to him.

The abbey was but about a quarter of an hour's walk from the cottage, so he accomplished the distance with ease, and without fatiguing himself.

Indeed, he was surprised at his own strength.

The general appearance of the place, as he drew near to it, differed in no respect from that which it bore upon the occasion of his first visit. All seemed unchanged.

But it was with a heavy and an anxious heart that he took the path leading to the little courtyard in which the turret stood. The fate of his master's child and his friend's son filled him with uneasiness. They were in the power of their worst and most dreaded enemy, Jonathan Wild, and therefore the worst was to be anticipated.

The little door was closed, but not locked.

He pushed it open and entered.

As soon as he passed through it shut again, which explained how it was he found it closed.

The courtyard was quite deserted; indeed, to have looked at it, no one would have thought a human foot had trodden it for years.

Blueskin did not pause in his course, but ascended the winding stairs that led up to the turret.

In a few minutes he reached the top and entered.

All within was just as he remembered it to be, with the exception that, upon the floor where he had fallen, was an immense pool of blood, which filled the chamber with a sickening and repulsive odour.

It was a strange sick man's whim, but Blueskin thought he should be better able to think over the occurrences of the past while he sat there than he would be elsewhere.

So, taking one of the rude chairs which had served them for a seat, he placed it near the window, and sat down upon it in such a manner that he could rest his arms upon the massive back and his aching head upon his arms.

Thus he gave himself up to thought.

It would have been far better if he had waited until his energies were more recovered, but he was too impatient to do that.

Utterly vain were all his endeavours to come to some rational conclusion respecting the events which had happened. This, however, was certain, and beyond all dispute: Jonathan had, by some means unknown to him, discovered their hiding-place, and, in concordance with his crafty nature, had stolen upon them, and taken them at unawares.

Well he remembered the attack, and how the thief-taker had himself confronted him. He could guess the rest. He had been struck down and left for dead, while Jack and Edgworth Bess he had carried off as prisoners.

"That is it, clear enough," he said, rising to his feet, "and it is no good troubling about the rest; he found it out somehow, and turned his knowledge to the best advantage. What may have been the fate of Bess and Jack I tremble to think of. They are alone and friendless at the time when they most needed such assistance as a strong arm, a clear brain, and a willing heart could afford them. I will go back now, and rest for the remainder of the day, then, if I feel well and strong enough, I will set out for London at nightfall."

As he thus expressed his determination, he left the little turret-chamber, and retraced his steps to the cottage.

Having resolved upon a definite course of action, he felt wonderfully better.

"Where are the horses, I wonder, that we left in the court-yard?" he said. "Has Jonathan or his men taken possession of them, or have they strayed away? Be it which it will, it is all the same, they are gone. One of them now would have been of the greatest service to me on my journey."

And so, with his brain busy with various thoughts, he passed the day upon his bed in the little cottage.

Just at sunset, old Ann came in to remove the bandages about his head, and to replace them with new ones.

She pronounced the wound wonderfully better.

"I am glad to hear that," said Blueskin; "I shall always feel grateful to you. Bind it up this time as well as possible, for it will be the last."

"The last?" repeated the old woman, with surprise.

"Yes, it is impossible for me to stay here any longer—I am imperatively called away. Here is a purse. It is a full one, and contains a large amount. Take it in return for what you have done."

"But," remonstrated Ann, "you ought not to think of moving yet. Your wound is better, but it is far from being well; a couple or three days more will put you quite right."

"May be, but I will start to-night. It would do me more harm to stay here in anxiety than it would to start, although I may not be quite well."

"Perhaps so," said the old woman. "But if you will take my advice, you will stay."

Blueskin, however, paid no heed to her words, and when the operation of binding up the wounds was completed, bid them all farewell.

The night was dark, and a cool wind swept over the earth, but this was all the more suited to him, for his blood was heated.

He gained the high road, and pursued it for some distance; then he took a lane that led him in the direction of the city of Oxford.

It was his intention to proceed thither, and then take the coach to London.

But it was decreed that he should be prevented from doing this, for scarcely had he gone half the distance than two dark figures sprang out upon him.

So suddenly and unexpectedly was the attack made that Blueskin had no opportunity of defending himself.

They clutched him on each side.

"Your money!" they cried; "surrender all you have, and peaceably, or you will suffer for it. Your money, I say!"

It was rather strange for Blueskin to be robbed on the highway, but strange things sometimes do happen.

Although he was so weak and in so bad a position to defend himself, yet he did not choose to comply with the demands of these fellows quietly, so striking out right and left, he made a vigorous attack upon them.

He stood, however, no chance. The man on his right side struck him a violent blow under the right ear, which felled him at once.

This done, they proceeded, with the utmost expedition, to rifle his pockets, and soon emptied them of anything that was of the slightest value, and then decamped, first having humanity enough to drag their victim to the side of the road, so that he was in no immediate danger of being run over by any passing vehicle.

About half an hour afterwards Blueskin came to himself.

He rose to his feet and looked about him, with surprise very visibly depicted on his countenance.

Then he all at once recollected what had happened.

"Curse the fellows, they have conquered me," he said; "it might have been worse, and I ought to be the last to complain, for it is no more than I have done many a time."

From this it will be seen that he took rather a philosophic view of the transaction.

It was, nevertheless, vexatious in the extreme, because he was in a strange place, some distance from his destination, and utterly destitute of resources.

His wound was either getting much better, or else his excitement made it appear so.

"There is no help for it," he said; "my only course will be to do as they have done. The worst of it is, though, I am unarmed, and not exactly a fair match for anyone. Never mind, I will try; I have been on the highway before to-night, and somehow or other have always been successful."

Just as he spoke these words, there rose upon the still night air the clatter of a horse's hoofs, and the sound was sufficient to make him aware that a single traveller was approaching the spot upon which he stood at an easy trot.

CHAPTER LXXXVII.

RELATES HOW BLUESKIN STOLE A HORSE, AND THEN WENT ON THE HIGHWAY.

"FORTUNE favours me," exclaimed Blueskin. "I will try to take all the advantage of the circumstance within my power. It will be no easy task, though, for me, unarmed and on foot, to stop a man on horseback. It must be done by stratagem."

He could not as yet obtain a glimpse of the approaching horseman, for the lane, about a hundred yards further on, took a sudden bend to the left.

Moreover, the night was too dark a one for objects at any great distance to be distinguishable.

Nearer and nearer, plainer and plainer, grew the sounds.

Blueskin, for a moment, was undecided as to which would be the best stratagem for him to adopt, but he decided upon one that looked rather hazardous.

Choosing, then, the highest part of the roadway, he laid himself down at full length upon his back, assuming, as well as he could, the appearance of a badly-wounded or dead man.

It was a strange way of stopping a horseman, but it would no doubt prove an effective one.

The rider came round the bend of the lane.

He was quite a young man, and rather slightly made.

The horse he bestrode was a magnificent creature, and the way in which it put its feet to the ground showed its perfect breed.

Suddenly the beautiful animal swerved, then stopped, and refused to proceed, except in an odd, sidelong fashion.

It had perceived the object in its path.

The young horseman seemed at first quite at a loss to comprehend the meaning of his steed's unusual behaviour, but upon leaning forward in the saddle, he saw the body of a man in the road.

The first words this youth uttered rather amused and surprised Blueskin.

He spoke in quite an exultant tone of voice.

"Hurrah!" he said. "Here is a real adventure at last! Well, I think its time I had one, considering the nights I have been out. How glorious! Woa, Polly, woa! Steady, mare! Why, its a dead man, I believe! I should just like them to laugh at me after this! I'll astonish them! Its a real romantic adventure, and no mistake! What shall I do, I wonder? Dear me, I don't know! I never had an adventure before, and—and—I don't feel half as comfortable as I thought I should! I'll holler out! Hilloa, there! Hilloa! Who are you? Are you very bad, eh?"

He waited anxiously for a response, but all remained profoundly still.

The horseman began to exhibit signs of evident fright.

"What shall I do, I wonder, eh? I've a good mind to be off. No, I won't, though, or they would laugh at me, and no mistake—to run away after finding an adventure. I'll get off. Perhaps he isn't so bad as he looks."

Thus speaking, this rather singular and very remarkable young man got off his horse with extreme deliberation, and, slipping the bridle over his arm, came forward on foot to where Blueskin lay, who, now he came to find what sort of adversary he had got to deal with, was almost ashamed of the artifice he had used.

But for all that, it proved to him that the idea was a good one, and, likely enough, some day it would be of service to him.

As soon as the young man approached him, he sprang up suddenly, and caught him by the throat.

"Murder!" he cried. "Murder!"

"Silence!" was the reply. "Utter another sound, and you utter your last on earth! I am a desperate man! Quick. Hand me over all that you possess, or your life shall pay the penalty!"

"Yes, good sir. Don't hurt me. I'll do all that you want. You see, I was reading the other day about adventures on the road, so I thought I would come out and try and find some myself. I can assure you that is a fact."

"Then you have nothing to complain of," said Blueskin, who, in spite of himself, could not forbear a smile. "Here's such an adventure as few have had the luck to meet with. Look here."

Knowing he had nothing to fear from the youth in the shape of resistance, he very coolly mounted his horse.

"There," he said. "This will be a rare adventure. Good bye. I'm off!"

"No, no! murder! murder! Stop—that's too much of a joke! Hilloa! Hilloa! Murder! Stop! I say; stop!"

Blueskin, however, heeded him not in the least, but striking his newly-acquired horse on the flanks, he gave him the rein, and its poor deluded owner was quickly out of sight and hearing, having, it may be fair to infer, had a sufficiency of adventure to last him his lifetime.

Blueskin slackened his pace after a little time, for he neither wished to over-fatigue himself or his horse.

His first intention had been to proceed to Oxford, but now he abandoned that idea, and pushed on direct to London.

The horse might be recognised, and himself brought into trouble in consequence.

He made his way across the country by the narrow lanes which intersected it, and at length emerged into the Oxford-road, at some considerable distance from that city.

Feeling the firm, smooth road beneath its feet, the horse showed himself impatient for a gallop, so Blueskin gave him the rein.

His immediate purpose was to proceed to London with all speed possible, and endeavour to ascertain what had been the fate of the two young people in whom he felt so great an interest.

That Jonathan Wild had left him in the turret under the impression that he was dead he felt quite sure, and so he resolved that when he did get to town he would carefully disguise himself, which would make his task all the easier.

But he was not destined to reach London without meeting with a strange adventure.

Besides, he himself determined not to let any chance of getting money pass him by, for what he had taken from the young man who was so fond of romantic adventures was but trifling in amount, and he did not know, of course, how much he would require on reaching London.

The saddle of the horse which he bestrode was furnished with holsters, and he had already satisfied himself that they contained a brace of well-loaded pistols.

And among the various articles he had taken from the owner of the horse were a powder-flask and a case of bullets, so that he was well qualified to make an attack.

His head, too, was wonderfully better; in fact, he only occasionally felt any inconvenience from it.

And so Blueskin, fully equipped as a "knight of the road," rode on at a swinging pace towards London, determined to cry "Stand and deliver!" to whatever passengers he might meet.

Nor was he green at the trade. It was not the first time in his long and adventurous career that he had played the highwayman's part, and always with success.

A glance at his burly frame was sufficient to make even the courageous think twice before they attempted to attack him.

But on that night the road appeared unusually deserted, and he travelled many miles before he met with a single person.

In fact, the hour was rather too late a one for many people to be abroad.

Presently, however, he heard a horse coming towards him at a furious gallop.

"Some one at last," he cried, as he pulled up at the side of the road. "I will stop him, at all events, be he who he may. What a terrific speed he is coming at, to be sure."

The beat of the horse's hoofs, as he brought them both together to the ground, succeeded each other so quickly that they almost made one continuous sound.

It was an unusual circumstance for any one to travel at such a speed. Few horses could have performed it.

Of course, one effect of this was to quickly bring him to where Blueskin laid in wait.

On came the horse like a whirlwind.

Blueskin dashed out into the centre of the road, and then pulled up, facing the approaching steed.

He drew a pistol from the holster.

"Stand!" he cried, at the top of his lungs. "Stand and deliver! Your money or your life!"

As he commenced uttering these words, he saw, faint and indistinct before him, the outlines of a man on horse-back.

He fully anticipated that upon seeing such an obstacle, as he was, planted full in his path, that he would pull up, or at least check the headlong progress of his steed, but he appeared to do nothing of the sort.

The horse, however, upon perceiving the obstruction, swerved aside with great suddenness, and before Blueskin could move in the least to prevent it, swept past him on his left with unabated speed.

But the rider was unhorsed, for the sudden movement had caused him to lose his seat.

He fell heavily upon the hard roadway.

This was a result that Blueskin had not expected.

His horse grew alarmed at the strange things taking place, for it was quite unused to them.

Blueskin, however, who was an excellent equestrian,

[THE DISCOVERY OF THE YOUNG MAN'S BODY BY JONATHAN WILD AND PINCHING TOM.]

soon succeeded in calming the creature, and then he turned his attention to the wild rider.

He lay in the roadway, just where he had fallen, without the least motion.

"He is badly hurt, no doubt," he said; "perhaps killed. I hope not. I will see."

He dismounted as he spoke, and, putting his arm through the reins, advanced still closer to where the rider lay.

The horse, however, evinced the utmost unwillingness to follow him.

And now, whether it was that some portion of the horse's terror had communicated itself to him, or what it was, something seemed to make him aware that there was in this affair something more dreadful than met the eye at a first glance.

The man lay in a strange, huddled-up fashion.

When he had succeeded in dragging his horse after him until he was within about six feet of it, the creature stopped short, planted its fore feet firmly on the ground, and refused to move.

Blueskin was more and more convinced that something unusual had occurred, for he had many a time noticed the keenness of perception which many horses possess.

He took the end of the reins in his left hand, and went forward as far as he could, and looked closely at the body.

It was motionless still, being, in fact, in precisely the same posture as that in which it had fallen.

Afraid, if he released the horse, that he should have some trouble in capturing him again, Blueskin led him to the side of the road, and tethered him to a stout branch of an elder tree.

This done, he, with a quickened respiration, made his way to where the fallen rider lay—a ghastly, motionless mass.

CHAPTER LXXXVIII.

A MYSTERIOUS AND HORRIBLE ADVENTURE BEFALS
BLUESKIN ON HIS WAY TO LONDON.

THE horse made a strange snorting noise as Blueskin left his side, whose attention was too much engrossed by what had happened to pay any heed to it.

"He must be dead," he said; "and yet how awfully sudden! I wish I had a light now, but I must do without."

The rider's face was partly turned to the ground, so, catching hold of the collar of his coat, he pulled him over on to his back.

Enough light was shed upon the earth for him to be able to see with tolerable plainness any object not very far distant from him.

Therefore, as he knelt down near the prostrate form, he was able to see it was a man who was some distance down the vale of life.

His hair was thin and white.

The face and figure well filled out.

His attire, though plainly made, was of the very best quality of material, but there were no ornaments about him, not even a watch-chain with its pendant seals.

But what struck Blueskin most was the ghastly pallor of the countenance, which wore the marble hues of death.

The eyes were fixed and open.

There was no movement about his breast to show that he still breathed.

"He must be dead," said Blueskin. "The fall from his horse killed him. It's an ugly job, and it shouldn't have happened if I could have helped it. Still, I may as well take advantage of the circumstance. He may carry something about him which is well worth having. If he's dead he can't feel the loss, and I may as well have the things as anyone else, and a great deal better, too, I think."

Having thus taken it for granted that he was dead, Blueskin began to search his pockets with a dexterity which sufficiently attested his long practice.

But, to his astonishment, not one single thing could he find in any of the pockets.

He could scarcely believe himself, and he made a second examination, but with the same result.

"Why, some one must have been beforehand with me, and emptied his pockets! What a strange thing! No one has approached him, and—ah!"

Blueskin suddenly interrupted himself with this exclamation, and sprang to his feet.

By mere accident he had touched the face of the old man with his hand.

It was icy cold.

"Good heavens!" he cried, "not only is he dead, but he must have been dead some hours. If he had been killed by falling from his horse, his body would be warm, not cold. What am I to think of all this?"

With a greater amount of emotion than he in general manifested, Blueskin stooped again, and touched one of the hands.

That, too, was as cold as a corpse.

Then he took hold of one of the fingers, and tried to bend it.

But it was impossible. The joints were quite rigid.

A further and still closer examination showed him that the man had been dead six hours at the very least.

But nowhere about him could he find the least signs of violence.

What, however, was the most awful circumstance connected with the whole affair was that, beyond all doubt, the horse which had come by at such a furious speed had carried on his back no living rider, but a rigid corpse.

In spite of himself, Blueskin trembled at this horrible adventure. He had cried, "Stand and deliver!" on the highway to a dead man!

The behaviour of the horse was now accounted for. Some of them have the most invincible repugnance to a dead body. They can tell one from afar off, and neither blows nor caresses will induce them to approach it.

In the whole affair there was ample food for reflection and speculation of the most bewildering character.

Questions to which he would fain have been able to frame some reply, thronged quickly to his mind.

Who was this old man? What rank and position in life did he hold?

How, where, and under what circumstances, had he met with his death?

By whom had his pockets been rifled?

How came his dead body, stiff and rigid as it was, upon the back of that mysterious steed? and by what means had he retained his seat?

What, too, was his destination?

To neither of these questions could Blueskin reply.

So absorbed, too, did he become—and, when all the strange circumstances are fully considered, who can wonder at it—that he, for a time, forgot his own affairs.

He was aroused, however, by hearing the grinding of wheels, and then the blast of a horn rung out clearly on the night air.

"The Oxford coach," he cried. "I must begone. It would never do for me to be seen near this dead body, or I should have the greatest trouble in the world in removing suspicion from myself. I will draw him to the side of the road, and place him against the bank, so that he shall not run the risk of being mutilated by the wheels; and then continue my road to London."

As he spoke, Blueskin carried out his intentions.

The dead body was placed in a sitting posture against the bank on the south side of the road.

Then going to the place where he had tied his horse to tree, he undid the knot and mounted.

By the time he had done this, the lamps of the coach were plainly visible in the distance, and the guard blew another blast upon his horn.

A slight impulse was enough to cause his horse to start off at a good pace, but perceiving a town in the distance, Blueskin turned down a narrow lane which was on his left hand, and resolved to wait there until the coach had passed.

He was curious to know whether the ghastly object by the roadside would be perceived by any of its occupants, and whether they pulled up in consequence.

But no, the coach came steadily on, the rumbling of the wheels reaching his ears with greater distinctness every moment.

The lane was one that had tall trees growing on either side of it. They cast a deep black shadow, for the season was scarcely far enough advanced to strip the branches of their foliage.

He took up his position just a foot or two down it, and with his face turned to the highroad.

For a moment the idea of stopping the coach, single-handed as he was, came into his head, for he muttered—

"I have had no luck in the way of money to-night, and the Oxford mail will be sure to carry a rich booty. It would be a daring feat for one man to rob so many, but I have a great mind to try. But no," he added, "it would be running too great a risk. Were I to throw away my life, who would Jack and Bess find to protect them? For their sake I will hold back; and, besides, my wound is easy, but I must not tax myself too far, and I am not certainly in a position to cope successfully with so many foes. It shall pass! I will try some safer game."

This was a prudent and sensible resolve.

The coach lumbered by.

He waited until it was out of sight and hearing, and then followed slowly, so as not to overtake it while changing horses.

"I would give no trifle to learn a little more about that horse and its dead rider. I suppose there is little chance of my ever doing so, and too many important things are pressing upon me for me to be able to devote my time to tracing it out. That it is but a small fragment of some frightful tragedy, I feel confident, and I should like to learn the other details."

Blueskin trotted gently through the little town which he had seen, but upon gaining the open country beyond, he gave his horse the reins, and swept over the ground at an amazing rate.

From a contemplation of the singular and most mysterious adventure which he had had, his thoughts reverted to those two young and persecuted beings in whose good fortunes he felt so warm an interest.

"I trust they are both in life," he said; "and yet, why should I? Jonathan would wish them dead, and he would have no scruples whatever in the matter. How tedious the road seems! Shall I never get to London?"

He urged his horse to fresh exertions, and upon breasting a little hill, saw the Oxford coach again about a quarter of a mile before him.

"That coach haunts me," he said. "But I will pass it this time, and I will give them leave to overtake me."

Down the hill he went, without slackening his pace, and he was past the cumbrous conveyance like a meteor.

And now a faint, cold, gray light began to steal up from the eastern horizon before him. The dawn of a new day was at hand.

Gradually the different and more distant objects in the landscape were brought to view. The night mists rolled over the fields in huge masses, and as the sun arose, they were rapidly dispersed.

And still the horse which Blueskin had beneath him maintained its speed, and that, too, without displaying any symptoms of flagging or exhaustion. It was a matchless creature, and now that the sun shone upon him, he was able to perceive his beauties.

In colour a dark iron gray, with a small symmetrically shaped head, arching neck, and slender sinewy legs.

Blueskin was delighted with his valuable acquisition, and resolved not to distress the creature, so he tightened the reins.

About mid-day Blueskin reached Hammersmith, at that time a suburban village, and some miles distant from London.

He paused here in front of a public-house called the "Fountain," which was kept by a friend of his.

He partook of some refreshment, saw his horse attended to, and then, telling the landlord that upon no account was he to make known the circumstance of his being in the house, he went upstairs, and threw himself upon a bed.

He was much fatigued, so he determined to have a few hours' sleep till nightfall, when it was his intention to proceed to London, procure a good disguise, and then make what inquiries he could as to the whereabouts and welfare of Jack Sheppard and Edgworth Bess.

The latter, he determined, should be restored to her rights, and he would devote the whole of his energies to the accomplishment of that purpose.

CHAPTER LXXXIX.

JONATHAN WILD MAKES AN INSIDIOUS PROPOSAL TO JACK SHEPPARD.

We last left Jonathan Wild at the wicket leading into the vestibule of Newgate, to which place he had repaired, in order to see in what manner Jack Sheppard had managed to escape from his cell.

He clung to the idea that some one in the prison, wishing to be revenged on him (Jonathan), had put Jack in the way of making his escape.

On being made acquainted with the actual circumstances of the case, and being shown the excavation underneath the cell door, as well as the inscription on the wall, he could scarcely conceal his admiration.

Jack Sheppard stood higher in his estimation than he had ever done. Bravery was the quality in others which he most admired.

Above all was he delighted when he learned how Jack had emptied the bucket upon them. Its contents were far from savoury, and it so happened that Mr. Noakes received the greater portion.

"Ha! ha!" said Wild. "Capital! Upon my word its good. But you don't half take a joke, Noakes. Why the devil don't you laugh? Ha! ha!"

"You be d—d," said Mr. Noakes, whose temper got the better of him.

"Never mind," said Wild. "Don't make a fuss. You will be easily able to serve him out when you put him into another dungeon. Ha! ha! I can trust you for that. Ha! ha!"

"But, I tell you he has disappeared. We can't find him anywhere. Every corner in the old prison has been searched, but all in vain."

Jonathan knew that well enough, but what he wanted to get at was the means by which he had got out.

This no one knew.

All agreed, however, that he was on the stairs and emptied the bucket on their heads as they were about to ascend.

Jonathan said not a word, but quietly mounted the stairs. He had proof positive that Jack had got out of Newgate, and that being the last place at which he was seen, he thought it would be a very strange thing if he could not discover the place at which he had made his exit.

In turn he searched all the rooms with a minuteness that seemed ridiculous, until he reached the one where the child slept.

He went to the window and looked out in the square pit-like place.

Not satisfied, he poked his head out, and, on looking to the right, there he saw the bent leaden rain pipe up which Jack had climbed.

"That's it," he said. "The fellow is as nimble as a cat. That's how he got out, you may depend."

In this conclusion he happened to be perfectly right.

He did not attempt just then to verify it, because it was by no means his wish or intention to let anyone know Jack was at that moment an inmate of one of his own cells in Little Newgate.

"What a difference it would make," he said, "if he was just to join me in my schemes, instead of setting himself up in opposition to them! Why, then I should always be successful, and with a band composed of half-a-dozen such spirits, I would dare all and defy everything. But it is not to be thought of, I fear. Still, I shall make one more attempt."

When he went down again, the governor was not visible. And as for the men on duty, they would no more have thought of asking Jonathan Wild a question than they would have thought of speaking to King George himself.

So Jonathan stalked out of Newgate, and bent his steps to his own house.

It was then getting daylight.

Just as Jonathan turned the corner of the Old Bailey, a thought darted into his head, which he evidently had a great idea of the excellence of.

"Yah! Bo!" he said. "That will do it. I shall have them both then quite safe. I wonder I did not think of that before. I shall then succeed in everything, even to bending Jack Sheppard to my wishes. I will go and see him in his cell at once."

Wild banged away at the door of his own house as he spoke, and, upon entering, took a light and went direct to the cells.

What diabolical thought was it which had now entered the politic and crafty mind of the thief-taker? Something more than usually cunning, or he would never have been so much elated.

It will be seen in the course of the events which followed what his proposition was, and what results he hoped to obtain from it if, as he expected, it was accepted.

Jack Sheppard, the reader will recollect, was left by Wild in the cell in a state of insensibility, produced by the punishment he had received and by the utter exhaustion of his system.

It was some time before he recovered himself, and then he felt very weak and ill.

The thought that Edgworth Bess had escaped from what was a thousand times worse than death afforded him some consolation, and he immediately felt himself better.

He sat up.

A dubious kind of twilight only was in the cell, and that proceeded from the oil lamp in the corridor without, a few rays from which found their way in through a small grated aperture near the top of the cell door.

"I trust," he said, "that the poor persecuted girl has by this time found a haven of safety where she will be secure from Wild's persecutions. What can be his intentions with regard to myself? Why, I wonder, did he spare my life when it would have been so easy for him to take it? It is quite at variance with his ordinary line of policy."

At this moment the tread of a heavy footstep in the passage reached his ears.

Nearer and nearer it came.

Something seemed to tell him it was Jonathan Wild.

It stopped at the cell door.

The ponderous lock was shot back, and the door permitted to swing open upon its hinges.

It was Jonathan Wild.

He stood just upon the threshold in an attitude of defence, which showed he stood in some degree of awe of his prisoner.

"Hullo!" he cried, as he turned the light of the bull's-eye lantern, which he carried into the cell, and let it rest upon Jack's face.

Jack was feeble, but he did not wish to make his enemy aware of his condition if he could possibly avoid it.

"What now?" he said, in a defiant tone of voice.

"I am glad to hear you are all right. Don't be shy with me, Jack. You are a clever fellow, and I like you."

"I am sorry I can't say the same thing."

"Are you? I didn't know you had any more regard for the truth than I have."

"Answer me one question," said Jack; "and tell the truth for once."

"What do you want to know, Jack? I am willing to forget the past and be friends again, if you are."

"Has Edgworth Bess escaped?"

"She has."

"You have not recaptured her?"

"No, thanks to you, she got clear off. I pursued her, but she had left no clue by which I could trace her footsteps."

"Then I care not, so long as she is not in your power."

"Well, Jack! Will you be friends? I have been to Newgate and heard how you served the governor, and how you got into my house. I can form a pretty good guess. I don't believe there's another man breathing who could have achieved what you have achieved to-night!"

Jack felt pleased.

It was one of his failings to be fond of flattery.

To be flattered, too, by Jonathan Wild was something extraordinary.

But, it must be remembered, Jack's perceptions were not in so clear a state just then as they generally were.

"Jack," said Wild again, while his evil-looking eyes twinkled with anticipated triumph, "are you willing to forget the past, and be friends with me? Say yes, and you shall have your freedom, and if you will only serve me I will guarantee to get you out of all your difficulties! What do you say, yes or no?"

"What do you wish me to do in return?" said Jack, who, just then, would have been willing to purchase his liberty at almost any price.

"Nothing that we shall quarrel about."

"Edgworth Bess?" said Jack, inquiringly.

"We will leave her entirely out of the question. All I ask is, let me have my regulars, and assist me now and then, when I require some one clever, and we will cry quits."

"You will let me free?"

"Assuredly, if you subscribe to my terms. Are you willing to forget the past, and be friends? It will be much to the advantage of both of us to be allies and not enemies."

Jack hesitated a moment.

At length he said—

"Agreed!"

"Come on, then, Jack!" said Wild, while the twinkle in his eyes was succeeded by a hideous grin. "You are free to go where you choose. The conditions are light, and I have let you off easily. But the fact is, I was pleased with the clever manner in which you made your escape from Newgate. You climbed up a leaden pipe on to the roof, did you not?"

"I did."

"And then how did you get into my house?"

"Through the trap-door in the roof."

"Well—well, you have a rare courage, and, if you will believe me, I am glad things have turned out as they have. Act square with me, Jack, and you have nothing to fear! While we are foes we only injure each other. Be friends!"

"Agreed!" said Jack again, who, in the weak state he was in, was hardly conscious of the reality of the events which were taking place. "Agreed, if you will set me free at once."

"It shall be done as you desire, Jack, and I trust you will take it in the way I mean it."

"How?"

"As a token that I am in earnest in wishing to be friends with you. Look, here is the door."

Wilkinson, who was on the lock, seeing Wild approach, opened the door.

Jack sprang out like a dart, for he was afraid if he hesitated, Wild might alter his mind.

CHAPTER XC.

REVERTS ONCE MORE TO THE EXTRAORDINARY DISAPPEARANCE OF YOUNG WILLIAM STANSBURY.

"Ha! ha!" laughed Wild, rubbing his huge hands together, and cracking his fingers. "Ha! ha! Wilkinson."

"Yes, Mr. Wild."

"You saw Jack Sheppard make a bolt just then?"

"I did, sir."

"Then be off after him, and don't lose sight of him, as you value your life. Don't let him see you. Off you go. Don't leave him a minute, but communicate with me as often as you can. Off at once."

"All right, Mr. Wild. I'll do it, you may depend. He's just turned down Warwick-lane."

"Make haste, then, or you will lose sight of him. Don't let him see you following him for the world."

Wilkinson, who was a very active man, darted off after Jack.

Jonathan stood upon his doorstep, and watched his progress.

Satisfaction beamed from every lineament in his face.

"Ha! ha!" he laughed again, so much pleased was he with his scheme. "I shall have her now. A capital thought, and how blindly he fell into the snare. I would stake my life he finds the girl in half the time that I should, if I set all my men to work. Let him do so. I shall then only have to learn their whereabouts from Wilkinson, and make them again my prisoners. Ha! ha! It's very good. When I get her again I will take care, too, she does not escape; and as for Jack, why he shall hang, and there will be an end of him."

Jonathan Wild closed the door, and retired into his house.

He called Tonks, and bade him take Wilkinson's place on the lock.

Then, thoroughly and perfectly satisfied with himself, Wild directed his steps to his sitting-room on the first-floor, and sitting down near the fire, poured out a large tumbler of brandy.

He wanted to think a little, and arrange the different business matters he had then in hand.

They were various.

The first in importance was the recapture of Edgworth Bess, without whom he could do nothing.

This he considered was as good as done, and was tolerably easy.

He felt quite sure Jack would not rest until he had found her.

Then there was Lord Donnull. How should he act with regard to him? Should he make him acquainted with the startling fact that the young girl was at liberty? Certainly not; there was no knowing what might be the result. He would soon have her in his power again, and he could easily conceal her absence until then.

Next came Steggs. What should he do with him? Get up a case against him and have him brought to trial, or would it be safer to put him to death in some less public manner?

That consideration he deferred. He was quite safe where he was, he thought, at all events for the present.

Then, last of all, he thought of the mysterious old man who had related such a strange story to him about the disappearance of his son with so large a sum of money in his possession. What should he do in that? Clearly it was his best policy to give it every consideration, and use every means in his power to unravel the affair. Should he succeed in finding him, he would create for himself a better reputation, and might gloss over some of his other transactions.

That, as the reader knows, was the view that he had taken of the matter at the onset, and further reflection only served to show him the benefit it would be to him.

He touched the concealed handle of the bell.

Wild was in a good temper again. Things were, he thought, going smoothly with him.

Alas! how often is it the case when we think we are most prosperous, and all things going well, that we find ourselves suddenly beset with difficulties and dangers on every side.

So it was with Wild.

To anticipate any of the surprising events which are to come would be but to destroy the interest of the narrative, so we forbear doing so.

Levee came to the door, in reply to Wild's summons.

"Pinching Tom!"

"Just come in, if you please, Mr. Wild, and he wants to see you, sir."

"Send him up."

"Yes, Mr. Wild."

Two minutes afterwards Pinching Tom entered, and by the expression of his face, Wild could tell that he was the bearer of intelligence of some importance.

The reader will remember that Jonathan had set him to find some traces of young Stansbury.

"I have been making inquiries unceasingly ever since I left you, Mr. Wild."

"And have they resulted in anything?"

"Only a confirmation of your suspicions, Mr. Wild."

"Sit down," said the thief-taker, graciously, "and tell me briefly what you have done."

"In obedience to your instructions, Mr. Wild, I went to the Bank of England, and verified the statement which had been made to you."

"And you found it correct?"

"In every particular. The young man was remembered by several of the bank officials, for his country-cut dress made him a conspicuous object. I found the man who had last seen him. He was one of the porters."

"And where was he last seen?"

"Going in the direction of Bishopsgate-street, Mr. Wild."

"Indeed," said Jonathan, "that looks as though I had hit upon the right nail."

"That was just what I thought, Mr. Wild."

"Ya—ah! Go on. What next?"

"I thought I would go direct to King-street."

Wild nodded.

"About halfway down, on the right-hand side of the street, I found a public-house answering to your description."

"And the sign?"

"The 'Pied Bull.'"

"Right."

"Next door, too, was the large empty house you spoke about."

"Go on. What was your next step?"

"I did not venture into the public-house, chiefly because I feared it might be the means of arousing their suspicions, so I proceeded with great caution to make my inquiries of the neighbours."

"Well?"

"Just opposite the 'Pied Bull' there is a little tailor's shop, in which a man always sits."

"I know the place."

"He was one of the persons I made inquiries of, and it was from him that I got the most definite information."

"What did he tell you?"

"He remembered seeing a young man, who agreed with the description which I gave of him, enter the 'Pied Bull' about two months ago, and what made him recollect the circumstance was, that his little child was playing in the roadway and was run over. A crowd quickly collected, and among them was this young man, who gave him five shillings to pay the doctor."

"So he recollects him?"

"Perfectly. Later in the same day he saw him enter the 'Pied Bull,' and that was the last he ever saw of him."

"And did you hear any rumours about the house, among the neighbours?"

"No, Mr. Wild, I did not. Several—in fact, I might say all of them—remember the circumstance of the child being run over, and one or two saw the 'country gentleman,' as they call him, give the five shillings to pay the doctor, but the tailor is the only one who actually saw him enter the 'Pied Bull.'"

"And is that the extent of your information?"

"Very nearly, Mr. Wild. I have no doubt we are on the right scent now. How I got my intelligence is plain enough, but I can't make out how you got yours, Mr. Wild."

"Nor will you! Have you anything more to say?"

"Only with respect to the empty house."

"What about it?"

"I made inquiries as to how long it had stood empty, and asked for the reason why it was not occupied."

"Yes; I wanted to know that."

"The reason given was, that the landlord of the 'Pied Bull' had bought the house some years back, along with his own, when both were put up to auction. It was his intention to make the two houses into one, and make other extensive improvements, but nothing has yet been done."

"And does he give no excuse for that?"

"Well—yes. He should be obliged to wait a bit before he could do it. Trade not being over brisk, and having bought the houses, and paid the whole of the purchase-money, he had not enough to make the alterations he desired, but that he should do so as soon as he had an opportunity."

"And so the people had no suspicions?"

"None; and the place had been so long in its present condition that they almost forgot it had ever been otherwise."

"And what do you make of the affair, Tom?"

"Well, Mr. Wild, I hardly know, but I think a good many things go on at the 'Pied Bull' as hadn't ought to."

"Right; and it is not the only one of the sort in London, to my knowledge. However, Tom, I want this affair thoroughly sifted, and if all turn out as I fully expect it will, it will turn out a good thing for me, and I won't forget you. Above all, be careful, because I should be defeated if any hint of my intentions got wind."

"Trust me, Mr. Wild."

"And now, Tom, listen. Take yourself where you like during the day, but come to me to-night at about twelve o'clock. Provide yourself with a lantern and spade, and we will pay a visit to the 'Pied Bull.'"

"Very good, Mr. Wild," said Pinching Tom, as he rose to go.

"We shall make some discoveries, I doubt not."

"Sh—shall we go alone?"

"Not altogether, so you need not be afraid. I shall take care to have some men stationed within hearing."

With this assurance Pinching Tom was tolerably content, and he withdrew.

Jonathan Wild finished his brandy, and then went down into the office to transact business.

But with the details of that the reader would not care to be made acquainted, since in them there was nothing of any special interest.

During the day several members of his band brought him messages from Wilkinson, but the intelligence he wanted and expected did not come to hand.

And so we pass over the time until nightfall, when Pinching Tom and Jonathan set out on their adventurous expedition.

CHAPTER XCI.

JONATHAN WILD AND PINCHING TOM MAKE AN ENTRANCE INTO THE WALLED-UP CELLAR.

LONDON, in the earlier part of the last century, was indeed a fearful place.

It was the resort of the most desperate characters that existed, and outrages at which we should shudder with horror were then nightly perpetrated.

Above all, there existed frightful dens into which strangers and travellers were decoyed, and from whence they never came forth again.

At that period, too, the difficulty which surgeons had in finding subjects for dissection led to the establishment of a class of ruffians who, at a later date, were known by the expressive name of "resurrection men."

The frightful deeds which these men committed have frequently furnished subject-matter for the novelist, but no one has yet dared to portray the more awful and disgusting side of their character.

The reason of this is obvious.

We will give it in the words of a highly-talented and well-known author, whose untimely end all lovers of literature must deplore.

He says:—

"There are certain themes the interest of which is all-absorbing, but which are too entirely horrible for the purposes of legitimate fiction. These the mere romancist must eschew if he does not wish to offend or to disgust."

And so, although we are in possession of many facts relative to the "mysteries of London," yet we shall forbear giving them for the reasons so well and ably expressed in the preceding paragraph.

But we shall certainly follow Jonathan Wild upon his night excursion to the "Pied Bull," for the circumstances are full of interest.

It was about half an hour after midnight that two dusky-looking forms paused opposite the public-house in question.

In a few minutes they were joined by two more, and then by two again, until presently about a dozen had assembled.

They were Jonathan Wild and his men.

The street was in total darkness.

They stood under the shadow of the tailor's house, in a dense and dusky throng.

In a low voice, Jonathan, without telling them his object, gave his men instructions where to place themselves, and how to act when they heard him blow his whistle shrilly.

One by one they departed, and took up their different stations, leaving Jonathan Wild and Pinching Tom alone.

The latter, in obedience to his instructions, had provided himself with a lantern and spade. He had also added, on his own responsibility, a mattock and crowbar, in case any necessity should arise for their use.

All the houses in the street were in total darkness, the "Pied Bull" not excepted.

"How shall we make an entrance, Mr. Wild?" asked Pinching Tom. "I took a good look at the premises yesterday. The lower windows and the door are boarded over."

"We can get over that difficulty."

"As how, Mr. Wild?"

"The boards will be easily removed."

"But there is a court which takes you to the back of the premises, which, I should think, would not be so well guarded."

"The front will be the best," said Jonathan. "They do not anticipate any attack, and ten to one if they have taken any precautions to prevent a determined man making an entrance. Have you a jemmy?"

"Yes, Mr. Wild. Here's one, if you please, sir. Thinking it might be wanted, I slipped it into my pocket."

Wild took the crowbar, and having made a hasty examination of the windows, set to work upon one of them.

A slight cracking noise now broke the silence, but only for a moment.

Jonathan had one of the boards off.

"The lantern, Tom," he said, "quick."

Pinching Tom unmasked a dark lantern, which enabled Wild to see that, if he removed another board, he would have no difficulty in making an entrance, for the glass in the windows beyond had disappeared, and he could see quite into the room.

The other board was, like its companion, quickly torn from its position.

All was now ready for them to enter, but before he did so Jonathan whistled faintly.

It was a signal, and was obeyed by a man gliding out of the shadow of the buildings, and coming to his side.

"We are going to enter here," said Jonathan, to the new comer. "You remain here on guard. If anything unusual should happen you know how to summon me."

"All right, Mr. Wild."

Jonathan and his satellite now scrambled through the window, into the front room of the empty house.

"Put up the boards in the same places," said Wild, as soon as they were inside, "but do it so that they can be pulled down in a moment."

Pinching Tom was a brave enough man, but he could not control an apprehensive shudder when he found himself fairly beneath the roof of the house of which he had such ghastly and horrible suspicions.

He was ashamed, though, to hang back.

Wild took the lantern, and unmasked it a little way, so that, although it afforded them sufficient light to enable them to see their route, yet enough light did not escape to make any one aware that persons were in the house.

The room was quite destitute of furniture.

Upon reaching the door they found it locked.

That, however, was a matter of little moment.

Pinching Tom was wont to boast that no lock could be made that he was unable to unpick, and as the lock on this door was only one of a very ordinary kind, he had the bolt back as easily and as quickly as if he had possessed the proper key.

On passing through this door they emerged into a little hall or passage, from which a flight of stairs ascended.

Wild looked all about him with great care, for having closed the door of the front room again, he was not afraid of the rays of light from his lantern being seen.

But there was nothing to excite suspicion, nor were there any indications of any one having lately visited.

Jonathan looked vexed.

The hypothesis which he had formed had this empty house for its basis.

He reflected a moment or so, and then he said—

"Where are the cellar steps, Tom?"

"Not far from this 'ere staircase, I should say, Mr. Wild; yes, here you are, sir—a little door in the wood-work!"

"Open it, then, and see where it leads to."

"Its fastened, Mr. Wild, but I daresay I shall soon get it undone."

Tom applied his crowbar to the crevice of the door.

It resisted for some time, having evidently been securely fastened from within.

Jonathan breathed again.

More pressure was applied to the crowbar, but Wild grew impatient, so he seized the edge of the door with his fingers, and, putting forth all his strength, fairly dragged it down.

The opening disclosed a flight of steep brick steps, upon which the dust lay in incredible quantities.

Pinching Tom, at the sight of this dismal and grave-like looking place, fairly drew back.

It did not appear that Jonathan observed this movement, or, if he did, did not attribute it to its right cause, for, taking no notice of it, he began to descend the steps.

Seeing his leader go first gave Tom a little more courage; besides which, he did not dare for the life of him hold back. His master—for such in every sense of the word he was—was treating him with great consideration, and visions of being appointed lieutenant in Blueskin's place flitted through his brain.

The cellar steps were only twelve in number, so the bottom was soon reached.

The cellar was on the right hand.

Jonathan entered it eagerly. He felt a more than common interest in the affair, and he was consequently exceedingly anxious to know whether it would terminate according to his expectations.

The cellar, which was clearly under the front part of the house, was an ordinary vaulted chamber, quite empty, and bearing every appearance of having been so for some time.

The walls, floor, and ceiling were all covered thickly with dust, while spiders had spun their webs in every direction.

Wild was foiled.

There was nothing at all there.

Still, the information he had received had prepared him for quite a different result, and he was far from thinking now that it was incorrect.

He must have had some doubts about it, however, or he would not have taken so much trouble to assure himself that there was no mistake.

"There don't seem to be nothing here, Mr. Wild," said Pinching Tom, as Jonathan finished a minute investigation of the cellar.

"Not what we want," growled the thief-taker; "but I haven't done yet."

As he poked, he left the cellar, and then proceeded to examine the walls at the foot of the stairs.

"Ha!" he said. "This explains it. Look at this brickwork, Tom. Don't it seem to you to be newer than that. Besides, here is a kind of arch at the top, just like the entrance to the other cellar."

"This is a doorway been bricked up," said Tom; "there can't be no mistake about that. Oh! it is as plain as can be."

"Go to work, then."

"On this wall?"

"Yes; you must fetch it down somehow or other, and don't make any more noise than you can help. It will be easy enough after you get the first brick out."

"Its lucky I brought this, then," said Tom, as he pulled the mattock out of his pocket. This will soon do the business."

He soon found, when he began to work, that the mortar was soft, which materially lessened the difficulty of the task.

He nevertheless found it tedious, even with the help that Jonathan gave him. The wall was three bricks in thickness, and every one had to be pulled out separate, and laid down carefully, for they were, above all, careful not to make noise enough to rouse the people in the next house.

All things, however, must have an end, and so, after about twenty minutes or half-an-hour's work, a breach in the wall was made, large enough to allow them to crawl through.

CHAPTER XCII.

THE BODY OF WILLIAM STANSBURY IS FOUND BENEATH THE FLOORING OF THE CELLAR.

JONATHAN went first.

Pinching Tom followed, and held the lantern high above his head.

It was in a vaulted apartment, in no way differing from that under the front of the house, that they now found themselves.

In one end, however, was a door, which, from its position, seemed to indicate a means of communication between that house and the "Pied Bull."

The floor, too, was very different—unlike the other cellar, there was no dust or dirt upon the floor to speak of.

It was composed of small flag-stones.

At these Jonathan Wild looked narrowly, and every now and then pressed upon the mortar with his thumb-nail, in order to judge, by the hardness exhibited, how long it had remained there.

Pinching Tom held the light, and watched him with the greatest interest.

Presently Wild gave vent to an ejaculation.

"Here is what we seek," he cried, springing to his feet. "Put the lantern down on the floor, and get your tools. Now then."

"Where am I to begin, Mr. Wild?"

"Here, and then work your way round the stone. When the mortar is all loosened, we shall easily be able to lift the stone from its setting."

"We shall, sir; and it won't take very long to loosen the mortar."

Both set to work with the blades of their clasp-knives, as being the most convenient instruments, and very soon indeed—in much less time, in fact, than one would have expected, they had the whole of the mortar dug out of the interstices.

The end of the crowbar was then inserted at one of the corners, and after one or two trials, they succeeded in raising the stone up a little way.

The advantage was taken of it to turn it quite over.

Some blackish-looking earth was disclosed by the stone.

Pinching Tom took up the spade with the intention of removing some of it, but Jonathan took the implement from him, and with nervous impatience began to scrape away the mould.

This he did to a depth of not more than two inches, when his spade struck against some object harder than the soil itself.

He laid this object bare.

It was the lower portion of a human body.

"And do you think this is the young man you spoke of, Mr. Wild?"

"I have very little doubt of it. Help me raise these other stones, and then we shall be able to see his face."

Now that one flag was taken out, there was no difficulty in displacing the remainder, and Pinching Tom laid them over in a few moments.

All that now remained was to remove the mould from the surface of the body.

This Pinching Tom did, while Wild folded his arms and looked on.

At length the corpse was fully exposed to view.

It was that of a young man, whose appearance in life must have been tolerably prepossessing, though now, of course, its effect was marred, for decomposition had already made some progress.

And now we may as well take the opportunity of explaining what may seem strange in Wild's behaviour on this occasion, for it is no part of our plan to wish to maintain unnecessary mysteries.

In brief, then, about a month before the commencement of our story, Jonathan received an anonymous communication to the effect that if he would look in a certain place in a certain house he would there find the evidence of a diabolical murder which had just been committed, and which was only one of a long series of similar crimes.

But it so happened that other things turned up to prevent him from attending to this note, and then, as the reader is aware, since he made Jack's acquaintance, that individual found him plenty to do.

Indeed, the circumstance was utterly forgotten until the old man strangely enough called upon him, as we have related, and then he all at once recollected the anonymous letter he had received, and thought that probably enough the victim there spoken of might be William Stansbury.

The house referred to was the "Pied Bull," and the reader is already aware how he called Pinching Tom aside and gave him his instructions.

The result, too, has been seen, so that the contents of the letter were completely verified.

The only link wanted was the proof that the dead body which they discovered was that of the young farmer.

Morally, however, there could be little doubt of it, and, so far as Wild and his janizary could tell, the corpse agreed with the description the old man had given of his son.

Having found the body, Jonathan's course was now clear and straightforward enough, and he would have sufficient grounds for arresting the occupants of the public-house.

He could yet see that the affair would redound very much to his credit, since he would undoubtedly be the means of breaking up one of those horrible dens into which unsuspecting travellers were decoyed and murdered.

"So far all is satisfactory," said Jonathan, after a brief interval of silence. "All has turned out exactly as I wished and anticipated. Whether this is, or is not, the body of William Stansbury, matters little, though of the two I would rather that it were."

"There is that door, Mr. Wild," said Pinching Tom.

"I don't know what more you think of doing."

"It is merely a communication between the two houses—at least, so I have been informed. We may as well see. It will not take much longer."

The pair upon this advanced to the door, and easily opened it.

They had to pull it towards them to pass through.

On the other side was merely an ordinary public-house cellar.

"All right," said Wild, "close the door. It will be best to secure it in some way."

"The door opens inwards, so it ought to be done easily enough," said Pinching Tom.

"There are the flag-stones we have taken up. I will help you place them against the door, so that if any one tries to seek an entrance here they will find it rather a difficult matter."

Between them they moved the stones and piled them up against the door, in such a manner that it was next to an impossibility for any one from the public-house to push it open.

This being done, Jonathan had things left just as they then were, and retraced his steps.

The man outside was waiting for them.

On reaching the street, Wild again summoned his men around him, and gave them orders to keep careful watch during the remainder of the night until he came in the morning.

Jonathan determined that he would make as much display of his zeal as he could; so at an early hour he waited upon the Secretary of State, told him the whole affair, and obtained his sanction to act in the way he thought best.

Thus armed, the thief-taker collected all the police-officers he could, and placing himself at their head, marched with them in a body to the house.

His men reported that no one had left the house.

The arrival of Wild and the officers raised quite a commotion.

The public-house was open,

Jonathan entered boldly at the head of all the rest.

A hard-featured woman was standing at the bar-counter, and as soon as she saw the officers, she turned of an ashy whiteness.

"Arrest that woman," cried Wild, "and every one else you find in the house."

The officers quickly spread themselves over the building.

Two servants were found and taken prisoners, and they seemed, with the landlady, to be the sole occupiers of the house.

Being quite assured that there was no one else, and, moreover, being assured by the neighbours that there was no landlord, Jonathan had the doors all fastened up, and he walked back with his prisoners in triumph.

The body was removed from the cellar, and was recognised by Mr. Stansbury as being his son. Over his grief we draw a veil.

The whole affair made a great stir when it was made public, and Jonathan Wild came in for a large share of undeserved commendation, and it is certain that he was just then more popular than he was at any other portion of his career.

The landlady of the "Pied Bull," who was a widow, was duly brought to trial, condemned, and executed at Tyburn. Her two servants, who were found accessories, shared the same fate.

And so was broken up one of about the worst of all the dens that then existed in London, and in to the disgusting and horrifying details of which we do not choose to go, for the reasons before given.

It was now that Jonathan thought more seriously than ever of quitting his profession as thief-taker, and, by a marriage with Edgworth Bess, obtaining undivided possession of the Donnull estates.

How he fared will be quickly seen, but we fear that he has engrossed our attention for a considerable period, and think it high time that we turned to some of the other characters in our history, all of whom, strange to say, are separated from each other.

It will be a relief, too, if we can turn to some more pleasing scene than the one to which we have just been introduced, and which would never have been touched upon at all had not the exigencies of the narrative required.

Blueskin we last left at the public-house at Hammer-smith.

Jack Sheppard we have not seen since he so blindly fell into the snare which Wild had laid for him, and dashed out of his house and round the corner of Warwick-lane, with Wilkinson at his heels.

To neither of these can we now turn our attention, for we are obliged to lay before the reader some of the most startling incidents that it is possible to conceive.

CHAPTER XCIII.

FOLLOWS THE FORTUNES OF EDGWORTH BESS, AND RELATES WHAT HAPPENED TO HER AFTER SHE ESCAPED FROM WILD'S CELLS.

THERE is one of the characters in this history in whom, it is hoped, a more than common interest is felt, but of whom we have for some length of time lost sight.

We allude, of course, to Edgworth Bess, whose trials, sufferings, privations, and ill-fortune, borne, as they were, with such a meek and gentle spirit, ought to have endeared her to all our hearts.

But the busy whirl of exciting incidents which have, from almost the first line, kept our attention wholly occupied, have afforded scarcely any opportunities for her gentle woman's nature to develop itself.

For this, however, there is yet ample time.

When, in obedience to the earnest entreaties of Jack, she left the cell, and rushed along the passage as he had told her, she was suffering acutely from the effects of Wild's brutal usage, and more than once she felt as though she must have fallen to the earth.

But, by a strong effort of the mind, she kept herself up, and, only partially conscious of the route she took, and the different objects she passed, she presently found herself in the yard at the back of Wild's house.

From that place, as the reader already knows, a dark passage led into old Newgate-market.

Down this she ran, with all the speed she could make, but when she reached it, the horrible stench which filled the place almost overpowered her.

She leant against the wall at the end of the passage for support.

While she did so, her quick ear caught the sound of approaching footsteps.

The fear that it might be her much-dreaded enemy, who, after vanquishing, perhaps murdering, Jack, had started in pursuit of her, bereft her, for a moment, of all motion, and then, feeling it would be madness to fly, she shrunk back behind a massive pillar.

The footstep came nearer.

She scarcely dared to breathe.

In another moment her worst forebodings were realized.

Jonathan Wild emerged from the passage.

The outlines of his bulky form were only just distinguishable from the surrounding gloom.

But if she had any doubt as to his identity, it was dispelled completely when she heard his voice.

There was no mistaking those harsh, grating sounds.

In a state of the greatest conceivable agitation she listened to his footsteps, as he threaded his way through the intricacies of the market to the entrance in Warwick-lane.

She had fortunately sufficient presence of mind to remain where she was.

And yet, if the truth was known, it was more likely from fear than calculation, that she acted as she did.

Scarcely venturing to draw her breath, lest the faint sound should reach her enemies' ears, she still remained crouched up behind the pillar.

And well was it for her that she did so, for, as the reader knows, Jonathan Wild came back.

But he did not look about him. Strange to say, the idea that she might be hiding somewhere in the market never entered his mind. He made sure her first act would be to place as great a distance as she possibly could between herself and his house.

Jonathan re-entered the passage.

With an intension, of which no words could possibly convey an adequate idea, she listened to the sound of his returning footsteps.

In that silent place she heard a heavy door swung shut, and the creaking of rusty bolts as they were shot into their sockets.

But even now the fear that he might come back again made her loath to quit her hiding-place.

So minute after minute passed away, and yet she stirred not.

But the silence of the dark and miserable place still continued, and she took fresh heart.

Cautiously, and trembling in every limb, she crept from behind a pillar, listened, and then took her way at random; all she did was to choose the widest route.

Presently, although she reached it circuitously, she emerged into Warwick-lane, and stood as near as possible upon the same spot as Jonathan had.

She looked up and down the dismal and deserted thoroughfare with an aching heart.

Which way to run for safety, or where to look for a friend, she knew not.

And as the full wretchedness of her position forced itself upon her she sobbed aloud.

A fugitive from the much-dreaded Jonathan Wild.

Alone and unprotected.

Destitute of all means.

Could anyone be in a more forlorn situation than she was.

To remain where she was, however, was but to needlessly court danger, and yet she could scarcely find heart to move away.

At that very moment was not Jack a prisoner in Wild's power for her sake; perhaps, by this time, was murdered.

Fresh tears streamed from her eyes as she made this reflection.

[JACK SHEPPARD IS ONE TOO MANY FOR WILKINSON.]

Over and over again did she regret that she had suffered herself to be persuaded by him to leave the place. But regrets came too late, and were unavailing now.

"What shall I do?" she cried, in anguished tones. "What shall I do? What will become of me?"

It was some moments before she found an answer to this question, and then she thought of Johnson, the landlord of the "Black Lion," in Drury-lane.

"I will go to him," she said. "I will go to him, and tell him how truly wretched I am—surely he will befriend me! I will try, and ask him to assist me in Blueskin's name."

Having thus resolved upon a particular course of action, she grew calmer, and, drawing her torn and disordered dress as closely about her person as she could, directed her steps down Warwick-lane to Ludgate-hill, and thence to Drury-lane.

In those days, when so little public order was maintained, it was a perilous journey for a young girl to make at that lonely hour.

But Edgworth Bess, thinking nothing of her danger, hastened on.

The corner of the turning now known as Farringdon-street, but then as Fleet-market, was reached in the course of a few minutes.

Here she paused, and drew back in terror, for a wild, uproarious bacchanalian shout arose, which echoed and re-echoed through the silent streets.

By the fullness of its sound it must have come from many a lusty throat.

Mingled with it, too, was the occasional clash of weapons, or a burst of drunken laughter.

It was but the surprise of the moment that made Edgworth Bess draw back. Recovering herself, she continued on her way.

But ere she could reach the opposite corner, there was a sudden rush of many footsteps from the direction of Fleet-market, accompanied by a strange whooping cry.

A deadly sensation of sickness came over the young girl's heart as she heard it, and she almost sank to the ground.

To the full was she conscious of the peril in which she stood, and that knowledge endowed her with strength to make a sudden rush to escape.

"Hurrah!" cried the chorus of voices. "Hurrah! More sport to-night! Hurrah for the brave Mohawks! Hunt her down! On—on, brave hearts! Rare sport—rare sport! Hurrah! hurrah! There she goes, along Fleet-street! Tally-ho! Keep her in sight! Hurrah! hurrah!"

Such were the loudest of the cries that made themselves heard above other and minor sounds.

Such were the cries that filled poor Edgworth Bess with the utmost alarm, and made her fly along the street with the speed of a hunted hare.

Imminent, indeed, was her danger, and greater, perhaps, than ever she had known.

By the dim light in the streets, the outlines of the throng who had uttered such strange cries and then rushed off in chase of her, could be partially distinguished.

In number they were, perhaps, rather over twenty.

The shape of their garments told at once they were persons of high social rank.

All were armed with long glittering dress swords or rapiers, which they either held aloft in the air, or whirled round their heads as they dashed onwards.

This band of wild young men were at the times of which we write the terror of all persons who were compelled to be abroad after dark.

By their barbarous acts and uncivilized behaviour they had earned for themselves the appellation of Mohawks—the collective name for one of the most bloodthirsty tribes of the North American Indians.

The Mohawks—or as the word is sometimes written, Mohocks—were composed of a number of dissolute young men, of ages varying from eighteen to thirty years. Among them might be found noblemen's sons, officers of rank, and a goodly sprinkling of those individuals whose income and mode of existence are profound mysteries to their most intimate acquaintance.

In a general way, the evening would be spent in furious revelry, or the amusements of the gaming table; then, when the sober portion of the inhabitants of the metropolis had retired to rest, they would sally forth into the streets, and setting the authorities at defiance, commit all kinds of excesses.

On these occasions they all seemed to be animated by one impulse, and that was to strive to outdo each other in deeds of violence and barbaric cruelty.

Wherever they went they left a track behind them which could be followed without difficulty.

Watchmen were knocked down, or otherwise maltreated—windows broken—signs pulled down—vessels on the river cut from their moorings, and sent adrift into the stream—carriages stopped, and their occupants subjected to every imaginable indignity—inoffensive people killed or desperately wounded—in fine, there was no species of enormity, no deed of violence or cruelty that they left uncommitted.

Many a time would the peaceful inhabitants of the city be rudely startled from their slumbers by their demoniac war-whoop, and experience a feeling of deep thankfulness that they were not abroad and in their path.

In all London there was not a human being to whom they were unknown, by name at least, and Edgworth Bess was no exception to the rule.

CHAPTER XCIV.

THE MOHAWKS CHASE EDGWORTH BESS THROUGH FLEET-STREET AND THE STRAND.

MANY and many a time had she trembled with dread when their fiendish deeds had been related to her, many and many a time had she hoped that she should never be exposed to their brutality.

Mercy, she knew, was a word to which they never paid any attention, and that to implore it would be but to court their utmost malice and derisive laughter.

To hunt a poor helpless girl through the streets would afford them unbounded satisfaction and delight.

Instances are yet on record of their having performed worse deeds than this. In particular one where, having procured a large barrel, they studded the inside with iron spikes, and a poor woman happening to fall into their clutches, they put her inside it, nailed in the top, and rolled it along the streets.

This will be sufficient to show that our heroine had good grounds for apprehension.

But the dread she felt at falling into their power enabled her to make the most incredible exertions.

With many a yell and unnatural cry, the Mohawks dashed on in pursuit of the flying form which they could just distinguish before them in the darkness.

There were no vehicles and no passengers in the street to impede their progress. The hour was the one before day begins, and when London is like a city of the dead.

As she sped along the corner of Fetter-lane she caught a transient glimpse of the lantern in the watchman's box that was stationed at the corner, but she did not pause or apply to him for protection; she was well aware it would be utterly useless.

By some unaccountable perverseness, those who were chosen to be guardians of the night and preservers of the peace were invariably old men, who were equally incapable of following any occupation, or of defending themselves or protecting others.

Edgworth Bess, then, continued on her way, believing that her only hope of escape consisted in so doing.

And in this she was quite correct, for the watchman, hearing the uproar, had very prudently ensconced himself in the recesses of his box, and pretended to be very sound asleep.

By so doing he hoped to escape the observation of the much-dreaded Mohawks.

But he was mistaken.

The sight of the lantern which was hanging outside diverted their attention for a moment from its original object.

Watchmen were peculiarly their prey.

Clashing their swords, and uttering their war-whoop, they made a simultaneous dash at this one.

The box went over in a moment with a terrible crash. It fell face downwards on the pavement, thus bringing the watchman beneath it.

A smothered sort of howl reached their ears.

They responded to it with a triumphant shout.

This was called "coffining a watchman," and was considered very fine sport indeed.

The whole proceeding occupied scarcely a moment of time.

"Now for the girl!" cried one of the foremost. "Quick, or she will elude us!"

"Yes—yes! The girl—the girl!" exclaimed the rest, as they bounded with fresh energy after the breathless creature.

What to do she knew not. There was a vague notion in her mind that she might run the whole distance to Drury-lane, and succeed in keeping ahead of her pursuers.

But as yet she had gone only a little more than half the distance, and already she felt her respiration impeded, and her limbs scarce able to maintain her weight.

Terror, however, acted as a sharp spur to urge her on, and although she felt as though each moment was going to be her last, she flew forwards with undiminished speed.

The loud cries, trampling feet, and clashing weapons of her pursuers seemed, nevertheless, to grow nearer and nearer, and more alarmingly distinct.

Her eyes grew dim.

Her brain reeled.

She staggered more than once, but each time was fortunate enough to keep her footing.

But she felt her senses were leaving her—that it would be beyond all possibility for her to hold up much longer.

Temple-bar was passed.

Then she saw, looming before her in the darkness, the dim outlines of St. Clement's Church.

It was just at this moment a more than usually loud shout of gratification was uttered by the Mohawks, as they perceived how quickly they were gaining upon the object of their pursuit, and who it would have been more consonant to human nature for them to defend instead of persecute.

But it was by no means part of their plan to come up with her too soon, and so they slackened speed a little. What they wished was to keep her well in view, and make her run until she could run no longer. The hunt over, their pleasure would be at an end.

Poor Bess reached the stout iron palings which surround the church.

Go further she could not.

Uttering a cry of despair and horror, she clung convulsively to the ironwork.

The strength which had up to that instant animated her seemed to suddenly depart, and she sank down in a strange, huddled-up mass upon the stone pavement.

She was only partially in possession of her faculties, but her hands retained their grasp upon the palisades.

A film came over her eyes, and objects faded from her sight.

With an earnest hope that Jack or Blueskin might arrive even at the eleventh hour and save her, as they had already done upon more than one occasion, she strove to rally her departing senses.

Then with a triumphant yell, and a sudden rush, the Mohawks closed around her.

She saw their numerous forms; to her excited fancy they were those of demons.

She saw the glimmer of their polished weapons in the murky light.

Then she screamed faintly, as she saw them all pointed towards herself.

To have moved now without receiving a ghastly wound from one of the many glittering steel points that surrounded her would have been an impossibility.

A mocking laugh arose from the shadowy throng of Mohawks as they beheld her frantic terror.

"Mohawks!" they cried, with one voice, and in such lusty tones, that they made the whole place ring again.

"Mohawks! Hurrah for the Mohawks of London! Hurrah! hurrah! Up, wench! What brings you abroad at such an hour?"

The last words were spoken by one who pressed more closely than the others to the trembling form of the poor girl.

"Why, boys," he said, "she is young, and, as well as I can tell in the dark, has a pretty face."

This speech produced a general movement among the rest. Lowering their swords, they crowded round her, all eager to catch a glimpse of her countenance.

"Mercy! have mercy upon me!" moaned Bess, faintly; "let me go, gentlemen, I implore you! Mercy, mercy! Help! help!"

It would seem as though her prayer had touched their hearts, and that they were about to accede to it, for they drew back a pace or two.

Making a great and almost superhuman effort, Edgworth Bess struggled to her feet.

She brushed her long, black, waving hair away from her face, then, clasping her hands beseechingly, gazed upon the spectral-like forms around her.

"Let me go," she said, "pray let me go! Have mercy on me, gentlemen, have mercy! I am only a poor, friendless girl, so you ought to feel some compassion for my state. Pray, let me go!"

But no heed was paid to what she said. One and all were occupied in gazing upon her, for they could not fail to perceive the beauty of her face and form.

Poor Bess turned her eyes from one to another, but there was not a single countenance whose expression gave her room to hope.

In one part of the ring, however, she saw a small opening, and in obedience to the powerful impulse to escape, she made a sudden and unexpected rush in that direction, and strove to get through.

So rapidly was the action performed that she almost succeeded in her design.

In fact, she did get through.

But she was bewildered, and consequently unable to take as much advantage of her success as she might have done.

With the greatest apparent ease, one of the band of Mohawks, who was tall and lithe of limb, sprang past her.

Then, turning round suddenly in advance of her, he held out his sword before him, thus effectually arresting her further progress.

Another moment, and the troop of young men, who were scars upon the face of humanity, stood around her. Shoulder to shoulder, in one unbroken circle they stood.

Each held his polished rapier in his grasp in such a manner that as they stood and projected the weapons before them, the points formed a ring about eighteen inches in diameter.

The extreme points of the swords were actually in contact with each other.

In the centre, and half-dead with terror, yet not daring to move in the least degree, stood poor, persecuted Edgworth Bess.

Upon the faces of each one of her tormentors was a fiend-like smile.

But they were more silent now.

For full two minutes did she remain in this horrible position, and then one spoke.

"More sport," he said, "more sport! Prick her with the swords! That's it! Look! Bravo! Capital! capital!"

As he spoke, this brute in human form lunged slightly with his sword.

A scream of agony came from the girl's lips as she felt the steel enter the skin, though it did not go deep enough to inflict a serious wound.

"Hurrah!" cried the rest, as they followed the example of their companion.

CHAPTER XCV.

BLUESKIN MEDITATES A DESPERATE UNDERTAKING, WHICH HAS NOTHING BUT BOLDNESS TO RECOMMEND IT.

FATIGUE procured Blueskin several hours' sound sleep, despite the deep anxiety of his mind.

This circumstance was fortunate, for unless he thoroughly recruited himself, what chance would he have with so powerful an enemy as Jonathan Wild?

The latter part of the day, however—that is to say, from noon till dark—seemed to pass with great slowness, for he deemed it injudicious to show himself by daylight.

Jonathan Wild was under the impression that he was no more, and things might so turn out as to make it advisable for him to continue so.

In obedience to his wishes, the landlord had started off to London to purchase him a disguise, and with the aid of which Blake trusted to keep Wild in ignorance of his existence, while, at the same time, he should be able to make inquiries as to the fate of Jack Sheppard and Edgworth Bess.

At about eight o'clock, however, by which time it was quite dark, being fully equipped, he had his horse saddled and brought round to the front door of the inn.

Not his most intimate acquaintance would have recognised him as he mounted.

Yet he did not carry with him an appearance of being disguised. On the contrary, any one would have taken it to be his natural character.

His ordinary attire had been exchanged for one that suited his tall and well-built form most admirably.

It was one best calculated to show off the proportions of the human frame, and in its style about as picturesque as could be well imagined.

To-day such a costume would attract a very great deal of notice, but then, when greater latitude was allowed in dress, it was thought nothing of, though many of the fairer sex might have been induced to look twice at its wearer.

A few lines will serve to give the reader an idea of it.

We will begin with his head, upon which he wore a light flaxen peruke, very tastefully arranged, and terminating in a queue, or tail, which hung down on to his back, and was secured at the extremity by a bow of black silk ribbon.

This was surmounted by a black felt hat, turned up at the brim, and edged with a narrow border of gold lace.

His coat, which was of marone-coloured velvet, fitted closely to his form, and was likewise trimmed with gold lace, but of a wider description and more elaborate pattern than that round the rim of his hat.

The sleeves at the upper part near the shoulders fitted tightly, but they gradually widened to the wrist, where they were turned back, so as to form a cuff, which was so deep as almost to reach the elbow.

Below these cuffs were some spotlessly white lace ruffles, which, when the hand was held downwards, fell over and concealed even the tips of the fingers.

Then the waistcoat which was almost as large as coats are now-a-days, was of bright amber-coloured satin, and came quite over the hips.

It was buttoned closely from the top—just allowing a white lace neckcloth to be visible—until within about four buttons from the bottom. The edges were very prettily embroidered with black silk, and had an appearance of great richness.

Then below the waistcoat appeared small clothes of white leather, similar to those worn by the Horse Guards at the present day. His highly-polished riding-boots, too, were like theirs, except that they did not come quite so high up above the knee.

A richly-mounted sword, with a glittering hilt, completed his costume.

If the foregoing description conveys a clear idea to the reader's mind, he will not fail to perceive that his exterior was aristocratic and imposing to a degree. He would, in fact, be taken for one of those young bloods who haunted the fashionable quarter of the metropolis.

Blueskin was an accomplished rider, and the manner in which he mounted and fixed himself firmly in the seat, would have been sufficient to convince any one of it.

In this position, too, he was seen to the greatest advantage, and the landlord gazed upon him admiringly. His horse was well rested, and obeyed the impulse forward which he gave it with the utmost willingness.

There is one thing we almost forgot to mention, and that is the peculiar appearance of his countenance, which would have enabled any one who had once seen him to recognise him.

But Blake himself had not forgotten it. At his request the landlord had brought him a box of cosmetic preparation, with which he had covered his face, and obliterated all traces of the dusky blue tinge which it wore.

So artfully, too, and cleverly was this done, that except upon a very close inspection, it could not possibly be perceived.

Recognition, he felt sure, provided he took ordinary care would be impossible.

And certainly no disguise could be better calculated to deceive Jonathan Wild. Supposing he should find his body had disappeared from the turret-chamber, or learned in any way that his life had been preserved, he would never think of looking for his old associate wearing such a garb.

The only thing he would have to do would be to keep up the character.

The distance to London was but short, and consequently soon performed; but he was careful to go at an easy rate, because by so doing he would be less likely to attract notice.

It gave him the opportunity to think over the best plan to be pursued to gain his ends.

A thousand half-formed schemes flitted before his imagination, yet he could not find one tangible, or that carried with it any reasonable prospect of success.

Jonathan Wild was a difficult man to deal with, and no one was much better acquainted with that fact than he was himself.

He rode as far as the "Saracen's Head," in Skinner-street, without coming to any definite arrangement. To be sure, one scheme haunted his mind more than any other, but it was one that required an inordinate amount of boldness to carry out.

And yet it might, perhaps, stand all the better chance on that very account; for to attempt to foil Wild by over-reaching him in cunning would be simply ridiculous.

The ostler, perceiving Blueskin's very distinguished appearance, received him with the utmost obsequiousness.

Then, having given the man some particular instructions, Blake strolled up Skinner-street, and passed the Old Bailey to Jonathan Wild's house.

It was on the opposite side of the street that he walked. He was thus enabled to get a good view of it.

As usual, no light could be perceived at any one of the windows of the thief-taker's dwelling. To have seen it, one would have thought it uninhabited.

No one appeared to be observing him, but still Blake did not know what unknown eye might be upon him. so he sauntered slowly by the house, and apparently taking no more notice of that one than he did of its neighbours.

And lest even his turning back too soon should provoked suspicion, he walked right on to the corner of St. Martin's-le-Grand.

He paused here listlessly for a moment. and then retraced his steps.

But his caution was superfluous. The hour was an early one, but still very few people indeed were abroad.

In fact, as we have more than once stated in the course of this narrative, nothing but the most urgent necessity would take anyone into the streets after the lamps were lighted, which was the signal for all manner of depredations to begin.

At a still slower pace Blueskin went back. He looked up at the house again, but with the same result.

"I wonder," he muttered, "what I had better do. I shall learn nothing by walking to and fro in front of the house, for I have seen all I can. Are they in there? That is the question I must first have answered. If I know, I should then be able to act. Is Jonathan himself at home, too? I ought to learn that, and, if possible, what have been the occurrences of the past few days. I will go in here, and trust to my disguise being good enough to preserve me from being recognised."

He reached that public-house in Newgate-street as he spoke, which must, from the singularity of its sign, be well known.

It is on the north side of Newgate-street, and nearly facing the stone wall at the end of the prison.

The sign is the "Magpie and Stump."

From its contiguity it was much used by Wild's janizaries—in fact, it was very seldom but that one, if not more of them, were in the house.

In his proper character, Blueskin had been there times out of number, and so he was putting his disguise to a very severe test when he determined to go in there and endeavour to obtain what information he required.

It is more than probable that, if he had stayed to reflect, he would not have entered; but, as it was, no sooner did he frame the resolution than he executed it.

He made his way down the passage until he came to a door, which opened into the front room where the company usually assembled.

A fire that was smouldering in the grate, and an oil-lamp depending from the ceiling, showed him the inmates.

They were two men, who were seated at a small table on one side of the room, and Flood and Levee, who had placed themselves on a screen which served to keep off the draught of the door.

All looked up as Blake entered, but their attention only rested upon him for a moment.

In fact, they gave merely a casual glance, as anyone would do upon a new-comer entering an apartment in which they sat.

He was glad to see they did not recognise him.

He crossed the room and sat down on the window seat, and called for something to drink.

In doing this he took care to assume the swaggering air which the wearer of such a dress as his was would assume.

While he did it he took care to fix his eyes upon his two old companions, and note the effect it had upon them.

Something in the tones appeared to reach their ears with a familiar sound, for they looked up quickly and inquisitively.

But they took no further notice.

As he sat upon the window-seat, Blake found he could, by drawing aside the curtain a little way, look out into the street.

The door of the thief-taker's abode was nearly opposite to him, but although it was in deep shadow, he was certain, so long as he remained where he was, no one could either go in or out of it without his knowledge.

So he sat there, and watched.

CHAPTER XCVI.

JONATHAN WILD RETURNS TO HIS HOME AT A RATHER CRITICAL AND EXCITING MOMENT.

HAD anyone asked Blueskin for what it was he watched, or what benefit he would obtain by so doing, he would have been at a loss for a reply.

The fact was, it was more in obedience to a sudden impulse than anything else that he had entered the place at all, and when he was there, and sat looking out of the window, it was more in a listless sort of way than anything else, and all the while he was revolving in his brain what would be his best course of action.

How long he thus sat he knew not, but he was suddenly aroused by perceiving the door of Jonathan Wild's house thrown open.

The lamp in the hall cast a beam of light on to the roadway, and revealed two figures standing on the doorstep.

One was the man on the lock, who was holding the door open.

The other was Jonathan Wild.

There could be no doubt of that. The outlines of his figure were well and sharply defined by the bright light behind him, and Blueskin was too well acquainted with his looks to fall into any mistake.

He let the blind fall, allowing himself only the smallest crevice to peep through.

Wild's eyes, he knew, were preternaturally keen, and seeing some one watching might in a moment have made him suspicious that something unusual was going on.

Still he did not lose sight of his object.

It would seem that Jonathan addressed some words to the man on the lock, and then he descended the steps into the street.

The door was closed.

In the darkness he could hardly distinguish the burly form of the thief-taker, but by not removing his eyes from him he managed to do so.

Wild went in the direction of the Old Bailey, but at the corner he stopped and hailed a hackney-coach.

In a minute more he entered it, and was driven off.

This little incident filled Blueskin with thought.

Where Jonathan might have gone, or what was the business upon which he was engaged, did not occupy him for a minute. That would have been fruitless speculation.

It had the effect of determining him to attempt to carry out a plan, the details of which he had been settling in his mind.

It was bold and daring in the extreme, and that was all that could be said of it, without we add the word rash.

Yet it was one that had some prospect of success, and after Wild's departure, the more he reflected, the more decided he became to carry it out.

Levee and Flood were seated just as they were when he came in, and there did not seem to be any symptom of their quitting their present quarters for some time to come.

He waited a minute, and then rose.

The reckoning he had already paid, so he had nothing to do but to walk out.

On reaching the street, he again looked up at Wild's house.

"It is a desperate chance," he said, "but it shall be tried, at all events. I can see no other means by which I can ascertain the fates of those for whose sakes alone I care to live."

He crossed over as he spoke.

What he was about to do we shall quickly see, but we will venture to assert that it will surprise the reader.

Springing up the steps before the door, he seized the knocker with his right hand, and knocked furiously.

A gentle summons, he knew, would meet with no attention. The door was quickly opened.

But Blueskin was in readiness for action.

With one well-directed and terrific blow of his clenched fist, he laid the man prostrate.

So suddenly, too, was the deed performed, that it created no alarm, and before the man at the grating had recovered from his astonishment, Blake had closed the door, properly secured it, and sprang forward and clutched him by the throat in such a manner, that he had scarcely power to gasp for breath, let alone call out for assistance.

A moment's continuation of the pressure, and the man turned black in the face, and then fell backwards, either insensible, or dead.

It was now time for Blueskin to turn his attention to the man he had knocked down, and who, by various movements, showed that he was fast recovering his senses.

He must be speedy, too, in what he was going to do, for before long some one would be sure to come down to the hall, though he had calculated that about that time in the evening it would be deserted by all but the two men on guard.

With great dexterity he stripped off Arnold's neck-cloth—for he it was he had knocked down—and twisting it up in the fashion of a rope, placed it in his mouth, and then tied it tightly at the back of his head.

The stout leathern belt, from which his hanger was suspended, served as a means of fastening his arms behind his back, and then he was quite helpless, either to cry out or move.

This done, Blueskin, with all the speed he could make, hurried to the man who had charge of the iron-grated door leading to the cells.

No signs of returning animation, however, were there.

Stooping down, he felt about his person for his keys, and as he knew exactly where to look, he quickly possessed himself of them.

To open the grating took him but a moment.

The stone staircase was beyond.

Lifting his foot, he, with one kick, sent the unfortunate man rolling down it.

He fell against the door at the bottom with a crash.

He was hardly there, however, before Blueskin was himself.

The key of this door he had ready in his hand, and thrusting it into the keyhole, he shot the bolt back.

To one so familiar with the intricacies of the place as Blueskin was, the task of searching the whole thoroughly was by no means a matter of difficulty.

The bunch of keys he held would, he knew, open every door there was, and so, one after another, he flung them back.

At each one he called out the names of Jack and Edgeworth Bess, but although he tried down all one side of the corridor, not one of the cells did he find tenanted.

Crossing over, he began the other way, for the secret door, leading to the other cells he resolved to leave till afterwards.

The second he came to was occupied by some one, but it was neither of those he sought.

He cast but one glance upon this person, for he had no time, nor had he inclination, to ask questions or lose precious time.

His life, he knew, depended upon his speed, for that the state of things in the hall above could continue for any length of time without discovery by some one, was impossible.

Three more doors were opened fruitlessly, and then he came to the cell in which Steggs was confined, though, of course, he knew it not.

Looking very much the worse for his sojourn in that dark, pestiferous place, the villain who had been the means of causing Edgeworth Bess so much trouble, came forth.

Blueskin recognised him instantly, and an angry look shot from his eyes.

But he smothered his resentment, and went on with his task.

Steggs, however, did not remember to have ever seen the handsome cavalier who unlocked his prison-door, but he noticed his angry glance, and his coward heart sank within him.

He cowered down upon the cold flagstones in the corridor, and crawled along abjectly after his deliverer, entreating him to spare his life; but Blueskin was by far too intent upon the business he had in hand to pay any heed to him.

As the reader is aware, his search was a vain one, for both Jack Sheppard and Edgeworth Bess had left the house.

Convinced that they were not in the outer cells, he ran to the secret door, opened it, passed through, and searched them, but with the same result.

A groan came from his lips, when he assured himself that they really were neither of them there.

In fact, so far did his feelings overcome him, that he was obliged to cling to the doorpost for a moment or so to keep himself from falling.

But, mastering himself by a great effort, he strove to think what he had better do.

His worst forebodings were confirmed.

"It will be vain to search further," he said. "Jonathan has either destroyed them, or hidden them in some place where it will be impossible for me to find them. Curses on his caution!"

"Spare me!" said Steggs, in louder and more supplicating tones, for, having overheard Blake's words, he gathered he was an enemy of Wild's. "Spare me! Let me go free from this place, and I will bless you. Time back, before I became the tenant of that frightful dungeon, I was an evil man, and ready to commit any deed, however desperate. But all that is altered now. Spare me!"

"Spare me, too!" said another voice, which came from the man he had first released. "Spare me, and I too will bless you, and do all I can to serve you."

"Stand aside, then," exclaimed Blueskin, "and let me pass, or I shall be a companion in your captivity. You can follow me if you choose. I should not think of hindering you, but you will most likely find that you will have to fight your way to freedom."

"We will do that—we will do that!" they cried, as they rose to their feet; and having allowed Blake to pass them, they followed him along the corridor in the direction of its exit.

Had Blueskin only been in possession of the secret means of leaving Wild's house at the back, and making his way through the old market, all would have been easy, and he would have escaped a frightful danger.

But he did not know of it.

Grasping his sword firmly by the hilt, and holding in his left hand a double-barrelled pistol, he ran up the steps to the iron grating.

Ere, however, he reached the top, he heard a well-known sound.

It was a key rattling in the lock.

He felt that a crisis had now arrived.

Discovery was inevitable, for it was Jonathan Wild himself who was seeking an entrance to his own domicile.

CHAPTER XXVII.

JACK SHEPPARD PRACTISES A SUCCESSFUL MANŒUVRE, WHICH RESULTS IN WILKINSON'S TOTAL DISCOMFITURE.

DESPITE the perilous position in which our friend Blueskin is placed, on the staircase leading to the cells, we shall be obliged to leave him for a short time, while we devote a portion of our attention to the consideration of the fortunes of one of the chief actors in the story, and who has not for some time appeared in our pages.

The reader will guess that the person in question is Jack Sheppard—that strange compound of good and evil—who, it will be remembered, we last saw as he darted round the corner of Warwick-lane, fearful that Wild would alter his mind.

Why he took this direction, his heart alone could tell. It was the street into which he knew Edgworth Bess would emerge when she left the market.

With that remarkable cunning, of which Jonathan possessed so large a quantity, he had allowed him to go free, or rather appeared to do so, from the conviction that he would find Edgworth Bess quicker than anyone else, because he would have a powerful motive to urge him on to make every exertion.

And in this calculation he was most unquestionably correct.

Then, as for Jack himself, notwithstanding the hypocritical sentences he had uttered, his feelings and intentions towards him were still unchanged, and he had, in a manner of speaking, set him about as free as a cat sometimes does a mouse—that is, takes care the prey does not get out of its reach.

So with Wilkinson, who, as the reader knows, he had set to dog Jack's footsteps. His orders were that he should follow him everywhere—not lose sight of him for a moment, but, as frequently as occasion required, or opportunity offered, report his exact whereabouts.

By this means it is easy to see what a tool Jack was made of.

That Jonathan's plan would be crowned with success there seemed every indication. All that was necessary was for Wilkinson to perform his part, and one would have thought that was easy enough.

We shall see how he got on.

As we said, Jack darted round the corner of Warwick-lane, but before he had gone a dozen steps down it, he paused to listen whether any sounds of pursuit reached his ears.

Nothing, however, broke the silence.

He rubbed his head thoughtfully.

"I can't make it out," he said; "I can't make it out at all! What is Jonathan's game? Was he really in earnest in what he said about me? He seemed sincere; besides, why did he let me go free? It is clear he meant to do so, or he would have sent some one after me. I've half a mind to go back and tell him how vexed I am that I left him as I did. No, I won't, though: that will keep till another time, especially as he is a man that does not care much about politeness. I must find Bess. Where can she have gone? Not far, perhaps. She may even be somewhere near the market. I will go and see, for all seems quiet and safe."

Thus speaking, or rather thinking, Jack made his way down the narrow, unsavoury thoroughfare, until he reached the large gateway leading into the market.

Here he waited and listened.

All, however, was as still as the grave.

The place itself was quite empty and deserted, for it was the hour when the latest stayers had gone, and the earliest comers had not arrived.

Finding all so silent, he ventured to raise his voice, and call upon Edgworth Bess—first, only just above a whisper, and then rising in tone until it became a shout.

But the echoing reverberations of his voice was the only response which he obtained.

There was a dull, oppressive feeling of coming ill about his heart, when the fact was forced upon him that the girl he sought was nowhere within hearing of his voice, and he looked up and down the empty street, fearfully and forebodingly.

"Where has she gone?" he cried—"where has she gone? Unknowing her course, or what may have befallen her, what chance have I of finding her again? Oh! if Blueskin had but been spared—if I had him now by my side to advise me and consult with—I should be glad. But such regrets are useless, though I can yet avenge his death. And I will do it, even as he would have avenged mine."

He was silent for a moment.

"But first," he said, "the whole of my energies—the whole of my attention—shall be devoted to the task of finding the poor girl, who has, in so short a period of time seen so much suffering. If ill befalls her, Jonathan Wild, beware! for you shall bitterly rue the day when you took part against her."

The slight accession of passion which he felt, soon passed away, and then he set about the task of searching on the ground, in the hope that by so doing he might discover something that would give him a clue to the route she had taken.

But in the hope of doing this he was disappointed. There was not the smallest object that would serve to guide him anywhere to be seen.

With the conviction pressing upon him that he must trust to chance alone to aid him, he walked slowly and dejectedly towards Paternoster-row.

At Amen-corner he halted.

Two roads lay before him—either of which might have been taken by the object of his search, and both leading in opposite directions.

One was Paternoster-row.

The other Ave-Maria-lane.

He was irresolute.

In her perturbation of mind, he thought it probable enough that she might have taken either of them, without giving it a thought which would be the safest.

"If she considered at all," he said, "she would try to find her way to Drury-lane. The only friends she knows of are there. I will go and see if she has done so."

Having come to this determination, he walked on as far as Ludgate-hill; and, although he knew it not, treading almost in the footsteps of Edgworth Bess.

The clock in St. Paul's cathedral chimed three-quarters past something, but what the hour was, Jack had not an accurate idea.

"She must have gone to Drury-lane!" he repeated, as he turned the corner. "The more I think of it the more certain I feel that that is what she would do. How foolish it was of me to feel so alarmed as I did! It is all right enough! Quite!—What's that?"

A slight sound from somewhere behind him now arrested his attention.

Upon looking back, which he did instantly and instinctively, he saw the dusky figure of a man.

Who it was he had no idea.

"Some late passenger, I suppose," he said, as he continued on his way; "and yet, where did he come from? How is it I did not hear his footstep before?"

These questions aroused a little suspicion in Jack's breast, although the thought that some one had been set to watch him by Wild did not occur to him.

Jack slackened his pace a little, in the hope that whoever it was behind him would pass him; but this was not done, and he soon found his own anxiety and impatience too great for him to loiter.

Accordingly he resumed his wonted pace.

Even as Bess had done about an hour before him, he reached that part of Ludgate-hill where it is divided from Fleet-street by Fleet-market.

Now all about this spot was quite silent, and showed no traces of the presence of those who had hunted the poor girl like some wild animal through the streets.

What has been her fate?

We shudder as we ask the question.

Jack heard the footsteps behind him slowly approach.

"I will cross over," he muttered. "It may be some one who has an object in tracking me, for my escape from Newgate is doubtless by this time pretty widely known. I will cross over, and if he attempts to follow me up Fleet-street, I will dispose of him."

With these words on his lips, Jack crossed the street, and then listened with some eagerness whether the man behind followed him. He did so.

Yet Jack thought it might be the result of accident, and that he should keep straight on was only natural.

Before he took any steps, therefore, to get rid of him, it would be necessary to obtain further evidence that he was actually following in his track.

"I will run," said Jack, "and that as fast as possible. Not only will it take me sooner to my destination, but set all my doubts at rest."

Without delay, Jack set off at a speed that was really surprising.

Wilkinson, who was behind, seeing this sudden movement, and being fearful that his prey would escape him, began to run too, and that at a prodigious rate.

He had, in fact, trained himself to running, and there were very few indeed who could surpass him.

And now Jack, having ascertained that the man behind was really in pursuit of him, resolved to put an end to it, for although he might have distanced him by running, yet he did not desire to try.

Therefore, finding that his pursuer was coming on after him at full-speed, he suddenly dropped down upon his hands and knees in the middle of the path.

It was too dark, and Jack was too far off, for Wilkinson to see the movement; but he heard the sudden cessation of his rapid steps, and so, fearful that he had eluded him in some way or other, rushed blindly on with redoubled speed.

Intent on looking before him, he did not notice the dark form crouching down in his path, and the consequence was, he caught his feet against him.

Over he went in a moment, with his head ploughing the stones, and his heels in the air.

Such, too, was his impetuosity, that he scudded along for several feet before he could stop himself.

Jack Sheppard, in spite of the anxiety that was tugging at his heart, could not forbear a laugh as he witnessed the complete discomfiture of his foe.

He quickly scrambled to his feet.

Then, walking to where Wilkinson lay immovable upon the stones, he kicked him over on to his back.

The light from a contiguous oil-lamp fell upon his face and figure.

"Why, it's Jonathan Wild's man," he said. "What did he want after me?"

CHAPTER XXVII.

JACK SHEPPARD FINDS A TRACE OF POOR BESS WITHOUT KNOWING IT, AND IS ATTACKED BY THE OFFICERS AT THE INN.

THIS was one of those questions which was more easily asked than answered; but nevertheless, it set Jack thinking.

But acute as he generally was, his intellect was not subtle enough to enable him to arrive at a true solution of the affair, though that there was something more in Wild setting him free than could be perceived at a first glance, he felt quite certain.

He stooped down over the form of the prostrate janizary, to ascertain if possible the extent of his injuries, and obtain some information from him.

But Wilkinson's head was not hard enough to stand with impunity such a crack as it had had upon the hard flagstones. He lay like a log of wood.

Finding there was no chance of doing as he desired, and not wishing to delay in reaching the "Black Lion," he rose and left him to his fate.

But the thought occurring to him that he was unarmed, and that circumstances might arise when the possession of weapons would be of the utmost importance to him, he stooped down to ascertain what his foe carried.

In his capacious coat-pockets he found a brace of pistols, primed and loaded.

At his girdle a belt carrying a hanger.

Of these he possessed himself, as well as of a formidable-looking clasp-knife, which had a spring in the back to keep the blade from closing.

The stout oaken cudgel, or bludgeon, he thought it hardly worth while to encumber himself with.

To do all this occupied scarcely two minutes, and he then set off at a run down the street.

Temple-bar was quickly passed, and the open space in the Strand, called Picket-place, in which St. Clement Dane's church is situated, gained.

Keeping the church-railings on his left hand he shaped his course in a straight line to the bottom of Wych-street.

But in his progress he suddenly trod upon something soft and slippery, and although he strived to regain his footing, he was precipitated to the ground.

An execration came from his lips at this untoward incident.

He was soon up again, but in assisting himself to rise, he put his hand into some cold, sticky substance which sent an involuntary shudder through his whole body.

Full of curiosity to know what it was, and yet having a pretty good idea, he held up his hand to look.

Just where he stood there was rather more light than in other places, which may be accounted for by the buildings being further apart from each other than they are in the streets.

The new day was coming, and the sky overhead wore a dull, leaden tinge.

But it shed some faint amount of illumination upon the earth.

Jack looked at his hand.

It was covered with blood.

"Just what I thought," he said; and with his other hand he felt the different parts of his clothes. "I am covered! What will be thought by those whose me? Confound it! what can have been the matter? There's a good quantity of blood upon the ground," he added, as he looked down. "There's been a regular fight, I should think, and half a dozen people bled to death!"

Jack spoke lightly.

How changed would have been the accents of his voice had he but known the real facts of the case—that the spot upon which he then stood was where Edgworth Bess had been hemmed in by the Mohawks not an hour before.

Perhaps it was as well that he was spared that knowledge for the present, or it would assuredly have driven him mad.

And yet some mysterious influence seemed to be at work—one of those presentiments of coming evil, which all of us must more than once have experienced, overshadowed his soul.

It was in vain he tried to struggle against the feeling. So far from dissipating it, all he seemed to do was to make its proportions more terrifying and gigantic.

Three minutes now, however, at the most, and he would know the worst.

Gladly would he have ran along Wych-street, but his agitation was too great, and his heart palpitated too quickly for him to be able to do so.

Then he reached the house in which, although he knew it not, the happiest days of his life had been spent.

It was that of his master, John Roots.

Never since that night when he was first introduced to the readers of this narrative, standing in the street, with clenched hands and heaving breast, pouring out maledictions upon his master, had he passed this spot, and now it was not possible for him to do so without emotion.

Anger yet burned fiercely in his breast as he thought of his real and imaginary wrongs, but he did not stay to give them utterance.

He hurried on.

The door of the "Black Lion" was reached.

It was open and the shutters were down, but there came from within no sounds of drunken merriment or quarrel such as might be heard in any one of the twenty-four hours.

All was silent and deserted.

The stillness of the place, and the different aspect which it wore from what it had upon the other occasions when he had seen it, increased Jack's agitation, and he was forced to cling to the door-post for support.

But recovering himself by an almost superhuman effort, he staggered in.

He pushed open the swinging half-glass door which was hung a few feet inside the passage.

The inside of the house looked dark and dreary.

No living person was in sight.

He had all the inclination to call for some one, but his tongue refused to obey the mandate of his will.

Well acquainted with the road as he was, he did not experience any difficulty, although it was so dark, in making his way into the kitchen where he had received an avowal of love from the young girl whose champion he had so strangely become.

No one was there.

In fact, that happened to be just the time when the least business was doing at the inn—that hour indeed, when London in all respects resembles a city of the dead.

A footstep, however, soon disturbed the silence of the place, and Jack waited anxiously for it to approach.

That it was nearing the kitchen he felt confident.

He leant back against one of the tables, and clutched its edges nervously with both hands.

A fire still burned in the grate, and diffused a faint, ruddy light around it, and by the aid of this he saw entered the kitchen a strange apology for a human being in the shape of a servant.

Dirty and ragged, with her eyes more than half-closed with sleep, she tottered in.

She was maid-of-all-work to the establishment.

Jack spoke.

One would have thought that the unexpected sound of a human voice would have startled her sensibilities, but, alas! that it should be so, she had no sensibilities to startle.

With an anxiety of which none of the readers of this history can conceive an adequate idea, Jack asked this benighted being questions the answers to which would either set all his doubts at rest, and send a shrill of unutterable delight through his whole body, or fill him with horror, despair, and anguish.

He fairly groaned aloud when he was assured that the poor, prosecuted girl had most certainly not arrived, nor been seen by any one about the place since the occasion of her last mysterious leaving of it.

"Where is Johnson?" Jack gasped, at length.

"Where is he? I must see him. Where is he?"

"A-bed!" said the servant, gruffly; "and I vallys my 'ed more 'n to go and wake him."

"I will go," said Jack. "Show me his room. Where is it?"

But before the servant could reply, there was a sudden rush of footsteps in the passage.

Jack's eyes had grown familiar to the semi-darkness in the place, and a glance showed him that those who had entered so hastily were police-officers.

Then his eyes were dazzled by the broad, bright beam of light, which issued through the lens of a dark lantern, which was carried by one of them.

"That's him," cried a voice, immediately. "Hurrah! we have him safe enough. There he is!"

The men, who were in number about a dozen, precipitated themselves into the room as they spoke, and almost before Jack could recover from his surprise at their first appearance.

But recovering himself instantaneously, he drew the brace of pistols he had taken from Wilkinson's pocket, and, pointing them at the throng of officers, commanded them to draw back.

At the same time he retreated further into the kitchen, with the firm resolution of selling his life dearly, and of not allowing himself to be captured alive.

The officers completely blocked up the doorway of the kitchen, so it was impossible for him to think of making his escape from them that way.

The police themselves hesitated a little when they saw Jack's determined behaviour, and he took advantage of it to adroitly place a table between himself and them.

It was but a poor barrier, it is true, but still it was better than nothing.

The hesitation of the officers, however, was but momentary. One, who appeared to be in command of the rest, gave the word for them to rush forward and secure their prisoner.

They obeyed, and rushed forward in a compact body, strong enough to carry all before it.

The table behind which Jack had intrenched himself was overturned.

Then two shots were fired.

The report of the pistols rang out with great effect in the confined space.

The place was filled with smoke, blue and pungent, which much increased the difficulty of perceiving objects.

Some curses and groans arose, which showed that the pistols had not been discharged without doing execution.

Two of the officers had, in fact, been hit, and severely wounded.

The remainder dispersed themselves about the kitchen, searching into all the corners they could find with the blades of their cutlasses, and flashing their lanterns about them.

But Jack Sheppard had disappeared.

CHAPTER XCIX.

THE POOR WIDOW WOMAN ASSISTS JACK TO CONCEAL HIMSELF FROM HIS FOES.

At the moment the officer in command gave the order for the others to charge, Jack drew back from the table, and turning round, made his way across the kitchen to where he knew the stairs were situated.

The only chance he had of escape was to mount them before the officers were aware of it, and this, under the cover of the darkness, he was able to do.

To better conceal his retreat, he had hastily aimed his pistols at the police, and pulled the triggers; then without waiting an instant, opened the door at the foot of the staircase, and having closed it after him as silently as he could, bounded up.

Everything now would depend upon the rapidity of his movements, for he did not anticipate that the police could be long in ignorance of the way he had gone.

In fact, ere he had well reached the first landing a loud cry from those below made him aware they already suspected the means by which he had made his exit.

Fain would he have called upon Johnson for assistance, and which he made no doubt he would have been well able to afford him.

But to have cried out would have been to point to his whereabouts and entail discovery, so he was altogether thrown upon his own resources.

His situation was a critical and perilous one, indeed, for though there might be many hiding-places in the building, yet he was not in a position to turn them to any advantage.

He had never made an examination of the upper part of the house—had, in fact, never visited it except upon one occasion, and there was no knowing how soon he might run into a corner, and be unable to escape.

That risk—and a fearful one it was, he would have to run, and trust to good luck to befriend him.

As his foes were so close behind him, he did not pause upon the first landing, but ran up the second flight of stairs.

At the top were several doors.

Without waiting to make choice of any, Jack put his hand upon the handle of the first he came to.

It yielded, and he stepped inside a room.

[BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD LAYING IN AMBUSH FOR THE TRAVELLERS.]

All was profoundly dark, but a faint, smothered cry from some one reached his ears.

"Silence, if you value your life," he said, in suppressed tones, but yet such as showed how terribly he was in earnest. "Silence, for your life."

He hastily, but silently, closed the door as he spoke.

Then he ran his hand down the edge of it, to try and find a fastening of some kind, but he could not.

"Who is it?" said a voice, from one corner of the room. "Speak again. Who are you?"

The voice was evidently feminine.

"One who stands in danger of his life," replied Jack, crossing the room in the direction of the sound. "Save me from my pursuers. Hark! do you hear their footsteps? In another moment they will be here."

The clatter which the officers made in ascending the stairs fully testified to the truth of Jack's words.

"Who are you, then?" said the voice again. "What do you want with me?"

"To save me!"

"How?"

"Show me some place in this room where I may conceal myself, and if you are asked whether you have seen me say no."

"There is nowhere," said the voice again. "Tell me who you are; I seem to know your voice."

"Never mind who I am," said Jack; "there is no time to talk about that. Where can I hide? Quick! In another moment they will be at the door."

"I am a poor, lone widow," said the voice, which Jack had found came from a woman, who was sleeping in a wretched bed. "I can do nothing for you, or I would, with all my heart."

Jack heard the sounds of weeping.

"Where can I conceal myself?" he asked. "Are you sure you know of no place? Will you try to save me, or will you see me slain before your eyes, for I am determined not to surrender myself alive."

"Alas—alas!" replied the woman. "I know of no way to serve you, or else I would gladly do so. Ah! they are here!"

The officers of police reached the door at that moment. "It is the only chance I have," said Jack. "Are you alone?"

"Quite."

"I must get into bed with you, and you must conceal me as well as you can with the clothes. When my foes enter, you must tell them you have not seen me. There is no time to delay or expostulate. Allow me to do as I say, or else you will be my murderess."

More dead than alive, the poor woman, who could tell Jack was young, and who possessed a gentle heart, suffered him to do as he had said, though, for her own part, she did not think the place would answer his purpose.

With great speed Jack got beneath the clothes.

The bedstead was placed against the wall, and it was towards that that he got, screwing himself up into as small a compass as he possibly could.

He had just time to whisper a last injunction to the woman, who was trembling in every limb, when the door was violently thrown open, and the officers rushed into the room.

By this time they had all provided themselves with lanterns, or nearly so, and therefore they were able to see, with tolerable distinctness, all about the wretched chamber.

The fright which the poor woman displayed, and the tears she shed, were ascribed to the alarm which she would naturally feel upon the sudden irruption of a number of armed men.

In a stern tone of voice the commanding officer asked her whether she had seen or heard any one enter the room, and to the question she returned, in a trembling voice, a negative reply.

The whole of the place was rapidly, but rigidly searched. Of course, as they did not look where he lay concealed, it was fruitless.

Poor Jack was almost stifled, but still he did not dare to move to get a little air, for fear of betraying his hiding-place.

The woman, who must have been a kind-hearted creature, did all she could to conceal him.

In this she succeeded, for, in a few minutes, the officers withdrew, feeling assured that he was not in that room at least.

To prevent his entering it, however, and their so having their search for nothing, one of their number was placed as a sentinel on the landing outside the door.

As soon as he found the last had departed, Jack left his place of concealment, and drew a long breath at the narrow escape he had had.

He did not dare to whisper even to the woman, for fear that the sound should reach the ears of the man outside.

In silence, therefore—and the pair of them listening to all the various sounds which disturbed the house—they sat upon the edge of the bed.

The tears still flowed from the eyes of the poor widow, for she felt a woman's terror for the dangerous position in which Jack was placed.

Both thought the search would never end.

At length, however, the men could be heard descending the staircase, slowly, and as if baffled in their object.

"Thank heaven," said the woman, as the echo of the last footstep died away, "thank heaven! you are saved."

"Say, rather, thank you," replied Jack, "for had you not acted as you did, I should now have been with the dead. I shall be ever grateful to you."

"Do not mention it. What I did was done willingly enough, goodness knows. There was something about your voice which seemed to remind me of my poor son. But you cannot be him, for he was hung at Tyburn two years ago."

"At Tyburn?"

"Yes, but do not think he deserved that death. It was Jonathan Wild who swore to bring him there, and he kept his oath."

"Jonathan Wild?" repeated Jack, while a most uncomfortable feeling crept over him, as he thought that Jonathan had sworn he should share a similar fate; "he is my foe."

"Does he hunt you?" asked the widow, eagerly.

"Even so."

"Then I pity you. You are young, and it is always hard for the young to die; but you will before you are many weeks older. The enemies of Jonathan Wild never live."

"I despise him," said Jack, assuming a defiant air which he was far from feeling. "I have too much to live for to die yet. I live, as well, in hopes of defeating him in his most cherished schemes. He is a villain. The blood of my dearest friend calls upon me for vengeance. Let him beware, for I will have it to the full!"

"Lost—lost!" moaned the poor woman. "As it was with you, so it was even with my son; but he perished—yes, he perished—and Jonathan Wild triumphed."

"Hush!" said Jack, "do not speak so loud, for fear we should be overheard. Listen to me. For what you have done to save me I feel deeply grateful; in what way can I serve you?"

"I wish for no reward."

"But you shall have it," said Jack. "Money must be of service to you. I have none now, but I soon shall have. Let me know your name, in order that when I come again I may inquire for you."

"I do not wish to be rewarded further for what I have done than I already am."

"But I insist upon it. What is your name?"

"Lawrence," replied the poor widow.

"Enough," said Jack. "The room gets lighter every moment. Slip on your clothes and run down stairs, and ascertain whether the officers have left the premises. You can go down without attracting suspicion. Above all, try to see Johnson, and let him know where I am, and he will then devise some means of getting me away."

In obedience to his words the woman hastily huddled on the few rags which served her for clothing, and then stole down the staircase.

CHAPTER C.

JACK SHEPPARD'S PERPLEXITIES AT THE "BLACK LION" INCREASE.

EAGERLY, most eagerly, did Jack Sheppard listen until he heard the last faint sounds of the widow's retreating footsteps.

Then, as he sat upon the bedside, he rested his head in his hands and thought.

Thought of his friend Blueskin, who, as the reader is aware, he imagined to be dead.

Thought of the poor persecuted girl, to whom his heart clung so closely, and for whom alone he only cared to live.

Thought of his own dangerous situation, his inability to aid her, his own crimes and unworthiness.

Thought, too, last of all, with deep hatred at his heart, of the arch villain, Jonathan Wild, by whose infernal machinations most of this had been brought about.

And as he took a mental review of the past, and speculated upon the future, he grew almost frantic.

So absorbed was he, that he did not hear the woman ascend the stairs. It was the opening of the door that aroused him.

He sprang to his feet, but the woman called to him to be quiet.

Then, going to the window, she drew aside the apology for a curtain which covered it, and allowed what light there was outside to penetrate the chamber.

The dawn of the new day had fairly come, and a dull, cold, gray, misty twilight filled the room.

But it was sufficient to enable the occupants to separate the different objects in it, and distinguish their own outlines.

Jack crept close to her.

As she was standing near the window he was able to note the expression of her features.

So far as he was able to tell, she seemed to be a woman of about fifty years of age, though it is probable that care and want had made her look prematurely old.

Her face was very thin, and of that ghastly sallow hue so often seen upon the countenances of the inhabitants of the more densely populated portions of the metropolis.

Her hair was thin and scanty; gray in colour, and now in a most dishevelled state.

Her clothes, and the manner in which they hung about her person, as well as, in fact, her whole appearance, betokened extreme poverty.

All these particulars Jack was able to take in at a glance.

"Have they gone?" he asked, scarcely raising his voice above a whisper.

A shake of the head was the reply.

"And Jokason; have you spoken to him?"

"I have."

"And without exciting suspicion?"

"Yes."

"And what did he say when you told him I was here?"

"Expressed no surprise, but merely said that you must be content to remain for the present where you now are, and then he would see what he could do for you."

"I must be satisfied with that assurance, I suppose."

"You must."

"And what about the officers?"

"They are one and all firmly of opinion that you are concealed somewhere in the house."

"Indeed."

"Yes, they say it is impossible that you could have left it, and they are determined to find out your hiding-place."

"Are they below?"

"Some are, I think; but not all."

"The remainder, I suppose, are stationed outside?"

"I do not know."

"Curses upon them!" said Jack, bitterly; "to be cooped up here is almost worse than captivity or death. Events of the greatest moment call for my immediate attention. If I stay here I shall go mad."

"Calm yourself," said the widow, gently, "and bear your confinement as patiently as you can. It must surely be better for you to be confined here than in Newgate!"

"No—not so! I should know the worst, then; and now I shall be in a continuous dread. What will become of her? Where is she now? Without a strong arm to protect her, not many hours will elapse before she falls again into the hands of her enemies. It will kill me to stay here."

The poor woman looked with great surprise at Jack as he uttered these words. She could not comprehend them.

"Is there no means by which I can leave this place?" said Jack, after a brief pause.

"None, without the risk of capture and detection."

"Show me the way," said Jack, "and I will dare all that may happen. To remain here is utterly impossible!"

He went to the window as he spoke, and looked out.

It overlooked a small yard at the rear of the inn, but the buildings round about were either too high up or too low down for them to be at all available to him.

"You cannot get out that way!" said the widow, "let me persuade you to wait until Johnson comes. It may not be long before he is here, and doubtless he will be able to suggest a means by which you can be free."

"I will," said Jack, throwing himself upon the bed, "but it will be no easy matter to curb my impatience until he comes. Not that I think I could get far away, for the whole neighbourhood is doubtless well watched."

"You are the best judge of that, but if Jonathan Wild is your enemy, it is in vain for you to struggle against your fate."

"But those were not Jonathan's men who came after me," cried Jack; "I did not think of that before, but I am sure they are not."

"That I don't know. Hark!"

"What?"

"Do you not hear?"

"No; what is it?"

"A footstep!"

"On the stairs?"

"Yes, quick, quick! Hide yourself, or you are lost. Conceal yourself under the clothes as well as you are able, and I will answer for your not being here."

The sound of some one ascending the stairs now came with very great plainness to Jack's ears.

As quickly as he could, he hastened to the bed, and hid himself beneath the clothes, which were piled upon it in a disordered heap.

Nearer and nearer came the footstep.

It was evidently a man's.

The widow's heart beat even more painfully and anxiously than Jack's did as she heard the step approach.

And yet, had it not been for the peculiar circumstances, she would have thought nothing of it. The house was occupied by several families, and of course there was much going up and down stairs. At any rate, it could scarcely be said that it boded any special danger to Jack.

When the step, however, paused at her door, and the latch lifted, the widow was ready to swoon.

Jack's very artificial hiding-place would surely not escape discovery.

But when the door opened a little way, and the form of Johnson, the landlord, appeared, no words could describe the revulsion of feeling which she experienced.

Gliding in stealthily, he closed the door behind him.

"Where is Jack, Mrs. Lawrence?" he asked, in a whisper.

"In the bed."

Hearing the sound of their voices in conversation, Jack ventured to look up.

Upon seeing who it was, he bounded from the bed.

"Get me out of this, Johnson," he cried. "To stay here will be worse than death. Show me a means by which I can escape."

"Gently, gently," rejoined Johnson. "Do not be quite so fast. You will find it a very difficult matter to get away from here."

"Why?"

"The officers are in force, and they are firmly possessed with the idea that you are hidden somewhere in the building, and they are only waiting for the day to come in order to make a thorough search."

"But they are not Jonathan Wild's men, are they?"

"No, not one of them. They all come direct from Newgate. There's none of them know how you managed to escape. How was it?"

"I must defer telling you that until I have a better opportunity. At present I must get you to devote all your thoughts to getting me away from here."

"That, then, you may as well know first as last is impossible."

"Impossible?"

"Yes."

"You would have said that, I expect, if you had been in my place in Newgate."

"Perhaps I should. But do you happen to know that the whole of the neighbourhood is closely watched by the police, and that you would never be able to leave unseen?"

"But what am I to do?"

"I can only propose one thing."

"And what is that?"

"To conceal you somewhere in the inn, where it would be next to an impossibility for them to find you."

"Can you do this?"

"I think so."

"But how long should I have to remain there?"

"Until it was safe for you to leave, of course."

"But, Johnson, look here. You remember Edgworth Bess?"

"To be sure I do. Would it be possible for any one, who has once known her, to forget her?"

"I think not. But seriously, my friend, when did you see her last?"

"You alarm me, Jack. What has happened? Surely she is in no danger. Speak."

"When did you see her last?"

"Why, when you and her and Blueskin went through the cellars to my other crib in White Hart-street."

"Then you have not seen her to-night?"

"To-night! no. What made you think I should?"

"I will tell you."

Jack then proceeded to relate all that had happened since the occasion the landlord spoke of; but as the reader is already in possession of the fullest details respecting those events, it is unnecessary to give the narration in Jack's own words.

The countenance of Johnson exhibited an expression of the greatest alarm and uneasiness when he learned the disappearance of Edgworth Bess. During the time she had been under his roof, short though it was, the amiability and cheerfulness of her disposition had endeared her to him in a greater degree than one would have imagined, considering the character of the man, and that he was one to whom the kindlier and gentler feelings of our nature are strangers.

"Now, Johnson," said Jack, as he finished, "I appeal to you. What am I to do? Blueskin, the friend who always saw the best way out of danger, is, as I have told you, no more. Therefore, I ask you, what am I to do?"

CHAPTER CI.

JOHNSON, THE LANDLORD, SHOWS JACK SHEPPARD A CUNNINGLY-CONSTRUCTED HIDING-PLACE IN THE STAIRS.

JOHNSON shook his head.

"I wish I could tell you what would be your best course of action," he said; "but, if you will believe me, I feel fairly at a loss."

"I must get away from here."

"I don't doubt that would be the best, but then you should consider"—

"I do."

"How do you propose to act, yourself? If you have already determined, it is useless for me to suggest anything."

"Forgive me, Johnson; I should not have spoken as I did. I have no plan, but only a desire, and that is to get away from here."

"That is only natural, but yet utter madness. What good would it do for you to throw yourself into the arms of the Philistines? Rest assured, if you do, they will not let you go again. Then let me ask you, suppose you are put in Newgate, what chance will you have of aiding the poor girl then? and that she stands in need of your succour I feel confident."

"It is that which maddens me."

"Hush!" said Johnson: "calm yourself, or you will be heard by those below. I must begone, too, or my long absence may excite remark, if not suspicion. Be still!"

Jack sank back upon the bed from which he had risen.

"Believe me," continued the landlord, "that in the present awkward posture of affairs, the best and only thing you can do is to consent to the course which I at first proposed. It is the only one that presents any reasonable prospect of success."

"And that is, to remain hidden here?"

"Exactly. You may not have to stay more than an hour or two, who knows? Perhaps not even so long."

"And perhaps three days."

"You must stand your chance of that; better endure captivity voluntarily than against your will."

"And to where do you propose to lead me?"

"That I will tell you shortly. Stay where you are a moment, while I go and see whether the coast is clear."

As he uttered these words, Johnson went towards the room door, and, opening it a little way, put his head out and listened.

The day was now coming fast, and as it was only for this that the officers waited, their renewed search might be looked for every moment.

All was silent in the direction of the staircase, so Johnson beckoned Jack towards him.

But before the latter obeyed the summons, he whispered in the ear of the widow, who had been of such essential service to him, a renewal of the promise he had made. To testify how deeply he felt her kindness.

This done, he rejoined Johnson.

"Tread lightly, for your life," he said.

"Must we descend the stairs?"

"Only the first flight."

"And where is the hiding-place?"

"That I will soon show you. The only thing I want to impress upon you, is to be perfectly silent in all your movements."

"You can trust me."

As noiselessly, then, as foot could fall, the pair crept down the staircase.

The widow stood at the top, looking down at them with fearful interest, but Johnson, as soon as he perceived her, made a rapid and imperative sign for her to retire, which she immediately obeyed.

To go as quietly as they did, necessitated their going slowly, so that, although the flight of stairs was only twelve in number, yet it took them a long time to reach the bottom.

Upon doing so, however, Johnson made a sign to Jack to remain just where he was while he crept to the head of the next flight of stairs, and which went down to the ground floor, in order to listen again, and further make sure that no one was observing.

This excess of caution made Jack impatient, but the landlord was unquestionably right.

Finding all secured, he stealthily returned, and touched Jack on the shoulder to arrest the whole of his attention.

Expecting something to happen of rather an extraordinary character, Jack readily complied.

It so happened, however, that just where they were then standing was the darkest part in all the staircase, so that he had to strain his eyes somewhat to see what was going forward.

In the first place, then, he observed Johnson count the fifth stair from the bottom.

This done, he proceeded to catch hold of the edge of it, much in the manner that one would take hold of a sliding shelf to draw it from its position.

But he tugged at it in vain, for it did not move.

He pulled Jack towards him, and whispered in his ear—"The top of this stair is not fixed, like the rest, but made to slide in and out of a groove. Beneath is a place large enough for you to lie down in, but it is so long since any use was made of it, that the wood has stuck. Help me to pull gently, and then it will come out."

This was enough to make Jack fully aware of the nature of the proposed hiding-place, and he set about giving effectual assistance.

Taking hold of the stair with both hands close together near one end, he whispered to Johnson to do the same, and both exerting a uniform amount of strength, they had the satisfaction of seeing the sliding piece of wood yield gradually to it.

When it was quite taken out, it revealed a dark-looking place, which could, however, only be perceived by being of a deeper shade than the stairs above and below it.

"In with you," whispered Johnson, "you have no time to lose!"

But Jack held back a little for the place looked exceedingly forbidding.

"In with you!" repeated Johnson, "the place is a great deal more comfortable than it looks; you will find the inside lined throughout with thick felt; and then, as for discovery, that is out of the question: I dare wager my life they will never find you here!"

And, indeed, the landlord's eulogiums were far from being ill placed, for a better hiding-place, and one more likely to elude discovery, could not be imagined.

Overcoming, then, his repugnance as well as he was able, Jack got into the coffin-like place.

For his slender anatomy he found there was ample accommodation, and the words of the landlord about its being more comfortable than it looked, were fully borne out.

As soon as he was fairly in, the landlord began to replace the sliding top of the stair.

"How about air for breathing?" asked Jack, before the aperture was quite closed.

"Oh! you'll find that all right," was the reply. "All you have to do is to remain quite still until I come to let you out."

"Or till I am discovered."

"You have no occasion to frighten yourself about that. They will never find you, without they pull the place all to pieces, and that they are not very likely to do. Now, quick, before I close it, are you all right?"

"All right!" responded Jack.

Scarcely were the words out of his mouth than Johnson slid the top board of the stair into its accustomed place, and when that was done it did not present to the closest examination the least difference in appearance to the others.

To make sure that all was just as it should be, however, the landlord trod upon the stair, to find whether it was as firm as the others.

He was rejoiced to find it equally so.

Then, feeling that he had already been longer absent from the officers than was exactly prudent, he descended the stairs.

The greater part of them, he found, were seated in the kitchen, whiling away the time till daylight by something good to drink.

They were quite contented in their minds about their prey, for their measures in stationing men in different places were so well taken that they were convinced he could not leave without being seen by one or other of them.

Johnson noticed that, as he came down stairs, they looked keenly and inquisitively at him.

But whatever suspicion may have had a place in their minds was pretty well dissipated by the words he uttered.

"I have just been up to my wife, gentlemen, and she has given me leave to let you have just what you like to order."

There was a general laugh at this, for those who frequented the "Black Lion" were well aware that in that household, like many others, "the gray mare was the better horse."

So, as his wife was at the time actually up stairs in bed, the sentence seemed quite a natural one to utter.

But as soon as the laugh had died away, the officer in command of the rest exclaimed—

"Come, my lads, no more dallying. We have light enough for our purpose now, and if the young rascal is anywhere in the house, I'll bet you a five-pound note I find him."

Nothing would have pleased Johnson better than to have called out, "Done!" only the manifest impolicy of doing so restrained him.

The manner in which this officer gave his orders to the men was quite sufficient to show that he had not only attentively considered his position, but was also well used to that sort of thing.

Every portion of the building was submitted to a most searching investigation.

Indeed, so systematically was the search pursued, that Johnson began to dread that the cunningly contrived hiding-place would, after all, be discovered.

But this dread proved unfounded, and, not to unnecessarily prolong the narrative, after prying into every nook and corner of the building, and then searching the neighbouring houses, the officers withdrew, baffled and defeated, perfectly convinced that, despite all their precautions, their prey had managed in some way to elude them.

When he deemed it safe to do so, Johnson went upstairs, and released Jack Sheppard from his place of durance.

He would then have quitted the place, and commenced the pursuit about which he felt so anxious, only he suffered himself to be restrained by the landlord, and he was afterwards glad he did so, for an unexpected event took place, which we shall immediately proceed to describe.

CHAPTER CII.

SHOWS THE MANNER IN WHICH BLUESKIN ESCAPED FROM JONATHAN WILD, AND MET JACK SHEPPARD IN DRURY-LANE.

WHEN Blueskin heard the rattling sound which Wild's key produced when that worthy rather roughly thrust it into the lock of the front door, he felt that to hesitate would be fatal, so he sprang up the remainder of the steps.

He was in hopes of being able to reach the hall before Jonathan got the door open, which would have given him an immense advantage over his foe; but in this he was mistaken.

Wild got the door open first.

An angry howl came from his lips when he saw the condition of his janitor, and anticipating that something unusual was amiss, he, with great presence of mind, put a whistle to his lips, and blew a shrill blast upon it.

This was a general signal to all those members of his band who might be within hearing to hasten to his assistance.

The last notes had not left the instrument, however, before Blueskin reached the passage.

His drawn sword was in his hand, and its brightly polished blade appeared to collect all the rays of light that were scattered about the place, and reflect them with tenfold brilliancy.

For a brief space of time, during which, perchance, a person might have counted three rapidly, Jonathan stood astounded and bewildered.

But recovering himself, he drew his hanger with his right hand and a pistol with his left, and again uttering a yell that might have been heard in any part of the house, he planted his back firmly against the door.

"Who are you?" he yelled; for he did not recognise Blueskin beneath the splendid disguise which he wore.

"Who are you? Speak, or I fire!"

But Blueskin took care not to utter a word, for fear that some familiar tone should strike upon Wild's ear, and raise a suspicion of his identity.

Rushing forward with his drawn sword before him, he aimed a furious blow at the breast of the thief-taker, who with much ado, succeeded in warding it off, but that was all.

Finding himself thus resolutely attacked, he lost a portion of his usual courage.

Blueskin was not slow to take advantage of it.

An accomplished master of the art of fencing, and, moreover, having the advantage over Wild in height and length of reach, he stood every chance of being the victor—that is, provided he did not give the janizaries time to arrive.

Animated by this feeling, he attacked Jonathan with great impetuosity, and wounded him severely in two places in the breast.

But Wild would not give up. Suddenly raising the pistol to a level, he took a good aim with it at his opponent, and he would have assuredly succeeded in hitting him had not Blueskin's eye been quick enough to perceive and wrist quick enough to change the direction of the barrel.

The pistol was discharged, but its contents expended themselves harmlessly against the woodwork of the staircase.

The hurried trampling of many feet, and the confusion of many voices speaking excitedly together, reached Blake's ears, and warned him to be speedy in his movements, if he wished to escape with his life.

Collecting all his energies, he gave Wild a sudden and violent thrust.

The thief-taker tried to avoid the blow, but in vain. The sword passed through the upper part of his chest, near the shoulder, pinning him to the door.

Steggs, who had hitherto kept close behind Blueskin, now came forward, and, when he saw his enemy thus worsted, struck him a heavy blow with his fist, which at once rendered him insensible, and, upon Blake withdrawing his weapon, he fell heavily upon the floor of the hall.

Some half-dozen men now rushed down the staircase, but they knew not for a moment how to act.

Blake seized upon that moment to undo the fastenings of the door and fling it open.

Then he dashed out into the street, closely followed by the two men he had delivered from the dungeons.

He ran but a few paces, and then he stopped.

He rejoiced that he had set the two prisoners free as he had, because now, they would be the means of diverting pursuit, if any was attempted against him.

"Separate!" he cried, "choose, each of you, your own road, and if you run fast enough you will effect your escape. This is my way."

He ran down Skinner-street, as he spoke, but before he reached Snow-hill, he turned down one of the narrow turnings on his left, which, by a circuitous route would take him into Fleet-market.

The place was dark, but all its intricacies were so familiar to him that he could have almost found his way blindfold.

Crossing Fleet-market, he wound his course through the numerous courts which lie between Holborn-hill and Fleet-street.

The result of his search in Wild's house filled him with mingled feelings of hopes and fears.

Jack's indomitable resolution to overcome all possible obstacles was well-known to him, and he thought it by no means improbable that he had found some means of escaping from Wild's clutches, and taking his companion with him.

But if this was the case he made sure he should learn some intelligence of them at the "Black Lion," so he resolved to repair thither without delay.

Little prepared was he for the startling intelligence which awaited him there.

By the time he reached the well-known spot it was broad daylight.

On entering, he found the place in the utmost disorder. He was not long in learning the cause of it. We can imagine with what anxiety he awaited the result.

Although so much in the habit of frequenting the tavern, no one recognised him in his present costume.

Seating himself in the tap-room, he called for drink.

The seat he chose was one where he was most likely to be free from observation.

He could not help feeling amused at the manner in which Johnson treated him. It was plain to be seen he had no suspicion of his identity.

The length of time the officers took with their search, inspired Blueskin with the hope that they would be unsuccessful in finding Jack, and the result proved that he was quite right.

When the last of the police had withdrawn, Blueskin called Johnson, and told him who he was.

The landlord's delight, upon being made the recipient of this intelligence, knew no bounds.

Blake cautioned him, however, not to let it be known, as so much depended upon his existence being for the present kept a secret.

Johnson then confided to him the place in which he had hidden Jack.

By his advice he waited for some time yet, in order to make sure that none of the police-officers were lurking about.

Then, as we related at the end of the preceding chapter, Johnson had gone up stairs, and released Jack from his place of confinement.

He felt it to be no inconsiderable relief to be able to move his limbs freely.

He was shown by Johnson into a room on the first floor, the door leading to which was close to the foot of the stairs, so that if occasion should require it, he would be able to return to his place of concealment without loss of time.

These preliminaries having been arranged, he broke the intelligence to him that Blueskin had not, as he thought, been slain, but that he had most miraculously recovered from the terrible wound Wild had given him.

Next to seeing Edgworth Bess in a situation of perfect security, nothing would have given Jack so much real delight as to learn that his friend was spared to him.

But Johnson, bidding him to compose himself, said he would go down and send Blake up to him.

In less than five minutes after the landlord had left him he heard some one ascending the stairs.

He could not control his impatience, but going to the door, opened it and looked out.

He drew back again suddenly and disappointedly, for Johnson had not told him Blueskin was disguised, and, like the rest, he failed to recognise him in his present attire.

Blueskin walked straight up to the door of the room, and spoke.

Jack knew the tones of his voice again instantly.

Taking him by the hand, he dragged him into the chamber, and sitting down near him, began to talk.

But to relate the mutual explanations which took place between the pair would be as unnecessary as it would be uninteresting. The reader already knows all, and therefore he will be at no loss to imagine what passed between them, thus enabling us to proceed with our narrative without hindrance.

When Jack had finished the recital of his own extraordinary adventures, and narrated how he had succeeded in setting Edgworth Bess at liberty, but that since then she had disappeared, leaving no clue by which he could find her, Blueskin's face assumed a grave expression, for he anticipated the worst.

For a long time he was quite silent. He was endeavouring to account for her disappearance.

But in all his speculations he was a long long way off the truth.

The anxiety and interest which Jack felt were plainly depicted in his countenance.

"What will be the best way to act, Blueskin?" he asked; "I know I can leave it safely in your hands to decide. What shall I do?"

"That is a difficult matter, Jack, unless I say in two words, find her. They just express what I intend to do myself."

"But how? In what way shall you set about it?"

"That is the question. Have you any money?"

"None."

"I thought not—nor have I, worth mentioning. But if we are to do any good some must be had, and that at once."

"I don't dispute it; I want some even now."

"We cannot do without it. Now, Jack, you are a brave and likely young fellow! What do you say to going out to-night with a good horse and a brace of pistols to cry 'Stand and deliver!' upon the highway?"

CHAPTER CIII.

BLUESKIN'S SEARCH AFTER EDGWORTH BESS IS A VAIN ONE, AND HE PERSUADES JACK TO ACCOMPANY HIM UPON A LITTLE EXPEDITION.

"At any other time," said Jack Sheppard, "I should have jumped at such a proposal, for there is nothing that would suit me better; but as it is, I feel the whole of my energies should be turned in one direction!"

"And so they can be all the same for that. Listen to me!"

"I am doing so."

"You perceive what a difference changing my dress has made in me. Even you did not recognise me—no more did Johnson! Do as I did. Remain where you are, and send some one out to purchase you some things of a similar character, and we might walk past Wild himself without his knowing us!"

"But the money?"

"I have, I think, enough for that. Say—do you consent?"

"Willingly—if I thought I could get out of this place."

"It will be most imprudent for you to attempt to do so before nightfall. By that time the vigilance of those officers who may be watching in the neighbourhood will have relaxed."

"It will kill me to stay here inactive all day!" said Jack, pacing up and down the room.

"You must be as patient as you can. Precipitation will ruin all. Surely you can see that!"

"I will be guided by you, my friend; your head is clearer than mine; and you will know what is the most prudent course of action."

"Do so, then. Remain quiet and patient where you are—will you?"

"I will try."

"If you cannot leave the house, that is no reason why I shouldn't. In this disguise I am certain they will never know me. I have the welfare of the young girl quite as much at heart as you have, and I will go forth alone, and try to find her. What say you?"

"Can I say anything but 'yes'?"

"I will do my best to be successful; but whether I am or not I will return at dusk, and we will be off upon our excursion, for money must be had!"

"You say you have enough to purchase a disguise?"

"I have. I will call myself upon a man who can be trusted, and send him here to you. He will also take away the clothes you have been wearing. Above all, be careful of your liberty, and take my advice, do not move from here until I return."

Blueskin then withdrew.

A few words passed between him and Johnson, and then he sallied forth into Drury-lane.

By this time the ordinary business of the day had fairly commenced, and the thoroughfare was crowded with people.

He threaded his way through the busy crowd without attracting much attention.

His first visit was to a clothier's in Holywell-street, to whom he gave a description of what he required, and paid him in advance for the clothes.

As the sum he got was about three times as much as he ever expected, the shop-keeper was civil to obsequiousness, and promised that it should be seen to without delay.

This over, Blueskin commenced his search after Edgworth Bess.

He felt more alarmed and frightened at her disappearance than he would have liked to confess to himself.

Full of deep, anxious thought, he walked down Holywell-street, and emerged into the Strand.

Confident of the excellence of his disguise, he walked with an air of the greatest unconcern.

Like Jack Sheppard, the more he thought over what the young girl would be likely to do, circumstanced as she was, the more certain he felt that her first step would be to make her way to the "Black Lion" in Drury-lane.

Doubtless she had done this, and supposing so, then she must have met with some interruption on her journey.

But beyond that supposition he could not go. What sort of peril she would be likely to meet with he knew not. It might come in a thousand different shapes.

All clue, too, was lost. There was not the faintest indication to guide him as to the direction she had taken when she left the archway of the market.

Little did he think as he went down the Strand and Fleet-street, that he was walking upon the very ground over which she had been hunted by the Mohawks.

The brief autumnal day passed away, and found him no nearer the achievement of his purpose than he was when he set out.

Vexed, dispirited, and his heart heavy with dread, he, according to the arrangement he had made, retraced his steps to the old inn in Drury-lane, where he knew Jack would be waiting with such nervous impatience to know the result of his search.

To hope to find any one by your own individual exertions when they have been lost in London, is a task so hopeless as to make it not worth while to use an effort, as it could only result in bitter disappointment.

So soon as Jack heard his comrade ascending the stairs, he could tell by his heavy and listless tread that he had been unsuccessful.

The discovery, although he had schooled himself to bear it, almost drove him frantic.

"You have not found her?" he said.

"I have not," replied his friend, "but do not despair of doing so. Come, are you ready?"

"Quite," said Jack. "Anything to get clear of this place, which grows more hateful to me every moment."

"You have put on your disguise?"

"Yes, and as soon as we leave this dark chamber you will see how great a difference it has made to me."

"So much the better. Let me go down first, and if in a minute or two I do not return, follow me; you will understand by that the coast is clear."

So saying, Blueskin left Jack, and descended to the ground floor.

There was no one in the kitchen, but in the front room a goodly number were assembled; that is, if the noise they made could be taken as a guide.

When Jack descended, and Blueskin saw him by the bright light there was in the room, prepared as he was for an alteration, he could scarcely credit his eyes.

For some time lately, what with one thing and another, Jack had had no time to pay any particular attention to his toilette, and the apparel he wore was in a very neglected condition. In fact, he had begun to look very much like a scarecrow.

Now, however, he had taken the utmost pains with himself.

His face and hands were scrupulously clean, and his short crop of hair brushed closely to his head.

Slimly and genteely built as Jack was, when properly dressed he had every appearance of a gentleman, unless the lineaments of his countenance were closely scanned.

Then an expression of low cunning was perceivable, which marred the effect of all.

Very little time, however, was spent by Blueskin in making remarks upon his looks. The first surprise over, he at once made his way to the front door.

Johnson was standing on the doorstep.

He had taken up that position in order to ascertain whether there were any officers lurking about the neighbourhood.

But all appeared to present much the same aspect as usual, and this he communicated to the two friends.

"We will be off at once, then," said Blueskin. "My first place will be the livery stables in Long-acre, where I shall hire a couple of nags, and you may expect us back when you see us, for there is no knowing how events may turn out."

"All right. I trust you will succeed in finding Bess, bless her heart. If she should come here, I shall take good care of her, you may depend."

"Do so—do so. I need not tell you that you may rely upon our gratitude."

"I know that well enough. Take care, and I hope you will soon succeed."

With these words in their ears Blueskin and Jack took their way in rather a circuitous fashion through the courts to the livery stable at the corner of Charles-street, Long-acre, already well known to the reader.

Here they were provided with a couple of steeds of excellent quality.

They were equipped with an especial view to the service they were to go upon.

Holsters were affixed to each of the saddles, and in them were two brace of carefully-loaded double-barrelled pistols.

Ammunition, too, was handed to each of them by the man in attendance, as well as a brace of smaller pistols, suitable to the pocket.

Thus provided, they were in a position to cry, "Stand and deliver" successfully to any travellers they might encounter upon the highway.

Blueskin led the way, and trotted at a gentle pace through the city in the direction of Blackfriars-bridge.

Their appearance was unexceptionable to a degree, and such as would have at once commanded respect from the beholder.

Most certainly no suspicion that they were "knights of the road," and setting out upon a night excursion, would be engendered.

"We will make our way over Blackfriars-bridge, Jack," said Blueskin, "and straight on to the Kent-road. It is one that is much travelled by people who are worth crying stand to. What do you say?"

"I leave the expedition in your hands," replied Jack. "Be you the leader, I will follow you."

"I don't so much care about that," replied Blueskin.

"I would rather have some one with me in an affair of this sort, that I could consult with than a mere machine to obey orders."

"You are old enough to assume the command."

"That may be, Jack, but I don't wish to do it. You may not know it, but the day is not far distant when you will grow famous, and make for yourself such a name and reputation as no one ever yet had and ever will have again, and it is you that will be the captain."

Jack smiled.

One of his greatest weaknesses was his vanity and love of flattery, and, such being the case, it is easy to imagine the effect Blueskin's words had upon him, though that he was perfectly sincere when he uttered them there can be no doubt.

"And now, Jack," he added, "nothing but a pressing need of money would have brought me out to-night, and diverted me from the pursuit of Edgworth Bess. Therefore, we will be content to return as soon as we make anything like a booty."

"That, of course, meets with my approval," said Jack, "for it is the subject of all others which is uppermost in my mind."

"Do not despair. We have every room to hope, and perhaps chance may suddenly and unexpectedly place the clue in our hands."

"I trust so," said Jack, as they pulled up at the toll-gate while the man opened it. "The sooner the better!"

CHAPTER CIV.

JACK SHEPPARD AND BLUESKIN MEET WITH A VERY SINGULAR ADVENTURE ON THE KENT-ROAD.

A SHARP canter of about ten minutes duration sufficed to carry them quite out into the open country.

The place they reached, however, is now as much like a town as any other part of London is, but the buildings are comparatively recent, and there must be many now alive who can distinctly recollect their erection.

A beautiful silence was about the spot.

The rustling of the tree-tops, and the cries of those birds whose habits are nocturnal, sounded like pleasing music in Jack's ears.

The trees on either side of the roadway grew up so high, and were planted so thickly together, that they cast a shadow so black as to make it look like some wild cavernous recess.

It was here that Blueskin drew up.

"There is no place for miles so favourable for our purpose as this is. Se we will stay here. Halt!"

Jack stopped.

"Keep your horse as quiet as you can. We shall be sure not to have to wait long before we hear some one coming."

The friends now backed their horses as far as they could into the shade and waited.

Advantage was taken of this opportunity to look to the priming of their pistols, for then, when the percussion cap was unknown, they required constant attention.

On this occasion, Jack perceived that the jolting in riding had shaken the powder out of the pans of the brace he carried in his coat-pocket, so that had he relied upon them in any emergency they would have failed him.

This, however, he soon remedied, and then he waited with considerable impatience to hear some one approach.

For a long time their patience was unrewarded.

No one came.

At last, Jack grew quite tired, and would have moved, but, just at that moment, Blueskin held up his hand in an attitude for silence.

"What is it?" asked Jack, in a whisper.

"Silence for a moment, while I listen. I heard very faintly the beat of horses' hoofs."

Jack strained his sense of hearing to the utmost, and then found he was just able to catch a sound, which certainly seemed to be what his comrade said it was.

"It is at an immense distance, and your ears must have been uncommonly acute for them to have distinguished it so soon."

"Sharp sense of hearing," replied Blueskin, "is an essential requisite for every true knight of the road, and it is a faculty you should cultivate to the utmost. Hark, again."

Jack did so, and this time the clattering of iron-bound hoofs upon the hard road reached him more unequivocally.

"There are two of them," continued Blueskin, "and they are coming at a slashing pace. Draw more on one side and listen. Be on the look out when they approach, and as soon as I give the signal pounce out upon them, and, in as loud and stern a voice as you can assume, command them to deliver their money or their lives. Now, silence till they come."

Both drew now as close to the hedgerow as they possibly could, and it would have needed a very sharp eye to have distinguished them from the different objects by which they were surrounded.

But now a circumstance occurred which tended to change the current of Blake's intentions.

As the beating of the horses' feet became more perceptible, he heard mingled with it those of other horses, as well as the grinding of wheels.

This seemed to point out that those whose approach he had first heard were merely outriders.

If this was so, his prey would be in the interior of the carriage.

A few minutes though, he felt, would set all at rest, and he would be prepared to act either way.

He deemed it no more than prudent, though, to let Jack know by a hasty whisper what he suspected.

At that time it was by no means an unusual thing for people to travel with an escort, for the roads were most unsafe.

Only those, however, who occupied high positions in the social scale, or who carried about with them valuable articles were thus attended, for it very materially increased the expenses of the journey.

The risk of stopping such travellers would, of course, be very great, but then the booty to be acquired would make it worth their while.

It was from the direction of London that the sounds came.

The outriders, for such they were, reached the dark bit of road where our friends lay in ambush.

They were talking together in a loud voice, but they swept by too quickly for them to catch the purport of their words.

Blueskin made not the least attempt to molest them.

He would have gained nothing by it.

They were doubtless galloping on to reach the next town where relays could be had, for there was every indication that it was an express journey.

Just as they passed, the lamps of the carriage came in sight.

At first they looked like two twin tiny stars in the intense darkness.

As they grew nearer, their size and brilliancy rapidly increased until the trees by the roadside could be distinguished.

"Now, Jack," whispered Blueskin, "prepare yourself for a desperate resistance."

"Do you expect it?"

"It is best to be prepared in case."

Jack gathered the reins firmly in his left hand, and grasped one of the holster pistols in his right, setting his teeth hard at the same time.

It was the first adventure on the highway that he had ever had, and he naturally felt a little nervous and excited.

Blueskin, however, was cool and prepared. He was an old hand at the business.

He was able to perceive, though Jack was not, that the approaching vehicle was a post-chaise, drawn by four horses, and having two postilions.

The speed they were coming at was something frightful. Indeed, he half thought the horses had taken fright and run away.

And, indeed, the only thing which seemed to convince him that such was not the case was, that above all other sounds, he could hear the loud cracking of the postilions' whips, as they strove to urge the cattle to make still greater speed.

What to think of this headlong haste he knew not, but it must have been something of no ordinary import to make them run the gauntlet, as they did, of the perils of the road.

But why they travelled post was a thing that Blueskin did not choose to trouble his head about. He resolved to stop them, be the consequences what they might. All he hoped was that he would obtain booty sufficient to repay him for his trouble.

When the two leading horses in the post-chaise were on a level with him, Blueskin gave the word to Jack, and then giving his own steed a sudden impulse forward, caught hold of the rear one by the bridle.

At the same moment he cried out to halt, and fired his pistol so close to the postilion's head, that he rolled off his horse into the road, firmly persuaded that he was hit.

But not heeding his cries, Blueskin tightened the hold he had upon the bridle, and forced the horses round until the post-chaise was turned quite across the road, and in such a position that further progress was impossible.

The horses kicked and plunged violently, but Blake called out to Jack to cut the traces, which he immediately did by the aid of the sword which he wore, and the liberated horses dashed off along the road as though possessed by demons.

So quickly, too, was all this performed, that the inmates of the chaise had not time to recover from their surprise.

But just as Blueskin reached the door, the window was let down with a sudden crash, and a man asked, with an oath, what was the matter.

"Guard the door there, Jack!" cried Blueskin, in such loud tones as to immediately arrest attention. "You, my men, be on the watch, and be prepared to fire the moment I give the word."

"Murder!" said the voice at the carriage window, as he drew in his head. "Murder!"

"You may rely upon it it will be without you comply with my demands, and that at once. Your money, watches, rings, and whatever other valuables you may have with you. You will find it best not to delay."

He rode quite close to the window of the post-chaise as he spoke, and, resting the barrel of his pistol upon the ledge of it, bent his head and took as good a look as he could at the interior.

But even as he did so, his ears caught the sound of the approach of some other vehicle from the direction of London.

This warned him to be speedy.

The inmates of the chaise were an elderly man and a female, who, as far as could be judged by her general appearance and contour, was by no means so old.

[BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD ARE SPECTATORS OF A STRANGE DUEL.]

Indeed, at first sight, she looked little more than a mere girl, but that was owing to her peculiar style of beauty, which, in its character, was child-like in the extreme.

She was, however, in a state of the greatest possible terror and agitation, and the alarm depicted upon her countenance was certainly too great for Blueskin's attack to be the sole cause of it.

"Help—help! Mercy!" she cried. "Oh! Charles! Charles! what shall we do?"

These ejaculations filled Blueskin with still greater astonishment, but before he could repeat his demand, the girl continued with greater vehemence and fright—

"Hark—hark! Charles, she comes! Cannot you hear the wheels? Oh! we are lost—lost!"

"Yes, curse her!" growled the elderly man, who had been addressed by the name of Charles; and then he added a few more imprecatory sentences, which we think unnecessary to repeat.

Blueskin interrupted him.

He, too, could hear rather more plainly than he wished the sounds of some four-wheeled vehicle coming along the road from London at a furious pace.

"Quick!" he said. "I am not in the habit of asking twice for what I want. You have dallied long enough. Quick! I say. Hand over your valuables, or the consequences!"

"Cannot be worse or more terrible than they already are," interrupted the young girl. "Wretched man, you have ruined us!"

"Ruined you? How?" exclaimed Blueskin, who found himself every moment more unable to understand what was taking place.

"Silence, Susanna!" said the elderly man, and who, in future, we shall, to save trouble, do as the girl did, and call Charles. "Things now have come to a crisis. Through this unfortunate accident, a meeting will be impossible to be avoided, and we must face the matter out as well as we are able."

CHAPTER CV.

THE MYSTERY OF THE POST-CHAISE BEGINS TO UNFOLD ITSELF.

THERE was one person present who listened to what was going forward with even more curiosity, interest, and bewilderment than even Blueskin did.

That person was Jack Sheppard.

It will be recollected that, in obedience to his comrade's injunctions, he had taken up his position at the other window of the post-chaise, so as to be at hand to prevent either of its occupants leaving it.

Of course, where he was, he could hear every word that was spoken with the greatest plainness.

But what he had heard so far only served to make him feel the keenest desire to know something more of the affair that at present seemed so mysterious and incomprehensible.

That he would have this desire gratified, appeared highly probable.

From what the girl Susanna had said, he gathered they were pursued, and that it was a female who was pursuing them.

And that this female, whom they appeared so much to dread, was the occupant of the carriage that was coming along at such a rate there was every reason to suppose.

If so, it would reach the spot upon which they stood in the course of a few minutes.

Then, surely, he would know more.

With his eyes turned in the direction of London, he watched its coming.

In the darkness and distance its outlines were dimly distinguishable.

As he gazed with straining eyes upon it, something seemed to tell him that he was about to witness a strange episode in the great drama of human life.

Leaving him, however, with his attention more directed to the road before him than the chaise window, where it ought to be, we will return to Blueskin, who had determined, at all hazards, to take his booty before the other vehicle arrived.

Accordingly he assumed a threatening manner, and, clicking the lock of his pistol, he said—

"Do not drive me to extremities! I have had patience with you so far, but I bid you beware of delaying too long. Do you value your life?"

"My life?"

"Yes, your life. Do not repeat my words."

"I do not value it," said Charles, "for it is as good as lost already. Kill me!"

"No—no!" shrieked Susanna, and, springing forward, she twined her arms around his neck, interposing her body between them. "Spare him, and I will give you all we have. Wretched man! you little think the amount of mischief you have caused by interrupting our flight!"

"Then you are fugitives," said Blueskin. "From justice, perhaps, and so I have done a good turn, I suppose, to those who will not thank me for it. Never mind. Once more, I say, give me all you have of any value, or I will take it by force; and I warn you beforehand, if you drive me to such a course, I shall not be over gentle when I set about it!"

Upon hearing these words, spoken as they were in a tone of the greatest determination, Charles, at the entreaties of Susanna, took from his fob a large gold watch, richly chased and jewelled, from which depended a long chain and a bunch of massive gold seals.

But Blueskin was not satisfied with this. It was cash he wanted, and cash he determined to have.

"This is not enough," he said. "Quick, your purses, rings, and other jewellery! Make haste, for your lives!"

Trembling all over with intense terror, with hot tears streaming down her cheeks, Susanna, one after another, produced the various articles which had been named, and handed them out of the chaise window.

Hastily placing them in his pocket, Blueskin would have made off, but at that moment, with a sudden dash, the pursuing vehicle arrived upon the scene of action.

Still more audible and horrible became the curses which issued from Charles's lips.

Still more piercing became the shrieks of his companion.

Then, before the pestilions had fairly brought their foaming horses to a standstill, the door of the carriage which had just arrived was thrown open.

A female form came forth.

Blueskin drew aside, but did not attempt to fly. He felt a sudden and uncontrollable desire to know more of the inmates of the two vehicles.

He looked on attentively.

In a moment or so he was rejoined by Jack, who said—

"What's the meaning of all this, Blue?"

"I cannot imagine."

"Nor I."

"It is very strange."

"Very. What shall we do?"

"Remain where we are a little while."

"With all my heart! but will it be safe?"

"Quite! There is nothing to fear. We are more than a match for any now present, and we can easily give our horses the spur if we hear sounds indicative of the arrival of any one."

"All right!"

This little dialogue was carried on with the greatest rapidity, but, having come to this understanding, both set themselves to the task of watching what course events would now take.

The female who had alighted in so hurried a manner was tall, and a large travelling cloak which she wore could not conceal her really fine proportions.

With the speed of passion she ran along the roadway to the door of the post-chaise.

A loud scream burst from Susanna's lips as she witnessed her approach, and, cowering down in the farthest corner of the vehicle, strove to hide herself from view.

"Wretch!" cried the woman, fiercely, and in a manner which sounded as though she had spoken through her clenched teeth. "You thought to escape me, but, behold, a fortunate chance has placed you in my hands!"

As she spoke, she unclasped her cloak about her neck, and allowed it to fall upon the ground behind her, in a heap.

"Let me get at her!" she cried furiously. "She shall live to repent this day, and you, too, villain, unworthy of the form you wear!"

It was Charles who was thus addressed, and his terror seemed scarcely less than that of the young girl beside him.

There was light enough for Blueskin and Jack to see that the apparel which this strange woman wore was of the best material, and doubtless it was under the domination of blind rage that she spoke and acted in the manner she did.

Springing up on to the step, she had the door of the chaise open in an instant.

"Come forth!" she shrieked. "Come forth, or I will make you! I will drag you forth! Do you hear me? Come forth, I say!"

"Now, Julia," said Charles. "Do not be violent, I"—

The extraordinary female, named Julia did not allow the unlucky Charles to finish his sentence, for with the sudden fury of a wild animal, she jumped into the chaise, and, catching hold of him by the hair of his head, drew him out into the road.

So rapidly and dexterously was the feat performed that neither Jack nor Blueskin would have had time to interfere, had they possessed the greatest inclination to do so, which, if the truth was told, they certainly had not. They had already learned the wisdom of remaining neuter in other people's quarrels.

Charles sat on the ground in a very rueful manner indeed.

He did not venture to move, but he turned his head in the direction of our friends, and implored their aid in the most abject terms.

The scene was ludicrous enough, in all conscience, and yet it was all the more horrible on that account.

The woman Julia looked in a moment to see who it was from whom he asked succour.

She saw dimly the figures of two men on horseback.

"Help!" she said. "If you are gentlemen, if you have a consciousness of what is right and wrong, if you are willing to assist a woman to avenge herself for the injuries which she has received, I implore you to aid me."

"What do you wish us to do?" asked Blueskin, who, strangely enough, felt more sympathy for this woman, violent-as she was, than he did for either Susanna or Charles.

"I will tell you," she said, struggling to appear as calm as she could. "Come nearer, so that you can hear me better."

They obeyed.

"When you hear what I have to relate to you," she continued, "I feel sure that you will take part with me. In the first place, that is my husband!"

As she said that, which she did in a most contemptuous manner, she pointed to Charles.

Our friends waited in silence for her to continue.

"I feel almost ashamed to confess it, but I have loved that man—I am afraid I still do love him. Time was when he was worthier than he is now, and returned my affection. But there came into our house that hussy who sits yonder. She was perishing from want and cold. I took her in, even as the man in the fable took the viper. Like the viper, she turned against me. She showed her gratitude by practising innumerable arts to win my husband from me. Not that she loved him, but because he was rich and could indulge her in every species of extravagance. She succeeded in ensnaring him, and from that time happiness and myself have been strangers. Day after day I saw him sinking still deeper and deeper into difficulties. She was the cause. At length it came to my ears that he was about to raise all the money he possibly could, and then fly with his mistress to the continent, leaving me to misery and poverty, and to fight my way through the world as best I could."

CHAPTER CVI.

BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD WITNESS A SINGULAR DUEL.

THE outraged wife paused a moment for breath, but it was only for a moment.

Then she went on.

"As soon as I discovered this, I set out in pursuit of them, determined to punish her with my own hand. The laws will allow me no redress, so I am driven to do so, for I will never allow her to go free. By what means their flight has been arrested I know not, nor do I care. I rejoice at the chance, whatever it may be, which has placed her so completely in my power. And so I call upon you both to render me what assistance I may require. Will you do so?"

"We will!" said Blueskin; "I don't like to interfere in other people's quarrels, but, under the circumstances, I think they fully deserve some retribution at your hands!"

"They do."

"What must we do?"

"Allow me to be uninterrupted."

"In what way?"

"Hold my husband here, and keep him from interposing between his minion and myself."

"Agreed! We'll manage that. Lay hold, Jack!"

As he spoke, Blueskin suddenly bent down in the saddle, and caught the unfortunate husband by the collar of his coat, and being a powerful man, he, by exerting all his strength, pulled him to his feet.

Jack then caught hold of him on the other side, and so, between the two, he was held there in a perfectly helpless condition.

No sooner did she see that her husband was perfectly secure than, with great speed, she ran back to her own carriage.

But she was back again in a moment.

In her hands she carried two long glittering rapiers.

Matters began to assume a serious aspect.

What was she going to do with those weapons?

They soon saw.

"Choose!" she cried, in a high-strained tone of voice, as she went to the post-chaise in which Susanna still sat, though half-dead with fright. "Choose! Will you remain there and be slain, or come forth and have a chance of your life!"

"Mercy! mercy!" shrieked Susanna. "Save me, oh! save me from this dreadful woman. Help, help!"

"Choose!" said Julia. "I shall not ask again. Will you come forth?"

"Yes, yes! Have mercy upon me, and I will do all that you ask! Mercy! mercy!"

With screams and tears and sighs, and wild cries for help, Susanna alighted from the post-chaise.

But she sank down immediately upon the ground.

Then Julia took one of the swords, and laid it down by the side of her rival.

The other she grasped firmly in her own hand, and held in a posture of attack.

"Take up that sword," she cried, "and defend yourself! I give you that chance of your life! Take it up, I say, or, so surely as there is a heaven above us, I will slay you as you are!"

Blueskin could not help feeling a great amount of admiration for this singular being, who in so masculine and self-reliant a manner set about the redressment of her wrongs.

To be sure a great deal of exception can be taken to what she did, but then there was every excuse for her, for people under the domination of a powerful rage will do what, under less exciting circumstances, they would never dream of doing.

That she felt the injury which had been done her most keenly there can be no doubt, and she happened to possess sufficient spirit to take the affair into her own hands.

The girl Susanna shrunk and trembled when she saw these terrible preparations on the part of the justly-incensed wife.

She did not attempt to take the weapon which had been put with the hilt so conveniently to her grasp, but seemed to try to shrink down into the earth.

An expression of contemptuous disdain was upon Julia's face as she turned towards Blueskin and Jack, and spoke.

"Let me intreat you," she said, "to leave this guilty coward in my hands. Will you promise me that you will not interfere, but stand and see fair play between us?"

"We will," replied Blueskin.

"And my husband," she added, as that individual made a desperate but unsuccessful effort to get free, "keep him as well from interfering with us."

"Don't be afraid," returned Blueskin.

"And you," continued Julia (who became calmer every moment), as she turned to the postillions, "will find it your best policy to remain neuter."

Things were now coming to a climax.

The greatest violence of her passion, now that she saw her victim fully in her power, abated, but it left behind a cold-blooded feeling of determined revenge.

With the manner of one who was by no means a stranger to the use of the rapier, she held hers in her hand, and pointed it at the breast of her rival.

"Rise, hussy," she said; "I will give you a chance of your worthless life. Rise and defend yourself with the weapon at your side, or, if you do not, I will, as surely as there is a sky above us, slay you where you are."

Up to this moment Susanna seemed to be overcome with the most abject terror, but now a sudden and remarkable alteration took place.

It was the courage of desperation.

She was, indeed, like one of those wild animals who, as long as they are able, will fly from danger, but who at the last, when forced at bay, will turn round and defend themselves.

Uttering, then, a scream of rage, she, by a sudden movement of her arm, took hold of the rapier.

She rose to her feet, and, with great speed, threw off her hat and cloak, in order that they might not encumber her.

"Now," she cried, "you have forced this quarrel on me. I avoided it as long as I could, but now that you have forced me to it, woe be to you!"

And no sooner had she spoken the words than, shortening her arm, she made a furious lunge at her adversary.

It was parried, though somewhat unskillfully.

A terrible and vindictive earnestness was now apparent in the eyes of both women.

It was, as they knew well, a life and death conflict.

The glittering blades twisted and twirled about in every imaginable shape.

Then a slight scream was heard.

Susanna felt the point of her opponent's weapon enter her left arm.

The wound was a trifling one—a mere puncture, in fact

—and so far from causing her to shrink, it seemed to endow her with fresh vigour.

Again the swords clashed.

Susanna bent all her energies to attack, and, to tell truth, Julia had much ado to defend herself.

She allowed no sound to escape her lips, but she felt more than once that she was wounded.

Indeed, as it now turned out, they appeared to be pretty equally matched.

It would be hard to say what were the precise feelings of Blueskin and Sheppard as they witnessed this singular combat.

They could not help thinking that the wife was in the right, so far as their own notions went, but still they did not for all that exactly like the idea of two females engaging in a duel of so deadly a character.

But they had given their words not to interfere, and so they resolved to keep to what they had said.

As for the husband—the unworthy wretch who had been the cause of all this—from the moment the contest fairly commenced, he ceased to struggle to get free, but looked on with a strange kind of fascination.

The movements of the combatants now became so rapid, that in the darkness they could with the greatest difficulty be distinguished.

Round and round, backwards and forwards, to the right, to the left, leaving, whichever direction they took, a track of blood as they went.

Still neither seemed to be seriously or dangerously hurt.

Presently, however, there was one horrible scream of anguish, followed almost instantly by another.

The weapons clashed more feebly.

Then Susanna's arm failed her.

She staggered, and almost fell.

In an instant Julia took advantage of it.

With a cry of triumph, which the pain she was suffering almost converted into a groan, she ran her rival through the body.

The keen point of the rapier entered her breast, and such was the vigour of the thrust that the hilt struck with a dull sound against the part where the point had entered.

Susanna fell.

A gleam of ferocious joy shot from the eyes of Julia.

She tried to move—to speak.

But utterance and motion were denied her.

With a deadly feeling of sickness, a sensation as though the world was gliding from her, she fell to the earth, bleeding from innumerable wounds.

There was a momentary stillness.

No one present had anticipated such a sanguinary termination to the duel.

Blueskin was the first to recover himself.

Relaxing his hold upon the husband's collar, he dismounted with great rapidity from his steed, and ran to where the two women lay.

He was immediately followed by Jack and the postilions, who had looked upon the whole scene with the greatest wonder and alarm.

Susanna was nearest to him, so it was over her that Blueskin first stooped.

Kneeling down, he raised her head carefully.

A groan of terrible anguish came from her lips, and he was obliged to return her to her former position.

"It is all over with her, I fear. She cannot possibly survive. I hope the other has escaped better."

With tottering steps, the husband approached the spot.

What his feelings were no one knew, but he stooped down over Susanna, and groaned aloud.

CHAPTER CVII.

BLUESKIN UNFORTUNATELY TAKES JACK SHEPPARD'S ADVICE.

At that moment, perhaps, there pressed upon his mind with full force the consequences which his own actions had entailed.

It was all his work, although, of course, had he been permitted, he would have endeavoured to prevent matters going to the extreme length they had.

Some fondness for this man must have had a home in Susanna's heart, for when she found who it was that was bending over her, she, despite the frightful pain the action occasioned her, raised her arms and twined them about his neck.

But it was only for an instant.

She could not possibly have long survived that ghastly wound in her chest, but the term of life that remained to her was shortened sensibly by taking that last embrace.

Once, and only once did she draw him towards herself, and then, with a low moan of anguish, she fell back dead!

In the meantime Blueskin had hastened to the other combatant, who was known to him only by her Christian name, Julia.

Her condition was bad, indeed, but not so desperate as her rival's.

"A surgeon ought to be had here at once," said Blueskin. Then, turning to the terrified postilions, he added, "Ride one of you to the nearest town, and bring one here without delay."

Jack Sheppard knelt down by the head of the injured wife, and with his hands gently put back her hair, which was streaming over her face.

As he did so, his ears caught a faint sound coming from her lips.

Still lower he bent his head and listened.

"A surgeon! a surgeon!" she said. "Quick! fetch one, or I die!"

"All is well," said Jack, soothingly, "the postilions have departed in search of one."

At this moment her husband approached.

His appearance was grief-stricken in the extreme.

"We will leave you," said Blueskin, "to your own thoughts. Should both of these be brought to death, you will be morally their murderer. Now, Jack, mount, and let us be off."

Charles, the husband, said not a word in reply to Blueskin. It is questionable, indeed, if he understood the purport of his speech.

In obedience to his comrade's words, Jack left his position at the woman's head, and went towards the horses.

"We had best be off at once," said Blueskin, "before others arrive; and we have got no time to lose, for look, some one is coming now."

"There is. Which way shall we go?"

"Back to London."

"Agreed."

A sharp application of the spurs made the horses set forward at a good gallop.

For some moments not a word was said, but when they drew in a little, and were beyond all signs or sounds of human beings, Jack said—

"Well, Blue, this has been my first adventure on the road. Heaven knows it has been a strange one!"

"You are right."

"It is an incident that would furnish material for much thought."

"No one knows," said Blueskin, "how many little domestic tragedies are daily enacted. You see we have come across one of them."

"And about one of the strangest, I should think."

"Does it appear so to you?"

"Yes."

"And you have the clue to the whole affair. Now, how incomprehensible it will appear to those who will arrive upon the scene!"

"True."

"Altogether, I am much vexed at it."

"Why?"

"Because it cannot fail to be productive of trouble to us."

"In what way?"

"We have allowed several persons to see us distinctly, and for a long enough time for them to be able to give a minute and accurate description of us."

"Very true."

"The little episode we have witnessed to-night will attract a great deal of attention among all classes, and the utmost pains will be taken to apprehend us, not merely for the sake of the robbery, but because we are mixed up in it, and may be supposed in a position to explain things."

"But there is the husband."

"He will be careful what he says, you may depend. He will have no desire to criminate himself."

"But the postilions?"

"They know something of the affair, it is true, but for all that we shall be looked close after. Now, I am vexed all the more about that in consequence of the pains I have taken to disguise myself."

"Now you will have to find another."

"I know I shall, but ten to one if I find one so good."

"Why not return to your proper character?"

"Jonathan Wild."

"What of him? Sooner or later he must learn the secret of your return to life, and I do not see what object you would gain in keeping it from him."

"Nor I, now. Of course you know why I assumed it?"

"I do," said Jack; "it was to seek for Bess. In the strange events which have just happened I lost sight of her for a moment. Oh! Blake, tell me where I am to look to find her!"

"Alas! I know not. However, we are in a better position to make our inquiries than we were."

"How much have you taken?"

"I cannot tell."

"Look."

"It is pretty fair. It will be best to defer till we reach London."

"But where do you propose to go? What steps do you intend to take?"

"I am at a loss to say. I did not think when I spoke. We shall have to be very careful, or you will be made a prisoner."

"What shall we do? Where shall we turn?"

"I can tell no better than yourself. She has disappeared, and left not the slightest clue by which she may be traced."

"Do give me hope."

"Certainly! We must set to work, and think into whose hands she is most likely to have fallen."

"Lord Donnull's?"

"Possibly, or into those of some other of Jonathan Wild's agents."

"I am perplexed," said Jack; "but from this moment I will take an oath to do nothing, have nothing in view but her discovery. Towards that end I shall turn all my thoughts and actions. It remains for you to say whether you will aid me."

"You know I will, Jack; my motive may not be quite so powerful a one as yours, but it is nearly."

Jack grasped his comrade's hand. It was all he could do towards expressing his thanks.

"And now you bring me back to my first question, what shall we do?"

"One moment," said Blueskin.

"What is it?"

"Listen."

"I do."

"Can you hear nothing?"

"Now I can. It is the grinding of wheels."

"Yes, some other vehicle is approaching us. Look, there are the lamps."

"I see them!"

"Draw aside, Jack."

"No!"

"No! why not?"

"Did you think of stopping it?"

"Certainly; we cannot get too much booty."

"My friend, we have sufficient for our immediate wants—let that suffice."

"I do not see any reason for letting this go by."

"You may not, but Blake, my friend, I want to devote the whole of my energies to the task of finding Edgworth Bess. Let all other things be forgotten, or unheeded. Will you promise me this?"

"I will if you wish it, though I don't see why our stopping the carriage, or whatever it is that is coming, should interfere with that task in any way."

"Do you not?"

"I do not, but still I am willing to give way to you. We are under no necessity that I know of. But when you come out upon the road, you should do all you can and then be off."

"We have already done enough."

"A little more, then, won't make much difference."

"Be guided by me. Let this pass by unmolested."

"I consent."

"I am glad of that. The same good luck we have hitherto had may desert us, and should either of us be captured, wounded, or killed, there would be an end to all."

"Do not be timid. But I can tell you are apprehensive, and so on that very account, it will, I daresay, be best to avoid the encounter."

"I am sure."

"But for all that I think it would be better for us to draw up under the shadow of the hedge and let it pass."

"I see no reason why we should court observation."

"It will be prudent to avoid it."

"There seems to be a lane just a little further on, on your left hand."

"It looks as if there was."

"We will ride forward and see. If it should turn out that we are right, we will back our horses into it and there wait while it passes."

A dozen steps brought them to the place in question, which, as they had fully expected, proved to be a lane.

They had just time to walk their horses a pace or two into it and turn round, when the carriage arrived.

It was going at full speed.

Perhaps it was only natural that both Jack and Blueskin should look upon the approaching vehicle with more than common curiosity, but, whether it was or not, they did so. On it came like a huge cloud.

It swept past the top of the lane with great velocity.

As it did so, however, a terrific and bewildering scream reached their ears—so loud, so shrill, so piercing, that it was distinctly heard above the trampling of the horses and the rumbling of the wheels.

CHAPTER CVIII.

OUR TWO FRIENDS MEET RATHER UNEXPECTEDLY WITH JONATHAN WILD ON BLACKFRIAR'S-BRIDGE.

"WHAT does that mean?" asked Jack, as soon as he sufficiently recovered the shock of the surprise to speak.

"What does that mean, eh, Blue?"

"I no more know than you do. It was some one in the carriage."

"Beyond all doubt."

"And a female!"

"What a rate they are going at, to be sure. Why they are almost out of sight."

"Yes; they have increased their speed, I think."

"And the girl—I am sure it was a girl."

"So am I."

"Why did she shriek out so dreadfully?"

"Heaven only knows. Perhaps she was being carried off by force."

"But, then, if it was against her will, you would think her abductors would take care that she gave utterance to no such cry as that, which would be the means of calling immediate attention to them."

"That may be, but it is just possible those means may not have been sufficient, or that she may have taken advantage of some unexpected circumstance."

"There was but one cry."

"Only one, and that one seemed as though it had been stopped suddenly."

"It is very strange."

"You may well think that. There is only one thing I regret."

"What is that?"

"That I did not refuse your request, and carry out my original intention of stopping the carriage."

"But think what fresh difficulties we might have got into."

"I do; but you ought to think, as well, that we might have been the means of getting some one out of one."

Alas! Blueskin little thought how perfectly right he was, and how materially the whole aspect of affairs would have been changed if he had stopped the carriage.

But fate, destiny, providence, or whatever name you may choose to call mysterious chance, had decreed otherwise.

Had he have stopped the carriage, much future misery would have been averted.

Perhaps the reader already guesses who was the inmate of the carriage.

It was Edgworth Bess.

By what strange succession of events she became so, we have yet to relate.

The doings of others have compelled us to leave her for some time, but ere long we shall be able, for a period, to devote ourselves exclusively to her strange fortunes.

Little did Jack think, as the carriage whirled by, and the shriek smote upon his ear, that she of whom he was in search was so close to him, and in greater peril than she had ever been before, or that that awful heart-bursting scream came from her lips.

Little did he think what he had missed by not acting in accordance with Blueskin's wishes.

The sounds of the receding vehicle died away into the silence of the night.

It was not until it had fairly done so that the two friends moved.

The discontinuance of the sound to which they had been listening seemed to have the effect of breaking the kind of spell that was upon them.

"It's very strange," said Blueskin, as he walked his horse out of the lane into the middle of the high-road, and there halted. "I don't feel at all at ease. I have half a mind now to gallop after it."

"Nonsense!" replied Jack, "that can do no good. Besides, they have got too good a start for us to hope to overtake them in anything like a reasonable distance, to say nothing of the danger of revisiting the spot where the duel took place."

"Well—well! I suppose we must go back to London now."

"That is it," said Jack; "but let us go slowly, so that we can talk. Where shall we go to in London?"

"It will not do to go to the "Black Lion."

"By no means!"

"I think I can manage now. Do you know Gilbert's passage?"

"Whereabouts is it?"

"At the back of Clare-market."

"I know it very well; but you do not think of going there, do you?"

"Why not?"

"It is so close to Drury-lane!"

"So much the better!"

"Do you think so?"

"I am sure! We shall be less likely to be suspected there!"

"As you will!"

"If you agree to that, the best thing we can do now is to make our way there direct, for it will be daylight by the time we arrive."

"What then?"

"We must lie by during the day, and as soon as it is dark, we must sally out and try if we cannot be successful in finding some trace of the missing girl."

"I shall not know what rest is until we find her!"

"I can understand your anxiety, but, Jack, you ought to remember that, unless you are careful to preserve your own powers, you will fall an easy prey into the hands of your enemies."

"True—true!"

"Get all the rest you can!"

"But when we start out, what course shall we adopt?"

"That it would be hard to say until the time comes. During the next twelve hours or so, something may turn up to give us the clue we want!"

"I trust there may!"

"And so do I?"

"Have you any hopes of such a thing?"

"No particular hope, but still it is probable such a thing might happen."

"But suppose the day should pass away and night come, and find us in the same state as we are now, what should you do?"

"What should you?"

"I know not, hardly."

"There is but one plan that I can think of."

"And what is that?"

"We have tolerable evidence that she reached Warwick-lane."

"We have that she reached Newgate-market."

"Well, that is much the same thing. It next remains to consider, upon finding herself there, what direction would she be likely to take."

"There it is! For my own part, I think it most likely that she was in such a state of mental agitation and confusion, that she would take the first course that came."

"There is a strong probability of that, but no more than that the "Black Lion" rose before her mind, and that she made the best of her way there."

"But she never reached it."

"I know that, but it does not follow that she did not set out with the intention of doing so. She may have been intercepted. You must know, as well as I do, that it is by no means safe for a girl to pass through London streets alone at such an hour."

"I do know it—I do know it, and when I think of the fearful dangers she would likely enough encounter, my heart grows sick within me!"

"Cheer up. All may not be so bad as you anticipate. She may have fallen into good hands."

"She may, but I fear she has not."

"Why?"

"Because, if she had, she would have sent word to the 'Black Lion,' knowing how uneasy I should be on her account. No, my friend; you cannot cheat me with that hope."

"I would fain do so. Let us return to our search."

"We will assume, then, first of all that she started for the 'Black Lion.'"

"Well?"

"To reach it she would doubtless take the main thoroughfares."

"Ludgate-hill, Fleet-street, and the Strand."

"Just so. We will then, step by step, go the whole of the distance, taking that route, and on our way make every inquiry we possibly can. If she has gone that way we shall assuredly hear some tidings of her."

"Oh! you fill me with joy! Let us make the attempt at once."

"Not so, and for many reasons. In the first place, it would be in the highest degree unsafe for you to show yourself by daylight; and, in the second, as it was night when she went, it naturally follows that night is the most proper time for us to set about making our inquiries."

"So it does."

"Keep yourself as calm and cool all the day as you possibly can. When night comes, I trust we shall learn something that will lift this load from our hearts."

"Until I knew her," said Jack, "my life had no aim or purpose, but since then I have been quite changed, and, had circumstances permitted, should have been a different being to what I am. I love her, and I will devote the whole of my life to shield her from all harm, stand between her and her enemies, and fight her battles, until I succeed in restoring her to that wealth and dignity from which she has been so unjustly debarred."

"You are a noble fellow, Jack," said Blueskin, deeply impressed by the earnest manner in which his companion had spoken. "You are a noble fellow, and it is a thousand pities that you have been spoilt, and your better feelings warped as they have been. Like you, I have the interest of my master's child at heart. Like you, I shall live for no other object than to see her restored to her rights."

There was a silence after these words were uttered, and they trotted on to Blackfriars-bridge a few minutes afterwards.

Already was the morning light making itself perceptible. Over the surface of the Thames there hung a slight mist.

They had gained about the centre of the bridge when they heard, on the hard stony roadway, the clattering of horses' feet.

Simultaneously they looked before them, for it was from that direction that the sounds came.

A party of six well-mounted men were coming over.

Our friends drew aside to allow them to pass them, if they would, unnoticed, but one of the horsemen who rode in advance of the others spurred his horse on towards them.

"Hullo!" he said. "Have you met any one on the road? Answer me, in the king's name. I am Jonathan Wild!"

CHAPTER CIX.

TAKES A GLANCE AT SOME OF THE PAST PROCEEDINGS OF JONATHAN WILD.

In order to account for the unexpected and embarrassing appearance of Jonathan Wild upon the old bridge at Blackfriars, and before we relate what took place thereupon, it will be necessary for us to go back a little, and take a glance at his late proceedings, for, as the reader cannot fail to have observed, he has not occupied our attention lately.

In order, therefore, to preserve the chronological sequence of our narrative, we ought to go back to the time when he discovered the remains of the young man who had been so barbarously murdered.

As may be readily imagined, he did not fail to make as much of that affair as he possibly could, and take all the credit to himself.

Indeed, upon this occasion, he made a more than ordinary amount of fuss, for it was only by so doing once now and then that he succeeded in blinding the eyes of the authorities to his other questionable transactions.

The authorities, too, happened to require something of the sort from Jonathan, for they had expressed their disapprobation of his doings rather audibly, in consequence, not so much of what they had themselves seen, but of what the numerous complaints from the inhabitants set forth.

This lucky stroke, however, had the effect of completely satisfying all parties, and those who had said the most against him were now foremost in their praises of him.

In fact, it was just about this time that the popularity of Wild was at its culminating point, from which its decline was extremely rapid.

Lord Ingestrie never forgot the money it had cost him to get back his diamond necklace. Indeed, we cannot well see how he could forget, for he was an impoverished nobleman, and at times almost at his wits end for money.

Indeed, it is wonderful how he stood up against such a loss. Few knew the straits to which he was reduced.

The necklace would never have been redeemed at all, but it was an heir-loom, and many families knew that he possessed it. Lady Ingestrie never went anywhere without wearing it, and so had it been missed the most uncharitable construction would have been placed upon it, and though the story of its having been stolen might have been received and openly apparently believed, yet behind their backs hints of a very disagreeable nature would be dropped.

But the precious necklace once back, even at so great a price, his lordship determined, not so much out of desire to do the public service as procure his own revenge, his lordship, we say, determined to make an effort to put an end to that sort of thing, and it was mainly owing to his exertions that the Act of Parliament was framed and passed which made the carrying on of Wild's business so difficult as it afterwards became.

This Stansbury affair, however, for a time rendered all that he had done of no avail, for Jonathan, at his own expense, caused a number of pamphlets to be printed, professing to give an authentic account of the matter, and in which the most unmeasured praise was awarded to himself.

It is much to be regretted that there is not one of these little books extant. Now it would prove both interesting and instructive, as well as give a still better idea of what the man was like.

None knew better than he did the value and importance of following up an advantage gained.

Accordingly, he looked about him for some means by which he could apparently render the public still further service; nor was he long in finding what he sought.

We think it will be best given in the words of a writer of the period, who says—

"The vast increase and extensive circulation of counterfeit money some years ago was too obvious not to have attracted the notice of all ranks.

"It had become an enormous evil in the melancholy catalogue of crimes which the laws of the country were called upon to assist the police to suppress.

"Its extent almost exceeded credibility, and the dexterity and ingenuity of the coiners had (after considerable practice) enabled them to finish the different kinds of base money in so masterly a manner that it had become extremely difficult for a common observer to distinguish their spurious manufacture from the genuine silver of the mint.

"So systematic, too, had this nefarious traffic become, that the great dealers, who were in most instances the employers of the coiners, executed orders for the town and country with the same regularity as manufacturers in fair branches of trade.

"Scarcely a waggon or coach departed from the metropolis which did not carry boxes and parcels of base coin to the camps, seaports, and manufacturing towns.

"In London regular markets in various public and private houses were held by the principal dealers, where hawkers, pedlars, fraudulent horse dealers, unlicensed lottery-office keepers, gamblers at fairs, itinerant Jews, Irish labourers, servants of toll gatherers, and hackney coach owners, fraudulent publicans, market women, rabbit sellers, fish criers, barrow women, and many who could not be suspected, were regularly supplied with counterfeit copper and silver, with the advantage of nearly £100 per cent. in their favour, and thus it happened that through these various channels the country was deluged with immense quantities of base money.

"The mischief arising from counterfeiting the current coin of the realm reaches to every door. A poor man cheated by a single base shilling frequently sustains a loss greater than a forgery to the wealthy merchant.

"Coining or uttering base money is high treason in the second degree.

"To rob all the people is to be a traitor to the state."

The above-quoted author, William Baldwin, an attorney-at-law, who gave the subject the closest attention, a little further on writes as follows:—

"It has been discovered that there are at least one hundred and twenty persons in the metropolis and in the country employed principally in coining and selling base money, and this, independent of the numerous horde of utterers, who chiefly support themselves by passing it at its full value. It will scarcely be credited that, of criminals of this latter class who were either detected, prosecuted, or convicted within the last seven years, there stood upon the register of the Solicitor of the Mint more than six hundred and fifty names!

"When the reader is informed that two persons can finish from £200 to £300 (nominal value) in base silver in six days, and takes into calculation the number of known coiners, the aggregate amount in the course of the year will be found to be immense."

Some very interesting particulars are then given, and which, had we the space, we should willingly quote. But we must refrain from doing so. Our object was merely, by quoting from this author, to show the reader to what an insufferable extent the practice had been carried, and in order that, looking at things as they now are, they should not undervalue what Jonathan did.

The prevalence of counterfeit coin was about the greatest evil then in existence, and there was no one who did not feel the effects of it at some time or the other.

The result of this was, that for some time past there had been a very popular outcry against the "smashers," as the utterers of bad money were called, and the government was called upon to take some more energetic measures to suppress the evil.

This, then, was the chance which Jonathan seized upon, in order to thoroughly ingratiate himself into the favour of the public.

The policy of this must be at once obvious to all.

Situated as Jonathan was, and having so many spies in all parts of the kingdom, it was not long before he received intelligence of the whereabouts of an extensive gang of coiners and utterers of base coin.

These he resolved to make the stepping-stones to his popularity, by bringing to speedy justice.

Taking all his measures with the utmost precaution, and laying his plans with the greatest care, he succeeded in effecting their capture at the very moment they were engaged in their illegal trade.

Upon these offenders being lodged in prison, the legislature awoke at last to the fact that something by way of example must be done to these men, in order to strike terror into the hearts of others.

Accordingly, when placed upon their trial, they were found guilty of high treason, and sentenced to death.

That this was an extreme penalty for such an offence must be conceded, but, at the same time, it is necessary to bear in view the gigantic proportions which this evil had assumed.

These men were duly executed, and then all felt that coming would be at an end, in consequence of which Jonathan rose to a still greater height than ever he had dreamed of.

And so, while things were prospering so well with the villainous thief-taker, those three persons in whom we feel so deep an interest were sinking into deeper and deeper trouble.

But surely the day will shortly come when—

The wronged shall be righted,
No wrong unrequited.

For the coming of that day, however, we must wait in patience. At present, darkness enshrouds the horizon, through which not the faintest glimmering of light is perceptible.

These matters occupied nearly the whole of Jonathan's attention, when he would fain have directed it in a totally different channel; but he felt the opportunity was too favourable to be lost.

Then the reader of this narrative will doubtless be able to account for the manner in which he spent his time up to that moment when, on returning to his domicile, he had been seriously wounded by some one in the garb of a gentleman, and whose face was perfectly unknown to him.

CHAPTER CX.

JONATHAN UNEXPECTEDLY FINDS THE CLUE TO THE MYSTERIOUS EVENTS WHICH SO PUZZLED HIM.

It will not be forgotten that Blueskin gave the thief-taker such a thrust with his sword that the weapon passed completely through his breast near the shoulder, and pinned him to the front door, against which he had been leaning.

Then Steggs, seeing his old foe so helpless, and unable to defend himself, had struck him a violent blow in the face with his fist, which rendered him insensible.

How Blueskin then withdrew his sword, and darted out into the street, followed by his two companions, we have already related.

Jonathan Wild fell down on the floor of his own hall like a corpse.

The janizaries who happened to be in the house, hearing his summons, and other sounds indicative that all was not going on just as it should, had hastened to the scene of action.

But they were in the upper portion of the house, and so rapid was Blueskin in all his movements, that, when they descended, they saw nothing but the open door, and Jonathan and Quilt Arnold lying as though dead upon the floor.

Their immediate and most natural impulse, therefore, was to surround their leader.

He was bleeding profusely, and showed no signs of vitality.

Quilt Arnold, however, was rapidly recovering himself, and by the time he was unbound was well enough to be able to give them some idea of what had happened.

Thereupon, one or two ran to the door and listened, but all was quite silent.

To attempt a pursuit would be folly.

And so they turned the whole of their attention to Jonathan.

In course of a little time, and under judicious treatment, he came to himself.

Of the horrible pain he suffered, and the still more horrible curses which he uttered, it is not our intention to say a word.

Let it suffice that the wound turned out not to be so serious a one as it looked. It had not touched any vital part, nor did it interfere in any way with his breathing or moving.

His iron constitution quickly enabled him to triumph over it, and in less time than any one would have believed possible, he was about as usual.

But his temper, never by any chance a very amiable one, was by no means improved by this little incident, and he had no especial cause for vexation.

It was his wish to appear to his men to be invincible, and for a long time he had preserved the character, but he had met with several reverses lately, which tended to very seriously damage this equivocal reputation.

This was the feeling, then, that made his mind rise superior to the ills of his body, and the instant he was able to move he did so, altogether ignoring the advice of his medical attendant upon the subject.

The first thing he learned was that the mysterious personage he had encountered had made a burglarious attack upon his cells, and released the two prisoners who were confined there.

But although this troubled him much, there was something that troubled him still more.

Who could this unknown individual be who had successfully performed the hazardous exploit, and what was his motive for doing it.

He was perfectly bewildered.

He could think of nothing.

That the richly-attired stranger was no other than his old lieutenant and associate, Blueskin, never for one moment entered his mind; in fact, he was about as confident that he had given him his death wound as he was of anything.

Further thought only seemed still further to perplex him, and so at last he had to give it up in despair.

He was compelled to do this by the other matters that were pressing upon him and requiring his immediate attention.

There was Edgworth Bess.

Jack Sheppard.

Lord Donnull.

Of the first he could obtain no intelligence at all.

Of the second, he learned that he had been seen at Johnson's, in Drury-lane, and that he had in some mysterious manner managed to elude recapture.

He instantly determined to proceed to the "Black Lion" himself. He felt certain he was concealed somewhere on the premises, and trusted to his own acuteness to un-kennel him.

But when he reached it, it was just after Jack and Blueskin had departed upon their highway expedition.

Of course, not a word was said to him about it by the landlord, who was the only person in the secret of their having left, and of course no opposition was made to Wild's ransacking the house.

But Johnson's easy manner alone was almost enough to convince Wild that the prey he sought was secure, but just for satisfaction he looked closely about him.

The hiding-place in the stairs, however, was not discovered by him. It would require a closer examination than that which he upon this occasion made to detect it.

Eight men had accompanied him upon this little expedition, and when the search was over, he took the precaution of leaving three behind him to act as sentinels.

On reaching the street he looked carefully about him, but no signs of those he sought could be seen.

He stood for a moment undecided how to act.

He still clung to the idea that Jack had not left the neighbourhood.

While thus in thought, he felt a slight touch upon his arm.

Looking round to see who it was, he perceived one of those miserable-looking specimens of humanity which are now and then to be seen hanging about public-houses.

His clothes hung about him in tattered rags.

His feet were shoeless.

His eyes bleared and bloodshot.

His countenance full of furrows, in every one of which was an accumulation of dirt.

"Mr. Wild, Mr. Wild," he said, in hoarse, croaking, yet cringing accents.

"Ya—ah!"

"Mr. Wild!"

"Be off."

"I have something to tell you, Mr. Wild."

"Ha! What is it? Speak! Tell me," said Jonathan, suddenly turning round, and clutching the wretched being by the arm.

"Don't hurt me, Mr. Wild, and I will tell you."

"Be quick, then."

"You will give me something to drink if the news is worth anything to you?"

"Curse you! yes. Let me hear what you know."

"You didn't notice me in the 'Black Lion,' did you? Ah! there's many an hour I've spent there."

[EDGORTH BESS IS RESCUED BY COLONEL THORNE.]

"Ya—ah!"
 "And many a guinea, too."
 "Ya—ah! Stop; tell me what you know. Have you seen anything?"
 "Yes, Mr. Wild."
 "What?"
 "Well, while I was sitting in the front room near the door, at the beginning of the evening, I saw Johnson go to the door."
 "Go on!"
 "I am, Mr. Wild. I fancied something was the matter, so I made up my mind to keep my eyes open."
 "And what did you see?"
 "Two tip-top gents follow him to the doorstep, and then, after talking to each other a moment, went off."
 "Tell me more!" said Wild, impatiently, for he felt he was on the right scent now, "tell me more, I say."
 "Johnson came in again."
 "And you saw these two gents spoke to him?"
 "Yes, Mr. Wild."

"Could you hear what was said?"
 "Partly, Mr. Wild."
 "What did you hear then? Quick! tell me, and you shall have a guinea."
 "A guinea?"
 "Go on, I say!"
 "You are joking with me."
 "If you don't tell me what you heard them say, and that at once," cried Wild, fiercely, "I will twist your head off!"
 "Oh! Mr. Wild, don't. I'll tell you all, indeed I will."
 "Quick, then!"
 "It was the tones, Mr. Wild, more than anything else, that struck me. It was a voice that I knew well, for I have heard it many times."
 "Whose voice?" thundered Jonathan.
 "Your head man's—Blueskin."
 "Blueskin!"
 "Yes, I recognised it in a moment."

"Impossible," said Wild; "he is dead!"

"No, I knew the tones."

"How was he dressed?"

"I only just caught sight of him. He was a real tall gentleman, with gold lace on his hat, and a maroon-coloured coat, with ruffles."

"A hideous roar, such as might have come up from the throat of some enraged wild animal, burst from Jonathan's lips."

A light burst upon him.

He knew now who his mysterious assailant was. He recognised the description instantly.

Blueskin was not, as he thought, dead.

His men, who had crowded round him when the old man had addressed him, now listened with great eagerness for what should follow next.

CHAPTER

RELATES HOW JACK SHEPPARD WAS TAKEN PRISONER BY JONATHAN WILD, AND HOW BLUESKIN ESCAPED CAPTURE BY JUMPING OFF BLACKFRIARS-BRIDGE INTO THE THAMES.

"And the other!" said Wild, furiously. "What was he like?"

"A boy."

"Ah!"

"I've seen him before, Mr. Wild, though he was dressed better than usual then."

"Where have you seen him?"

"With Blueskin and Johnson, Mr. Wild."

"That's Jack then, by all that's damnable! But you do not tell me what you heard them say! Speak! Did you catch any words?"

"Only one or two, Mr. Wild."

"Tell me enough to put me on the track, and you shall name your own reward!"

"I heard them mention some one's name," said the besotted being, before whose clouded brain swept dim visions of unlimited drink. "I heard them mention some one's name."

"Well?"

"A girl's name, I take it."

"What was it? Quick! do not palter with me! Quick! what name was it, I say?"

"Bess!"

"I am right, then! Oh! but they shall pay dearly for this! Doubtless they think themselves very cunning and clever, and a match for Jonathan Wild, but I'll show them the reverse, for when they have circumvented me they will have but one more to out-manceuvre!"

"I know more, Mr. Wild," said the sot. "I can tell you more! I heard more!"

"Speak, then, in the fiend's name! What was it?"

"I heard Blueskin, for Blueskin I am sure it was, say, 'My first place will be the livery stables in Long-acre!'"

"Did you hear that?"

"Yes, Mr. Wild."

"Then why did you keep it back until now? Forward, my men, we have found the track at last! I know the place he speaks of, and it will go hard with me if I do not find out where they are! Forward!"

"But my reward, Mr. Wild?" said the old man, "you said I should name my own reward."

"I will save you the trouble, and give it you in full," said Jonathan, brutally.

As he spoke, he struck the poor wretch a violent blow on the head with his bludgeon.

He fell to the ground like a corpse.

This outbreak of gratuitous ferocity seemed to have a mollifying effect upon Wild's temper.

He laughed.

Then strode off with his men at his heels in the direction of Long-acre.

He knew the stables well. He had many a time hired horses from the keeper of them, and so, without any hesitation or delay, he went direct to Charles-street.

Under the low archway, into the spacious paved yard he passed.

Even as Blueskin himself would have done, he gave a peculiar whistle.

It was immediately responded to by the appearance of the ostler, who always sat up during the night in order to receive the cattle when they returned.

The man carried in his hand a large stable lantern.

He held it up high above his head, as he cried—

"Who's there?"

Jonathan did not speak, but glided forward, so that the full force of the lantern's rays should fall upon his hideous physiognomy.

He gave it, too, the most horrible expression he possibly could.

The man drew back with a faint cry of dread.

Jonathan's name and face were well known to every person in London.

Indeed, the latter once seen could never be forgotten. It made too deep an impression on the mind for that.

"Ya-ah," he snarled. "You know me?"

"Yes, Mr. Wild. If you please, sir."

"Ya-ah."

"Do you want anything, Mr. Wild?"

"Yes; and mind you speak the truth."

"Oh! I will, sir."

"Or you shall swing at Tyburn next sessions, and you must know, when I promise any one that, they are as good as scragged already."

"Yes, Mr. Wild."

"Answer me, then! Two persons came here to-night and hired two horses. Don't attempt to deny that! I know it, and, moreover than that, know who those two men are."

"You—you are right, Mr. Wild," said the ostler, who had but a vague and undefined idea of the extent of Wild's powers of mischief.

"Ya-ah. Now then; tell me the truth, as you value your life. Which way did they take?"

"I don't know, Mr. Wild."

"Seize him, then," cried Jonathan to his men. "To Newgate with him; he shall suffer for his ignorance."

"No—no, Mr. Wild! Spare me!"

"Tell me which way they went then."

"They only trotted out into Long-acre, Mr. Wild. I saw no more of them."

"Did you hear nothing that would enable you to guess?"

"No, Mr. Wild, except that they said something about the Kent-road."

"The Kent-road?"

"Yes, Mr. Wild."

"Ass—dolt. Why did you not mention this before?"

"Mercy—mercy."

"Are you sure you heard them mention the Kent-road?"

"Quite sure, Mr. Wild. But I didn't pay no sort of attention, because you see it was no business of mine."

"Six horses!" yelled Jonathan. "Make haste, villain. Six horses! Saddle them at once! They are for the king's service! My men will help! Quick! We shall catch them yet!"

Jonathan's myrmidons at once released their prisoner, and followed him into the stable.

There was no lack of horses, so six were quickly caparisoned and led out.

Jonathan was full of impatience.

The delay, trifling as it was, chafed him.

He vaulted into the saddle.

Then, striking his spurs into his horse's flanks, he cried—

"Follow me! To the Kent-road! Forward! Forward!"

His men knew better than to dally, and they dashed after him almost before they had got their seats.

Straight towards Blackfriars-bridge he went.

By the time they reached it, his men had got into proper order, and as they went they formed quite a military-looking cavalcade.

How they met Blueskin and Jack Sheppard upon the bridge, as they were returning from their night excursion, we have already related.

In the dim, misty light, Wild did not immediately recognise them.

But he rode forward in order to assure himself, and addressed them.

The near approach enabled him to see that one of the horsemen was the mysterious visitant to his own house.

The other he did not for a moment doubt was Jack Sheppard.

"Seize them!" he yelled. "Do not allow them to escape! Seize them!"

"Fight for your life and liberty," shouted Blueskin, drawing his sword.

Jack immediately followed his example.

Then ensued one of the most desperate combats that could be imagined.

Hemmed in as they were, flight was out of the question.

By keeping close to the parapet of the bridge, however, they prevented their enemies getting behind.

But the odds were three to one.

Odds too great for them to have the hope of proving victors.

Still they fought with the utmost desperation.

To be deprived of liberty just at that moment would be destructive in the extreme.

But it very soon became evident that such would be the case.

Jack was suddenly disarmed and made a prisoner.

Single-handed, to have attempted his rescue would have been the height of folly.

But how was he to escape sharing his fate?

His foes were pressing with redoubled vigour upon him.

He resolved upon a desperate expedient.

It was perilous, but then he thought his position could hardly be worse than it then was.

Freeing one foot from the stirrup, he, at the same instant, swept his sword around him with such resistless fury, that a circle was left for a brief instant by it.

Taking advantage of that small interval of time, he took out his other foot, and placed it on the parapet of the bridge.

Then, with a violent effort, he sprang over into the river.

So astounded were Wild's men by this feat, that they stood as if turned to stone, until they heard the heavy splash below, which told them that his body had reached the water.

Jonathan was the first to recover himself, for he had been as much taken aback as his men.

"Guard your prisoner!" he cried. "Look that he does not escape. The rest of you follow me."

As he thus spoke, and without waiting to see whether his hasty commands were attended to, he galloped to the end of the bridge.

Then, dismounting, he ran round the corner to where the steps descended to the water's edge.

Two of his men held Jack firmly.

The other three followed close at his heels.

Down the wet, slippery steps he dashed like a madman. It is the greatest wonder in the world that he did not miss his footing and fall headlong to the bottom.

But he did not.

The mist that hung upon the surface of the Thames baffled his vision.

With straining eyes he strove to pierce it.

"Boat, your honour?" said a sleepy voice. "Want a boat, your honour?"

CHAPTER CXII.

EDGORTH BESS FINDS SUCCOUR, EVEN AT THE ELEVENTH HOUR, BUT DOES NOT REACH THE TERMINATION OF HER PERILS.

SHRIEK after shriek burst from the lips of poor Edgorth Bess, as the Mohawks continued their diabolical sport.

But so far from desisting in consequence, they persevered the more, and replied to her screams of agony by shouts of wild maniac laughter.

It was in vain she tried to escape the sharp points of the swords, and when she instinctively drew back, it was only to have her progress stopped by another weapon entering her back.

Yet none of these wounds were serious ones, though they caused her intolerable pain and fright.

In vain she asked for mercy.

A deaf ear was turned to her supplications.

But suddenly, when she felt that she was about to faint, there was the hurried dash of horses' footsteps from the direction of Temple-bar.

The sound reached not only the ears of the poor girl, and filled her with new hope, but it reached her tormentors also.

They paused a moment.

That moment was enough.

Before it had expired a horseman dashed into their midst.

He was fully armed.

His long heavy sword was drawn, and he laid about him with terrible effect.

With a cry of joy, Edgworth Bess sprang forward and grasped the horse's bridle.

Instinctively she recognised the rider as a deliverer.

"Whoop! whoop! ahoy!" shouted the Mohawks. "Down with him, lads! down with him! Whoop! ahoy!"

Clashing their swords together, they pressed forward to the attack.

But the stranger, who had so opportunely made his appearance upon the scene of action, stooped down, and with an apparently slight effort, lifted Bess on to his horse.

Then he whirled his ponderous weapon round his head, and the Mohawks fell before it like grain before the sickle.

His steed, too, he made to prance and rear in such a manner, that the villains could not reach him.

But well skilled in the art of defence as he was, he knew very well he could not obtain a permanent advantage over so many foes.

Watching his opportunity, then, and goading his horse almost to madness, he cut a way through the throng.

Right and left his sword flashed with inconceivable rapidity, and every time it came down one of his opponents fell to the earth.

He was clear.

The Mohawks, burning with rage, commenced an ineffectual pursuit.

At a tremendous gallop, the horse, making nothing of its double burden, dashed along the Strand.

In less than two minutes all sounds from the band of dissolute young men had died away.

Edgworth Bess was saved.

But by whom?

She had not seen his face.

She had not heard his voice.

But she felt that he was a friend.

And then the moment he lifted her upon his horse, and she felt that she was comparatively safe, her spirits failed her, and she fell into a swoon.

By whom had she been saved?

Into what hands had she fallen?

Had she found a friend and a protector?

Or had she found a foe and a persecutor?

These are questions which time alone can answer, but much can be judged from a person's appearance, and so we will take a glance at that of the girl's saviour.

There is now light enough in the sky for objects to be distinctly and clearly visible.

Just at the corner of Whitehall he pulled up, and bent down to look at his inanimate burden.

As he does so, the first thing that strikes the beholder is his immense proportions.

His height must be close upon, if not quite, six feet.

His form is well filled out.

His face large, square, and massive, with angular features, large, fierce-looking eyes, and deep lines about his mouth, betokening firmness and resolution.

In accordance with the almost universal fashion of the time, he wore a peruke.

The plain, three-cornered hat he wore allowed a broad forehead to be visible.

Then his arms, legs, and body would have befitted Hercules.

But yet there was nothing clumsy and ungainly about him. His proportions, although on so large a scale, were perfect.

His horse was a large, powerful creature, and more to be admired for its strength and endurance than its symmetry.

But as for the man himself, there was something about the expression of his countenance that was far from being pleasing.

Any one could have told at a glance that he was fitted to take the lead in any desperate enterprise.

Nor did he look like one who would permit any obstacle to stand long in the way, if it interfered at all with his designs.

"By heavens!" he said, in a deep, rough voice, "as pretty a face as ever I have seen! Beautiful! Who is she, I wonder? and how shall I restore her to her senses? Well made she is, too," he continued, as his eyes roamed over her person; "what a beautiful hand! I love her already! I will take her where she can be attended to. Ha! what is that?"

For the first time, he noticed that blood was flowing from her in many places.

"Is she dead?" he asked; "why the villains have wounded her! What did it mean, I wonder? I will be off with her at once, or may be I shall now be too late to save her."

Thus speaking, he made his way at an easy canter along Pall-mall to St. James's-street.

At the door of one of these houses he paused.

It was an imposing, aristocratic-looking edifice, and such as any nobleman might be proud of as a home.

His return seemed to have been expected by some one, for as soon as his horse was brought to a standstill, the door of the house was opened.

A man came forth.

He was dressed like a gentleman's servant, out of livery, but somehow he did not look to have either the face or form of one.

"Fennell!" cried the man on horseback.

"Yes, sir."

"Send Waldron to hold the horse, and call Mrs. Lovat."

"Yes, sir."

The man who had been called Fennell re-entered the house.

A moment afterwards another emerged, who took the horse by the bridle.

Making nothing of his burden, and holding it in his arms, the unknown dismounted with ease, and strode into the house.

The door was closed behind him.

Hurriedly crossing a large hall, he kicked open a door, and entered a room furnished in the most luxurious fashion conceivable.

A large bright fire was burning in the grate, while on the table was laid a slight repast.

The shutters were closed, and the curtains drawn, so that no trace of the faint daylight entered.

A candelabra standing in the centre of the table, and carrying about a dozen wax candles, brilliantly illuminated the apartment.

Near the window was a large couch, made after the capacious and comfortable fashion of our ancestors.

With more care and gentleness than one would have thought such a huge specimen of humanity possessed, the unknown laid Edgworth Bess upon it.

As he did so, she uttered a faint moan.

Just then some one tapped gently at the open door.

"Come in, Mrs. Lovat."

In obedience to this command, a thin, plain-looking woman, apparently fifty years of age, entered.

"Attend to her," said the unknown, in the manner of one used to commanding others. "You will know best what to do. If necessary, send for a surgeon."

This said, he at once left the room without vouchsafing the woman the least explanation.

But she was used to his ways.

The first thing she did was to make an examination of her charge.

Her pale and marble-like face attracted her attention for a moment, but it was quickly diverted to her body, from which the blood in many places was oozing slowly.

But the alarm she first felt was quickly dissipated, for she found the hurts to be all of a very superficial character.

She had her then carried upstairs into a bed-chamber, where her first care was to arouse her from her swoon, and then to wash and dress her wounds.

No words can depict the poor girl's astonishment upon opening her eyes.

She did so with a shudder, for she feared to see around her the fierce faces of the Mohawks.

Instead of that, however, she found herself environed by luxury, such luxury as she had never seen, perhaps even ever dreamed of.

But it was in vain she asked for some explanation; the woman, Mrs. Lovat, persisted in remaining silent.

Wearied out at length, Edgworth Bess fell into a deep slumber.

It was an unrefreshing sleep, and haunted by terrible dreams.

How long it lasted she knew not, but it must have been many hours.

When she awoke and looked around, she found herself alone.

The pain from her wounds had sensibly abated.

But she could tell she was fearfully weak. It was only by making a great effort that she could raise her hand.

The windows in the chamber were facing her.

They were covered with thick curtains, and through them penetrated a very faint, subdued light.

Wondering whether it was morning or evening, she was startled by a slight sound.

She turned her head in the direction from which it came, and saw the man who had rescued her from her great peril enter, and approach the bedside.

CHAPTER CXIII.

EDGWORTH BESS, WITHOUT DUE CAUSE, FORMS A BAD OPINION OF COLONEL THORNE.

It would seem that he had expected to find her sleeping, for when he saw her large, full eyes fixed upon him, he gave a start, and a partial air of confusion was visible in his manner.

And now, it must be borne in mind that Edgworth Bess did not catch the most transient glimpse of her preserver's face. She saw he was a man, and that was all.

So, with suspense and alarm struggling in her mind, she gazed upon the intruder.

The first sight she caught of his countenance repelled her.

Why it was she knew not.

As the poet says—

"Ye who know the reason, tell me,

How it is that instinct still,

Prompts the heart to like, or like not,

At its own capricious will?"

Tell me by what hidden magic,

Our impressions first are led

Into liking, or disliking,

Of before a word be said.

Is it instinct, or some spirit,

Which protects us, and controls

Every impulse we inherit

By some sympathy of souls?"

Is it instinct? is it nature?

Or some freak or fault of chance,

Which our liking, or disliking,

Limits to a single glance?"

Be the power what it may, it unquestionably exists, and Edgworth Bess felt in a moment that she was looking upon one who would prove no friend of hers.

But on the other side quite a different feeling took place.

As the unknown gazed upon the face of her whom he had saved, and saw how very fair and beautiful it was, a wild and passionate love sprang up in his bosom.

Finding he did not speak, Edgworth Bess commanded her voice sufficiently to do so, though the effort was almost beyond her strength.

"Is this your house?" she asked.

The stranger bowed as he replied—

"It is."

"For what reason, then, am I brought here?"

"Is it possible you cannot guess?"

"I cannot."

"Think back a little, then. What is the last thing you can recollect?"

Bess was silent a moment, during which she was endeavouring to separate what had really happened from the occurrences she had dreamed.

"I remember," she replied, slowly, "that I was hunted through the streets by a number of men—by their dress, gentlemen. They caught me near St. Clement's Church, and tried to murder me."

"What then?"
 "I felt almost dying, when I heard a horse's hoofs upon the road, and then some one dashed among my persecutors, lifted me on to his horse, and then—then—"
 "What then?"
 "I remember no more until I awoke, and found myself here."
 "Is it possible you do not remember who rescued you?"
 "I never saw him."
 "Never saw him?"
 "No, a mist was before my eyes. I saw some one, but who I have not the slightest idea."
 "It is strange. Did you hear his voice?"
 "I did not notice it. But why do you ask so many questions?"
 "Simply because"—
 "What?"
 "It was myself."

To say that Edgworth Bess did not anticipate this avowal would not be true. She dreaded, yet hoped she should not hear it.

In spite of her attempt to suppress it, a shudder of loathing passed over her.

But it was so slight that the unknown did not notice it. "It was myself," he said. "By chance I was riding down Fleet-street, when just as I passed under Temple-bar, I heard a succession of screams. My first impulse was to ride at full speed to see what was amiss. I saw you surrounded by a gang of ruffians. I dispersed them! Carried you off in safety! Found you bleeding and insensible! Had no idea where you lived, and brought you here!"

All that he said was reasonable enough, but yet, for the life of her, Bess could not find words wherewith to thank him.

And yet there was nothing in his conduct with which she could have found fault. Under the circumstances, no one could have acted otherwise.

But in the face of this there was the strong feeling of misliking which she had experienced when first her eyes had rested upon his countenance.

This feeling she strove to combat. "You must forgive me," she said, "for not remembering you. It was ungrateful of me."

"Nay, nay. I can easily understand"—

"And if I do not express my thanks to you for the great service and kindness you have rendered me in the manner that I ought, it is because I am unwell."

"I am sure you must be. Remain here, however, in peace until you feel yourself well enough to move. You must pardon my intrusion, but I fancied you still slept. I wished to assure myself that you were well, yet would not for the world have disturbed you."

"You did not disturb me," replied Bess; "I was awake, and wondering how I came here. Now I am at rest."

"It pleases me to hear you say as much, and now, before I leave you, there is one question I wish to ask of you."

"What is it, sir?"
 "I cannot but think that there must be those who are in deep trouble respecting your disappearance. Where is your home?"

Bess burst into tears. The stranger looked vexed.

"What have I said to distress you?" he asked.
 "I have no home!"

"No home?"
 "No; but there is one who will be full of anxiety to know where I am. His—his"—

"Where shall I find him?"
 "Will you assure him of my safety?"

"With your permission, yes."
 "Thanks, sir! I shall never be able to repay you."

"Do not talk of that. Who am I to tell that you are safe?"

"Jack."
 "Jack what?"

"Jack Sheppard!"

"Jack Sheppard!" said the unknown, repeating the name several times, "and where does he live?"

"You will find him at a public-house in Drury-lane, called the 'Black Lion,' and kept by a man named Johnson. If he—that is, Jack—is not there, leave word, and that will be enough."

"I will do it."
 "Thanks! thanks!"

"I will send a messenger there at once. Is there anything more? Do not be afraid to speak."

"There is nothing more."
 "I will go, then. Mrs. Lovat will attend to you. Good night."

"Good night, sir," said Bess, "if night it is."

"Yes, it is night."
 "How long, then, have I slept?"

"More than twelve hours."
 "More than twelve hours! Oh! sir, add still more to the obligation I am under to you by sending at once to Drury-lane."

"I will, you may depend upon it."
 The unknown then retired.

A vague, uncertain dread of something wrong pressed upon Bess's spirits.

Yet every consideration was shown her. She had met with nothing but fairness and kindness.

Over and over again did she reproach herself for having such feelings.

But she could not master them. If for a time she succeeded in driving them back, they only returned directly afterwards with double force.

It struck her as being rather strange that he had never asked her name, nor communicated his own.

That, however, might be only a natural omission. And so, without any new incident, the night wore away.

It was not until the middle of the day following that her preserver entered.

Bess was wonderfully better; indeed, she felt well enough to rise and dress, but was dissuaded from doing so by Mrs. Lovat.

There was no misunderstanding the eager inquiring look which she gave the stranger as he entered.

"I have sent," he said.
 "Yes—yes!"

"But the person you inquired for was not there."
 "But you left the message?"

"My man did."
 "That is right, then."

"And now," said the stranger, "I hope you will listen to me, and be not offended with what I say."

"I could not be so ungrateful to you."
 "Make, then, this house your home until such time as you feel yourself sufficiently recovered to leave it. Do not hesitate, I beg. You will still receive the same treatment as you have done hitherto."

"Accept my thanks, sir; but I think I shall be well enough to leave in the course of an hour or so. I should have risen this morning, only Mrs. Lovat expressly desired me not to do so."

"And she is right. Do not think of moving yet. Is there anything more that I can do for you? I hope you will excuse me making the remark, but ever since I saw you I have felt the greatest possible interest in you. This house is mine. My name is Thorne. Generally known as Colonel Thorne, though I am not now in the service. I have no friends and relatives of my own, and that will explain in a great measure the interest I feel in you."

This speech was a kind enough one, and sounded fair enough, but yet Bess could not divest herself of the idea that there was something more than could be seen at a first glance in this fairness and kindness.

The speech, too, was one which having contained a confidence, ought to receive one in return, and so she said—

"I must again thank you, sir, for all that you have said and done. I am a poor girl—an orphan—with but one friend in the world—the one to whom I sent a message. I have to work hard for a livelihood, and my occupation is that of a shroud-maker."

CHAPTER CXIV.

COLONEL THORNE BEGINS TO SHOW THE CLOVEN FOOT, AND EDGORTH BESS'S WORST SUSPICIONS ARE FULLY REALIZED.

COLONEL THORNE will, for the next few pages, play rather a prominent part in this narrative, and so we will devote a few lines to him especially.

Firstly, then, as he had said, the palatial-looking residence in St. James's-street was his, or rather, he occupied it.

Throughout it was furnished in a most luxurious and expensive style.

Among a certain set in London, there were few better known than Colonel Thorne, though from what source his income was derived, or in what regiment he had held a colonelcy was an inscrutable mystery.

But that he had abundant pecuniary resources was manifest to everybody who came in contact with him, for he spent money with a freedom and a lavishness that was utterly astounding.

It was, however, tolerably notorious among his friends that he had a very pretty residential estate, situated upon the cliffs, not far from Dover, and this place was at once the envy and admiration of all who saw it.

Here he passed a great deal of his time, being frequently absent from London months together.

During his stay, too, in this place, which was known as "The Larches," from the great quantity of those deciduous trees growing upon the estate, he lived in the strictest privacy, permitting no visitors to see him, or, in modern parlance, being "at home" to no one.

There were occasions, however, when he would throw open this place, and send invitations to his friends, but very rarely.

Still, the reputation of what he possessed was spread about.

The only point upon which public curiosity was unsatisfied, was his source of revenue.

He was known, while in London, to gamble a great deal, and some hinted that it was by this dishonourable means that he procured the wherewith to support him in his extravagances.

But there was a mystery about Colonel Thorne, and what that mystery was the reader will not be long in discovering.

Soon after the interview was over, and he left her, Bess determined to rise.

It was not that she felt so very well, though her wounds did not give her so much inconvenience as one would have thought, but she was full of anxiety to know where Jack was, and whether he had got free from the clutches of Jonathan Wild, for the reader will remember that when she saw him last he was a prisoner in Wild's hands.

Whether he had succeeded in getting free, whether he had been murdered by the villainous thief-taker, or whether he still languished a captive in his cells, she knew not, and had no means of ascertaining.

The intelligence that he was not at the "Black Lion" made her uneasy, but not very so. She knew that, in all probability, he would be denied to a stranger.

So she resolved to dress herself and proceed at once to Drury-lane, where she would be sure of finding a home, and also hearing the worst that had happened.

In pursuance, then, of this determination, she attired herself.

Whenever she moved she was in considerable pain, but the hurts she had received were scarcely more than skin-deep, for the corset which she wore protected her in a great measure.

More than once she had to rest, but at last the operation of dressing was completed.

Her clothing was in a sad condition, but she did not care for that.

And now she felt that, great as was her dislike to Colonel Thorne, she could not leave him without informing him of her intention of doing so, and again thanking him for the trouble he had taken, and the kind manner in which he had behaved.

There was a little silver hand-bell that stood upon a small table near the bedside, and this, after some hesitation, she ventured to ring.

The summons was immediately obeyed by Mrs. Lovat, who expressed, in very audible terms, her disapprobation of the step which the young girl had taken.

But she evinced the utmost alacrity to inform Colonel Thorne of her wish to leave the house.

The bed-chamber in which Bess had been placed had but one door, and that door opened into another apartment fitted up as a sitting-room.

When Mrs. Lovat departed, she shut the first door, and, crossing the sitting-room, closed the door of that which led into the passage, cautiously and silently turning the key in the lock.

Edgworth Bess was a prisoner!

It was some time, however, before she made this discovery.

However, as minute after minute passed away, and she heard no sign of the colonel's approach, she grew impatient, and, rising from the easy chair in which she had been sitting, she went to the door, and, opening it, passed into the sitting-room.

It was the first time she had seen the interior of this apartment, and she was, for more than a minute, absolutely amazed at its magnificence.

No description in any fairy tale which she had read, nor idea which she had formed, at all came up to it.

For a little while, then, and almost unconscious of what she was about, Edgworth Bess stood just upon the threshold of this room, admiring its rich and varied contents.

It was some time before she saw the door. All must have noticed what a blemish a door is to a room, and the owner of the house had exhibited considerable ingenuity in remedying the defect.

Round all four sides, and reaching to within about three feet of the ceiling, was a beautifully carved wainscot, composed of the finest Spanish mahogany, at that time a scarcer, and consequently more expensive, wood than it is at the present day.

This wainscot was formed into panels, each about two-and-a-half feet in width, by rather more than six feet in height.

In every one of these panels was painted a grand historical portrait, the persons selected being those most celebrated in English history.

The frames to these pictures consisted of an elaborately carved border, cut in the wainscot.

As the apartment was of considerable size, the effect was very grand.

The harmony of the whole was unbroken—no door was visible.

Had there have been, all would have been spoiled.

Of course the reader comprehends that one of these panels formed the door—or rather that the door was painted to imitate the panels—but this was not apparent at a first glance.

On the door was painted a beautiful full-length portrait of Lady Jane Grey.

It was so arranged that the part in the deepest shadow should be where the handle of the door was fixed, and the better to escape observation, this was small, and made of dark wood to match the colouring of the picture.

Bess probably would have been some time in discovering this had she not noticed that the door leading to the bedroom was painted to imitate the panels, with a handle of the kind described wherewith to open it.

This gave her the clue, and, after a very little searching, she found the one leading into the passage.

She turned the knob in the same way that the other turned, but the door remained fast.

She could scarcely believe at first that she had been locked in, but she found that such was really the case.

She was a prisoner.

In a moment the apartment which she had so much admired, and of which she had felt certain she never could grow tired, lost all its charms. It became suddenly distasteful to her sight, and she longed for nothing so much as to leave it.

She made a vain attempt to force the door, but it was too strong, and would have resisted thrice her strength.

Bursting into tears, she sank upon her seat.

Why was she made prisoner?

What fresh ill was there in store for her?

The forebodings which she had felt were now approaching a realization.

Suddenly she thought of the windows.

An invincible desire to get free from that house took possession of her.

The windows she thought might not be fast, and she might get out that way.

Those in the sitting-room were too high for her to reach.

She ran to the bedroom.

Breathlessly she pushed back the fastener, and strove to raise the sash.

Alas!

It remained firm as a rock. Either it had been nailed up, or never made to open.

It was while she was thus engaged, that she heard a faint clicking sound in the outer room.

She ran to it instantly.

"Mrs. Lovat tells me you wish to leave here," said a voice, and Colonel Thorne stepped into the room and closed the door.

Poor Bess!

Her heart seemed to stand still.

All the blood seemed to forsake her body and congregate about her heart.

"You will excuse me for saying so," continued Colonel Thorne, calmly, "but I hardly think you will be acting prudently by leaving here so soon. Your face is ashy pale, and you look much worse than you did yesterday even."

"Thank you," gasped Bess, faintly; "but I would rather go. I cannot stay here, indeed I cannot. It will do me more harm to stay than go."

"You are mistress here," said the colonel, "and quite free to go whenever you may think proper."

Edgworth Bess felt the question rise to her tongue—

"Then why was the door locked upon me?" but she thought it might be best policy not to give it utterance, but take him at his word.

"Let me go, then, sir," she said. "Let me go at once; and, if the prayers and good wishes of a poor girl can do you any service, I am sure you shall have them. I am sorry I have nothing better to offer you—nothing more worthy of your acceptance."

CHAPTER CXV.

THE COLONEL SHOWS HIMSELF AT LAST IN HIS TRUE COLOURS, BUT NOT UNTIL HE HAS SUCCEEDED IN HIS DESIGNS.

"You must excuse me, my dear girl," said Colonel Thorne, advancing a few steps, and taking Edgworth Bess by the hand. "You must excuse me if I ask you to do me the favour not to go just this moment, but sit down, for I wish to speak to you, and seriously, for a little while before we part."

There was something so kind—so paternal about this speech—or rather about the way in which it was spoken, that Edgworth Bess felt all her suspicions and presages of ill almost entirely vanish.

She forgot the locked door, and all that was equivocal in the colonel's behaviour, and replied—

"I cannot refuse you, sir, having done so much for me as you have, but I hope you will not be offended if I ask you to be no longer than you can help, and let me go as soon as you are able."

"I make that promise freely," said the Colonel, leading Bess to a chair, in which she seated herself.

Then, drawing another close to it, he himself sat down.

There was a silence for about a moment.

"I hardly know how to frame my words," he began, at length, "but, from the moment that I first saw your face, I loved you, and every time that I have seen you since has only had the effect of increasing my passion. You tell me you are alone in the world, and have to work hard to procure a scanty and uncertain subsistence. Now I am rich, am in a position to gratify your every desire, maintain you in a state that many princesses even would envy. In short, if you will accept it, I offer you my protection, and"—

So far, Edgworth Bess listened in silence, she would have spoken before, but she found it impossible. Suddenly starting to her feet, she said—

"You have mistaken me, sir! I am poor—I am friendless—I am alone in the world! But I am honest, and I take the words you have just now spoken as the greatest insult you could possibly offer me! For your kindness in rescuing me from death, and taking such care of me, believe me I am very very grateful and shall always be so! But you are mistaken in me!"

Colonel Thorne saw that he had made a false move—that he had allowed his purpose to be seen too plainly, but he by no means considered the mischief done as irreparable.

In saying that he had fallen violently in love with Bess, he only told the truth. Her face, her voice, her manner, all charmed him, and he loved her as all such natures as his do love. He was a man of fierce passions and unlimited means, so that it was very rarely that he failed in accomplishing his purpose.

Few men could be found better actors than he was. The bearing he had assumed towards Bess was as foreign and totally opposed to his ordinary manner as winter is to summer, and yet so well did he do it that it would have deceived or imposed upon more suspicious natures than hers.

Poor girl! She was like a bird in the snare of the fowler. Fluttering awhile, and then—

Bursting with rage as the colonel was, he allowed no indication of it to be visible. Indeed, he was perfectly calm and unruffled, with the exception of the air of vexation and contrition which he assumed.

He, too, rose to his feet.

"Pray forgive me," he said, "for what I have done! Take me back, if you can, into your good opinion. Make what excuse you can. All I can say is, that I was led away by the influence of your beauty. Had you not wished to depart so precipitately, I should not have spoken as I did, and if heartfelt sorrow will atone for what I have done, I tender it here."

The earnest and respectful manner in which these words were uttered is perfectly indescribable.

Need we say that Edgworth Bess, unused to the ways of the world as she was, freely forgave him for his offence?

"If you wish me to retain always a good opinion of you," she said, "if you wish me always to look up to you as my protector, you will suffer me to depart at once."

"Then I will do so," said the colonel. "You are quite free to go this very moment, if you think proper. It is only because I love you as I have never yet loved, that I am able to do this, but I feel that your happiness is my own. Therefore go. But as we are about to part, probably never to encounter each other again in life, take with you the assurance that there is one who loves you—that there is one who will wish that your life may be a truly happy one, and, whenever he has the opportunity, will do all that lies in his power to make it so."

Edgworth Bess was touched.

Her heart fluttered.

She believed what she had heard uttered with so much fervent earnestness, was the genuine sentiments of the man who gave them utterance.

But she shook off the feeling slightly, and then she thought of Jack, and she shook it off altogether.

"You will always have my respect and gratitude," she said. "But we must part. It will be best for both to do so. Farewell!"

Colonel Thorne had bowed his head, but all the time he was looking furtively at her. He saw she was determined.

"Farewell!" he said, in a voice broken with emotion, and holding out his hand as he spoke. "Farewell!"

Timidly, Edgworth Bess placed her hand in his.

She felt that it trembled, and was vexed, yet could not help it.

Gentleness and devotion will ever touch a woman's heart.

"Good-bye," she said.

"Before we part," said the colonel, taking her hand between both of his own, "tell me your name. I have never heard it yet, and I should like to have a name by which I could remember you. Tell it to me. What is it?"

"Elizabeth."

"A queenly name! Am I to remember you by that alone?"

"My other name is Donnull."

"Then, Elizabeth Donnull, as I shall remember you do you remember me. There is one old English custom which I have always admired, and I should like to keep it now. I am fond of old customs; they seem to carry us back into the past, and bring us into close communion with our ancestors. Will you favour me, or humour me, whichever you may choose to call it, by complying with this custom?"

"What is it, sir?"

"A very simple one. To drink with me."

"Drink with you?"

"Yes, do not be astonished. I will pour out a glass of wine. Do you give me your good wishes, and drink of the contents. Then hand the cup to me, and I will give you my good wishes, and drain the goblet to the dregs!"

"It is a strange request."

"Why so?"

"It seems so."

"I will not press it on you if it be against your inclination, but if you will do as I wish you, you will make me very happy."

When the wine was mentioned, Edgworth Bess thought of the locked door and the colonel's infamous proposal, and she dreaded some villainy; but when she saw he did not press it on her, and that he would drink from the same glass, she discarded her suspicions as unworthy and unfounded.

"I shall be only too glad," she said, "to do anything in my power to make you happy."

A flash seemed to come from the colonel's eyes, but it went again almost quicker than it appeared, and he was cool and collected as before.

He walked to a side table, on which were some dried fruits, and several decanters containing wine and spirits.

One of these he took.

By its colour it seemed to be sherry.

Then, from the same place, he took a silver goblet that would, perhaps, hold nearly three-quarters of a pint.

This he placed on a silver salver, and brought it to the table in the centre of the room.

Edgworth Bess watched him narrowly. There might be no harm or treachery intended; still, it would be best to be prepared.

The colonel placed the decanter, and the salver with the cup upon it, side by side.

"I am sorry to detain you, but it will not last long. There is one portion of the custom of which I have not yet spoken."

"What is that, then?" asked Bess, all her doubts springing up with fresh force.

"It is very simple, and need not, that I know of, be adhered to. That you shall please yourself about. It is that you should pour the wine from the decanter into the goblet, and that I should hand you the salver."

Again were her doubts and fears dispelled, and this time she felt angry with herself for having indulged in them.

Alas! poor inexperienced heart, she did not know that this was all the result of careful calculation, and done in order to throw her completely off her guard.

"Willingly," she said, and she took out the massive stopper from the mouth of the decanter, and lifting it up, poured some of the contents into the cup.

She was satisfied all was well.

Could she but have seen the colonel's face at that moment, how suddenly she would have altered her opinion.

It was contorted by a demoniac mocking smile, such as one might imagine to appear upon the countenance of the Evil One upon seeing a human soul about to fall into his hands.

The decanter had a very slender neck, and it took some little time to fill the cup.

At length the amber-coloured fluid reached the brim.

Its surface was diversified with a few crystalline beads.

Colonel Thorne took the salver, and held the goblet to her.

"Drink," he said. "It is the real Amontillado, and will do you good."

Edgworth Bess took the proffered draught.

She murmured a few words, the import of which the colonel did not care to catch.

Then she raised the goblet to her lips, and drank a small portion of the contents.

Then she handed it back.

The colonel held it in his right hand.

"I ought, first of all," he said, "to thank you for your ready compliance with my strange whim. I do so. And then I have before me the far more pleasing task of wishing you every possible happiness which this world can afford. May you"—

CHAPTER CXVI.

EDGORTH BESS IS THREATENED WITH WORSE DANGER FROM COLONEL THORNE THAN WITH THE MOHAWKS.

THE COLONEL ABRUPTLY CEASED, AND PLACED THE GOBLET OF WINE UNTASTED ON THE TABLE.

THE HYPOCRITIC WISH HE WAS ABOUT TO UTTER WAS ARRESTED ON HIS LIPS.

There was no need for it.

A strange shudder swept over Edgworth Bess.

She tried to speak.

She tried to move.

But she failed in both these attempts.

Despite herself, her eyes closed, her limbs gave way beneath her, and she would have sunk to the ground had it not been that the colonel sprang forward, and caught her in his arms.

Fervently he pressed her to his breast, and rained kisses upon her lips, cheeks, eyes, and forehead.

But mastering himself by a great effort, he laid her on a couch.

Then, going to the wall, he pressed upon a knob, which rang a bell.

It was instantly obeyed by some one tapping at the door.

It was the man who had first come out to receive him when he arrived, and whom he addressed by the name of Fennell.

There was a strange mixture of familiarity and deference in this man's manner.

"Is the carriage ready?"

"Waiting, sir."

"Good! be ready to start at a moment's notice. Send Mrs. Lovat."

Fennell disappeared.

Colonel Thorne waited impatiently until she came.

An anxious troubled look was on his face, from which it might be inferred that he had other matters pressing heavily upon his mind than any connected with the poor girl, of whom he had taken so dastardly an advantage.

But the time has not yet arrived, though it is very close at hand, for us to make full disclosures respecting this extraordinary individual.

At length Mrs. Lovat knocked upon the panel of the door, and received permission to enter.

"All is well," said the Colonel. "Have the cloak ready."

"It is here," said Mrs. Lovat, holding up a very large military cloak, which she had carried over her arm.

"That is well."

"Are you sure that she is all right?"

"Oh! yes! Had she drank only half as much as she did, it would have been sufficient for my purpose."

"Do you start now, sir?"

"Yes, at once. But it is late, is it not?"

"Early, sir."

The colonel consulted his watch.

"Half-past three," he said. "Never mind, it will be some hours yet to day-break. You place the cloak."

Colonel Thorne went to the couch upon which he had laid poor Edgworth Bess, and raised her in his arms.

She was still insensible.

In his hands she was no weight.

Then, while he held her, Mrs. Lovat carefully wrapped the cloak about her form.

It enveloped her completely.

The colonel himself assisted in folding it round her, leaving only her face uncovered, in order that respiration might not be impeded.

Then, when this had been done, he took her up in his arms as though she had been a child, and carried her out of the apartment, Mrs. Lovat holding the door open while he did so.

Across a corridor, and down a spacious staircase with massive carved balusters, and having rare exotic plants placed about it, the colonel went.

There was no one in the hall.

Upon reaching the bottom of the staircase he paused, in order to allow Mrs. Lovat, who was following, to pass him and open the front door.

This was done.

A very plain, yet elegant and commodious travelling carriage was drawn close up to the kerb opposite the door.

Four beautiful horses, whose worth represented as many hundreds of guineas, were harnessed to it.

Upon seeing the front door open, Fennell, who was seated in the rumble behind, immediately descended and threw open the door of the carriage.

There was no one in the street at that lonely hour, and the colonel descended the steps in front of his house, crossed the pavement, and entered his carriage unperceived by any but his own creatures.

[JONATHAN WILD FIRES AT BLUESKIN ON THE THAMES.]

Fennell closed the door. Then, mounting the rumble behind, ordered the coachman to drive on.

Their destination was evidently already known to him, for it was not mentioned, and yet he guided his horses round the corner of St. James's-street into Pall-mall, and so on until Westminster-bridge was reached and crossed.

The strong, spirited horses which were harnessed to the vehicle dashed onward over the smooth, well-kept road, at an alarming rate.

At that early hour in the morning it was not likely they would meet or pass many vehicles; nor did they.

Down the broad, open Kent-road they went, then bounded on both sides by tall hedgerows, with pleasant meadows beyond—not as now, one continuous line of brick and mortar.

Poor Edgworth Bess! She is now in the toils of the destroyer.

When we think upon the peril with which she is threatened, and how entirely she is in the power of that bold bad man, Colonel Thorne, we fairly tremble and turn sick with apprehension.

Her death-like trance or swoon still continued.

The drug which had been dissolved in the wine must have been of a most powerful character, for the poor girl had drank but the smallest possible quantity of it—a tablespoonful at the most—and yet its effects were instantaneous and continued.

She was still enveloped in the ample folds of the cloak, and remained in the same position as that in which she had been placed—namely, in one corner of the carriage.

The colonel was seated by her.

His basilisk eyes were fixed upon that portion of her pretty countenance which the cloak permitted to be visible.

It was only dimly that he saw it, for the lamp in the interior of the carriage emitted but a feeble light.

It was enough, though. His imagination served to supply the rest.

One arm he had around her, without which, or some similar support, she could not have retained her position, for, excellent as were the springs beneath the carriage, yet, such was the tremendous speed with which it was whirled along, that it swayed violently to and fro, and occasionally there would be a sudden jolt as some obstruction or other was encountered.

And now the reader will be pleased to remember that after their singular adventure with the post-chaise, Blueskin and Jack Sheppard, on their return to London, heard some vehicle approaching them.

Blueskin wished to stop it, though, when doing so, he did not for a moment anticipate that any particular result besides obtaining additional booty would arise from it.

As we have related, he very unwillingly allowed himself to be overruled by Jack, and permit the carriage to pass unmolested.

Accordingly, that they might the better escape observation, they retired into the mouth of the lane.

The carriage swept by.

Edgworth Bess at that moment recovered from the lethargic slumber into which the drugged wine had plunged her.

Upon finding herself in such rapid motion, and half in the embrace of a man, who in the faint light she did not recognise, she uttered a loud and awful scream of affright and terror.

That was the sound which had reached the ears of the two watchers in the lane.

Alas! Jack did not know that scream came from the lips of the girl he so fondly loved, and who was even then present in his thoughts.

Little did he dream she was in extreme danger, and within arm's-length of him.

It is astonishing what great results often follow little causes; but so it is, and so it always will be.

Had Jack Sheppard allowed himself to be persuaded by his comrade, he would have brought the carriage to a standstill, and a glance at its interior would have discovered Edgworth Bess.

What, then, would have been more easy than for them to overcome all such resistance as Colonel Thorne might offer, and bear off the poor girl to some safe place of refuge until such measures could be taken as would reinstate her in her possessions.

Then the whole after-current of his life would have been changed, and all the world of misery and shame and grief have been averted.

But fate had decreed it otherwise.

Away flew the carriage, and Jack, when it had passed, set out in an opposite direction to search for her.

How hopeless and how vain a search!

Even in its very commencement most disastrous, for he had fallen into the power of his arch enemy, Jonathan Wild.

But it is not at present with either him or his comrade Blueskin that we have to do. For yet a little longer we will follow the vicissitudinal fortunes of poor Edgworth Bess.

Blueskin had remarked that the shriek which had assailed their ears sounded as though it had been suddenly and violently suppressed; and this was exactly the case, for with an oath, Colonel Thorne placed his hand over her mouth and stilled it.

"Silence!" he said, in a tone of voice so threatening and terrible that Bess felt her heart turn fairly cold, and sink within her; "silence! Utter such a cry again, and it will be your last. Do you hear me? Will you be silent?"

He removed his hand a little, in order that she might reply to him.

But she was silent.

"Speak," he cried again; "give me your word, your promise, that you will continue silent, and I will take it. If you do not, you will drive me to such measures as will compel your silence. Answer me, I say!"

But had her life then and there have depended upon her uttering a syllable, she could not have uttered it.

The colonel, perceiving the state of terror she was in, appeared content, and merely muttered some diabolical threat, if she attempted again to scream out for assistance.

It was just at this moment that a light flashed across the window of the carriage, and then the horses stopped.

The colonel seemed to be perfectly aware of what was taking place. All he did was to look more keenly at his companion.

There was the trampling of horses' hoofs—the sound of voices; but they lasted a moment only, and then the carriage resumed its former pace.

The horses had been changed.

CHAPTER CXVII.

EDGORTH BESS FINDS LITTLE FOOD FOR HOPE IN HER CAPTIVITY.

WITHOUT the occurrence of any incident of special interest deserving of recordation, the carriage containing Colonel Thorne and Edgworth Bess reached that residence belonging to the former of which we have already spoken, and which was known as "The Larches."

Evening shadows were gathering round when they arrived.

Of what kind of place it was to which she was being taken, Edgworth Bess had not the remotest idea, for the colonel kept the carriage-blinds closely drawn down, so that it was not possible for her to obtain a glimpse even of the country through which she passed.

Ever since the threats to which her persecutor had given utterance, she had remained profoundly silent, shrinking as far back into the corner of the carriage as she was able, and fixing her eyes steadfastly and reproachfully upon him.

She was, too, very—very ill. The mere excitement of the scene through which she had so recently passed would be sufficient to induce this, but there was in addition, her weak and wounded state, and the effect which such rapid travelling would be sure to have upon it.

But most of all, there was the agony of spirit under which she laboured.

Could she but have been assured of Jack's safety, one-half of the load which weighed so heavily upon her heart would have been removed. In her imagination she pictured him a prisoner in the hands of the villainous thief-taker, and the inmate of one of his horrible and gloomy cells.

Of her own position she scarcely realized the full danger.

Colonel Thorne sat on the opposite side of the carriage. His head was bent, and his eyes apparently gazing upon nothing, but all the time, though not seeming to do so, he was watching every movement, and every varying expression of the countenance of his fair prisoner with the utmost closeness.

At last he knew by the change in the grinding sound which the carriage-wheels produced, that they had passed through the lodge-gates of his estate, and were traversing the broad gravel carriage-drive leading up to the front-door of his mansion.

But of this Edgworth Bess was herself ignorant. She was too terrified—too ill—and her mind too much occupied with gloomy thoughts, to take notice of such trivial circumstances.

The sudden jerk, however, when the carriage stopped, served to arouse her.

"We have reached our destination," said Colonel Thorne, in his rough, stern voice. "Alight, and make no needless resistance, for it will be quite useless, and, at the same time, futile. You will be seen by none but persons in my pay, and who take no notice of my actions. Alight!"

As he spoke, the carriage-door was opened by some one who held the handle of it in a deferential manner.

It was Fennell.

At the same moment the colonel stretched out his hand, and took hold of Edgworth Bess by the wrist.

To have opposed her strength to his would have been perfectly ridiculous, so, in order to avoid ill-usage, she rose, and suffered herself to be assisted to the ground.

She took a hasty and terrified glance around her, but nothing met her gaze, save a large mansion close to which she stood, a dark surrounding of tall trees, and the blue sky and stars overhead.

There was not the slightest sound to indicate the presence of human beings.

A very short opportunity was allowed her for perceiving, even this transient glimpse, and then she was hurried up a broad stone perron, and through a massive door, into a dimly-lighted vestibule.

"The Larches" was a mansion built somewhat after the picturesque Elizabethan fashion, with large, iron-studded doors; small windows, with diamond panes; innumerable gables, and fantastic chimneys. Its elevation was insignificant; but it rambled over ground enough for half-a-dozen modern commodious dwellings to be built upon its site.

From this vestibule opened several doors, leading into different corridors and apartments, and from the part furthest from the door ascended a winding staircase.

Half fainting with dread, terror, exhaustion, and fatigue, poor Edgworth Bess permitted herself to be led across the vestibule and up the staircase.

A long, long, weary ascent, it seemed, of many hundreds of steps; but that was only her imagination, for the highest apartment in the whole building—and that was the one under the turret upon which the clock was placed, was not more than thirty feet from the ground.

At length the colonel stopped before a door—in size small, in strength remarkable.

It opened, however, with a touch.

The chamber into which it opened was a tolerably spacious one.

It was plainly and scantily furnished.

In one corner was an antique grate, in which a bright fire was burning, and it was chiefly by its ruddy blaze that the different outlines of the apartment could be defined.

The colonel seated Edgworth Bess in a tall, high-back chair, at a comfortable distance from the fire, and then he said—

"At present, this is your residence. Look around you! There is little pleasing to the eye to be seen. In daylight it is even more wretched. Here, then, you will stay until such time as you are disposed to listen to me. But other matters now call for my immediate attention, and so important are they that nothing can detract me from them. But before I leave, let me impress upon you this—you are utterly in my power! Attempt not to escape! Attempt not to ask any one whom you may see to assist you! The result can only be disappointment! Farewell!"

With these words the colonel rose, and left the apartment.

He closed the door behind him.

Instinctively and mechanically Bess turned towards it. She heard a key turned in the lock, and the sharp clicking sound of the bolt as it shot into the socket.

She was, indeed, a prisoner.

And now she sunk into that strange, apathetic state which is sometimes produced by despair.

The different objects wherewith she was surrounded faded from her view.

She did not think—seemed scarcely to exist—and had only a dim consciousness of what had happened.

That the drug she had taken in the wine had a great deal to do with producing the stupefying effect there can be no doubt; and it was assisted by the combination of all those other circumstances which we have a little while back recapitulated.

Whether she remained in this state five minutes or five hours she knew not, but she was aroused by hearing the door unlocked.

It was thrown open.

Upon the threshold appeared a woman of colossal dimensions.

With a swaggering stride this female crossed the room, and put her hand upon Bess's shoulder.

"Get up, miss," she said, in what she, no doubt, intended to be a highly conciliatory tone of voice. "Get up, and come into this room."

"Spare me! spare me!" said the poor girl. "Let me free! I beseech you, let me free! Have mercy upon me, and assist me to leave this hateful place!"

"Hush! hush! you must not speak so! The colonel has commanded me to attend to your every want—treat you with the utmost care, and made me responsible for your safe custody; and when you know the colonel as well as I do, you will find it best not to palter with his commands!"

"Do not drive me to despair!" said Edgworth Bess.

"Do not drive me to despair! Assist me to escape, and I will bless you!"

As she spoke these words, in tones of supplicating anguish, she sunk down upon her knees, and clasped the woman by the hand.

"You will save me, will you not?" she added. "Surely you can feel for my position! Help me, and save me!"

The huge female shook her head.

"You don't know Colonel Thorne! What you ask of me is quite impossible! I dare not assist you to escape! I don't want to be unkind to you, but I cannot assist you in any way."

"Alas! alas!" cried Edgworth Bess, as she let her head fall between her hands, and burst into tears: "What will become of me? Jack! Jack! Where are you? You do not know in what peril I am placed, or you would fly to aid and save me!"

The huge female, although no one would have exactly thought it at first sight, possessed a warm and kindly heart, and compassionated the poor girl who pleaded to her. She endeavoured to utter some words of consolation, but Bess did not need them.

"How is he to know where I am?" she continued. "I do not even know myself! And how truly selfish I am! Even now he may be in greater danger than I am; and what would he do? He would not call for assistance, when he saw assistance there was none; but he would act for himself. And I will do the same."

Edgworth Bess uttered these words aloud, but she was not conscious that she had done so until the woman said—

"Let me advise you to abandon all hopes of making your escape from here. It is impossible. Too many precautions have been taken for that, and so I say again, do not indulge in any such hopes, because they can only end in disappointment. You are weak and weary. I am told you are suffering from many wounds—let me assist you. In the next apartment you will find a bed, and every toilette necessary. Come with me."

Passively Edgworth Bess allowed the woman to take her by the hand and lead her into the adjoining chamber.

CHAPTER CXVIII.

COLONEL THORNE APPEARS UNEXPECTEDLY TO EDG-WORTH BESS, AND ATTEMPTS TO BEND HER TO HIS PURPOSE.

WITH a faint, weary sigh, Edgworth Bess, after a sleep of many hours duration, awoke.

A dull, roaring sound, to which she was unable to make a comparison, reached her ears.

What it was she had no idea.

Never in the whole of her life had she heard anything resembling it.

It was incessant, but not monotonous. Sometimes it would be as faint as a zephyr's breath, and sometimes it would swell into a sound like thunder.

Her awakening could not at first strictly be called such, for she was in the same dreamy, trance-like state as she had been upon her arrival.

But after a time, as she lay there in solitude and silence, she began slowly, and little by little, to regain possession of her faculties.

In the same proportion as she did so, so did she feel better.

She raised herself presently upon one arm and gazed about her.

All was still. There was no person either within sight or hearing.

Then, with an accession of energy, prompted by the desperate nature of her situation, she rose and dressed herself.

She was really astonished to find how strong she was, and by the time she had plentifully bathed her face with water, and drank copiously of the pure fluid, she felt almost if not quite well.

"I will stay here no longer," she said, with that air of resolution which goes so far towards accomplishing an object; "every moment serves to increase my peril and Jack's uneasiness. I will show myself reliant upon my own powers, and it will go hard with me if I do not get free."

While these thoughts passed through her mind, the poor, persecuted girl occupied herself in making an examination of the bed-chamber.

There were two doors opening from it.

One was that through which she had passed, affording the means of communication between the bed-chamber and the outer apartment in which she had first been placed.

This was the door she determined to try first.

It opened to her hand, and this she accepted as an omen of future success.

A small matter will at times make a remarkable and inconceivable difference in the state of one's mind; and slight and probable enough as was the circumstance of her finding the door unfastened, yet it was with a more hopeful heart that she opened it and crossed the threshold.

In the outer, or sitting-room, as it might be called, all things presented precisely the same appearance as they had done on the preceding evening when she first saw it.

With a throbbing heart she hastened to the other door, but this she found secure, and fitting so closely into its setting, that not her whole strength could shake it in the least.

To a certain extent she was prepared for this; nevertheless she could not control a feeling of disappointment.

Subduing it, however, as much as she was able, she crossed the room in the direction of the windows.

It will be remembered that at present she had not looked out of them, and now, when she did so, a cry of surprise, slightly mingled with pleasure, came from her lips.

Before her, and stretching in every direction as far as her eye could reach, was the sea!

Yes, there could be no doubt of that. She had never before gazed upon the ocean; indeed, from the manner in which she had lived and been brought up, knew little, if anything, about it; but, for all that, she instinctively recognized it, and knew what it was.

The sun was shining with unusual brightness for the dull season of the year, and his beams fell upon the slightly-agitated water like myriads of diamonds.

The two words which Bess uttered upon this unexpected sight being presented to her view will best describe its character.

"How beautiful!"

And now she gradually comprehended the sound for which she had found herself so completely at a loss to account.

It was the dashing of the sea against the shore.

The mansion—for such it was—was one of the largest, and built upon the summit of one of those tall white cliffs which make the shores of England so conspicuous to those approaching them from foreign lands.

The sea was far below it, more so than it appeared to any one in the position of Edgworth Bess to be, but in reality the cliff was upwards of two hundred feet above the level of the water.

The constant alteration of the restless tide had worn deep indentations in the chalky rocks, and into these, the waves dashed with great fury, producing the deep hollow, roaring sound.

For some minutes Edgworth Bess was so enchanted with the scene before her that she lost sight of the purpose for which she had in the first instance approached the window.

But suddenly recollecting herself, she lifted her hand to try the fastenings.

As she did so she was startled by a deep voice at her elbow, which said—

"It is useless!"

Turning round suddenly she saw, standing close beside her, within arm's length, her new and much-to-be-dreaded persecutor, Colonel Thorne.

The absolute terror which his unexpected and inexplicable appearance produced, made the poor girl for a minute or so speechless and motionless. She could only gaze with a horrified stare upon his stern, implacable-looking countenance.

The colonel slowly, but significantly shook his head.

"It is useless!" he repeated, "utterly useless! You cannot escape. The doors are fast, and so are the windows. You are my prisoner, and wholly in my power!"

"And by what right am I your prisoner?" asked Edgworth Bess, recovering herself, and assuming, with difficulty, a manner altogether foreign to her nature. "Answer me. By what right am I your prisoner?"

These bold words, and, moreover, the bold manner in which she uttered them, caused her eyes to sparkle, her cheeks to flush, and her whole frame to tremble.

"Ha! ha!"

That was the only reply Colonel Thorne made to her question.

It was a mocking laugh, and, as it came from his lips, he folded his arms, and looked, with a still more ludicrous expression, into her countenance.

But Bess felt firmer.

The reply she met did not, as might have been expected, dishearten her.

"Tell me," she said, "as you are a man, and as I have a right to ask, why am I your prisoner? By what right?"

"The right of power," replied the colonel, in his bass voice, which was not destitute of a peculiar melody of its own. "The right which the strong has over the weak. You are in my hands. I can do with you as I choose, and there is nothing which can or shall step between me and my desires."

Bess trembled.

But ere she could command her voice to speak, the colonel continued—

"From the first moment that my eyes lighted upon your countenance, I loved you. I do so now, and in that fact discover, if you can, the motive, the mainspring of my conduct. I love you; not as nine-tenths of those who profess to feel the passion do, but with the ardency of my nature. I say I love you, and where my inclinations are concerned I allow nothing to step in between me and my desires. I am rich—wealthy beyond all your dreams of wealth—and, consequently, possessed of no ordinary amount of power, which I can wield as the humour takes me. You are a prisoner. Secure, beyond even the faintest chance or probability of escape. Dismiss, therefore, that idea from your mind at once."

Every sentence which this speech contained, uttered as the whole was with extraordinary force, made Edgworth Bess feel as though a death knell had been struck to all her hopes of freedom.

The confident manner of the colonel had its full effect.

"You have heard my avowal," he said. "It remains for you to think it over. You have your choice, either to comply with my wishes, and return my love, or compel me to use force. In the former case you shall be happy. Every want which you can frame shall be supplied almost ere you have given it utterance. I will do my utmost to show the love I bear you. But if, on the other hand—mark me—you know—I need not describe."

"You need not," cried Bess, passionately, "you need not. I love another. One who is as different to you as tempest is to calm—one to whom I will prove true under all circumstances, and through all time. The only sentiment I have for you is loathing and abhorrence. What little good feeling there might have been in my heart for you, your behaviour to me has utterly extinguished, and I would rather die a hundred—nay, a thousand—times, than consent to be the thing you wish to make me."

The appearance of the poor girl, as she thus spoke, was truly majestic and beautiful.

But that of the colonel was of the most deadly and ungovernable rage. To be thus bearded by a girl was what he would never suffer. He who had been accustomed to see the rudest men bow down before him, and instantly obey his slightest wish.

"Rash girl!" he cried, his voice almost choked with rage. "You shall repent of this, and when it is too late, you will wish you had treated me with more consideration! You have made your choice, and you must abide by it!"

An awful scream burst from the lips of Edgworth Bess, as the colonel, while speaking these last words, suddenly darted forward, and clasped her in his arms.

CHAPTER CXIX.

COLONEL THORNE'S CONDUCT BECOMES MYSTERIOUS.

VAINLY did she struggle and implore for succour. In his hands she was but a feather in those of a child, and, alas! there was none near to hear her cries who would obey her summons for assistance.

Such a sensation of deadly sickness came over her, that she was deprived of what little strength she had.

Her head swam round.

Her eyes dimmed.

She lost all power of using her voice, and sank upon her knees.

"Now do you believe you are in my power!" cried the colonel, hoarsely. "What is there to step in between us? All your frantic cries have met with no response. All your struggles have only served to show your weakness. But I am unwilling to master you thus. I love you, and would fain win back your love in return. Say, will you give me hope?"

"Never!"

"Then you shall rue your refusal. I will let you know, girl, that I am one in command! I have beneath me, and subsistent to my slightest wish, fiercer and more untamable spirits than yours. Reflect! Surely it can need no reflection! or, if you think so, I will give you a few hours for the consideration of my offer."

"It is useless."

Such were the words that rose to the lips of Edgworth Bess, but she took a rapid second thought, and did not utter them.

If she put him off, she would gain time, and time to her might be life, escape, everything.

"Leave me, then!" she said, instead. "Leave me, and I will try to reconcile myself to my lot."

"Is it possible that you consent? That you give me room to hope that I may hope to win you for my own? Ha! confusion! curses!"

The sudden exclamations that came from the lips of Colonel Thorne proceeded apparently from a very simple cause, and, at all events, it would have been thought from one totally inadequate to produce such an effect.

What was the cause?

All that Bess heard was a clock strike the hour of three.

The sound appeared to come from overhead.

But why should such a seemingly simple and natural occurrence produce the effect it did?

She was lost in conjecture.

She fixed her eyes earnestly upon her persecutor.

He had released her hands from the hold he had taken of them, and drawn himself up to his full height.

He stood in the attitude of one who expected to hear more.

Nor had he long to wait, for again the clock proclaimed the hour of three.

This was mysterious and remarkable.

What could it mean?

She had thought before, not only from the colonel's manner, but from the time she imagined it was, that the clock had not pealed forth the proper hour.

And now she could hardly think it was a clock at all, for certainly no clock would strike the same hour twice in succession, and with an interval of about a moment only.

What could it mean?

Again the clock struck.

The colonel seemed much agitated.

"I will leave you!" he said. "I will leave you! Consider well all that I have said! Do not allow yourself to be led away by any hopes of getting free! Once for all, and all for once, I tell you it is impossible! I must leave you now!" he repeated. "But look, what is that yonder?"

He pointed through the window, as he spoke.

With a natural instinct, Edgworth Bess looked immediately in the direction in which he pointed.

There was nothing but the bright blue sea before her.

Then she heard the door leading into the room in which she had passed the night shut violently.

With a boldness, for which no one would have given her credit, she ran across the room, and, turning the handle of the door, opened it, for it was not secured in any way.

But when she entered the bedroom, although not a moment elapsed from the time she heard the door slammed, no living creature could be seen.

She looked round twice or thrice, but all was undisturbed, and just as she had left, nor was there any trace which would lead one to suppose that it had been recently entered.

Bewildered and alarmed, Bess sank down into a chair, and, clasping her hands tightly about her head, strove to calm her mind, and think dispassionately of the occurrences of the last two or three hours.

She found the task a difficult one.

"How came he to enter here so silently and unperceived as he did?" she asked herself; "for when he spoke behind me I had no idea of his presence; and, then, how did he leave? His pointing to the window was only a device to conceal the means by which he departed. And why did he slam the door? Was that to mislead me again? I must think—I must think."

For a long while Edgworth Bess remained in deep meditation, and then she rose to her feet.

There was an air of decision about her which she had not previously displayed.

"I will make a careful examination of this place," she said. "I have good grounds for doing so. I feel convinced there are some other means of leaving these apartments than by the strong and firmly-fastened door through which I was brought. No doubt this other door—if door it is—depends entirely upon its secrecy for its security. So I will be diligent, and search."

She was impelled to do this with all the greater expedition, for she found, from the decreased amount of light that came into the room, that night was fast approaching. Therefore, what she had to do, it behoved her to do quickly.

Returning to the outer room, in which she had had her terrible interview with Colonel Thorne, she made a minute examination of every part of it.

But all her trouble met with no reward. She was unable to find anything like a secret means of ingress or egress, and so, with the utmost reluctance, she passed into the bed-chamber, and made a rigid examination of that also.

Floor, walls, and every part was scrutinized with a minuteness that one would have thought more than sufficient to cause the discovery of the most cunningly-concealed hiding-place, but alas! for her hopes of escape, the result was just the same.

And now she came to that other door in her bedroom which she had several times seen, but through which she had never attempted to penetrate.

Her hand trembled, and her heart palpitated as she turned the knob.

Somewhat to her surprise, she found it give way before her touch.

She flung the door wide open.

But she did not venture to cross the threshold until she had first taken a glance at its interior.

In the first place, there did not seem to be so much light in this room as there was in the three others.

And such was indeed the case, for it was smaller in size, and there was but one window.

The day, too, was still declining, which made it all the more manifest.

But, whatever might have been the mysteries of that room, Edgworth Bess was not yet destined to explore them.

For one thing there was not light enough to enable her to properly examine it, and, just as she was about to enter it, the outermost door opened.

In a moment she sprang forward to see who it was.

It was the huge female.

She carried in her hand a small tray, upon which a tempting repast was laid.

This she placed upon the table.

Bess looked at the viands wistfully.

It was a long, long time since she had tasted food, and she felt faint and sick in consequence.

Whoever the woman might be, and however repulsive her outward form might appear to be, she had a tender heart, and, had it not been for the terror in which she stood of Colonel Thorne, she would certainly have assisted our heroine to escape.

As it was, she could not bear to hear her supplications for aid and help. They cut her to the heart, and so she was glad enough to be able to place the things upon the table without a repetition of the former scene, and she left the room, after having done so, with the greatest precipitation, determined to give Bess no more chance of speaking to her than she could help.

And Edgworth Bess had not heart to renew her entreaties.

The door was closed and locked.

The receding footsteps of the bulky female became inaudible.

As she gazed upon the viands so temptingly displayed before her, poor Bess could not help feeling the cravings of hunger very, very strongly.

But she was afraid to gratify them.

The remembrance of the drugged wine arose up like some horrible phantom in her imagination.

And yet this might be untampered with, and, besides, she asked herself if she denied herself food, how was she to hope to have strength enough to carry out her purpose, or embrace any opportunity of escape that might be offered to her.

Under the influence of these thoughts, she looked more closely at the different eatables upon the tray.

Conspicuous above all was a small cake of wheaten bread.

"Surely," she said, as she took it in her hands, "no harm or poisonous drug can be concealed in this. I may eat of it without fear. At any rate, I will run the risk, for my position is now so bad it cannot, by any possibility, be made much worse."

So saying, she took the cake.

It was whole, and nowhere in the crust could she see any signs of its having been tampered with, and so she ventured to break off a portion and eat it.

To her it tasted sweeter than it was in reality.

The taste, however, convinced her that all was well, and she ate of it heartily.

Just as she had finished her meal, the last ray of daylight faded from the room, leaving her in sudden and utter darkness.

CHAPTER CXX.

RELATES SOME PARTICULARS CONNECTED WITH CAPTAIN HOWLET, THE PIRATE.

No doubt the reader, like poor Edgworth Bess, feels no inconsiderable amount of curiosity to know why the clock—if clock it was—should strike so eccentrically, and why it produced the effect it did upon Colonel Thorne.

The idea that it was a signal of some kind will readily occur to the imagination. But what kind of signal could it be to make him withdraw at the moment when it would seem he had succeeded in making a favourable impression?

By what mysterious means, too, had he managed to leave the chamber almost instantaneously, and without leaving any trace behind?

These questions will, in good time, be answered, as well as many strange particulars given of this man, in every sense of the word remarkable.

But in order to do this fully, and to lay before the reader a clear account of all, it will be necessary, for a time, to leave our characters where they are, and take up the thread of the narrative at another point.

In doing this, we promise to occupy no more space than comprehension allows us, and the reader will find the episode we are about to lay before him the most interesting and unparalleled in the whole history.

At the time, then, of which we are writing, the North Sea and the English Channel were much infested with pirates, who, setting every law and principle of humanity at defiance, and eluding every attempt made to capture them, struck terror into the hearts of all those who, from necessity, navigated the seas.

But among the numerous horde there was one who made himself and his vessel conspicuous and pre-eminent above the rest by the desperate nature of his deeds, and the success which invariably attended what he took in hand.

The name and fame of this celebrated pirate were spread far and wide, and many a stout heart trembled when the atrocities of himself and crew were mentioned.

For many long years had their depredations been successfully carried on. There were some few who existed who had been attacked by them and escaped with life; but very few indeed, for it was a part of the policy of these pirates to slay every one who came into their hands.

In some mysterious manner the name of their leader got whispered abroad.

It was Captain Howlet. Sometimes, however, the title was dropped, and he was called simply the Howlet, which, as many of our readers may perhaps be aware, from the fact of its being in provincial use, is an old Anglo-Norman word, used to designate the large white or barn-owl.

Why he had assumed this name was considered obvious. Like an owl, he was only heard of by night, and it was then he sought his prey.

But there were others who said that this name was not of his own assumption, but that it had been bestowed upon him for the convenience of distinction by the authorities.

These called him the Owllet, and derived the word from the law term to owl (i.e., carry on a contraband or unlawful trade).

But which of these was right can only be unfolded by time, and the reader is at liberty for the present to espouse the hypothesis of either.

Be it how it may, however, Captain Howlet, the pirate, was the terror of the English and adjacent coasts. The most incredible stories respecting himself and his vessel were afloat. Those who had been fortunate enough to escape from the clutches of the crew, described him as a man of gigantic stature and superhuman strength; and that the faces of his crew and himself were covered with masks of a peculiar and terrifying description, being wrought into the semblance of owls' heads.

Then, as for the vessel! No fairy bark could ever have achieved the feats that were ascribed to it. It flew through the water with the velocity of an arrow, enabling it to come up with its prey and escape from danger.

And certainly this latter power the pirate vessel seemed to have, for hitherto it had defied all efforts made to capture it.

Ships and men had been specially dispatched on the mission, but all had returned baffled and defeated, while the daring deeds of Captain Howlet were heard of almost daily.

And now, when we have said so much, we have put the reader into possession of all the facts the public or any one else had respecting these notorious buccaners. There may be a few other details, but they are trivial ones, and unsupported by authority.

There were times, however, when nothing would be heard of Captain Howlet and his crew. Vessels would arrive and depart in safety; confidence would begin to be restored, and then he would suddenly appear again, to the terror and confusion of those who thought to make their voyage unmolested.

Nor were his depredations confined to one spot. He would one day be heard of cruising about the entrance to the Bay of Biscay, and the next he would scuttle a vessel in the German Ocean; then again he would appear off the English coast.

And so it will be seen that all that was known of him was vague, unsatisfactory, and mysterious.

But that which appeared so mysterious will quickly be made manifest to our readers.

Not very far from Dover there was, in the face of one of the huge precipitous cliffs, a cleft or indentation; and as the cliff spoken of rose sheer from the water's edge, it was not possible for this to be perceived, except from the deck of some ship or boat passing that spot.

When at that distance—for there was nothing in the appearance of the place to cause any one to wish to make a closer investigation—it differed in no respect from hundreds of cracks or fissures which diversified the cliffs, and of which the widest and deepest were known to be only a few feet in width and depth.

But the one to which we now direct attention was different to its companions, but not in height, width, or general appearance.

Upon taking a small boat, and rowing quite close up to it, no difference would be perceptible.

You might even row into the little cavernous-like place. You would then have found that it extended a little more than the boat's length.

Here the solid wall of the cliff would be found to be a thousand hollows by the curious, restless waves.

The one side would produce a similar appearance, so far as solidity went, and so would the other.

The most careful scrutiny would not reveal an inlet.

But there was one.

And now, having examined the three sides of the cavern, the explorer would probably turn his eyes upwards to the roof.

It would, except at high tide, be very many feet above him.

Quite out of reach, and too high up for him to see it distinctly.

Could he have ascended, it is there he would have found the inlet.

Yet it was concealed as carefully as possible; no casual glance would have discovered it.

That this was the pirates' secret haunt the reader must already suspect.

This indentation was at the base of the cliff upon the summit of which Colonel Thorne's residence, "The Larches," was situated.

A man so wealthy as the colonel seemed to be was, of course, well known and much noticed by those who resided in the neighbourhood.

His horses, his dogs, and his equipages were the delight and admiration of all who were fortunate enough to behold them.

In one word, they were faultless.

Among his other possessions of this character was a beautifully-built yacht, but although this was the most admired of all, yet it appeared to be the one of which he made the least use, and of which he took the least notice.

It was nearly always to be seen riding at anchor at a short distance from the land; but as it is well known that things wear out most when not in use, so the men in charge of this yacht used at times to cruise off for days together.

And now, while we are speaking of the colonel and his possessions, we may as well take the opportunity of describing briefly the outward appearance of his dwelling.

Doing so at this juncture will spare us the necessity of interrupting the narration of events, for in order to properly understand that which follows, it is requisite that a correct notion of its appearance should be had.

We have already said that it was a long, low, rambling edifice, built in the Elizabethan style of architecture. The material used in its erection was a grayish-coloured stone, only a few shades darker than the cliff forming its foundation.

The mansion was uniformly two stories in height, except in one portion near the centre of the building, where it rose another story, and was then surmounted by an antique clock-tower, or turret.

The upper portion of this turret—that is to say, above the clock—was dome-like in shape, carrying upon its highest part a ball and cross, in all respects, save that of size, resembling those which crowned the spires of so many of our cathedrals.

From its elevated position being not only double the height of the surrounding building, which in its lowest part was nearly three hundred feet above the level of the sea, it was a most conspicuous object when seen from the land, but still more so when viewed from the sea, whence it could be distinguished at a distance of very many miles.

Strange to say, this part of the colonel's abode was suffered to go to ruin and decay. The other portions, so soon as they required it, were carefully repaired; this belfry or clock-tower was alone neglected.

For what reason no one could conjecture. It certainly had the effect of spoiling the appearance of the whole, and those who enjoyed the acquaintance of the colonel, one and all, knew him to be a man who would brook no idle questions upon such a subject.

Having explained so far, we will now proceed to direct the attention of the reader to a scene of the wildest and most startling interest.

CHAPTER CXXI.

THE PIRATE CREW PROCEED TO EXECUTE SUMMARY JUSTICE UPON THE SPY.

"A SPY! a spy! Down with him! Slay him! Knock him on the head with a marling-spike! Let him have it!

Death to the spy! Will Ogden he calls himself! Down with Will Ogden! Down with him! Death! death!"

These words came from many a fierce throat, and were uttered with gesticulations of ungovernable rage.

Those who uttered them were men dressed in a semi-nautical costume.

They had all seized upon one man, who, in the most abject terror, had sank upon his knees.

His countenance proclaimed his guilt, and gave the lie to the words which fell falteringly from his lips.

He was dressed in a similar manner to those who made use of such threatening language and gestures towards him.

The scene was a large cavernous apartment.

Irregular in shape.

Unequal in height.

The sides and roof composed of calcareous rock.

The floor of bright glittering sand and sea shells.

The extent of the place could be seen by the lamps which were hung at uncertain intervals around it.

It was probably a quarter of an acre.

In five places five very large lamps were suspended by a chain from the ceiling, and as each carried several wicks, the place was tolerably well illuminated.

Of course, to any one coming in fresh out of the sunshine, it would have seemed dark and gloomy enough, but to those who had been in it for some time there was sufficient light to enable them to distinguish anything.

"A rope! a rope!" cried the men again. "Put a rope round his neck and run him up! That is the death for a traitor and a spy! Death! death! A rope! a rope!"

"Here you are, mates!" said a voice; "here's as taut a line as you could wish to see! Don't loose him! hold him tight! Here, Joe, you help me."

The speaker, a short, burly seaman, who, as soon as the rope was mentioned, separated himself from the turbulent throng, and returned with the article demanded.

With true sailor-like dexterity he formed one end into a running noose; then going to one side of the cavern, where a large hook projected from the wall, he, after two or three attempts, succeeded in throwing the end of the rope over it.

The one he had called to his assistance understood without being told what was required of him, and from one of the many little recesses round the side of the place he rolled an empty barrel.

Its appearance was hailed with a shout of delight by the others.

To place it on end just underneath the hook took him but a moment, and then all was ready; for while this was going forward those who held the poor trembling wretch in their grasp, had pinioned his arms behind him.

Then, in spite of his frantic cries and struggles, they lifted him bodily upon the on-end cask.

By blows they forced him to stand upright.

Then the noose was slipped over his head, and drawn tight about his neck.

The burly seaman took hold of the other end.

"Now then, mates, say the word and up he goes, like an angel. Are you ready?"

"Mercy! have mercy!" cried the man; "spare my life—spare it, and I will confess all! Mercy! mercy! you make a mistake! All of you make a mistake! I am innocent—indeed, I am."

"We are ready," exclaimed the other sailors; "Up with him, Ben! I'll bear a hand. Now, then, one!"

In a perfect yell, which penetrated to every nook and corner of the cavern, and aroused many a slumbering echo, the poor wretch so close to death shrieked out the one word—

"Mercy!"

"Two!"

"Mercy!" he shrieked again, with even, if possible, more violence than before. "Mercy! Mr. Morgan! Mr. Morgan! You will put a stop to this. Spare me—spare me! Mercy! oh! mercy!"

From his elevated position the accused was able to see over the heads of his late comrades, and perceived a person approaching, with wonder and anger in his looks.

It was the lieutenant, or second in command of the band, assembled in the cavern.

The name by which he had addressed him was the one by which he was known to the stern beings he had under his command.

"Hold!" he cried, in a loud and imperative voice.

The band was still in a moment.

The one who was about to pronounce the word three, let the sound die away upon his lips in a whisper.

The man who was ready to obey the signal slackened the rope slightly.

"Oh! Mr. Morgan! Mr. Morgan!" cried the one who, rightfully or wrongfully, had been accused of being a spy, and who gathered some hope from the appearance of the lieutenant. "You know me, Mr. Morgan. Will Ogden! To be sure you know Will Ogden. Spare me!—save me! They call me a traitor and spy, and wish my death. But I am innocent—innocent! Mercy—mercy!"

"Peace!—peace! Not another word. What is the meaning of all this? Come forward, some of you, and speak. Not all of you at once."

"I will tell you, Mr. Morgan. I will tell you. Indeed, I will tell you all," cried the man with the rope around his neck.

Lieutenant Morgan looked at him angrily.

"Silence, I say! Let me not hear your voice again. It seems to me that they have discovered you to be a spy. I am not surprised, and am inclined to believe it, for I have long had my suspicions of you. So I warn you, for your own sake, to be silent."

After these words, the poor wretch seemed to collapse, and he sank down on the head of the cask as low as the rope would allow him.

"Will you let me speak, sir," said a man, coming forward from the rest of the throng, and saluting the lieutenant.

"Certainly, Batson, certainly."

"Well, then, it fell out this way. As Tom Drotchel, yonder, was walking across the cave, we noticed a paper fall from his pocket, or somewhere else about him. Thinking it might be from some lass, or to one, for that matter, we thought to have a bit of fun with him, knowing what a surly chap he in general is, so, without saying a word, I got up and walked to where the letter was lying on tip-toe, and picked it up unperceived. I went to look at it, but I couldn't make out the lingo, so I gave it to Joe Dudley, and asked him to spell it out to the company."

"Well, what then?"

"That's all, sir; and, with your leave, my mate, Joe Dudley, will tell you the rest."

"Good! Stand aside, Dudley."

"Yes, your honour."

"Go on with the story."

"Yes, your honour. Well, as Batson said, I thought to have some fun, so I began to read the letter; but, my stars! what do you think it were? Shall I read it to you, your honour?"

"Yes, and then all may hear."

"Ay—ay, your honour."

The lieutenant gave this permission because he could not read himself; indeed, the man Dudley was the only one possessed of that accomplishment.

"It's a first-rate hand, sir. That was the first thing I looked at; and not such as we should turn out, however."

"RESPECTED SIR,—

"The suspicions which I had the honour of communicating to you have turned out to be no more than fact. At great trouble and risk I have succeeded in joining the pirate-band, and write this in their secret haunt, of the existence of which they do not dream any one but themselves has the least idea. However, it is beyond all doubt that the much-dreaded and mysterious pirate, known as Captain Howlet, is no other than Colonel Thorne, the owner and occupier of the mansion called 'The Larches.' Of this I have abundant proof, having seen him frequently in both characters. The cavern in which the pirates conceal themselves is hollowed out of the cliff upon which the house stands, and there is a secret means of communication between the two, known only to the captain himself. The means by which you will find it best to make an attack, I have yet to learn; but as soon as I possess the knowledge, I will take care that no time is lost in making you aware of all particulars. I should not have written now, only I thought you would feel anxious to hear something respecting me. So no more at present from GEORGE HAWKINS."

There was perfect silence while Joe Dudley read this precious epistle, which seemed to place the guilt of the prisoner beyond all doubt.

Lieutenant Morgan looked sternly at him during the whole of the time occupied by the perusal.

For the life of him the poor abject wretch could not bear his gaze.

He turned his eyes away.

"A traitor—a traitor," cried the pirates; "hang him up—hang him up! Quick! Let not the villain live!"

Lieutenant Morgan held up his hand.

"Hold," he said. "Silence, all. This is very serious business, and there is one above us all who ought not to remain in ignorance of it any longer. Let him decide his fate."

"The Howlet—the Howlet!" cried the pirates, as with one voice. "The Howlet!"

"Yes," continued Morgan. "I will summon our brave captain, who will best know how to deal with such as he is. Silence, all, and wait his coming."

As he spoke, the lieutenant went to a small recess in the cavern side, and put some machinery or other in motion.

Then he advanced to the centre and waited.

There would have been a breathless silence had it not been for the convicted spy.

A few minutes elapsed, and then, from the darkest portion of the cavern, came a tall and commanding figure.

When it reached the light it presented an appearance awful in the extreme.

It was a man of gigantic stature, with the head of a huge owl.

CHAPTER CXXII.

BLUESKIN IS FIRED AT BY JONATHAN WILD, AND HAS TO SWIM DOWN THE THAMES FOR HIS LIFE.

FAIR or sterner reader of this record of love, of trial, of temptation, of crime, of sin, of violence, of suffering, of treachery, of courage, and all the attributes which disfigure human nature, turn back with us for a little while, during which we will occupy ourselves with the fortunes of three of our chief characters.

Leaving the mysterious-looking pirate chief to mete out such justice to the traitor in his hand as he may think proper, and leaving the poor wretch to make abject supplications for his life.

Leaving, too, Edgeworth Bess in her dangerous captivity, let us take up the thread of our narrative at that point when Jack Sheppard was made a prisoner upon Blackfriars-bridge, and where Blueskin only escaped a similar fate by the desperate feat of leaping from the parapet of the bridge into the river.

It will no doubt be well remembered by the reader that Jonathan Wild, the moment he saw this daring act performed, shouted to his men to keep strict guard over their prisoner, while the remainder followed him.

Then, with the recklessness of insanity, he dashed down the broad flight of slippery stone steps leading from the bridge to the water, those steps which are even now about to be swept away.

The receding tide had left the stones wet, and it is a thousand wonders that in his headlong descent Wild did not lose his footing.

But he did not.

He reached the bottom step in safety.

Then he strove to pierce with straining eyes the dense mist which hung upon the surface of the water.

A boatman, too, who had been for hours in expectation of a fare, roused up from the sleep into which he had fallen, and just guiding his little wherry to the foot of the steps in front of where Wild stood, he cried out, in sleepy tones—

"Boat, your honour, boat. Do you want a boat, your honour?"

But Wild was too much occupied just at that moment either to hear or heed his words.

As the man asked the question, one of those natural phenomena occurred, which, though common enough, are rarely seen by human eyes.

As if by the magic influence of an enchanter's wand, the dense mist suddenly dissolved—disappeared.

Nor did it leave the least trace to show that it had been, except in the far distance, where it could be seen curling up and vanishing with great rapidity.

And then the rising sun cast his beams upon the waters.

[EDGORTH BESS HAS A PERILOUS ADVENTURE IN ATTEMPTING TO ESCAPE FROM COLONEL THORNE.]

But by neither of these did Wild suffer his attention to be diverted.

His eyes were fixed upon the Thames.

Suddenly he uttered an exclamation, and drawing a pistol with great rapidity from his belt, he fired.

His eagle glance had caught sight of Blueskin's head near the buttress of the bridge.

To see this, take aim at it, and fire, seemed simultaneous actions, so little interval was there between them, so little time did the whole occupy.

The sharp report of the pistol was followed by a cry.

Then the head disappeared.

"By heaven! I have hit him!" cried Wild, exultingly. "I have hit him! Now, where's your infernal boat? Quick! and I shall have him yet!"

But the waterman, somewhat dismayed by these summary proceedings, and immediately forming a natural dread of so violent an individual, backed water, and got out of reach.

"Villain!" roared Jonathan, "your boat! Quick, or it will be the worse for you. Do you hear? I command you in the king's name! I am Jonathan Wild."

Upon hearing this declaration, the terror of the waterman visibly increased, but he did not dare refuse to obey the thief-taker, so he rowed again to the foot of the steps, mentally cursing himself for having woke up as he did.

Wild sprang hastily into the boat, followed by his two men.

By his directions the waterman rowed to the projection of the bridge near which he had seen Blueskin's head disappear.

Then he stood up in the boat, and looked closely about him.

For full a moment he gazed vainly. Nothing could he see but the chill dreary waste of waters everywhere around him.

There was a strong current of air underneath the bridge, apparently carrying a number of watery particles, and as it swept with full force against and past the inmates of the boat, it seemed to chill them to the bone.

Al shivered save Jonathan Wild, and he was too intent upon what he was about to take cognizance of any other circumstance.

But, for all that, one moment was sufficient to load his hair and apparel with moisture.

The tide was flowing out, so it was down the river that Jonathan looked, under the full impression that he should again see the head of his ancient coadjutor and ally.

Should he do so, he had a pistol ready in his grasp, and that he would not hesitate to favour him with its contents there cannot be a doubt, for Blueskin knew too much, and was too deeply in many of his secrets, to make it safe for him to live as Jonathan's avowed enemy.

It was probable enough that the first shot he had fired was an effective one, but, if so, the body would in a little time rise to the surface, and this time he determined not to depart without assuring himself that he really was no more.

Already had he had sufficient evidence to prove that Blueskin had a cranium of no ordinary thickness, and that he had as many chances of his life as a cat, and so, on this occasion, he determined to be more than ordinarily particular.

"Look about you, you villains!" he roared to his men, finding himself unable to distinguish anything resembling what he looked for. "Do you hear me?"

"Yes, Mr. Wild, sir, if you please," replied the janizaries, their teeth chattering with the intensely raw cold.

"Then can you see anything? Ha! what is that? There he is!"

Bang! went Wild's pistol.

Something in the distance had caught his eye, and caused him to give vent to the hasty exclamation he did.

The moment he saw it he fired.

Then, without waiting to see whether he had accomplished any good by his hasty aim, he cried—
"Row—row! Yonder—yonder! Quick, I will guide you!"

In obedience to these hurried and imperious commands, the waterman let fall his oars over the sides of the boat, and rowed with all the vigour which the muscles of his arms would permit in the direction Wild indicated.

The smoke from the discharged pistol hung lazily about the surface of the river for some seconds, gradually diffusing itself until it became of such extreme tenuity that it was no longer visible.

As soon as this was the case, it was with a voice of terrible exultation that Wild cried—

"I see him! There he goes! Look—look! Keep him in sight, whatever you do! We are sure to overtake him! Faster—faster! We shall have him yet!"

The waterman began to feel some kind of personal interest in the chase, which was no more than natural, although he had been so frightened at first, but there is a contagious excitement in chasing anything, no matter, whether beast or man, which seems to be an inherent quality in the breasts of human beings.

Bending his back, then, to his task, and exerting his utmost strength, he gave most vigorous long and lusty strokes, which caused the little bark to bound over the mimic waves upon the Thames with a speed that was really marvellous.

But of this Jonathan, who stood in the prow of the boat, was unconscious. To him the progress of the boat seemed tediously slow.

His eyes were riveted upon a small dark object drifting down the river with the tide.

Nothing, he resolved, let it be what it might, should induce him to remove his gaze even for a single moment, lest in that moment he should lose sight of what he had before so anxiously sought to see.

And now, as the morning got more and more advanced and the daylight brighter, he was all the better able to perceive the object in the water, and, at last, there could be no possibility of doubt that it was the head of a human being.

Despite, however, all the efforts which the boatman made, they did not gain very perceptibly upon it.

Wild had not another pistol loaded, or he would assuredly have fired again, and, so great was his excitement, that the thought did not occur to him either to order his janizaries to fire, or ask them for one of their pistols.

But soon the agitation and excitement which Wild had felt increased to an unbearable extent, for the swiftly-floating object was approaching the numerous vessels which were moored off the Surrey side of old London-bridge.

Once among the shadows and intricacies of those, Wild felt certain that all hopes of recovering him would be futile. To use an old and familiar illustration, it would be like looking for a needle in a bottle of hay.

"Row!" he yelled, and his voice sounded with remarkable distinctness over the silent river; for as yet the hour was too early for any of the craft to be in motion. "Row!—curse you—row! or he will escape us! If he reaches the boats he is lost."

And so seemed to think the swimmer, for his speed could be seen to perceptibly increase.

No doubt the so close prospect of safety nerved his failing powers to fresh exertion.

Perspiration poured from the head and face of the waterman, but all was useless, for in another moment the swimmer disappeared behind a huge, clumsy vessel.

"Damnation!" roared Wild. "But I will not give in yet. Ha! there he goes again! Fool that he was not to make the most of such a chance! Why, he seems to be swimming towards us."

And such was the case.

Whether the wounds he had received from Wild's bullets had bewildered his brain, or whether he had been seized with a sudden insanity, we know not; but certain it is, that the swimmer now left the shelter of the boats he had seemed so anxious to gain, and was swimming towards Wild's boat.

CHAPTER CXXIII.

JONATHAN WILD MEETS WITH AN ADVENTURE WHICH THOROUGHLY Baffles AND BEWILDERS HIM.

A DEMONIAIC roar came from Wild's lips when he first perceived this circumstance, but its note quickly changed to dread, for in this there was something so extraordinary that he could not control his apprehensions.

"Shall I fire now, Mr. Wild?" said one of the janizaries; "he is close to us, and evidently mad, and there is no knowing what mad people may not do."

"Yes; fire in the devil's name! Why did you not do so before? Fire!"

No sooner was the command given than it was obeyed—for the janizary had a very wholesome fear of mad people, and was only too glad to have the chance of putting an end to that feeling and his trouble at the same time.

The aim was a good one, for a loud shriek resounded over the water, and the swimmer turned round several times, as though in the agonies of death.

"Now row," said Wild. "We have him at last!" "Quick! or he will sink, and we shall lose him that way, and I should not feel safe unless I saw his dead body with my own eyes."

"There is a couple of boat-hooks lying at the bottom of the boat," said the waterman. "Take them, and you will be able to lay hold of him."

The janizaries stooped down and picked up two of those long poles, with strong iron hooks and spikes at their extremity, and used by the boatmen for various purposes.

One was much longer than the other, and this was the one that was handed to Jonathan Wild.

From its extreme length it was very heavy to hold, and few men could have used it without a great deal of trouble; but Wild was gifted with more than ordinary strength, especially when his mind was fixed upon any particular object: and so on this occasion he took hold of the ponderous implement and wielded it with an ease and dexterity which instantly elicited the waterman's admiration; who, nevertheless, did not relax in his efforts to increase the speed of the boat.

Quickly they reached the spot where the swimmer was still floundering and endeavouring with all his remaining strength to do battle with the waves.

A deep red tinge was on the water around him, which showed that he was bleeding profusely from some wound or wounds.

At last he came within reach.

Jonathan Wild poised the ponderous boat-hook, and watched his opportunity.

Then he, with great viciousness, stuck the sharp steel into the bleeding form.

A deep and horrible groan followed.

The hook had taken a firm hold, and gradually and gently, so that it should not slip; he drew the wooden pole through his hands.

The body followed easily, for it is well known how light a human being is when immersed in water.

Then the janizaries, who had the other hook, fastened it in the clothing, and they hauled steadily, gently assisting their ferocious master.

The boatman, right glad of the chance, rested on his oars, for the exertions he had made had greatly fatigued him.

Another moment, during which the waterman looked on at the proceedings of the three men with horror and a sickened heart.

The body was brought to the boat side.

Then they had by far the most difficult portion of their task to accomplish.

That was to lift the poor mangled body of their prey over the gunwale.

But after a little trouble they managed to do this.

The body had come with the back turned towards them.

As, however, they lifted it and it rolled into the boat, they saw the countenance.

Bleeding, bruised, and disfigured it was, but still there was sufficient configuration left to make them confident that it was not he whom they sought—he who had leaped in so daring a manner off the bridge—he whom they had chased with so much toil and trouble down the Thames.

In fine, it was not Blueskin.

That was a point that admitted not of the least doubt or contradiction.

Indeed, when they came to look more closely at the form which was now lying at full length on its back in the boat, the two men were at a loss to conceive how it was they had not discovered their mistake earlier.

But the fact is, they never gave the subject the least thought at all. It never entered their minds for a single instant that there might be some other person in the river besides Blueskin.

We have, however, not said a word of the effect which this discovery had upon Jonathan Wild.

We feel our powers of depiction totally inadequate to such a task.

Let it suffice to say that he poured forth a volume of the most horrible curses that could be conceived, and which only did him credit on the score of the copiousness of his vocabulary.

His men, accustomed as they were to the fearful imprecations he at times uttered, fairly shuddered as they heard him; and as for the waterman, he sat speechless and agast.

This tempest of passion, from its very violence, soon exhausted itself.

Wild grew calmer.

He looked down at the prostrate body at his feet, and could hardly believe what his own eyes avouched.

How was it the mistake had been made, for a mistake there was somewhere?

But where?

When had it occurred?

He was thoroughly foiled, and the more he thought the more did his perplexities increase.

He was baffled and bewildered.

Had he not, with all speed possible, after Blueskin took his mad leap from the parapet of the bridge, hastened to the landing steps?

Had he not dashed down them just in time to see the head of his lieutenant rise above the water near one of the buttresses of the bridge?

Had he not instantly fired at the object, and received tolerable evidence that his shot had been effective?

Had he not hastened to the precise spot where he saw the head disappear beneath the water, and had he not waited there until, in the distance, he had seen it rise again?

Had he not fixed his eyes most steadfastly upon it, never allowing them to be removed for an instant, while the waterman rowed with all speed possible?

Yes, he had done all this.

How, then, can the mistake have originated?

It was Blueskin who had jumped off the bridge.

That he would have sworn, for he had heard the familiar accents of his voice.

Was it not Blueskin he had seen rise from the water?

That he could almost have sworn to as well, but yet there was a slight possible, though not probable, doubt.

That doubt, however, he found upon further thought to be too slight a one to entertain.

Then, as they chased the swimmer down the Thames, had he ever removed his eyes from him?

No.

They had been fixed during the whole of the time.

But stop.

Although he had not removed his eyes, yet the swimmer was for a little while out of his sight.

Was it then that the mysterious and incomprehensible change had been made?

He could scarcely think so, or imagine how it had been done.

Yet that was the only thing at all reasonable that he could think of to account for it.

And with that means he was very far indeed from being satisfied.

Yet he recollected how the course of the swimmer had been changed after he was a moment out of his sight.

This looked very strange.

It seemed to point to that being the time when the substitution was made.

These thoughts passed through Jonathan's brain with that rapidity of which thought only is capable.

"Throw this fool overboard!" roared he, "and do not sit there like idiots! Over with him!"

Some lingering trace of life and consciousness must have remained in the bleeding form, for as soon as the inhuman command was uttered, it gave vent to a feeble groan, as though of remonstrance.

But it was unheeded.

Wild's janizaries were by no means the most tender-hearted of men.

Catching hold of the poor wretch by the head and the heels, they swung him over in a moment.

A faint cry for help!

A heavy splash!

And then all was over. The body, like lead, sank down to the muddy bottom of the river.

"Row across to those boats," cried Wild, alluding to those lying at anchor off the Surrey side. "He is somewhere there, I feel confident. Quick, it is broad daylight now, and he will have great trouble in getting away unperceived."

As he spoke, the waterman again put his little vessel in motion, and as he did so the sun broke forth from the clouds which had until then enshrouded it, and his broad golden rays fell with full force upon the Thames.

The spectacle was one of rare and picturesque beauty, but neither Wild nor the men he had with him were exactly the persons to appreciate it.

The boats the thief-taker had mentioned were soon reached, and a most vigorous search made among them.

Of course, Wild would not have had the time to search every boat at moorings himself, but the alarm quickly communicated itself from one of the closely-packed vessels to the other; and the inmates of each, on their own responsibility, diligently searched the one they occupied with every wish to unkenneled the fugitive, whom Jonathan described as a murderer, and for whose apprehension a reward of fifty pounds would be given.

Stimulated by the prospect of possessing this sum, the search was prosecuted by every one with the greatest vigour; and though no one was found, Jonathan was satisfied that Blueskin was in that locality.

This left him with the disagreeable conviction on his mind that he had got clear off.

CHAPTER CXXIV.

BLACKFRIARS-BRIDGE IS REGAINED BY WILD, WHO IS AGAIN DISAPPOINTED, FOR HIS PRISONER AND THE GUARD HAVE VANISHED.

"WHERE to now, sir?" asked the waterman. "Shall I put you ashore now?"

"Ya—ah!"

"I say, shall I put you ashore?"

One of the janizaries nudged the waterman to be quiet. He was sufficiently quick of apprehension to take the hint.

Wild was thoughtful.

He did not wish to so readily relinquish his search for Blueskin, who, doubtless, was somewhere very close at hand; but, on the other side, he did not relish the idea of Jack Sheppard remaining so long upon Blackfriars-bridge in no better custody than two of his men.

He knew, from experience, what a very slippery customer Jack was, and there was the dread at his heart that he had taken advantage of his long absence to make his escape; for it must be understood that his little trip down the river, and subsequent search among the vessels, had occupied a considerable portion of time.

The morning was now far advanced, and the great bustle in the streets had begun.

And, so much against his inclination as it was, Jonathan determined to retrace his steps, and, if possible, make sure of one of the two prisoners at least.

Nothing so much vexed Wild as to be defeated, no matter in what it was, and on the present occasion he was more put about than usual, for from the moment he had learned that Blueskin had recovered from what he fully believed to be his death-wound, he determined to lose no pains in hunting him to death.

And when he thought his object was all but accomplished—when, if there had been any present to bet upon the affair, the odds would all have been on his side—lo! in a most mysterious and unaccountable manner, his prey eludes his grasp.

"Curse you," he said, as he sat down in the stern-sheets of the boat. "Why, in the devil's name, don't you row me back to Blackfriars?"

Now, had the waterman been as conversant with Jonathan's sweet ways as the two janizaries were, he would have rowed on in silence, and as fast as he was able.

But he was not versed in the thief-taker's little eccentricities of disposition, so, as any one naturally would do under the circumstances, he replied, that he was waiting for his instructions.

"Ya—ah!"

This was the second time the boatman had heard Wild utter this particularly ferocious and wild-animal-like reply, and he hardly knew what to make of it.

Did it mean an affirmative or a negative?

"A thousand curses!" roared Jonathan. "Do you mean to stay here dallying all day? Row me back to Blackfriars-bridge, or I'm d—d if I don't lift you overboard! Row, curse you! Row, and break your back, for aught I care!"

Muttering something in a low tone between his teeth, the waterman plied his oars, intent upon getting rid of his troublesome fare as soon as possible, and praying that he might never have the ill-luck to be hailed by him again.

Crossing his arms moodily over his breast, and looking down at his feet, with an angry scowl upon his features, Jonathan waited impatiently for the journey to be completed.

The tide, however, was now against them, so that, in spite of the desperate exertions of the rower, they made but little headway.

Still they did progress, and the boatman, by going in a diagonal direction, overcame, in a great measure, the resistance of the tide.

At length, to the inexpressible satisfaction of all parties, the landing-place at Blackfriars was reached.

The waterman guided his boat close to the steps, and Jonathan and his two satellites got out.

Wild was hastening away, oblivious of the fact that he had given the man nothing for his time and trouble.

"Waterman, please," he said. "Don't forget the waterman."

The thief-taker turned round.

"How much?" he asked, gruffly.

"Six shillings, Mr. Wild, if you please."

"Then send in your—ha! ha!—account to the—ha! ha!—Secretary of State, and he—ha! ha!—will pay you. Or," Jonathan added, delighting in the look of blank dismay that was depicted upon the man's face, "or you can call at my house in Newgate-street some time when you're passing—ha! ha!—and I will pay you. Ha! ha! ha!"

"Ha! ha!" laughed Wild's myrmidons, respectfully, as they followed their master up the steps.

The waterman gazed after them until they turned the angle of the bridge.

"The devil take their wit!" he said. "I wish I had known, I'm d—d if I wouldn't have upset the wherry! And serve them right, for I don't suppose they can swim."

Having thus vented his just indignation, he turned away.

But leaving him to put up with his loss in the most philosophy way he could, we will follow Jonathan Wild on to the bridge.

It was tolerably crowded with vehicles and passengers. With an uneasy feeling at his heart, he strove to look first to the right and then to the left.

But though he scanned attentively every moving object within sight, his eyes rested not upon what they sought.

With scarcely less uneasiness, his men looked up and down the road, trusting that they might see some signs of their companions.

They trembled when they found they were nowhere in sight.

Jonathan's anger would be dreadful.

And when in one of those moods, he always took revenge upon whoever might be nearest to him.

So they felt their hearts turn cold within them, and experienced that uncomfortable sensation produced by intense fright.

But this time they alarmed themselves needlessly, for Jonathan was seized with a new thought.

"Newgate," he said. "Yes, they have taken him to Newgate! Quick, follow me! To Newgate! To Newgate! They would not think it safe to keep him so long in the streets, and so have taken him there. Perhaps it is best, perhaps it is best."

Thus muttering to himself, Jonathan hustled along the pavement leading over the bridge.

But this mode of progression was too slow for his impatience.

The people on the footpath hindered him, although they made way for him with the utmost rapidity.

He looked behind him, and saw an empty hackney-coach approaching him.

"Hold!" he cried. "Drive me to Newgate!"

This was to the driver, who brought his horses to a standstill.

"Get in!"

This was to his men.

All three then scrambled into the coach as fast as they were able.

"Half-a-guinea!" roared the thief-taker, projecting his ugly head out of the window, "half-a-guinea for your fare if you drive fast. Half-a-guinea, I say!"

As this was only about six times his proper fare, the jarvey cried—

"All right, your honour! I'll have you there in no time. Half-a-guinea! Oh! lor!"

The descent of the bridge was just at that moment reached; and so, by dint of lashing the miserable animals vigorously who were harnessed to the clumsy vehicle, he got them to go at a very creditable rate.

In something less than a quarter of an hour Jonathan reached his destination.

The jarvey had driven up the Old Bailey from the direction of Ludgate-hill, and drew rein opposite to the principal entrance to the prison.

When Wild said Newgate, he meant his own house in Newgate-street; but he did not say anything more, for of course he could not tell whether his men had taken their prisoner to one place or the other.

So he alighted, and, having given the man his fare, knocked, as he alone had the audacity to knock, at the portals of the great city prison.

The summons was instantly responded to.

Followed by his men, Jonathan strode into the vestibule.

There were only two men present. One had charge of the door, and the other was seated on a rude kind of bench, placed there principally for their accommodation.

This man rose, and advanced in a deferential manner towards him.

"Shall I call the governor? Mr. Wild."

"Ya—ah!"

"Yes, sir. In one moment."
 "No!" roared Wild. "I don't want him. How long have you been on duty here?"
 "Four hours, Mr. Wild."
 "Have my men brought in a prisoner during that time—a young chap, slightly made?"
 "Jack Sheppard?"
 "Curse you! What is it to you who it is! I asked you if any one had been brought in."
 "No, Mr. Wild. I humbly begs your pardon, I am sure. But there's no one been brought in while I've been on duty, except an old man for an assault."
 "You are quite sure of that, eh?"
 "Quite, Mr. Wild, and Bill here will corroborate what I say, because he's been on duty too."
 "No, Mr. Wild," said the janitor, "there's only been an old man brought in this morning."
 "It's Little Newgate, then," muttered Jonathan, as he moved off.

The two turnkeys made some hideous grimaces behind his back, which, fortunately, the thief-taker did not perceive.

A bare two minutes sufficed to take him to the door of his own domicile.

He entered.

He repeated the question, this time with a certainty that it would be replied to in the affirmative.

But, to his horror, Tonks, who was on the lock, communicated the startling intelligence that neither Jack nor the two men with whom he had been left in charge had been seen anything of.

CHAPTER CXXX

JACK SHEPPARD ENTERS INTO A VERY INTERESTING CONVERSATION WITH JONATHAN'S MEN.

THE current of events, though it has more than once carried us very near Jack Sheppard, yet has drifted us by him, and thus disenabled us from devoting our attention to him, as we should have wished, long ago.

Our readers, we feel sure, must be deeply anxious to know what befel him after he was left by Jonathan Wild upon the old bridge at Blackfriars.

Two of that worthy's janizaries had taken firm hold of him, and had received the strictest injunctions to keep guard over him.

The moment, however, that the thief-taker disappeared round the angle of the bridge, all three, prisoner and captors, animated by one impulse, rushed to one of the recesses in the parapet which happened to be nearest to them.

Mounting upon the stone seat, they bent over as far as they could without losing their equilibrium, and endeavoured to pierce the thick white mist, and obtain a glimpse of the river below.

We have already described the dispersion of the mist immediately after Wild's arrival at the foot of the steps, and then they saw him draw a pistol, take a hasty aim, and pull the trigger.

In their situation the report of the weapon was something tremendous.

The smoke, too, ascended, and for a moment hid the scene below from their gaze.

But they heard the loud cry of pain which followed the report, and Wild's triumphant assertion that he had hit the mark.

By the time he had uttered it the smoke had cleared away.

Jack's state of mind can be imagined.

Pain would be have leaped over the parapet into the river himself, but the two men who held him in their grasp were on the alert to prevent any such intention being carried out.

Jack made up his mind that this time his friend and companion was no more, and the conviction forced itself upon his notice that he had lost him at the time when he stood most in need of his counsel and assistance.

Then there was the altercation with the boatman, and, in fine, they witnessed the whole of those occurrences which happened round about the old bridge, and with the details of which the reader has already been made acquainted.

They watched the boat as far down the river as it was visible, and when it faded from their sight, the two men looked rather anxiously and curiously at each other to know what they had better do.

Should they obey Wild's commands literally, and remain where they were until he returned, or should they take their prisoner direct to Newgate-street?

Jack was not long in discovering that they had something on their minds.

What that something was he knew not, but he trusted to his own acuteness to find it out, and turn the knowledge to his own advantage.

He could not help observing, though, that, in spite of their indecision about something, they took good care to keep a tight clutch upon him.

It should be premised that these two men had a very great idea of Jack's prowess.

Hitherto Jonathan had failed in all that he attempted against him.

A thing unparalleled.

It should as well be borne in mind that there was nothing these men admired so much as true courage, and Jack they had frequently seen exhibit it under such circumstances as would have made the boldest hearted quail.

But Jack had never done so, and had never failed in coming off victorious.

"Matthew!" said one of Jack's captors, at length.

"Yes."

"You know Johnny's instructions?"

"In course," growled Matthew. "Don't you?"

"Don't you be a fool, Mat. You have counsed the matter over, I can tell, as well as I have. Now what do you think we had better do?"

"What do you think?"

"I asked you."

"Then I think the same as you."

"Do you?"

"Yes."

"Then we are off to Little Newgate?"

"Just so. We can't do wrong, and its a thousand chances if Johnny comes back here first. We'll chance it."

"Agreed."

"But you do not ask me," said Jack, with an assumption of good humour, as he saw they were about to move off, "but you don't ask me for my opinion!"

"Ha! ha!" said Mat, "that's good."

"Oh! very," said the other.

"I'm glad you think so," said Jack, forcing a laugh.

"Oh! get out. What do you think we care for your opinion?"

"A great deal."

"Not a bit of it. Now, Jack, look here."

"I am looking."

"Just understand that me and Mat don't intend to stand no larks. Do we, Mat?"

"Certainly not, Bill, and so I advises him not to try none on!"

"Oh! thank you for nothing!" replied Jack. "Just wait till I begin."

"We gives you warning beforehand, that's all, and if you don't like to take it, why the fault's not ours."

"That's right; but just listen to me."

"No—no."

"Then that's not fair. I have let you have your say, and so you ought to let me have mine."

"We would, Jack, only we know you of old."

"It's all the same to me," replied their prisoner, "but you would find it much to your own benefit to hearken to what I was going to say."

"Are you sure of that, Jack?" asked Matthew.

"Quite," said Jack. "Now, look here. In the first place, you won't be doing wrong by stopping here, because I heard Jonathan give you orders to do so."

"That's true, to begin with."

"Of course it is, and so all I am going to tell you will be true."

"Go on, then. If you're long-winded I shant listen!"

"I want to say a great deal, and you needn't listen without you like."

"Oh! go on, Jack," growled Bill, "you'll waste all the blessed time disputing afore you begin."

"Then let us sit down on this stone seat," said Sheppard, "and wait for Wild's return, and while we are sitting and waiting, what's to hinder us from having a little comfortable talk?"

"Nothink at all."

"Sit down, then."

Accordingly all three repaired to one of those recesses in the bridge, which we have before mentioned, and here they sat down, Jack Sheppard occupying the centre position, with Bill on his right hand and Mat on his left.

It was only fear of their master, the thief-taker, that made them keep such a tight grasp upon him as they did. In their hearts they both admired and liked him, and would have been glad to give him a chance of escape, if it could have been done with safety to themselves.

Jack cleared his throat.

He had no idea what he was going to say to his jailers, and he had no time left him for consideration.

"Of course," he began, "you understand that Blueskin and Jonathan Wild are deadly enemies, and that they will never again hold the same relative positions as they once did."

"It strikes me very forcibly," said Mat, "that Mr. Wild will put an end to his enmity before he comes back, for he has sworn to take his life at the first opportunity, and you know when Jonathan Wild says a thing he always does it."

"Pho—pho! Don't you mind him. Now, I don't mind letting you into a secret."

"What is it?"

"That leap into the Thames was all planned before hand."

"The deuce it was!"

"Yes, and what is more, Blueskin is sure to get off."

"Is that a part of the plan, too?"

"It is."

"Oh!"

"But I don't see"—

"And I shant tell you any more to help you, but you can take my word for this, he will get off."

"You are not joking, Jack?"

"No."

"Then Mr. Wild will be a few savage."

"Most likely."

"Then I'll tell you what, Master Jack."

"Tell it, then."

"You're very clever, but if Blueskin gets off, I'll take jolly good care you don't, there now."

"You are quite at liberty. I don't want anything of the sort."

"I suppose not."

"You wouldn't be off, if you had the chance?"

"Don't be a fool, Mat. What's the good of going on in this ridiculous way when time is precious, and we have some very important business to discuss?"

"Oh! go on."

"Well, I will go on, if you'll only let me. That's just what I've been wanting to do all along."

"Begin, then."

"Do you understand about Blueskin?"

"Yes."

"That's all right, and will prepare you for what I am going to say next. You quite understand that Blueskin will escape from Wild in the river, let him do what he will, because you see, he has a plan that will do it."

"But you told us all that before."

This was very true.

But Jack's invention was not fertile enough to enable him to concoct a plausible story on so short a notice, and so, as the reader has seen, he strove all he could to delay commencing.

All of a sudden, however, and just as the patience of the two men was quite exhausted, an idea sprang into Jack's mind.

It matured itself instantly.

Not only would it, if successful, answer his first purpose, but also prove of much future benefit to him.

What it was will be very quickly seen, for he proceeded to unfold it to Mat and Bill, as they respectively called themselves, without delay.

CHAPTER CXXVI.

A VERY STARTLING PROPOSITION IS MADE BY JACK SHEPPARD TO MATTHEW FLOOD AND BILL BLEWITT.

"You must have noticed," began Jack, "that, now I have come to the point, I hardly know how to express myself; but I have resolved not to let anything of that sort stand in the way, but speak out at once."

"By far the best plan."

"I am glad you think so, because I want more particularly to talk about Jonathan Wild."

"I suppose so."

"And yourselves, too."

"What?"

"I mean with respect to your positions under him."

"Oh!"

"What sort of a master do you find him?"

"Very middling as to that."

"Very bad, you mean," said Jack.

"Well, very bad."

"I can see that. It's a mystery to me how you put up with his brutality."

"We are obliged."

"Not a bit of it!"

"But I say we are!"

"How so?"

"Why, he can tuck any of us up at Tyburn any session he pleases, and so we are compelled to bear his bad temper as well as we can."

"A fig for Tyburn!"

"Indeed! You don't know what it is!"

"I do! It don't frighten me in the least!"

"I believe that, Jack! Ah! I wish I had got your pluck!"

"Pho—pho! It's nothing! But I have got a proposal to make to you."

"Make it, then!"

"Don't be startled!"

"Let us hear it!"

"What do you say to leaving Jonathan's service?"

"Leaving Jonathan's service?"

"Yes!"

"Can't be done!"

"Pho—pho!"

"You must be mad to think of such a thing!"

"It's you that's mad! Jonathan is only a man, though you would fain make him something more. But take my advice. Defy him!"

"Defy him!"

"Yes, and then his power is at an end. It ceases from that very moment! Don't you think so?"

"No!"

"Look at myself! I defied him!"

"I know that."

"And who has got the best of it?"

"You."

"Of course!"

"But you are one of a thousand!"

"If you choose to think so, I am. But you try it, and you will find yourselves the same."

"I doubt it!"

"But you haven't quite heard what I was going to propose. You understand, of course, that Blueskin and myself are united to make common cause against Jonathan Wild!"

"I know."

"Hitherto we have come off first-rate, when you take all things into consideration, have we not?"

"You certainly have."

"Then, just look here, if us two can do what we have, by ourselves, mind you, what do you think we could do if there was four of us?"

"Four of you?"

"Yes, four. Double the number. What do you think we could do?"

"I don't know."

"Why, it's plain enough. We should do twice as much, and then, where would Jonathan be then?"

This was rather an unanswerable question, so the two men remained silent.

"He would be nowhere," continued Jack, triumphantly.

"Nowhere. He wouldn't dare to show his face to us."

"What are you driving at, Jack?"

"Can't you see?"

"Not exactly, and you had better go on explaining."

"I will do so, because you have so far listened to me; and so I feel emboldened to make the proposition in plain words."

"Ay, that's the way to do it. We shall understand you then."

"Very good. Then, Matthew and William—what's your other names?"

"It don't matter."

"It will be best to tell them."

"Mine, then, is Matthew Flood."

"Yes."

"And mine William Blewitt."

"I know your name well."

"Do you?"

"Yes; and you, Matthew, if I recollect right, have got a bit of a grudge against Jonathan?"

"You may say that."

"But you would be nearer the mark," interrupted Blewitt, "if you said Jonathan had got a bit of a grudge against him."

"Oh! that's it."

"Rather different you see."

"Oh! very different; and being different, is so much the better."

"How do you make that out?"

"In this way. In plain words my proposal amounts to this: Blueskin and myself set up against Jonathan Wild. Will you join us?"

"Join you?"

"Yes; be on our side. If you make up your minds to do so, take my word for this, you will have all the advantages you at present enjoy, without any of the disagreeables."

"It is a serious matter."

"I know that; but you don't seem to see that if you do as I wish you cannot, by any possibility, make your position worse, while you have all the chance of making it better."

"There's something in that."

"Everything. Jonathan Wild will never be what he has been. He has reached the top of the hill, and now he will begin to go down, and, mark my words, if he don't descend a great deal quicker than he went up."

"But how do you know that he has reached the top?"

"I will tell you. Jonathan Wild would never have been what he has, and is, had it not been for Blueskin."

"Blueskin?"

"Yes; and now he has set up against him, down he will go. Did you ever notice that while Blueskin was with him all went well?"

"No, I never noticed it; but now you come to speak of it, it certainly did."

"And how have things gone since they parted?"

"Better."

"Better?"

"Yes, better."

"But how?"

"In all ways."

"You are making a great mistake, my friend. He may have made a few lucky strokes, but they ought, instead of inspiring you with confidence, to fill you with doubt."

The two men were staggered by the cool, deliberate way in which Jack spoke.

They hesitated.

There was nothing but the fear of their lives to tempt them to remain in the service of the thief-taker.

And as Jack had very truly said, they could not make their position any worse than it was, while they might make it better.

They would have consented at once, but the great awe and dread of their master in which they stood, made them hold back.

Jack saw that they were wavering in the balance, and that a very little thing indeed would turn the scale.

His liberty, and probably his life, depended upon their decision; so, as may be expected, he looked for it rather anxiously.

He was impatient, too, though he did not deem it politic to show it. He every moment expected to see Jonathan make his appearance, and then all his hopes would be dashed to the ground.

From where they sat on the stone bench in the recess, they were able, by turning their heads a little, to see down the river as far as London bridge, although that structure, owing to its distance, was only dimly discernible.

He could see nothing of Wild's boat returning as yet, but then it was as likely as not he was returning by land.

So he determined to press his suit yet closer.

"Have you considered?" he asked. "Don't answer hastily, and without you have made up your minds to abide by your decision. I have plans under hand, which, in conjunction, must prove to be profitable. We are in want of two to join us, and you have had the first offer; if you don't like to accept it, we can look out for some one else!"

"But you seem to forget!"

"That I am your prisoner. No, I don't. That gives me no uneasiness at all; for if Jonathan was to load me with chains, and put me in the deepest and strongest cell in Newgate, it would not hold me; I should be sure to get out."

The easy, off-hand assurance with which these words were uttered is perfectly indescribable.

But it had a great effect upon the two men.

"There is only one thing, Jack," they said, after a little pause, "that we want to assure ourselves of."

"And what is that?"

"Why, that all you have been telling and representing to us is quite right; because, if it is"—

"What!"

"I don't say what! but is it true?"

"Every word of it."

"I believe you, Jack; and so I for one say, I'm with you; and I know Blewitt will say the same."

"I do just the same. If what you say is right, we are with you."

"Depend upon it, and let me assure you that, with Blueskin as our leader, we shall be able to set Jonathan at defiance. Our policy will be this—not to interfere with him without he interferes with us."

"That's only fair!"

"It is reasonable; and if the villain seeks an encounter with us, his overthrow is certain. Are you with us?"

"We are; and we should have said so long ago, only we wanted to try you, and see that all was right. We were sick and tired of Wild's service, and were studying how to leave it best. So we are with you!"

They released their hold upon him as they spoke.

"Hurrah!" said Jack, as he felt himself free. "Come on, my friends; and you will find yourselves more than a match for Jonathan Wild!"

"I'll hang him!" said Flood, malignantly. "I have sworn it, and I will keep my oath."

Jonathan had sworn to hang him. We shall see how the oaths were kept.

CHAPTER CXXVII.

EDGORTH BESS DISCOVERS THE SECRET EXIT FROM HER CHAMBER, AND PERFORMS A MOST DESPERATE ACHIEVEMENT.

FRUGAL as the meal was of which Edgworth Bess partook, yet she felt all the better for it.

She was stronger, and not so dejected as she had been.

Consequently she was able to look about her with greater calmness, and reason a little upon the events which had lately happened.

There was much to perplex and baffle her.

Two circumstances particularly did so.

The reader can guess what they were.

One was the mysterious manner in which the clock had struck.

What did it mean?

She had only one answer to the question, and that was that it was a signal of some sort.

But a signal of or for what?

There she was baffled, and unable to proceed.

Then there was the other circumstance.

The mysterious and inexplicable manner in which the colonel had first acted and then disappeared.

But for his behaviour she was not particularly at a loss to account. She had a pretty shrewd idea of what it meant.

He had raised his arm, uttered the ejaculation, and pointed to the window as he did, for the sole purpose of distracting her attention from himself.

He succeeded in his attempt, and he took advantage of the moment that her back was turned.

But why did he slam the door of the bedroom?

That, to her, seemed to indicate that he had passed through it, and had done so in order to hinder her from entering it.

But she had made a most careful and minute examination of the two outer chambers, and she felt sure there was no concealed mode of exit there.

For, as she reasonably enough considered, it must be some easy mode, or he would not have been able to leave the apartment so quickly as he had.

Then she set herself to think of some other motive for his closing the door violently.

Was it done for the purpose of misleading her?

Perhaps so.

The concealed exit might be in that very room—easy of discovery if its existence was suspected. Had he, with calculating forethought, reckoned upon throwing her off the scent?

From what she had already seen of the man—and woman's quickness in reading man's character is proverbial—she thought this must be it, and the more she pondered, the stronger grew the conviction in her mind.

Then, on the heels of the other, followed another thought, which really seemed the most plausible of all.

Assuming that there was the secret exit from the chamber.

That exit would most probably be accomplished by a panel in the wainscot.

That panel would close with a spring.

When it shut there would be a faint snap.

Was it to conceal that faint snap that the colonel had slammed the door?

Was it his motive to make the greater sound drown the less; for if the snap was heard, it would go a long way towards fixing the exact locality of it: the piece of knowledge most requisite to keep from his prisoner.

Then, pursuing the same train of thought, she further asked herself whether it was not from the last two causes combined?

She felt almost sure of it.

Endowed with a sudden and momentary hope, she sprang to her feet.

She listened.

All was still, save the dull, hollow murmur of the waves upon the beach, and the palpitation of her heart, which had increased to a most painful and unbearable extent.

Her agitation was excessive, and as she considered it was without adequate cause, she tried to shake it off, and to a certain extent succeeded.

Having done so, she, in a methodical manner, began the examination of the room.

Carefully she felt over the whole surface of all the panels in the apartment, in the hope of meeting with some slight obstruction.

But in this she was disappointed, although the operation was very carefully performed, and took up a great deal of time.

Then, with her knuckles, she commenced sounding the panels in different places, in order to judge, by the difference in the sound, whether there was a hollow space behind any one of them.

Presently she came to that angle in which the door opening into the bed-chamber was placed.

She knocked.

The sound produced, though not what could exactly be called hollow, was yet very different to that which she had previously elicited.

She knocked again.

Then she tried to shake the panel.

And was successful.

Yes, it was evidently loose in its frame.

And now it should be explained that, as you walked out of the outer room into the bed-chamber, the knob of the door was on the right hand side of it, and that when you turned the handle to open it, you had to pull the door towards you, not push it.

The consequence of this was, then, when the door was wide open, it rested against the paneling, for we have before stated its position to be in the angle of the room.

Then Bess, with an acumen which she could hardly have been supposed to possess, came to the conclusion that the colonel, finding the door open, it of course impeded his retreat, and so he had shut it in the way he had.

The secret panel was now all but discovered. The only chance of their remaining undiscovered is when there is no suspicion of their presence, but the moment that suspicion is formed, if there is one, it is sure to be found out by anyone taking a little trouble, for they can never be perfectly concealed.

That there was the secret entrance Bess felt confident, and now, having found the spot, it only remained for her to discover the means of opening it.

With this end in view she stood upon a chair, and began to feel at the very top of the panel.

Placing the four fingers of the right hand together, and holding them nearly straight, she moved them in a horizontal manner from side to side, thus describing a series of lines, and taking care, as she descended, to leave no space in between them.

In this way she went slowly down the panel.

She reached the centre.

But, up to the moment of her doing so, her pains had been unrewarded.

But she did not despair. Already had she met with greater success than ever she had anticipated.

She got off the chair—for there was no longer any need of it—and renewed her search.

Lower, lower, lower she went, until she at last thought that the means of opening the secret door were too cunningly hidden for her to be able to find them out.

Then she reached the floor.

She could scarcely repress a cry of joy when her fingers encountered some little projection.

She looked down, and felt it more carefully.

It was a small brass stud, fixed in the panel.

Her first impulse was to press upon it, but that produced no effect.

Then she placed her thumb nail against it, and strove to move it first in a lateral, and then in an upward direction.

As she did this, it went gradually up to the extent of perhaps half an inch.

This stud, it should be stated, was fixed in the centre of the bottom of the panel, quite close down on to the floor.

Having done this, she tried to find, by pushing in different directions, which way it opened.

The mode was rather singular.

When pressing upon the stud, now it was raised, she found the woodwork give way before her.

Looking up, she saw that there must be hinges fixed in some way to the top part of the panel, which opened just the reverse way that doors do, or as doors would if their hinges were shifted from the side and fixed to the top.

She pushed further and further, but met with that kind of resistance which a spring would offer, and if she slackened the pressure in the least, it began to close again of its own accord.

It was so dark on the other side that she could see nothing, and being sure of opening it again without trouble, she allowed it to close.

In her bedroom there was a small lamp, and this she lighted.

Then she felt the necessity of pitching upon some object which would counteract the force of the spring, and enable her to keep the door open while she made her explorations.

When standing upon the chair she had noticed that the rail at the back was loose.

She resolved to break this off, and after a few attempts succeeded.

She was then armed with a piece of beech-wood, about two feet long and nearly two inches square.

This would answer the purpose she required of it most admirably.

These arrangements having been completed, she took the lamp in her hand, and went to the corner of the room,

[CAPTAIN HOWLET ORDERS THE EXECUTION OF THE SPY.]

first listening that there was no one close at hand to interrupt her.

All was still.

She knelt down, and quickly had the panel undone.

She pressed it as far back as she could, using the piece of wood the back of the chair afforded her for this purpose.

Then, when it had reached its full extent, she carefully lodged it against a projection.

The door was open.

A current of cold air came from the aperture, and more than once its force was so great that the lamp was all but extinguished.

She saved it, however, by shielding it with her hand.

Then holding it forward, and lying almost on her face, she proceeded to look what kind of place it was the secret door in the paneling disclosed.

She uttered an ejaculation of terror!

The light of the lamp revealed nothing but the sides of an abyss, the bare sight of which, and thoughts of the frightful depth, sent a chill of horror through her blood.

Had she been less careful, what an awful fate would have been hers.

CHAPTER CXXVIII.

EDGORTH BESS MAKES GOOD USE OF THE SECRET OUTLET TO HER CHAMBER, BUT THE END OF HER PERILS IS NOT YET REACHED.

THERE was nothing whatever to indicate the position of such a pitfall, and nothing to guard one from falling into it; and no doubt this was a part of the cleverness of the original contriver, who, in anticipation of some person discovering the secret outlet, determined that they should not long survive that knowledge.

Caution—generally, in its extended phase, timidity—is a prominent characteristic in the mental composition of nearly all females; and thus it was Edgorth Bess, differing in no wise from others of her sex, acted in the manner we have described.

Not for one moment had she expected to make such a discovery as she had; and coming upon her so unawares as it did, she was obliged to draw back and wait a moment while she recovered herself.

The peril she had so narrowly escaped unnerved her, and made her less capable of carrying out her enterprise successfully than she otherwise would have been.

Nor was what she saw around her at all calculated to reassure her. On the contrary, the gloomy room, with its walls of dark wainscot, now momentarily illuminated by the flickering light, and then left in the deepest shadow, was well calculated to excite superstitious ideas.

All was very—very still—dreadfully still. It would have been a relief of no mean character if she could have heard some sound to indicate that there were others in the world besides herself, but no sound met her ears.

Even the roaring of the sea had ceased, or at all events, had become so nearly so, that from her situation she could hear nothing of it.

Rapidly and painfully did her heart pulsate, and she drew her breath, not in long, healthy suspirations, but in short, quick, uncertain gasps, that sounded more like sighs than ought else.

Her hand trembled, and the light of the lamp—feeble at the best—was much diminished in brightness, as the motion of her hand was communicated to it.

It peopled the walls, too, with strange, horrible, moving shadows.

But, despite the state of alarm and vague apprehension in which the poor girl found herself to be, the idea of how necessary it was for her to calm herself in order to attempt her escape never lost its prominence in her imagination.

At last, with a vigorous effort of the will, she rose to her feet, and, still retaining the little lamp in her grasp, made an inspection of every part of the chamber.

This dispersed much of the supernatural dread of she knew not what, which she had experienced, and then she returned to the strange opening in the wall.

Her contrivance, simple as it was, for overcoming the propensity of the spring, answered admirably.

Timorously, notwithstanding her determination to be firm, she knelt down again upon the floor, and, resting the weight of her body upon her left arm, she leaned over the abyss.

But the lamp was totally inadequate to the task of dissipating the darkness with which the pit was filled, and so far from aiding her, it had an opposite effect.

Unwilling to leave the place until she had thoroughly examined it, for something within her which might, with questionable propriety, be called inspiration, seemed to tell her that, however repulsive it might look, yet it led to freedom.

Therefore she again laid herself down at full length, with her head and the upper portion of her body actually hanging over the abyss.

But she steadied herself with her left hand, with which she clutched the sides of the wainscot tightly.

Her right arm she held quite down the pit-like place, with the tiny light in her hand.

This she waved about in the endeavour to catch a glimpse of the sides, but, to her bewilderment, there were no traces of sides visible—all was void, empty space; nor had she any apparent means by which she could discover either the depth or the width.

"But surely," she thought, "there must be something like a wall at the side nearest to me. I will try."

As she spoke, she moved her hand in the direction she had mentioned, fully expecting that it would be as she had said, but in this she was again deceived, for her hand encountered no opposition whatever.

There could be nothing delusive about it, for when she so held her hand, the light was quite out of sight.

Such a thing as this was calculated in every way to increase her fears and give tangibility to those dim presages of horror which she had had so much difficulty to banish from her mind.

What kind of place it could be which the secret panel disclosed she could form no notion. Conjecture she found to be quite useless.

But suddenly, as she still moved her hand, in an anxious and vain attempt to see about her, something came in contact with her hand.

Although this was just what she expected, or rather was hoping to find, she uttered a cry of dismay, which she found it impossible to repress.

But this was caused by the singular feel which the object had her hand had casually touched.

It was soft, yet hard.

Yielding to the touch, yet firm.

What could it be?

The question was one to which she was incompetent to frame a reply.

Gathering courage from desperation, for she felt certain, if she dallied much longer, the opportunity of achieving her freedom would be lost, she bent her head lower, in order to look what it was.

For a moment she saw nothing, and then she perceived the mysterious object which she had touched.

Her fears were dispelled in an instant, and she grew quite angry with herself to think that she had been weak enough to entertain them.

The mysterious object was a rope.

Yes, a rope, and nothing more.

But it was of extraordinary thickness, and knotted in many places.

Straight down it hung, the end seeming to lose itself in the very bowels of the earth.

It was attached, in some way which she could not very well make out, to the flooring beneath her.

The use of this rope seemed obvious.

It was by its aid that the secret panel was made of service.

But where did it lead?

With what place did it communicate?

Was the length of the rope, apparently endless in the imagination, comparatively short in the reality.

Who could tell?

The only means by which she could acquire such knowledge was to descend by it.

She shuddered at the idea.

Was she strong enough to support the weight of her body for any length of time by clinging to a rope?

She feared not.

Already was she a prey to exhaustion.

But then the remembrance of the terrible scene she had had with Colonel Thorne flashed across her mind, and that seemed to endow her with ten times her ordinary strength.

No longer did she hesitate.

Let the rope lead to what place it might—let there be what dangers there might—she would dare all—brave all—anything would be better than remaining where she was, exposed to such peril as she had been.

Dominated by these thoughts, she placed the light upon the ground, and then felt for the rope.

Its position was apparently awkward, but it was not so in reality, and she found herself able, by lowering her body gently, to take hold of it easily.

She clung to it for dear life.

The rope swayed from side to side with her weight at first, but it soon steadied itself.

She looked upwards to the ceiling of the chamber, which she fondly hoped and believed she was about to leave for ever.

Downwards she dare not trust herself to glance; and, besides that, she knew that it would be impossible to see a foot below her.

Had she been able she would have taken the little lamp with her, but she knew she would require the full use of her hands, and she could not see how else she was to carry it.

Reluctantly, therefore, she left it behind her upon the floor of the room, for she could not but be conscious of the amount of consolation it would be to her upon her perilous journey.

Discarding, however, from her mind all these vain regrets, she began to lower herself down the rope.

She found, after a little while, that it was specially adapted to the purpose to which she was putting it.

It was just thick enough to grasp comfortably, while, at about every ten inches, there was a large knot, which afforded a hand as well as a foot-hold.

Cautiously—very cautiously, and not moving one hand or one foot until she was certain the other was secure, the intrepid girl lowered herself down the rope.

No other courage than that of desperation could have prompted her to the execution of such a feat.

Down, down—ceaselessly down she went.

The little light to which she looked up had now dwindled down until it was no larger than a star.

Still there seemed no end to the rope.

Surrounded as she was by utter darkness, she could form no idea of the place she was in except that she could not divest herself of the idea that it was well-like in shape.

There can be no doubt that Edgworth Bess would never have attempted to descend by the rope had she not had the conviction firmly implanted in her mind that it was by means of it Colonel Thorne had left her presence.

It might lead her into his arms, but she trusted that good fortune would so far befriend her as to shield her from him.

At length, after an apparently endless time, her feet touched something firm, which she quickly enough found to be solid earth.

Still was she in utter darkness, and so, without venturing to move, she held to the rope which she had already begun to look upon as a friend.

CHAPTER CXXIX.

CAPTAIN HOWLET COMMANDS THE EXECUTION OF THE SPY.

WHAT kind of place it was which Edgworth Bess had managed with so much difficulty to reach, and what befel her upon her arrival there, must be deferred to another chapter, as the reader's attention must first be given to that strange scene in the caverns underneath Colonel Thorne's residence, "The Larches."

It will be recollected that the pirate-band had, with some apparent show of reason, pronounced one of their companions guilty of treachery and being a spy, after which, without in the least regarding his denial of the charge, and protestations of his innocence, they had proceeded to execute very summary justice upon him indeed, by pinioning his arms, placing him upon an inverted barrel, and tying a noose round his neck.

His death—immediate death—seemed inevitable, but at this crisis the lieutenant, or second in command to the captain, had made his appearance.

This person, whom the prisoner had addressed by the name of Morgan, desiring to be placed in possession of the facts of the case, had been shown a letter alleged to have been dropped by the prisoner.

This letter was read, and its character was such as left no reasonable doubt of the truth of the accusation behind; but Morgan, deeming the matter important enough to be brought before their much-dreaded captain, had by some means or other, known only to himself, gone to the side of the cave and summoned him.

Then, as we have described, there was a brief interval of silence, which would have been quite perfect had it not been for the miserable being whose position was truly so awful a one.

But after the lapse of a few minutes, there advanced from the darkest portion of the cavern a tall and commanding figure, which, when it reached the light, presented an appearance most dreadful to behold.

It was a man of gigantic stature, but instead of the head of a human being, he had the head of a large white owl.

The appearance of it was grotesquely hideous.

To the wild, lawless spirits, however, who were there assembled, it must have been familiar, for with one accord they cried—

"The Howlet! the Howlet! Three cheers, mates, for our brave captain, the Howlet! Down with the spy! Slay him! Kill the traitor to our captain! Three cheers for Captain Howlet!"

These, and many other similar vociferations, greeted him.

How long they would have continued is highly problematical.

As it was, they received a sudden check.

The captain, as he had been called, slowly elevated his right hand.

The action was noted.

A dead silence ensued.

The effect was like magic.

Morgan approached, and, with a deferential air, addressed himself to the strange being, Captain Howlet.

The reader must already be aware who and what this individual is—at all events he has been shown in both characters, and so it will be folly to attempt to keep up any mystery concerning him.

In order, however, that there be no mistake—no misunderstanding, we may as well in this place briefly say that the information contained in the spy's letter was perfectly correct. Colonel Thorne, the envied wealthy gentleman, and the everywhere dreaded Captain Howlet were one and the same person.

It does not need any great effort on the part of the mental faculties to imagine how it would be tolerably easy to maintain two such characters in such a manner as to avert all suspicion.

The device of the owl's head, which was merely a curiously-fashioned head-dress, was for the purpose of surrounding the pirate-chief with more attributes of the wild and wonderful than had been imputed to him.

It certainly gave him a most horrible and unnatural appearance, and, to any one who had not seen or heard of it, would be productive of the utmost terror.

As we have hinted in another place, the pirate crew were armed with head-dresses of a similar kind, but these they generally laid aside when in the security of their cave, and resumed them only when on board.

But Captain Howlet was very rarely indeed seen among his men without this appendage, and on this occasion, when their was no actual reason for so doing, he had assumed it.

One thing only remains unexplained, and that is the precise means by which Lieutenant Morgan had summoned him.

They were very simple.

Attached to the bell upon which the hours were struck by the clock within the belfry above "The Larches" was a hammer, the handle of which was attached to a piece of wire, that, passing down the strange, well-like place, which Edgworth Bess had with so much peril descended, terminated in a large wooden handle in the recess, into which we stated he made his way.

The nine strokes signified that something of a very unusual and important character had occurred, and that his immediate presence was necessary.

With the fear, then, at his heart that he was menaced by a danger of a more than ordinary magnitude, Colonel Thorne had hastily left the apartment in which he had immured Edgworth Bess.

He had adopted the expedient of pointing through the window in order to distract her attention from himself, and succeeded in his object.

Then, taking instant advantage of the opportunity afforded him, he had slammed the inner door, passed through the secret panel, and, by means of the rope, reached the caverns below.

Ere he entered upon the turbulent and awful scene he paused a moment, and taking his owl's head-dress from a kind of shelf upon which he was accustomed to keep it, he had donned it.

Amid the silence, then, that succeeded his holding up his hand, Morgan spoke—

"There is treachery here, captain," he said. "Black and dangerous treachery!"

Captain Howlet made a movement with his hand, which signified "proceed," and that was the sole reply he chose to give.

But he did not need to be told who was the suspected man. A glance would serve to show any one that.

He folded his arms, however, and looked steadfastly at him.

The eyes in the owl's head had a truly horrible aspect. They were formed of dark-coloured, yet transparent, glass.

They were large, round, and prominent, like the real eyes of this strange nocturnal bird.

Through these lenses, for such they were, the captain could see with great distinctness.

He never removed them from the man on the barrel.

"The men were going to string him up, captain, and give him a short shrift, but I happened to come, and when I heard the particulars, I thought the matter was important enough to call you."

"Good, Morgan!" said Captain Howlet, in strange muffled tones, from behind his singular mask. "What kind of treachery is it?"

"You shall hear, captain; but shall I tell you, or call the men forward, and question them before your face?"

"Question them," said the captain. "There can then be no mistake."

"Certainly not. Batson!"

"Yes, your honour."

The man who had before spoken again stood forward, and, folding his arms, awaited his interrogations.

"Is that man on the barrel the one you suspect of treason?"

"He is, your honour."

"His name is Will Ogden, is it not?"

"I don't know for that. Sometimes he calls himself Will Ogden, and sometimes Tom Drotchel, and it appears his name is neither the one nor the other."

"Well, let that pass for the present. We will call him Will Ogden."

"Yes, your honour."

"What was the first suspicious thing you noticed?"

"As he walked across the cave, we saw a paper drop to the ground."

"From his person?"

"I am quite sure of that, your honour."

"What next?"

"As I said before, we thought it was a love-letter, or something of that sort, so I crept quietly after him, and picked it up without his knowing, for we meant to tease him a bit over it."

"Well?"

"I couldn't read the letter, so I gave it to Joe Dudley."

"Now, Dudley, stand forward."

In obedience to this command, the man stood forward who had read the letter, which he did again, but as it has already been placed before the reader, it is scarcely worth while to repeat it.

At last the epistle was finished.

By the manner alone in which he received this communication, it was apparent how much the pirate captain was surprised at it. The secret there mentioned he fancied was unknown to any of his lawless band.

He was furious.

But the desire to know more enabled him to control himself. The traitor he could deprive of life at any moment he thought proper.

"To whom is the letter addressed?" he asked.

Joe Dudley turned it over in his hand.

The thought of looking on the back for the name of the person for whom the letter was intended, had not occurred to him.

It was there, however, and, to the surprise of all present, he read—

"Mr. Jonathan Wild, Newgate-street."

CHAPTER CXXX.

COLONEL THORNE DISCOVERS EDGWORTH BESS, BUT MEETS WITH AN INTERRUPTION TO HIS LEAVING THE CAVERN.

PROBABLY there was no one present in the cave upon whom this announcement took so great an effect as Captain Howlet.

The fame of the great thief-taker, unusual as it was, had failed to penetrate the intricacies of those old Kentish caverns, and to the pirate crew his name was almost, if not quite, unknown.

But it was not so with their captain.

In his character of Colonel Thorne, and during his residence in London, he had both seen and heard of this extraordinary man.

He well knew how much his interference was to be dreaded—he had seen it exemplified in others.

And there was pretty positive evidence before him that he was acquainted with all his secrets.

Tearing off the strange head-dress which he wore, and casting it upon the ground, he cried—

"Give me the letter—I must see it! Give it to me!"

With a trembling hand, Joe Dudley presented the scrap of paper to him.

There could be no doubt whatever about the matter.

As his eyes rested upon it, his face assumed an aspect more terrible than any of his crew had ever beheld upon it.

He drew the long, heavy sword which he carried by his side, and, rushing forward, held it threateningly before the traitor's face.

"Speak!" he cried, hoarsely. "Confess!"

"I do—I do!"

"What?"

"I am innocent."

"Bah!"

"I am innocent! I am innocent, captain! The letter did not fall out of my pocket, or, if it did, it was placed there by some one."

"Beware!" said the Howlet; "I have long had my suspicions of you. You are no sailor, I am certain, though such, when you entered the band, you represented yourself to be. Unless you would quit life by the most lingering torments, confess all!"

"Spare my life, then, captain. Spare my life!"

"I shall make no promise."

"I will tell all—I will tell all!"

"You have acknowledged your guilt. Now speak. It will remain for me to decide afterwards whether your life is to be spared."

"I will, captain."

"Go on, then."

"I—I wrote that letter!"

"You did?"

"Yes, captain; but I didn't send it—I didn't mean to send it."

"Ha! would you trifle with your life? Up with him!"

The men needed no second bidding.

The spy was off his feet in a moment.

He kicked and plunged convulsively, but his struggles were in vain.

He grew black in the face.

In a few moments all was over.

He was a corpse.

A marling-spike was stuck into the ground, and the extremity of the rope tied tightly round it.

Then the dead body was allowed to swing to and fro, as a warning to those who might have contemplated a similar act.

Captain Howlet was satisfied.

"My mates," he said, for, with that policy for which he was so remarkable, he endeavoured to conciliate and be on good terms with his crew, "it is a good thing chance favoured us so far as to let us know that villain's designs. Who knows but that another hour or two might have seen that letter on its way to the person to whom it was addressed, and then, if he had received it, there would have been no quarter for any of us."

A fierce murmur followed his words.

"However, that danger's over now. Here is the letter. It will never be sent now. Look!"

As he spoke, Captain Howlet held the paper in the flame of one of the many oil-lamps that were placed around the cavern, and in a moment it was consumed.

"Keep yourselves ready," he said, "for I intend to cruise off again directly. This will hardly be a safe place for us just at present, and it is best to avoid danger of discovery. Cut the traitor down, and bury him somewhere out of sight. I will begone, but only above. Morgan, if anything occurs, signal me directly."

"Ay—ay! captain."

"Keep a sharp look out, and be prepared. Not that I am much afraid, because I think we have been lucky enough to nip the evil in the bud."

Having thus spoken, Captain Howlet crossed the cavern in the direction of the low dark archway through which he had entered it.

As he neared it, however, he fancied he heard a slight sound.

At any other time than the present, he would probably have allowed it to go unheeded.

But the scene we have described had disturbed him greatly.

In the first place, Jonathan Wild had a suspicion at least, if not more, of who and what he was.

The fact that he was known on shore as Colonel Thorne had been published to his men.

Discovery was what he had to dread. For a long time past he had eluded it, and flattered himself that for a long time he should still be successful in doing so.

Every little thing would now be noticed. He would be in a state of perpetual suspense; and so, when he entered the little recess and heard a faint sound, he started and listened, fancying he was about to encounter an enemy.

The place was profoundly dark.

He hesitated to advance.

"Morgan!" he cried; "Morgan!"

"Ay—ay! your honour."

"A light here! Quick! A light!"

Morgan hastily detached one of the lamps from the wall, and ran towards him.

Captain Howlet took it from him with his left hand. In his right he held his drawn sword.

Thus provided, he advanced.

The lamp shed a clear light around him.

He advanced cautiously.

Ere, however, he had proceeded a dozen paces, he uttered a loud exclamation, and, dropping his sword, he rushed forward.

A scream—loud—shrill—ear-piercing—followed the act.

The reader can guess from whose lips it had come.

It was Edgworth Bess.

When, with so much hazard, she had descended the rope and found her feet touch the earth, she paused, not knowing what to do.

Darkness surrounded her.

Not that darkness which may be seen abroad, or in a chamber, but such a darkness as is found only in the caverns of the earth, where no ray of light ever penetrates.

She knew not what danger might attempt a movement in any direction, and so, bewildered, alarmed, and exhausted, she clutched the rope tightly, determined not to quit her hold until she felt herself in safety.

It was just at this moment that she heard a footstep and a voice.

The latter was known to her.

It was Colonel Thorne's.

She felt as though she was about to faint.

But fortunately she was able to rally herself from it.

More heavily, however, she leant upon the rope, which made a faint rustling sound.

It was this which had reached the colonel's ears as he was about to return.

Edgworth Bess heard him pause.

She heard him call to Morgan for a light.

But so intense was her terror that she found herself unable to move in the least from where she stood, even when she saw the pirate approaching with the light.

With the strength of desperation, however, she held on to the rope.

Then she uttered that awful scream which followed so close upon the captain's exclamation.

As may be imagined, these cries rang with great shrillness through the vaulted chambers, reaching the ears of the pirates, and causing them to hasten to the spot.

Captain Howlet, in a second, had darted forward and caught Bess tightly round the waist.

But still she kept her hold upon the rope, nor could he force her from it.

But Morgan, although as full of surprise at seeing a girl there as any one well could be, yet retained some of his faculties, and so, drawing his sword, he with one blow severed the rope a few inches above the place where Edgworth Bess had grasped it.

Captain Howlet, of course, ceased to experience any difficulty in dragging his captive with him.

He carried her into the outer cavern.

The poor girl's mind and strength almost gave way before the continued attacks which had been made upon it, and she was now in a state of semi-unconsciousness.

She still retained her hold upon the rope.

Captain Howlet placed her on the ground, and, before his men had time to express their astonishment at the affair, so inexplicable as it was to them, he cried—

"Quick! all of you, quick! Morgan, get everything in readiness. We will go aboard at once!"

"All is quite ready," said Morgan in reply. "Follow me, lads, to the outlet!"

So saying, Lieutenant Morgan hastened forward, while the men, in a disorderly throng, followed him across the cave, and down a long tortuous passage.

The captain quickly raised Edgworth Bess from her recumbent posture, and followed in the rear.

The passage was about five hundred paces in length.

Upon reaching its extremity, they paused.

All was in darkness.

But the men were too much accustomed to what they were about to need a light, besides it would have been rather dangerous to have shown one.

They were opening the secret door in the rocks.

But ere they had quite finished their task, there was a strange, grating sound against the rocks, and a voice cried, in loud and startling tones—

"Forward! forward! Fire upon them if they offer the least resistance! Take them, dead or alive! Forward! forward! The ladder is quite forward! Down with them, and then there will be an end to Captain Howlet and his pirate band!"

CHAPTER CXXXI.

JACK SHEPPARD REACHES GILBERT-PASSAGE IN SAFETY, BUT HEARS NO TIDINGS OF BLUESKIN.

JACK SHEPPARD and the two men who had so strangely left Wild's service and entered his, proceeded at a good pace towards Drury-lane.

It was getting daylight, and, like those predatory animals of nocturnal habits, they hastened to find some place where they could conceal themselves during the day.

Impulse, without reflection, caused Jack to take the route he did. A moment's thought would have told him it was dangerous in the extreme, being the first place Wild would go to look for him.

Strange to say, however, so engrossed was he with thinking of Blueskin and poor Edgworth Bess, he reached Wych-street before it occurred to him.

Then happening to look up, he saw a little way before him, on the opposite side of the way, the residence of his old master, John Roots, the carpenter.

The shop-shutters were shut, and the blinds before all the windows drawn down.

In the busy whirl of ideas and incidents to which he had been subject since that night when we first introduced him to the reader, the original purpose of his revenge had almost been lost sight of; but now, when he unexpectedly found himself before his dwelling, thoughts of the past surged up in his breast, and those angry passions which had been for so long dormant, broke forth afresh, with additional fury, from the long rest they had had.

Blewitt and Flood looked astonished, and rather alarmed, too, when they saw the change in Jack's demeanour. They could not tell what to make of it.

"Villain!" said Jack, hoarsely, apostrophizing the senseless wood-work, "this is all your work! but you shall yet live to repent your treatment of the poor apprentice, who you would not believe to be honest, because his father was hanged. Tremble, villain! tremble! I have sworn to be revenged; and if it is ten years to come, I shall remember my oath, and keep it!"

"What's the row, Jack?" asked Matthew Flood.

"Nothing—nothing! No matter. A little private affair. Come on."

"All right. But, I say, Jack!"

"What?"

"Is it some one you don't like?"

"I hate him."

"That is enough. Tell me who he is, and I'll hack his whistle for him."

"No—no! Leave him to my hands. My revenge will be all the sweeter for being long kept."

"But who is he, Jack?"

"My master."

"Your master?"

"Yes; I was bound 'prentice to John Roots, the carpenter."

"That shop over the way?"

"Yes, that is it."

"It says over the door, 'John Roots, Carpenter and Joiner.'"

"Such is his trade, and such was to have been mine. I should then have been within the pale of society, but now I am for ever shut out. By ill-usage, threats, sneers, and false accusations he raised a demon within me, which grew too strong for him at last."

"Eh!"

"My father was hanged," continued Jack, who, whenever he thought upon this theme, was almost frantic. "But what had I to do with that. I was not guilty, or they would have hanged me too. Would they had done so—would they had done so—for what has life been to me? A curse—a curse!”

Flood and Blewitt looked at each other in silence.

They knew not what to say.

“But a time will come, John Roots, when you will bitterly regret the way in which you acted, and when it is too late, then you will wish you had done otherwise. Beware! beware!”

“Come, Jack,” said Blewitt, as he tapped him on the arm, “Come along, and don’t kick up such a row, or you will have all the blessed people in the street looking out of winder.”

“True—true!” replied Sheppard, recovering himself in a moment. “I had forgotten where I was.”

“I thought so.”

“I will tell you some day,” he continued, “the whole history; but now we must be on the look out for a place where we can hide, for Jonathan will be sure to make sharp search after us.”

“You may say that, Jack,” remarked Flood.

“I don’t feel at all comfortable,” added Blewitt.

“Come with me,” said Sheppard, who, fortunately, recollected all at once the place spoken of by Blueskin, in Gilbert’s passage, Clare-market. “I know of a safe retreat. This way.”

He turned down a court as he spoke, and from his intimate acquaintance with the ramifications of that locality, soon reached the place of which he had spoken.

Jonathan Wild’s two late janizaries kept close to his heels.

Having taken the decided step they had, they felt that their safety depended upon their keeping close to him.

The “Fountain,” was the name of a small beer-house, kept by one George Stokoe, in Gilbert’s passage, and it was before this house that the three paused.

It was closed, and there was no sign to indicate that it was inhabited by any one.

But Jack, without ceremony, mounted the crumbling steps before the door, and turning his back to it, kicked furiously with his heels against the panel.

So imperious a demand for admission was quickly attended to.

The mention of Blueskin’s name was quite sufficient.

A capital repast was quickly spread before them, for upon entering they found the interior belied the exterior, for the inmates were all astir.

This disposed of, they lay down to rest, a thing of which Jack stood greatly in need, but his mind was too much agitated for him to enjoy a refreshing slumber.

When it was dark they ventured to descend.

The first question Jack asked was whether they had seen Blueskin.

The landlord replied in the negative.

This made the two men hang back a little.

Sheppard noticed the difference in their behaviour instantly.

He was unwilling for them to leave him, so he said—

“Blueskin will not be long before he comes.”

“Are you sure, Jack?”

“Quite certain.”

“Because if I thought—”

“What?”

“That if he was not coming pretty soon I should be off.”

“So should I,” said Blewitt, for it was Flood who spoke.

“Pho! pho!” laughed Jack; “I tell you it will be all right; take my word for it. However, not to keep anything from you, I think it very likely Blueskin won’t be here until to-morrow morning.”

“To-morrow morning?”

“He may come before, but I don’t expect him.”

As the reader knows, Jack had no grounds for speaking in the way he did, but having commenced the deception, he was obliged to keep it up, at any rate, a little longer, and then, if no tidings of his comrade could be heard, he would have to break it to them gradually.

But somehow he had a feeling at his heart, amounting almost to conviction, that Blueskin would not fall into the hands of Wild.

Time will show whether he was right.

Edgworth Bess, and the circumstance of her mysterious disappearance, was uppermost in his mind.

He had, however, but little hopes of finding her after the elapsion of so long a time, but yet he could not quite relinquish it.

“Mat,” he said, addressing Flood.

“Yes, Jack.”

“I want to go out on a little expedition to-night; will you come with me?”

“I have no objections. Have you, Blewitt?”

“No, none as I knows on. But what’s the lay?”

“I want to find some one.”

“Oh!”

“Some one who I managed to get out of the clutches of Jonathan Wild, but somehow or other she has disappeared.”

“She!”

“Yes. Do not ask me for any further explanation now, because I cannot give it. Will you come with me?”

“With all my heart.”

“Then make what change in your dress you can, in order that you may not be readily known, and I will do the same.”

“Agreed.”

A few minutes after this all three were in the street.

Jack Sheppard remembered the conversation he had had with Blueskin as to the mode in which the search should be conducted, and he resolved to act according to it.

He went, therefore, by a circuitous and unfrequented route to Newgate-market.

After a little trouble, he found the place where the secret door was situated leading into Wild’s house.

From this point he searched over the whole market; but, of course, without meeting with anything to reward his trouble.

Then he went to the gateway leading into Warwick-lane.

That narrow, dismal thoroughfare was now quite silent and deserted.

There was no one of whom he could make an inquiry.

Passing down Warwick-lane, he went into Paternoster-row.

At Amen-corner he paused.

Four routes were open before him, either one of which he thought was just as likely to be taken by the poor girl as another.

His heart sank when he saw how very, very faint was the chance of discovering any clue to her whereabouts.

In fact, he was almost ready to despair.

Here, also, there was no one of whom he could make inquiry. The whole neighbourhood appeared deserted.

At last he emerged on to Ludgate-hill.

“I will take this way to Johnson’s,” said Jack, to himself. “It is the most direct route. I will examine every inch of the way, but I fear it will be to no purpose.”

With these thoughts in his mind, he descended the hill, and made his way into Fleet-street.

At the corner was a watchman’s box.

Here, he thought, was a chance, though a bare one. This watchman might have seen her. He would question the man and see.

After a while, the guardian of the night was aroused from a deep slumber into which he had fallen.

“Hullo!” he said, “thieves! murder!”

He would have sprung his rattle, only Jack seized him by the hand.

Then he questioned him upon the point so dear to him, but in vain. He could obtain no satisfactory reply.

Wearily he walked up Fleet-street until the corner of Fetter-lane was reached, where he espied another watch-box.

He knew it would be useless to inquire, or, rather, feared it would be, but yet he determined not to let any chance, however remote or faint, pass by.

CHAPTER CXXXII.

JACK SHEPPARD HAS AN INTERVIEW WITH JOHNSON, THE LANDLORD, AND FLOOD PROPOSES TO BREAK INTO JOHN ROOTS’ HOUSE.

It will be remembered when the Mohawks chased poor Edgworth Bess along the streets, some of their number had noticed the very watch-box before which Jack and his two companions now stopped, and had gone through the pleasant little diversion of “coffining” him.

With some little difficulty, Jack Sheppard managed to elicit from him a clear enough account of the affair as to leave but little doubt upon his mind that she whom he sought had been hunted through the streets by this band of dissolute young men.

No stranger was he to their doings.

Often and often had he heard their deeds of cruelty related to him.

And poor Bess had been hunted by them.

Hunted, perhaps, to death.

Of course, all the information he could get from the watchman was that they chased her towards Temple-bar. In this direction he now went.

But the empty, silent street now showed no signs of what had taken place a night or so before.

Passing under the grim archway, he came at length to that circular part of the Strand to the north of St. Clement's Church, which is known as Pickett-street.

This was the very spot where the Mohawks had come up with their prey.

But this Jack knew not.

His heart burned like fire within him.

Rage and despair struggled for supremacy.

Alas! to him there was every probability that he had looked upon the face of the poor persecuted girl, whom he had so often defended, for the last time.

"This looks like no go, Jack," said Flood, at length.

"Don't be like that. What are we to do next?"

An angry rejoinder came to his lips, but he had the prudence to check it ere he gave it utterance.

It was no good making more enemies than he had already.

Curbing himself, he said—

"I am afraid it is as you say, but yet I shall not despair—I shall cling tight to hope to the last."

He looked round him as he spoke, but there was no one whatever, except themselves in view.

What had poor Jack to guide him in the slightest?

Nothing.

On he went. Past the church palings and into Wych-street again.

At the top of Wych-street was the "Black Lion."

Had the kind-hearted landlord, Johnson, heard since he saw him last some news respecting her? Perhaps he might have done, but how was he to ascertain?

The old inn would doubtless be well guarded by Jonathan Wild's men.

Still it would be a satisfaction to learn whether there was any intelligence, and so he determined, let the risk be what it might, that he would go there once more and inquire.

Having come to this resolution, he stepped forward at a quicker pace.

To go up Wych-street he would have to pass his late master's house.

It was twice he had seen it in a short interval.

The first time the reader knows with what revengeful and passionate feelings he had stood before it; but this outbreak was calmness in comparison with the storm that burst forth when he saw it the second time.

"John Roots, you laugh at the boy's expressions, and take no heed of them. He has passed your house twice—beware of the third time!"

Dashing onwards, Jack soon left the shop behind, and came in sight of the public-house.

He halted on the opposite side of the way, and shrunk back into the shadow of the houses as much as he could, so that no casual glance would discover him.

The exterior of the "Black Lion" presented its usual appearance.

Loud laughter, boisterous songs, and the clanking of drinking vessels reached the ear, telling too plainly of the furious merriment that was going on within.

A bright light from the partially-curtained windows streamed out into the dark, deserted street.

But, beyond this, there was nothing to be seen about the place that would cause suspicion.

Jack hesitated a moment, and then turning round to his two followers, he said—

"Wait here for me, I shall not be a moment. At all risks I will cross over and ask Johnson whether he has seen or heard anything of her."

Then, without waiting to hear the reply, he ran across the road, and disappeared in the low doorway of the inn.

He pushed open the half-glass door.

A glance was sufficient to show him that the passage, at least, was clear.

Like a ghost, he glided into the kitchen.

This was the back apartment, where Johnson and his household usually sat. It was not exactly a private room, yet it was not a public one.

One or two persons were seated in it, besides the landlord and his wife.

But Jack knew them not.

Pulling his hat down as closely as he could over his forehead, in order to conceal his features as much as possible, he sat down upon a vacant seat, and beckoned Johnson to him.

"Have you heard anything of her?" he asked, anxiously.

"Good heavens! it's Jack."

"Yes, I am here. Have you heard of her?"

"Not a word, Jack, but hark! What made you so foolish as to come here? The place is full of men—some regular police-officers, and some Jonathan's crew. How you managed to get in without their seeing you is a mystery. It strikes me you won't go out so easily."

The landlord spoke with great rapidity, in a low but energetic tone of voice.

"I care not," replied Jack, as he placed his elbows on the table, and let his head fall between his palms, "I care not now what becomes of me. She is lost to me for ever."

"Come, come, cheer up! Her disappearance looks strange, and yet she may be in perfect safety. What does Blueskin say?"

"I know not whether he is alive or dead."

"True, the men here told me how he had jumped off Blackfriars-bridge, and how Jonathan had got into a boat and chased him down the Thames."

"Did he catch him?"

"I don't know, but I fancy not. I can't get them to speak about the latter part of the affair, and that's what made me ask you."

"I trust he has got off!"

"So do I. But come, Jack, it will not do for you to despair! Sit still a moment where you are, and I will fetch you some brandy."

Johnson left his side, but was soon back again with a large glass of raw brandy, which he placed on the table before him.

"There," he said, "drink that. Take my word for it, you will be better afterwards. Throw despair to the dogs! Drink, and be a man!"

Thus adjured, Jack lifted the strong spirit to his lips and swallowed a good half of it at a single gulp.

"That's right, Jack! Now, again!"

"No, I have had enough!"

"Tush! try again! What you have had is not enough to do you good! Drink the rest!"

Jack emptied the glass.

"You will be all right now. And just listen to what I have got to say. Don't fall into your enemies' hands if you can help it. Wait until you see Blueskin before you do anything. Will you promise me that?"

"I will."

"Off with you, then, and seek some place of safety, for this will no longer be a refuge for you! But where shall you go? Tell me, so that if I should want to find you I shall be able to do so."

"At the 'Fountain,' in Gilbert's-passage."

"Good! I know it well. Take care to get there unobserved. The longer you stay where you are the greater will be your danger! Off with you!"

Jack arose.

The spirits he had drank had not failed to produce their full effect upon him, as they would upon any one not habituated to their use.

"Johnson," he said, "see that the coast is clear."

"All right."

He disappeared, and was absent about a moment.

Then he returned.

"Wild's men are in the front room," he said. "They are drinking, but as I went to the door I saw them look at me."

"What is to be done?"

"You might go out without them recognising you, but then again you might not! It will be a little trouble, but it will be best to make sure!"

"What do you mean?"

"Just this. Do you recollect I once took you down the cellar, and showed you a way into my house in White Hart-street?"

"To be sure I do!"

"Well, then, that is what I meant! Come on, you will be able to slip into the bar unperceived, and when that is done the rest will follow easily enough!"

"So it will."

"Follow me, then, quietly! Don't seem to be in a hurry, or agitated, and ten to one if you are noticed!"

With this the landlord, closely followed by Jack, led the way into the bar, the door of which he closed behind him.

Then, lighting a candle, he preceded him down a flight of steps. The same as described in a previous chapter of this history.

It is needless, having already done so, to repeat minutely all the details. It will be enough to say that he entered the secret passage and emerged from it in safety.

He did not tarry a moment, however, at Johnson's other house, but made his way to that part of Drury-lane where he had left his two companions.

He found them both there waiting for him.

"No luck," he said.

"She has not been there?"

"No."

"Where next?"

"I promised to go back to Gilbert's passage, because there are so many of Jonathan's men hanging about."

"Oh! well!" said Flood. "Will you listen to me, Jack?"

"Yes."

"While you have been gone, we have been thinking about you and your master, and we have come to the conclusion that he is a downright bad one!"

"Curse him!"

"Just so. Now, I'll tell you what we have thought."

"What?"

"That we would serve him out!"

"Serve him out?"

"Yes; and it remains for you to say whether you'll help us."

"I have sworn to be revenged upon him for all the misery he has caused me!" cried Jack Sheppard, "and, as I live and breathe, I will keep my oath!"

"Bravo!" said Flood.

CHAPTER CXXXIII.

JACK SHEPPARD AND HIS TWO COMPANIONS COMMIT A BURGLARY AT THE CARPENTER'S IN WYCH-STREET.

"SPEAK out!" said Jack; "tell me at once what you mean."

"Very good."

"Go on, then."

"We have just considered how you might be well and fully revenged upon him."

"But how?"

"The street is quiet," said Flood.

"Not a mouse stirring," added Blewitt.

"What then?"

"We will just crack his crib for him."

"Too dangerous."

"Do you think so, Jack?"

"To-night I do."

"Why?"

"Because, when I was in at the 'Black Lion' yonder, the place was full of Jonathan's men, who are keeping a sharp look-out for us."

"The deuce they are!"

"They have no suspicion as yet, I feel confident; but a little thing will suffice to arouse it."

"What do you say, Flood?" asked Blewitt.

"Why, I say this. That! for Jonathan's men."

He snapped his fingers as he spoke.

"But the crib?"

"I say, crack it. You will be safe, enough, Jack; and, I take it, that will be the best way of having your revenge."

"You know all the ins and outs of the place, I suppose?" said Blewitt.

"Quite well."

"Then it will be as easy as daylight."

"Now, Jack, you had better do it."

Jack hesitated.

The proposal came upon him quite unexpectedly.

Many things prompted him to accede to it.

In the first place there was the deep-rooted, angry feeling he had against his former master, John Roots, a feeling which had been called into existence by that person's ill-treatment of him.

He had sworn to be revenged.

Here there was an ample opportunity of gratifying it, for he well knew that his master was one of those persons who never think their money is safe without it is in their own possession.

Consequently, being a man well to do, and of a frugal disposition, he had in his house a very large sum of money. His whole worldly wealth, in fact.

Jack, from having been so long an inmate of the house, of course knew quite well where the box containing the treasure was kept.

He knew, too, that if he took it, the ruin of John Roots would follow.

And would it not be fair, he asked himself, to give him back as good as he had sent.

Had he not ruined him?

Why, then, it would be only fair that Jack should pay him back in his own coin.

He thought so.

Besides, he could tell the men he had with him were wavering and unsteady.

A little thing would serve to turn them against him, and then how hopeless would his position be.

He did not wish it to be seen that he complied with their request for that reason, for if he had he would have lost all mastery over them.

If he refused they might, perhaps, turn round quite against him.

If, on the other hand, he agreed, it would most likely be the means of conciliating them.

And so, with all these reflections bearing in one direction, it is not wonderful that he consented.

The proximity of Wild's myrmidons would add considerably to the peril of the undertaking, but Jack just then was not in the humour to care for that.

His blood was heated and his brain inflamed by the brandy which had been given him by Joe Johnson.

"It shall be done," he cried; "old Roots shall repent the past this night!"

"Hurrah! Jack—I thought we should please you."

"There will be plenty of booty to repay us for our trouble," continued Sheppard.

"Better still."

"Somewhere in his house there is a large chest in which he keeps his money."

"How much?"

"All he is worth, for he will never trust it in a bank. All the money he receives, all the money he has saved, he keeps in this box."

"You don't say so?"

"He is a careful man, if you know what that means?"

"What!"

"A miser!"

"I thought as much; but, Jack, do you really mean to say that there is so much in this old crib worth the looking after?"

"There is. But it won't do to stand talking here about it. Let us get to action."

"Bravo, Jack!"

"Here is the house."

They paused before the carpenter's dwelling as they spoke.

All three looked up at it.

None of the inmates were up—at least there was no light to be seen at any of the windows.

The street was quite empty.

The burglars now only spoke in whispers, fearful lest the sound of their voices should be carried upon the still night air to unfriendly ears.

They were quite unprovided with tools—at least such implements as they would have chosen had they have contemplated the enterprise earlier, and so have been able to provide themselves with proper tools.

[HOW BLUESKIN BAFFLED JONATHAN WILD.]

But all three were armed with large-bladed clasp knives, and Blewitt had in his pocket a bunch of skeleton keys.

With these, then, they would have to achieve their object.

They had, however, very little doubt their efforts would prove successful.

"The window," said Jack; "the shop window. You will get in easiest through there."

"But the shutters?"

"Oh! you will easily manage them."

"How?"

"There are two hinges. Get your knives and cut away the wood round them."

"Capital."

"We shall then be able to get in without leaving anything to excite suspicion if a person should happen to go by."

"So we shall."

It will be necessary, in order to understand this, to explain what sort of shutters they were that protected the windows of John Roots' shop.

The kind is one that has, since the introduction of plate glass, fallen into complete disuse.

Some years ago they were to be met with in remote country villages, but even there only very seldom.

The shutter, then, was composed of a large piece of wood, hung upon two horizontal hinges fixed to the window-sill.

When fastened, the shutter was lifted up bodily like a flap—or, rather, huge box lid—and secured at the top by an iron cotter and pin.

By attacking the lower part of the shutter in the manner proposed by Jack, it would, when the wood was quite cut away from the hinges, hang loosely suspended by the fastener at the top, so that, unless upon a particular observation, it would not be noticed that it had at all been tampered with.

With great speed and energy the two men set about the task assigned to them, and although their knives were sharp, the wood was so hard that it was a long while before they accomplished it.

At length, however, it was finished.

Raising the shutter a little way, they next proceeded to attack the window itself.

This, as it was of the old-fashioned latticed description, did not prove an obstacle worthy of the name. The lead round the panes yielded easily.

So noiseless were they in all these operations, that not the least alarm was raised.

In less than two minutes all three stood inside the shop.

It was not until this moment that they remembered they were unprovided with one of the most necessary things of all.

And that was a light.

How they had omitted this in their calculations, they could not tell.

"This is a nice state of things," said Flood. "What are we to do, Jack?"

"We must have a light," said Blewitt.

"That is very true, but I have not got one. Have neither of you?"

"Only some matches."

"Stop. Then I think we shall do."

"How?"

"Light one of them. I know the old crib well, as you may imagine, and I shall find the place where the candles are kept without much trouble, and we must do the best we can with one of them."

"Good," said Blewitt, and as he spoke he produced from his pocket a bottle of phosphorous and a few "thieves' matches," as they were called, from the fact of their being ignited without noise.

The flame was a tiny one, but yet the light it gave was sufficient to enable Jack to find his way across the shop without coming into contact with any of the various objects which it contained.

Pushing open a half-glass door, he entered the little room behind the shop.

In one corner of this apartment was another door, which Jack opened, but the moment he did so, the half-burned match he carried was extinguished by a sudden and violent current of cold air.

This door, in fact, was the one leading to the cellars.

Jack did not need the light now, he just passed his hand behind the door, and produced a candle.

Another match was struck by Blewitt, and it was lighted.

This difficulty, then, was over, though, had not Jack been as intimately acquainted with the premises as he was, it would have proved a very serious one indeed.

"This way," said Jack, "and be silent. Here are the stairs."

Again recommending his two followers to silence, Jack led the way up the staircase, towards the sleeping apartments in John Roots' house.

All within the dwelling was as still as death, and the three burglars stole up the stairs like three grim spectres.

Now and then, however, despite their utmost care, the timeworn wood would creak beneath their tread, but the strident sound would, if heard by anyone, be thought nothing of in the night.

At length the landing on the first floor was reached.

Jack did not speak, but by a motion indicated which was the door opening into the carpenter's bedroom.

Too well did the apprentice know that his master made it an invariable practice to lock the door, and place the key beneath his pillow.

He pointed to the keyhole.

Blewitt understood him.

Cautiously advancing, he took from his pocket his bunch of skeleton keys, and having selected one which he thought most likely to answer his purpose, he gently inserted it in the lock.

CHAPTER CXXXIV.

EXPLAINS HOW IT WAS THAT BLUESKIN ESCAPED FROM WILD UPON THE THAMES, AND RELATES HOW HE TOOK REFUGE IN A LODGING-HOUSE IN SOUTHWARK.

So long a time has elapsed since we took any cognizance of the proceedings of Blueskin, that we feel we cannot any longer suffer our attention to be diverted from him.

The whole of the remarkable incidents which took place upon the occasion of Jonathan Wild chasing him down the Thames will doubtless be fresh in the recollection of the reader, so it will be unnecessary for us to recapitulate them.

The first shot which Wild fired at him while standing on the steps was an effective one.

He had just risen to the surface after his tremendous dive, and was dizzy and breathless.

He saw nothing, for the water blinded him.

Ere, however, he could clear the hair from before his eyes, and recover himself, he heard a sudden shout, a loud report, and then felt a stinging sensation along his neck, which told him in a moment that he had been struck by a bullet.

The impulse to cry out in the manner he did was one that could not be controlled.

He sank.

Down—down—seemingly for miles down beneath the surface of the muddy river he seemed to go, until he lost all consciousness of the distance.

Then he rose again, and, by the mere instinct of self-preservation, struck out his arms.

Blueskin was an excellent swimmer.

The tide carried him down the river, and what with that and his own exertions, he went at a very rapid rate indeed.

He was not allowed time enough to make more than a dozen strokes before he heard the report of another pistol.

He ducked his head instantly.

This time, however, he was not hit.

As long as he could he swam with his head under water, but his breath soon compelled him to draw in more air.

The first sounds he heard were the shouts of Wild's men in the boat.

He was seen.

He was pursued.

His heart sank within him, and he gave himself up for lost.

How was he, wounded and weak from loss of blood as he was, to hope to escape from his enemies when they chased him in a boat.

For a little while his speed might perhaps be greater than theirs, but he would be the first to grow exhausted.

Then he would fall into their hands an easy prey.

His wound, however, he quickly found not to be a serious one, and then the cold water, besides having the effect of materially stanching the blood, mitigated the pain which it would otherwise have caused.

For this much, then, he had to be thankful.

From his old friend and acquaintance, but now bitter foe, Jonathan Wild, he felt he had everything to dread. Having learned that he had escaped the death to which he fancied he had doomed him, he would now spare no effort to capture and slay him.

Love of life is one of the strongest impulses implanted in the breasts of human beings, and in obedience to the dictates of this feeling, he summoned up all the strength he possessed to do battle with the waves, for he felt he had yet much to live for.

Already have we seen how he managed to keep ahead of Wild's boat, and how, in spite of their utmost exertions to prevent it, he had gained the shadow of the boats that lay moored on the Surrey side of London-bridge.

But then a most mysterious and inexplicable circumstance occurred.

From those very boats had come a swimmer, who, naturally enough, Wild and his men took to be the person of whom they were in chase.

Under this impression, one of them had taken as careful and as steady an aim as he could, and fired.

The swimmer was hit, as was abundantly manifested by the quantity of blood which gushed from his head and face, and dyed the water around him.

He turned with great rapidity over and over, as though in the agonies of death.

Then, by means of a couple of boat-hooks, the body was drawn through the water and over the gunwale into the boat.

To the horror and astonishment of Wild, it was not Blueskin!

One glance at the bruised and bleeding form was enough to assure him of this beyond all possibility of doubt.

In vain, as we have seen, did he endeavour to frame some hypothesis that would account for this most unparalleled circumstance.

He was completely baffled.

As a last hope, he had caused a thorough search to be made of all the boats lying at their moorings, but that search did not result in the discovery of the object which he sought.

Quite defeated, he had left the spot.

But though this remained so inexplicable to the thief-taker, it will not to our readers.

Incomprehensible as it seemed, it in reality was about the simplest thing in the world.

Blueskin reached the boats.

The first one to which he came was a huge, clumsy vessel, built more with a view to transporting heavy burdens than for swiftness.

He had made a tremendous effort to reach these boats. It had been almost beyond him, but he managed it. He knew that was the sole chance he had of escaping from a dreadful death.

But he would have failed, certainly, had they been ten yards further off than they were.

He swam behind this boat.

His foe was no longer in sight.

Now was the chance.

The faint morning light that fell upon the bosom of the river Thames showed him the thick iron chain by which the boat was moored.

He clutched it tightly.

Then, straining his powers to the utmost, he drew himself up it, and rolled over the edge into the boat.

What it was he fell upon he could not for a moment think.

It was soft.

But his doubts were quickly put to rest; for, by the movement of it and a faint cry, he knew it was a human being.

In fact, it was the man who had been set to watch the boat during the night.

But, wearied out with his lonely vigil, he had, just as the dawn began to show itself in the sky, laid down and fallen asleep.

Of course, the shock of Blueskin falling upon him aroused him from his slumber.

But ere he could give an alarm, a hand was pressed tightly over his mouth.

Then, with the suddenness almost of a lightning flash, there darted across Blueskin's mind the thought that this man might aid him in making his escape.

No sooner did the idea occur to him than he proceeded to put it into execution.

Seizing the only partially-conscious man in his powerful grasp, he forced him over the side of the boat, and let him slip into the water.

This he was careful to do quietly, so that there was no splash made whatever.

"Swim for your life!" said Blueskin, in a suppressed whisper; "swim for your life! Utter the least cry, and I will send a bullet through your skull! Swim off for your life!"

The half-bewildered man obeyed.

Eagerly did he watch his progress.

Away—away he went, and then Blueskin heard the roar which Jonathan gave when, as he imagined, he saw his prey swimming towards him.

Then followed the pistol shot.

For an instant—or, perhaps, not so long—Blueskin was undecided how to act.

He did not know how far the stratagem he had put into practice would prove successful, nor how long the deception under which Jonathan laboured would continue.

Should he remain where he was in the boat, and either persecute the man he had in so summary a manner ejected, or conceal himself within it? Or should he commit himself again to the river, and swim ashore?

This latter he had an opportunity now of doing.

It would be, perhaps, the safest, so he resolved to try it.

With the greatest speed, therefore, he lowered himself over the boatside into the water.

But when he entered it, he found his strength was much diminished, and, short as the distance was which intervened between him and the shore, he was filled with dread that he should find himself incompetent to reach it.

Still, having met with so much success as he had done hitherto, he felt himself stimulated to make the attempt.

When the mind is firmly fixed upon any object, it is very rarely indeed that it is not attained, and so it was in the present instance with Blueskin.

Undetected by any one, he wound his way among the vessels, for so close were they together, and so black the shadow that they cast, that it would have needed a very keen eye to have discovered him.

The shore was reached just at the moment Jonathan arrived at the first of the moored vessels, and caused the search to be made.

The tide, as we have before mentioned, was running out, and had now about reached the turn, consequently, Blueskin had to scramble through a quantity of thick, black, oozy mud.

Although he knew his strength was ebbing from him every moment, still he toiled manfully on, and at last had the satisfaction of fairly reaching dry ground.

He was then compelled to lie down at full length, for his exhaustion was so great that he could proceed no further.

The activity, however, with which the search of the vessels was being carried on, warned him to remove as quickly as he could, for fear lest, after all, he should be taken.

Scrambling, therefore, with no little difficulty to his feet, he staggered rather than walked along a narrow thoroughfare, bordered on each side by tall warehouses.

Anxiously did he look up and down to the right and to the left, for a friendly light which would indicate a place where he would be able to obtain shelter, but no such met his view.

Still he went on.

Every now and then he was forced to clutch the sides of the buildings by which he passed, in order to prevent himself from falling heavily to the ground.

At length he reached a place where a narrow street branched off from the one he was traversing.

The buildings in it were low and squalid.

But this he did not notice.

There was something else which attracted the whole of his attention.

CHAPTER CXXXV.

BLUESKIN INCURS GREAT PERIL IN THE LODGING-HOUSE IN SOUTHWARK, AND HAS TO FIGHT HARD FOR LIFE.

ABOUT twenty paces down the street was a dimly-burning oil-lamp, which, from its position, was evidently suspended from a bracket before the door of one of the dwellings.

This seemed to point to a place where he would be able to obtain rest and shelter, the two things of which he stood so much in need.

Whereabouts he was, or what was the name of the street, he had no idea whatever, and, as he just then felt, this was a thing not likely to much trouble him.

Taking every step with greater difficulty than its predecessor, he crawled towards this light, which, though it burned, seemed every moment to be on the point of expiring.

Upon a closer approach, he perceived that the house before which it hung was one of those lodging-houses of which, even at the present day, there are so many along the banks of the Thames.

That the establishment was patronized by none but the very dregs of society could be seen at once. A respectable person, or one with any money about him, would never have dreamed of entering the neighbourhood.

Southwark, a hundred and forty years ago, was really a most horrible place, and those who know the locality at the present day will readily admit that there is even now ample room for improvement in many respects.

The door of this house Blueskin found standing invitingly open. In fact, it was very rarely closed, for those who slept upon the premises were rather eccentric with respect to the periods when they took that very necessary refreshment.

With a great deal of difficulty the stone steps leading up to the door were ascended, and the narrow, dingy passage gained.

Down this, however, he managed to slowly make his way, until he reached a small square aperture in the wall—disguised by the name of the bar-window—at which sat a most repulsive-looking woman.

Her dress hung in tatters about her.

Her hair was in disorder.

Her face was begrimed with dirt, and her eyes were bleared and bloodshot.

"What do you want?" she asked, in shrill, querulous tones, for she was never over-civil, even to her best customers.

"Rest," said Blueskin, in as firm and loud a voice as he could command. "I will pay you well for it."

He struck his pocket as he spoke.

The jingling sound produced had an instantaneous effect upon the old harridan.

"Yes, sir; to be sure; I will attend to you in one moment, sir."

She sprang off the stool upon which she had been sitting as she spoke, and, opening a door, emerged into the passage.

"I have had to fly for my life," exclaimed Blueskin, as he noted the effect which his bedraggled appearance had upon the hostess. "I have had to fly for my life, and am well nigh exhausted. Let me rest awhile, and that I will pay you well for your accommodation, let that be an earnest."

While speaking, he plunged his hand into the pocket of his trousers and produced a guinea.

The eyes of the old woman glistened with an unholy lustre as the yellow coin was dropped into her palm.

"Thanks, good sir; thanks," she said. "You shall have the best which the poor place affords, which is not much however. Walk in here, sir, if you please."

With an obsequiousness that was really sickening, when the cause which had produced it was known, the woman ushered him into the little chamber where she had been sitting.

It was a truly miserable den, entirely destitute of every thing in the shape of comfort.

The ceiling was grimed with soot.

The walls positively reeking with filth.

But, bad as the place was, Blueskin was right glad to seat himself upon the chair which the old woman officiously placed for him.

"Is there anything more you would like?" she asked. "There is no licence to this house, but I can send out for anything you want."

"No—no! Never mind! I shall do! A rest is all I require!"

"Very good, sir! Perhaps you would like a bed, though. If you would, I can let you have one. A private room, all to yourself."

"Can you?"

"I can, sir."

"Then I will accept your offer."

The woman's eyes glistened as the words reached her ears, but with some trouble she concealed her exultation.

"I will see to the room being got ready, then, for you, if you won't mind waiting a minute."

"Very good."

With eager haste, the old woman left the bar, carefully closing the door after her.

That caution which usually attended Blueskin, seemed on the present occasion to have abandoned him.

He noticed not the sinister appearance of the place, nor the avaricious look upon the old hag's countenance.

He had assented to taking a bed, not only because he so much wanted rest, but because he should be more out of the way in case search should be made for him; and from what he knew of the great thief-taker he felt pretty sure there very soon would be.

The thought of the amount of personal peril he might be incurring by his sojourn in the suspicious-looking lodging-house never entered his mind.

Yet none knew much better than himself how many fearful dens there were along the water-side, into which it would be the height of imprudence for any one to venture.

But there is every allowance to be made for his being, on the present occasion, blind to danger.

It may be as well to remind the reader that he had about his person the whole of the money and valuables which had fallen into his hands during his highway expedition with Jack Sheppard, and this was no inconsiderable amount.

At any rate, the old woman must have had some very powerful motive for being so civil to one whose appearance would certainly never of itself have commanded it.

But we will not anticipate events by explaining what her motives were just at present.

She was only absent a few minutes.

"Now, sir," she said, as she returned, "all is ready, if you will follow me."

Blueskin rose.

He felt sick and faint.

Not only was there the immersion in the cold Thames, but also the wound in the neck, which the bullet from Wild's pistol had inflicted.

This, though not what would be exactly called serious, was yet more than skin deep, and a great quantity of blood had effused from it.

From these two causes combined, then, it can be easily seen that he must be dreadfully exhausted. Indeed, few frames could have endured one half so much.

Right glad was he to follow the landlady of the lodging-house out of the bar, across a passage, and up a flight of dirty, crazy stairs.

At the top of these were several doors, one of which she opened, and allowed him to enter a small room, in which the first thing he noticed was a fire.

From its appearance it had evidently just been lighted.

Through the window came just enough morning light to make the different objects visible.

"This is our best room, sir," said the landlady, with a wave of the hand. "You will find everything quite comfortable."

"No doubt—no doubt. Just listen to me."

"Yes, sir."

"If any one comes here to make inquiries whether you have seen a man answering to my description, just say no."

The woman nodded.

"It will be nothing out of your pocket," added Blake. "There are those after me who would gladly take my life; but so far I have escaped them, and shall do so altogether, if"—

"If I am silent," said the landlady. "Lor' bless you, sir, I never knows nothing about my customers, if people come and inquire. Don't be afraid, you'll be as safe here as if you was"—

She paused for a simile.

"As if I was in my coffin," added Blueskin.

"Lor!" said she, as she gave a great start.

"Leave me. I have money, and will pay you well for your assistance. Leave me, I must rest."

"You won't have nothing to drink?"

"No—no!"

"Very good, sir. Just as you like, sir, of course."

"I don't half like that woman," said Blueskin, as the landlady closed the door after her. "She is no good, I know, but she had better not play any tricks with me, or she will find she has got the wrong fellow to deal with."

Going to the fire, he gave it a good poke, which caused the fuel to burn up briskly, and burst into a blaze.

His next proceeding, before lying down, was to dry his clothes.

This he did by standing before the fire. The easiest and best plan would have been, of course, to take off his clothes and dry them, but there were several reasons why he thought it would be injudicious to do this.

Not the least of them was the dread that he had that Wild might find him out, and if he did the only chance he would have of defending himself would be lost to him if he was undressed.

While drying himself, he also bound up his wound as well as he was able, for, from some cause or other, it had begun to bleed afresh.

In a little while after this, being quite overpowered, he sank down upon the bed, and dropped into a deep slumber.

By this time it was quite broad day, but a thick, dark-coloured curtain, which hung before the window, prevented the light from entering, except in a subdued fashion.

About a quarter of an hour after Blueskin fell asleep, the handle of the door was turned cautiously and silently.

No further movement was then made for about a minute.

At the expiry of that interval, however, the door itself was gradually pushed open.

The hinge creaked slightly.

But this was disregarded.

Presently the door was opened far enough for a head to be projected between its edge and the jamb into the room.

It was an old man's head.

The hair, long and straggling, was a grizzly gray.

His skin was puckered up into many deep wrinkles.

For only a moment did the head appear, and then it was withdrawn again, but that moment sufficed for the deeply-set eagle eyes within to take a survey of the whole apartment.

Blueskin slumbered.

His attitude and stertorous breathing at once proclaimed that fact.

The head reappeared, and, after listening again to make sure all was well, the old man crept into the chamber.

He assumed a strange crouching attitude, and his head shook tremulously from side to side as though afflicted with some palsical complaint.

Then, turning round, he beckoned with his finger to some one without.

The summons was obeyed.

A woman entered.

It was the landlady.

CHAPTER CXXXVI.

THE LANDLADY OF THE LODGING-HOUSE AND THE OLD MAN CAME TO A VERY BAD END INDEED.

The faint light which struggled through the thick curtain drawn across the window distinctly revealed the countenances of these two persons.

No human eye was there to look upon and note the expression which they wore.

Had there been, unless, indeed, their nerves were iron, they would have shuddered with horror as they saw it.

Stamped upon each, in the most legible characters, was the word, murder!

That was their awful errand to that silent room.

The money which they supposed Blueskin to have about him was doubtless the incentive to the horrid deed.

Money, indeed, was the god they both worshiped with a fervour and a zeal that would in former times, directed to a different object, have caused their bones to be canonized, and their names revered as saints.

The old man made a gesture to the old woman, which she immediately comprehended.

She reclosed the door, and stooping down, slipped a bolt into its socket.

Despite the care with which this operation was performed, she could not help it making a slight sound, which caused them, like guilty creatures as they were, to start violently.

But it would have required a ten times louder noise than that was to have aroused Blueskin from his heavy sleep.

Satisfied that no alarm had been given, the pair crawled towards the bed.

The dimensions of the room were limited, so it was quickly reached.

The slumberer's position was one in every way suited to the consummation of their purpose.

He lay upon his back, his limbs stretched out to their full length, and his head thrown back, leaving the neck naked and exposed.

But this attitude served also to show the muscular development of their guest, and to show them how formidable an antagonist he would be, unless they took him at unawares.

The contrast between him and the two wretches by whom his life was menaced was great indeed.

Of the two the old man appeared to be the strongest, but what the woman lacked in strength was more than compensated for by coolness of nerve.

And now, having reached the bed, they did not hesitate a single moment.

From some place in the breast of her clothing the hideous old woman drew forth a knife.

The haft was white, and the blade long, sharp, and glittering.

It looked as though it had originally been a carving-knife, and ground down to its present dagger-like shape. Grasping it firmly by the hilt, she raised it above her head.

With her other hand she felt for the slumberer's heart. This was the point at which she aimed. It might have been previous experience that had taught her that that was the surest and quickest way of robbing one of life.

The old man stood by quietly—his turn had not come to take part in these diabolical and murderous proceedings.

The precious landlady, having found her mark, now brought the knife down with full force and suddenness upon Blueskin's breast.

But a result ensued for which she was quite unprepared.

The point of the weapon, instead of sinking into soft flesh, as she expected, struck against some hard substance like iron or steel.

She uttered a howl of agony, and let the knife fall from her bruised fingers.

A terrible cry also burst from Blueskin's lips, for, of course, this had awakened him.

He had laid down with his hanger drawn and handy to his grasp.

Seizing it, therefore—although when he did so he could not be said to be thoroughly awake—he sprang to his feet.

Yelling for mercy, the old man sank down upon his knees.

But the landlady rushed to the door, and made a frantic attempt to leave the room.

"Stop!" said Blueskin, as with his left hand he drew a pistol from his belt and held it at arm's length. "Stop, or I fire."

His accents were so full of determination that the woman, perforce, obeyed.

"Now," he continued, "explain this this moment! Make the least movement, either to attack me or to escape, and I will slay you without mercy. It is fortunate I wore over my heart a piece of highly-tempered steel. It has been the means of saving my life upon more than one occasion. Now, then, what was the meaning of this attack upon my life?"

"Mercy—mercy!"

"I will show none if you do not speak at once."

"Spare our lives, good sir! Spare our lives!"

"What right have you to make such a prayer? But all will depend upon your answer. Do you hear me? Was it to rob me that you wished to take my life?"

"Ye-s, sir. Mercy—mercy!"

"No one set you on?"

"No—no, sir, no."

The idea appeared to hold momentary possession of Blueskin's mind that some one had instigated them to murder him, but a moment's thought told him that it was an absurd one.

Avarice—the sin that has prompted the commission of more sins than aught else—was the sole motive that had actuated the poor wretches before him.

He knew not what other people there might be in the house ready and willing to render them assistance, and in his weak state he would easily be overpowered by numbers; and so it was his best policy to get out of the house as quickly as possible.

But he was unwilling to do so without inflicting some punishment upon those who had in so base a manner attempted to take his life, though, having asked for mercy, he did not like to slay them in cold blood, though, had he done so, it would have been no more than they deserved.

He glanced round him for something that would suit his purpose, but, save the bedclothes, he saw nothing.

He determined to make one of the sheets available. By dint of the most terrible threats, he compelled the two abject beings to stand close to each other.

Then, stripping the clothes off the bed, he twisted the top sheet into a kind of rope, and with this he bound them tightly to each other in such a fashion that neither could move in the least.

This done, he doubled one of the blankets and put it over their heads, securing it in that position by means of the other sheet, twisted up in the same manner as the former one.

When this was done, they were, to all intents and purposes, quite helpless.

But he had not done with them yet.

They should suffer some inconvenience, he determined. By the side of the fireplace he noticed a large cupboard. "That will be the very place," he muttered. "I will stuff them in there, and then, if no one finds them, it is no fault of mine."

Before he had finished making this reflection he had begun to drag them, in spite of their resistance, along the floor.

The key was in the lock of the cupboard door, so, turning it round, he opened it.

Somewhat to his surprise, he found that there was only one shelf in it, and that very near the top.

But it was not, strictly speaking, until afterwards that this struck him.

With one vigorous push, having got them close to it, he pushed them inside.

Ere, however, he could close the door, he was startled by a rushing sound, and a dull, muffled shriek.

A heavy splash succeeded.

For a moment Blueskin was so astounded that he stood like one suddenly changed to stone.

The very instant that the two bodies reached the floor of the cupboard it gave way beneath them, and they disappeared from sight with the greatest swiftness conceivable.

It was their falling for some distance down a kind of well-like place that made the rushing noise.

The muffled shriek had come from their lips as they descended.

The heavy splash was when they reached the depths below.

It was water.

So rapidly was this done that Blueskin could scarcely bring himself to believe that it had really happened.

But it was one of those circumstances that will not for very long admit of the possibility of a doubt.

Recovering himself, he sprang to the window, and with one snatch pulled down the curtain which hung before it.

A glare of daylight of course came into the room the moment this was done, revealing its darkest recesses.

Blueskin then walked to the cupboard.

The door had swung partially shut, but he pushed it wide open.

Holding firmly by the woodwork, he looked within.

Then he saw that bottom to the cupboard there was none, and that instead there was a kind of square pit, the depth of which he could only estimate by the length of time it had taken the bodies to reach the bottom.

Bending still more over the abyss, he listened to see whether any sounds would come up from below.

But all was silent, and though he remained in the same attitude for several minutes, nothing came to indicate that the infamous lodging-house keepers were in life.

"This is very strange," Blueskin said; "very strange and very awful. I little thought that they would receive their death at my hand. But it is just, perhaps, after all. No doubt that pit is the receptacle of many a poor traveller whom they have murdered! It would probably have been my resting-place had not the steel plate I always wear prevented them from achieving their object. I must leave this place, though—I must leave this place. There is no knowing what danger I may incur by lingering here."

This was true, so he at once set about taking his departure.

Unbolting the room door, he opened it and went out upon the stairs.

But before he descended them, he listened whether any one was stirring.

But all was still.

Nevertheless he crept down the staircase with the utmost silence and caution.

They terminated in the passage.

A hasty glance showed him that it was vacant, and that the front door was standing open.

To dart out into the street was the work of a moment only, and he drew a long breath as he did so.

"Now for Jack Sheppard!" he said, as he turned his face towards the river. "Is he a prisoner, I wonder, or has he, like me, managed to escape? That is a point which I will very quickly ascertain."

CHAPTER CXXXVII.

JONATHAN WILD RECEIVES A VERY IMPORTANT COMMUNICATION IN A VERY MYSTERIOUS MANNER.

WHILE the dramatis personæ of our story continue to be so widely separated as they now are, and as they have for some time been, it must inevitably occur that, while we are giving our attention to some, we neglect others.

But so far as possible, every one has had his turn.

The adventures of Edgeworth Bess and Colonel Thorne have been brought up to a certain point, and so too have those of Jack Sheppard and his two companions.

Blueskin also has been followed for a length of time, and now that he is not in a situation of any special danger, we feel that for a time he can be left, while a few pages are devoted to the proceedings of Jonathan Wild.

Of late he has certainly been very much neglected, but it was presumed that a greater interest was felt in those to whom he was a bane, than there was in himself.

If the reader will carry back his recollection a little, he will find that the last that was seen of him was on that morning when, after his unsuccessful pursuit of Blueskin on the Thames, he had returned to his own residence in Newgate-street, under the full impression that he should find there Jack Sheppard and the two men in whose custody he had left him.

We know already how disappointed he was in that anticipation, but we certainly shall not attempt to transcribe the awful volley of curses which poured from his lips when he was made the recipient of the startling intelligence that nothing whatever had been seen of either of them.

He could hardly believe in the possibility of such a thing at first, but, when his ire had subsided a little, he cried—"The horses—the horses! Have the horses at the door at once! Six! Call up the men! Quick, I say!"

"Yes, Mr. Wild," gasped Tonks, who was in momentary dread of receiving something from his imperious master harder to put up with than words. "Yes, Mr. Wild. In one moment, sir."

"Ya—ah! Be quick, I say."

He stalked down the passage as he spoke, and entered his office.

"Brandy," he cried. "I must have brandy. Curse that Jack Sheppard! Am I always to be thwarted by him? Is he always to slip through my fingers when I think I have got him secure. No. Jonathan Wild shall never be balked by a stripling like that. I will capture him if I live, and, when I do, I will take good care that he does not escape. I have sworn to bring him to Tyburn, as I have done many a better man, and I renew the oath. Ah!"

While speaking, Jonathan had lifted the sloping lid of his desk and took out a small black bottle of brandy, which he carried to his lips and emptied at a draught.

This done, he looked to his weapons and ammunition.

His powder-flask and shot-pouch were replenished.

He carefully loaded and primed his pistols.

Then walked back into the passage.

Here six of his janizaries had assembled, for such was the state of discipline to which he had brought them, that they obeyed with as much promptitude as soldiers.

"Ya—ah," he growled. "See all your pistols loaded, for you will have some warm work to do, I expect. Where are the horses?"

"They will be at the door in one moment, if you please, Mr. Wild."

It was Tonks who spoke, and, even as the words passed his lips, the trampling of horses was heard outside.

"There they are, sir," he said, as he flung open the front door.

"Follow me," said Wild, darting out. "Follow me."

In a disorderly throng they followed him down the steps into the street.

With what speed they could, they scrambled into their saddles.

As it happened, they were all seated before their master, for, having approached his horse in a savage mood, he had kicked it brutally on the leg because it would not stand still.

The consequence was as might naturally be expected.

The horse was not so afraid of the thief-taker as his men were, and it did not hesitate to show its resentment by kicking and plunging, and that in such a manner that it became an impossibility for him to place his foot in the stirrup.

This did not tend to in any way abate Wild's ill temper, and the curses which he uttered were really awful to hear.

Presently, however, he spied an opportunity, and at the risk of his own neck, put his foot in the stirrup.

But he mounted in perfect safety.

No sooner, however, had he got his seat upon the creature's back, than he proceeded to vent his ill humour upon it.

With brutal recklessness, he plunged his spurs again and again into the flanks of his steed, until it uttered loud snorts of pain.

The way in which it pranced and reared would have thrown many a practised rider, but by some strange means or other, Jonathan held on.

Away they went, as though a legion of fiends was at their heels, down the Old Bailey, and on to Ludgate-hill.

With unabated speed they swept down this busy thoroughfare.

The approach to the old bridge was quickly gained.

Here he slackened a little.

The horse was completely cowed.

Looking restlessly from side to side, allowing nothing to escape his eagle glance, Jonathan went on across the bridge, for the hope that he should find his men waiting there for him still held a resting-place in his heart.

But nothing of them could he see, until, having gone some distance down the Blackfriars-road, he turned back again towards London.

Blinded as he was by rage, yet he was both puzzled and alarmed.

In no way that he could think of was he able to account for the disappearance of his two men.

The thought that they had left his service, and consented to join their fortunes to those of Jack Sheppard, never occurred to him for a moment, or, if it did, he considered it as being altogether too preposterous to be entertained.

And now from house to house he went, making the most rigid inquiries, but nowhere could he learn anything.

Thoroughly satisfied, at length, that it would be quite futile to search or inquire any further, he made his way into Fleet-street.

Here he paused, and, after a moment's thought, instead of going back to his own house, he turned his horse's head in the direction of Drury-lane.

Once before he had learned tidings there of the persons he pursued, and why should he not do so again.

It did not take him very long to reach the "Old Black Lion," and having done so, he dismounted, and commanded his followers to do so likewise.

A man who was lounging about, at a sign from him took charge of the horses.

He entered the inn, closely followed by his men.

It will be remembered that on the occasion of his former visit, he had left two of his men there to keep guard.

These, upon hearing him arrive, instantly approached him.

But they declared, in the most positive manner, that nothing had been seen, either of Sheppard or Blueskin; in fact, they were certain neither had been there.

The reader must bear in mind that this was the morning of the day upon the evening of which Jack had made a visit to the old place.

In a worse temper than ever, Jonathan turned away, and remounted his horse.

He shaped his course to Newgate-street, for his business had been rather neglected of late, for as for searching for his prey through London, no one knew better than himself the inutility of that when there was nothing to serve him as a clue.

He argued that no long time could possibly elapse before he heard something of them, and that would afford him the opportunity to act.

Besides which, he had other matters on hand. None of them perhaps so important to him as they were, but then, notwithstanding that, they required attention.

Therefore he made the best of his way back to the place from which he had started, for even now the hour was an early one, and he would be able to get back before the business of the day began.

But we fancy no one, who knew just what had taken place that morning, would have ventured to intrude upon the thief-taker on that day at least.

Without the occurrence of anything important enough for us to record it, Newgate-street was reached.

Wild flung himself off his horse, and left it to take care of itself.

He had had a new master-key made since Jack stole the one he formerly carried, and not only that, he had had some alterations made in the locks themselves, which would make the old key quite useless.

It so happened that Tonks' turn of duty had expired.

He was succeeded by Quilt Arnold.

Jonathan rammed his key in the lock, and swung the door back with all the force he possibly could.

But Quilt, who had been for some time in his employ, was acquainted with all his little amiable tricks, so he took good care to stand aside and let the door bang harmlessly against the wall, which it did, but it made a most horrible clatter.

Jonathan did not deign to open his lips, but stalked down the hall or passage of his house like some grim old giant along the corridor of his castle.

In nine cases out of ten, when he entered his house, the first place that he went into was his office, and so he did upon the present occasion.

Passing through the half-door in the wooden railings, which divided the room into two portions, he shut it behind him, and mounted his stool.

Now he came to sit down he found how much he must have been exerting himself for he broke out all over in a profuse perspiration.

He drew out a spotted blue pocket-handkerchief, and wiped his disagreeable-looking face with it.

Then he twitched his wig violently.

Nothing vexed the great Jonathan so much as being foiled, and lately he had, in connexion with Sheppard and Blueskin, met with nothing but defeat.

His ruminations, however, were not destined to extend to any great length.

They were interrupted by a faint tap, tap upon the panel of the door.

"Who's there?" he yelled.

"Me, sir, if you please!"

It was Quilt Arnold's voice.

"Come in, then!"

Accordingly, although it was with no small degree of hesitation, the janizary opened the door.

"Well, villain," said Wild, "what is it?"

"A man, Mr. Wild, if you please, wants to see you on some very important business indeed!"

"What's his name?"

"Glucks!"

CHAPTER CXXXVIII.

JONATHAN WILD IS VERY UNEASY AND ALARMED ABOUT THE MYSTERIOUS BOX.

"GLUCKS!" roared Jonathan Wild. "What do you mean by Glucks?"

"That is his name, Mr. Wild."

"Bah!"

"Yes, sir."

"Send him in."

"All right, sir! He's in No. 2."

Quilt Arnold vanished with these words on his lips, felicitating himself upon his good luck.

With all the speed he possibly could, he made his way across the passage to the well-known little waiting-room, which was always known as No. 2, in order to tell the man with the strange name that Jonathan Wild would see him.

It was a very strange name, and one might almost argue from it that a man with such a strange name must want to see the thief-taker upon very strange business.

But be his business what it may, and whether strange or not, we shall very quickly know.

Upon receiving the intimation from Quilt, he rose hurriedly to his feet from the seat upon which he had been sitting, and in a nervous sort of manner picked up a mysterious-looking box.

This he held tightly, as though it was something of great importance.

In length it was probably eight or nine inches, in breadth four, in depth three.

Of what material it was made it would have puzzled any one at a first glance to tell, but upon one of the four sides was an inscription of some kind, in white letters.

And now, having described the box, we feel ourselves bound to extend the same courtesy to its possessor.

He was a young man probably twenty or two-and-twenty years of age.

His form was slight, and his bones hung loosely together, or, as one would say, "half-set."

His face was pale and emaciated.

The cheeks sunken.

Three little tufts of downy, sandy hair were on his face.

One—the largest—was situated upon the extreme point of his chin, and, when pulled out quite straight, might have been an inch or an inch and a half in length.

The other two tufts, which were very much smaller, grew on his cheeks, where whiskers should have been.

His eyes, which were very deeply set, had a peculiar dreamy expression.

His hair, which was very black, was suffered to grow to a great length, and was combed down with scrupulous straightness.

His attire was black as well.

Such was the strange being who answered to the name of Mr. Glucks, and, if we have succeeded in sketching him properly, the reader will agree that his personal appearance was quite upon a par with his name.

In a bashful, diffident kind of way he followed Quilt Arnold, and presently he stood within the lion's den, and face to face with the lion himself.

Jonathan Wild gave a grin as this peculiar specimen of human kind presented itself before him.

"Mr. Wild," said Mr. Glucks, in a diffident tone of voice, and shifting the box about as he spoke, "Mr. Wild!"

"Ya—ah."

The horrible sound was almost too much for Mr. Glucks. He started back, and looked very much as though he meditated a wild rush to the door.

But Jonathan's next words stopped him.

"Now then," he growled. "What do you want. Speak quick, and don't use any more words than you are obliged. Go on."

Mr. Glucks licked his lips.

He was in a state of the greatest possible trepidation, and it was quite a minute before he could command his voice sufficiently to speak.

Jonathan enjoyed his confusion immensely.

"I have ventured to call," said Mr. Glucks, at length, "upon something I fancy of importance to yourself."

"What is it?"

"This box, Mr. Wild."

As he pronounced these words, Mr. Glucks handed Jonathan the mysterious-looking box.

Now Wild had, in a general way, a sort of dread of anything mysterious or unusual.

On the present occasion, this feeling so far had the mastery of him that he would not hold out his hand to take the box.

"Put it down," he said.

Mr. Glucks obeyed.

It balanced just on the railing before the desk.

"What's in that?" said Wild, snappishly, after eyeing it for some few moments suspiciously. "What's it got to do with me?"

"I don't know, Mr. Wild," replied Mr. Glucks, whose alarm had by no means subsided.

"Then what did you bring it to me for, eh?"

"Be good enough to look on the lid."

"The lid?"

"Yes. There's an inscription on it."

Jonathan Wild looked at the box again.

But as it was placed, he could not read the inscription, though he could see it.

Why it was he had such a repugnance to touching the box he would have been put about to tell. But he had, and there was no mistake about it.

After straining his eyes and neck in a vain endeavour to decipher it, he gave it up.

But his bludgeon lay on the desk beside him, convenient to his grasp, and so, taking it in his hand, he poked the box with it till it fell off the railing on to the desk itself.

It did not fall as though there was anything very heavy in it, but it did not sound empty for all that.

Jonathan drew back as it fell, but seeing all continued as before, he took courage, and poked it with the cudgel again, until the part with the letters on it was turned towards him.

Then, to his intense surprise, he read as follows:—

Take this Box immediately to

MR. JONATHAN WILD,

NEWGATE STREET,

LONDON,

And he will Reward you for your trouble.

Jonathan Wild read this inscription twice.

Then he raised his head, and looked inquiringly into the face of Mr. Glucks.

"What's that mean?" he cried. "Mind!" and he flourished his bludgeon ominously, "mind what you're saying."

"I don't know what it means, Mr. Wild."

"What made you bring it to me?"

"Because of the inscription."

"Then where did you get it?"

"Found it, Mr. Wild."

"Found it?"

"Yes, sir."

"Where? Speak! Tell me! Beware of speaking anything but the truth, for though mine is a most amiable temper, yet I am not a man to stand trifling with."

"I wouldn't trifle with you for the world, Mr. Wild."

"You had better not. Now, where did you find this infernal box?"

"Infernal box?"

"Yes, or damnable box, if you like that better, or box without the damnable. Ya—ah!"

Wild made a hideous roaring noise, and accompanied it with a contortion of countenance so truly horrible to look upon, that Mr. Glucks, whose nerves did not appear to be over strong, almost fainted outright with terror.

But he could see his best plan of action was to reply without delay to the questions asked of him.

"Dover! Dover!" he gasped. "I found it at Dover, Mr. Wild."

"At Dover! Whereabouts?"

"On the sea-shore."

"The?"

Jonathan stopped.

But Mr. Glucks finished the sentence.

"Sea-shore."

"Speak out!" roared Jonathan. "Don't keep me in suspense. Speak out, I say!"

"I am, Mr. Wild. It is my delight, for I am a worshipper of the Muses, and those celestial goddesses have infused poetical inspirations into my soul. It is my delight, in the early morning, when the inhabitants of the earth all slumber, to fly from my restless couch and repair to the margin of the sea, where alone and unseen I can commune with nature in all her glory. On such occasions my soul soars as upon the pinions of an eagle, above base, sordid humanity, wherewith I am surrounded. I pace with reverent footsteps along the pebbly beach, and from every object draw a subject for a poem, and when, as I walked, I saw that mysterious box cast up at my feet!"

"Ya—ah!" said Wild, who tried in vain to make something of Mr. Glucks' narration. "Ya—ah! Shut up your spoony trap, and answer me."

"I am a poet, Mr. Wild," said Mr. Glucks—"a sensitive plant—a—a—in fine, a poet, and!"

"A poet," mimicked Wild; "bah! bo! Shut up! You say you were on the sea-shore, walking along, when the tide washed this up to your feet?"

"Such is a prosaic rendering of a most poetical incident."

"Ya—ah!" said Wild, again, who had the greatest contempt for all poets and poetry. "Will you take your oath to what you have said?"

"Yes, Mr. Wild."

"And was the box addressed as I see it now?"

[JOHN ROOTS IS SHOT ON THE STAIRCASE BY MATTHEW FLOOD.]

"It was, sir."

"Strange!"

"Very strange!"

"Who the devil told you to say it was strange? Did you open it to see what was in it?"

"I, Mr. Wild? No, I would for ever scorn an act so base—so!"

Jonathan did not speak, but he shook his cudgel so fiercely that Mr. Glucks stopped short in his poetical flight.

"And you don't know what's inside?"

"No."

"Have you carried it safe?"

"Yes."

"I mean it hasn't hurt you at all?"

"What do you mean, Mr. Wild?"

"Mean, why how do you know what's inside it? For all you know, it might be filled with gunpowder!"

Mr. Glucks turned pale at the idea, and drew back a step.

"You don't mean to say there's gunpowder in it, Mr. Wild?"

"I don't know what there is in it, but I very soon will. Take it, and open it this minute, and tell me what's inside, or—take it—take it, I say."

"Gunpowder!" said Mr. Glucks.

CHAPTER CXXXIX.

JONATHAN WILD COMPELS MR. GLUCKS TO OPEN THE MYSTERIOUS BOX.

THERE was something very strange about that box.

But yet one would think there was not enough to alarm Jonathan Wild in the way that he seemed to be.

He would not touch it.

The reason was this.

It was impossible for any one in the position he occupied not to have very many enemies.

And he knew it as well as anybody.

So long as they tried openly against him he did not care.

What he feared was that an attempt would be made upon his life at a moment when he was unguarded, and by a means which would never be expected.

Now, Jonathan Wild had a vivid recollection of having once read how a very celebrated personage was once put to death by his enemies, by having a casket presented to him.

This casket, which was supposed to contain jewels of great value, was placed in his hands securely locked.

Not dreaming of any danger, the nobleman—for such he was—proceeded to open it.

No sooner, however, had he inserted the key and turned it round in the wards of the lock than, with a noise like thunder, the box exploded.

He was seated in his cabinet alone when this took place, but the attendants in his mansion heard the report, and hastened to the door of the room.

This, in order that he might not be disturbed, the unfortunate nobleman had securely fastened.

It was broken open, however, and the servants entered. They found the apartment full of dense blue smoke.

At first they could see nothing, but by degrees the vapour cleared away.

Then was presented to their view a spectacle for which they were ill prepared.

Extended upon the ground, with his head and the upper portion of his body fearfully shattered, was their master. He was quite dead.

One glance at the bleeding, palpitating mass sufficed to show that it was impossible for life to cling to it. Of the box scarcely a vestige remained.

The whole circumstance continued to be a profound mystery for many years.

At length it was cleared up.

The supposititious casket of jewels was a device of his enemies in order to procure his destruction.

They succeeded.

The box was filled with explosive materials, and the interior was so arranged that the turning of the key produced the same effect as pulling the trigger of a fire-arm.

To any one such a remarkable story as this would be full of interest, and the extraordinary nature of the incidents would make a deep impression upon the mind of any one.

But upon the mind of Jonathan Wild they fell with more than usual force.

From the very time that he had read this, he had had the most invincible dread of anything mysterious.

Before that, the idea that his life would be attempted to be taken in some way calculated to throw any one off their guard had dimly haunted his imagination, but afterwards that idea had taken consistency in form.

He knew how many there were to whom he was a continual curse, and he knew as well that many of them were unscrupulous enough to avail themselves of any means, however base, that presented a reasonable prospect of ridding them of him.

Naturally enough, then, when he saw this box with the tempting inscription on the lid, he, in a manner of speaking, jumped to the conclusion that some mischief or danger to him lurked within it.

So he was loath even to touch it, except with the top of his bludgeon, and that he did with very great trepidation.

It might be, of course, that the box contained nothing mischievous, but that could only be told by opening it.

This Jonathan Wild firmly determined not to do.

There were too many mysterious circumstances about it.

Not the least of them was the strange behaviour and appearance of the strange being who had brought it to him.

The manner in which he stated it had come into his possession was equally strange.

Jonathan, however, came to the conclusion, and very correctly, that Mr. Glucks was unacquainted with the contents of the box.

Had he known they were of a dangerous character, he would never have run the risk of bringing it in person.

His astonishment and alarm, too, when Jonathan had suggested that it might be dangerous to hold or open it, were too genuine to be feigned.

"Take it," Wild roared, as he perceived his visitor retreat, with the word gunpowder upon his lips. "Take it, I say! Do you hear me? You had better!"

But Mr. Glucks was too much frightened.

His nerves were of a very weak character indeed, and such a scene as this was more than he could go through. He sank down upon the ground in a swoon.

Jonathan got off his stool.

Anger and astonishment contended fiercely in his breast.

But the former seemed to have the mastery.

At least one would have thought so, had they seen him make his way to where Mr. Glucks, in a strange, doubled-up fashion, lay upon the office floor.

Raising his ponderous foot, he dealt the unfortunate young man so terrible a kick, that it is greatly to be marvelled at that it did not demolish his slender anatomy altogether.

"Now then," growled the thief-taker, "get up, will you? Don't think to impose upon me. You are only shamming, and you know it. Get up."

He saluted him with another kick.

But though poor Mr. Glucks moved slightly, he showed no symptoms of recovering from his swoon.

"He aint shamming, then," said Wild. "Curse him, and the box and all. What shall I do with both?"

He cast a dubious and dissatisfied glance at the little box, which lay to all appearance harmlessly enough upon the slope of the desk.

"I must think a bit," said Wild, after a pause.

But he did not return to his desk.

On the contrary, he retired to that part of the room most distant from it.

Then, leaning his back against the wall, he gave himself up to reflections.

It was really ludicrous to see the doughty thief-taker so terrified at such a harmless, common-place looking thing.

But curiosity soon began to exercise its sway upon his mind.

"I'll know what's in that box," he said. "I am determined I will. Who knows? Perhaps it is nothing hurtful, but of the greatest consequence to me. But I don't think it is—I don't think it is. It must be a scheme on the part of my enemies to put me to death; but, ha! ha! they will find Jonathan Wild a match for them."

He chuckled for some few moments in that odd guttural fashion, as was usual with him when he was pleased.

"I must get rid of this fool," he muttered, as his eyes fell upon Mr. Glucks. "I must get rid of him, and then I will think how I'll get the box open. Stop! A good idea. There's Levee. Curse him! he laughed at me when he thought I was not by. I remember it. That will be a good way to serve him out. Ha! ha! Mr. Levee, I will be even with you, at least."

The reader will doubtless remember the occasion to which Jonathan alluded, and when poor Levee by his incaution had incurred the resentment of his imperious master.

It looks now as though he was about to pay dearly for his pleasantry.

When Jonathan Wild the great made up his mind to do a thing he always set about it at once.

Going, then, to the door of the office, he opened it a little way, and projected his villainous-looking head into the passage.

Quilt Arnold was still upon the lock, and, fortunately for him, he was attending to his duty.

"Quilt!" yelled Wild; "Quilt!"

"Yes, sir."

"Come here; I want you."

Jonathan withdrew his head into the office again.

Quilt, of course, made all the speed he could across the passage, and into the room where his master awaited him.

He was, of course, in no small degree astonished when he saw Mr. Glucks lying to all appearance dead upon the ground.

"Carry him out," said Jonathan.

"Is he dead, Mr. Wild?"

"Dead! No, fool, he isn't; he's only swooned, or something of that sort. Carry him out and give him to the watch, and let them lock him up for being drunk and disorderly."

Experience had taught Quilt Arnold the policy of implicitly obeying his master, so he at once, without a word of either question or remonstrance, took hold of Mr.

Glucks by the heels, and began to drag him out into the passage.

Jonathan looked on in grim silence.

As soon as Quilt had fairly disappeared with him, he said—

"Now for Levee! Stop a bit; I won't arouse his suspicions if I can help it. Let him fall into the snare with his eyes shut. I wonder whether I dare venture to touch the box. That fool carried it without being hurt. I'll risk it, for I should not like him to see the label; he might suspect something."

With manifest uneasiness and apprehension, Jonathan went to his desk, and reseated himself upon his stool.

There lay the box, with the inscription staring him in the face.

Then he, for the first time, noticed that the address was painted on the lid of the box itself, with white paint.

To remove it, therefore, would be difficult.

He looked at it for a moment in silence.

"Shan't touch it," he said, at length. "Too much risk. Let him make what he can of it. I'll call him!"

He raised his cudgel as he spoke, and banged it furiously upon the desk.

Quilt Arnold, who had disposed of Mr. Glucks in the manner commanded by his master, re-appeared.

"Where's Levee?"

"Up stairs, Mr. Wild."

"Call him! I want him."

"Yes, Mr. Wild."

Quilt vanished.

Jonathan resumed his old favourite attitude.

But his reflections, whatever they were, did not continue long, for some one tapped, in a very faint manner, upon the panel of the door.

"Come in!" roared Jonathan, at the very top of his voice. "Come in! and don't stand waiting there! I want you."

CHAPTER CXL.

THE CONTENTS OF THE MYSTERIOUS BOX PROVE TO BE VERY DIFFERENT TO WHAT JONATHAN WILD EXPECTED.

WITH a smile on his lips and a tremble in his heart, Levee sidled into Wild's office.

Since the occasion of which we spoke, he had been careful to keep as much as possible out of the way of the thief-taker, in the hopes that what he had said would be forgotten.

And now, when he entered, he half hoped that so desirable a thing had taken place.

It was the first time for some days that he had been face to face with his master.

He looked up, therefore, in a wistful sort of a manner, to see what kind of expression it wore.

But he could gather nothing from the scrutiny.

Jonathan looked much the same as usual.

That is to say—hideous in the extreme.

Twitching his wig in that peculiar way for which he was so remarkable, he said—

"Levee!"

"Yes, if you please, Mr. Wild. What did you please to want?"

Jonathan grinned.

"Take that box," he said, abruptly.

He pointed to it as he spoke.

Thinking of nothing but how he had best conciliate his master, Levee approached the desk, and stretching his arm over the railing, took the box as he had been bid.

"I am busy, Levee!" cried Wild, "and am going out."

"Yes, sir."

"I shan't be more than half-an-hour, and while I am gone, I—I——"

"What, Mr. Wild?"

"I want you to open that box."

"Certainly, Mr. Wild."

"You see the lid is fastened down, and I fancy you will have some trouble in raising it."

"I'll do it, Mr. Wild," replied Levee, elated at the good feeling Jonathan displayed towards him, and congratulating himself that the past had been forgotten.

"You had better do it in here, Levee, and take care of the contents. Don't let any one know what you are about. I shall be back in half-an-hour."

Jonathan Wild put on his hat.

He got down off his stool.

His hideous physiognomy was distorted by a diabolical grin.

"Take care of the box, Levee, till I come back. I am only just going out into Giltspur-street. Good day, Levee Good day!"

Jonathan Wild walked out.

He closed the door behind him.

For a moment, Levee stood quite still, looking at the wood-work which hid his master from his sight.

He rubbed his head with a puzzled air.

In his anxiety to disarm suspicion, Wild had overshot the mark.

Levee suspected something more was in what had just taken place than he had seen.

"I'm blest if I can make this out," he ejaculated, rubbing his head more furiously than ever, as if by so doing he could assist his thoughts.

He still held the box in his hand.

He glanced down at it.

Then, for the first time, he noticed the writing on the lid.

Reading was an accomplishment which he possessed in only a very partial degree, and he was a long time spelling the words out.

At last he managed the first line.

"Take—this—box—immediately—to——"

The second and two following ones did not give him much trouble.

"Mr. Jonathan Wild,
Newgate-street,
London."

Then he spelt out the last, and arrived at the true sense of the whole.

"And he will reward you for your trouble."

Now this by no means served to decrease Mr. Levee's perplexity.

Indeed, it had a contrary effect.

He looked at the box with an air of the greatest possible mistrust.

"Johnny's playing some deep game," he said, at length. "I am sure of it, but what it is I cannot make out. Curse the box! What shall I do with it? I wonder now what's inside, and why he didn't open it himself."

He shook it up and down as he spoke, but no sound was produced that enabled him to form a notion of the nature of the contents.

"There's something in it, I can tell by the weight; but it don't shake about at all. Curse the box, I say. If I only knew what old Jonathan was at, I shouldn't care. What made him run out and leave me like this? I don't feel at all comfortable, that I don't. However, here goes. I'll have the lid off, and risk it, for if Jonathan was to come back before I had opened it, the house wouldn't hold him."

With these words on his lips, Levee put the box under his arm, and commenced searching his pockets.

In a minute or so, from among a multitude of other things, he produced a peculiar house-breaking implement, then very much in use, which was shaped like a long slender chisel.

This he applied to the junction of the lid with the box itself, and the crackling sound which immediately ensued, testified to the efficacy of the instrument.

Little by little, he forced away the lid, but the wood of which it was composed was hard, and it had been very securely fastened down.

But it yielded before the pressure he applied to it.

As soon as ever he was able, Levee, whose curiosity was excited to the utmost pitch, endeavoured to obtain a glimpse of the contents.

It was something white, almost like flour.

The box seemed quite filled with it, and it was pressed in hard.

More puzzled than before, Levee ripped off the remainder of the lid.

The box was harmless enough, that was quite clear, and, after all, it looked as though Jonathan's apprehensions were quite unfounded.

The contents presented a clear unbroken surface of some white granular material.

Levee looked at it for some time in silence, but the proceeding did not tend to enlighten him in the least.

The manner, however, in which he gazed at it was really most amusing to see.

"I suppose it's all right," he said; "What a fool I must be to go frightening myself about nothing. Johnny's all right. I suppose he didn't want the trouble of opening the blessed thing himself. I should like to know what it is that is in it. However, that's no concern of mine."

Little old Levee think that Wild was fully under the impression that he had laid a snare for his destruction.

When the thief-taker left his house he had carried out the intention which he had expressed of going to Giltspur-street.

Crossing over the way, he turned round the corner, and made his way to the eating-house which we have before had occasion to mention, and where Jonathan usually took his meals.

A grin of hideous satisfaction expanded his features as he gloated over the fate to which he had doomed his janizary, for somehow or another Wild felt as certain that that box was intended to be his destruction as he was of his own existence.

With great gusto he despatched a hearty meal, washed down by plentiful libations of brandy, for of late he had taken to drink a still greater quantity of this fiery stimulant.

Then his impatience rose to such a height, that he found himself unable to any longer stay away from his house and the sight which he fully expected to see there.

Rising, then, from his seat, he retraced his steps.

On reaching the door of his house, he drew forth his master key, and inserting it in the lock shot back the bolt and entered.

He fully expected to witness some scene of tumult, but the quiet appearance of the hall gave no token of anything of the kind.

All was still—unusually still—he thought.

He did not pause for more than a moment, though.

Striding across the hall, he in half-a-dozen steps reached the office door.

He listened here, but no sound whatever came from the interior.

With the feeling in his mind that he had allowed his fears to get the better of him increasing every moment, and the conviction that he had made some egregious blunder, he opened the door.

As he had more than half expected, the chamber was quite vacant; for when Levee had opened the box in the manner we have described, and spent some time in fruitless conjecture, he had placed it upon Jonathan's desk, and betaken himself to his own quarters, there to meditate upon the mysterious conduct of his master, and endeavour to arrive at some sort of a conclusion respecting it.

Jonathan felt that he had acted in a very ridiculous manner.

No harm had resulted from the opening of the box.

Perhaps it contained something of great and secret importance.

If it did, he had, by his own groundless fears, placed that knowledge in the possession of another.

In no enviable frame of mind, he entered his office and closed the door.

The key was in the lock on the inner side, so he fastened himself in, determining not to be disturbed.

Then going up to this desk, he saw the box lying upon it, and presenting the appearance we have described.

His surprise may be imagined, and his astonishment also.

Clearly, however, the contents had not been tampered with.

He approached, and not without some misgiving, took up some of the whitish powder between his finger and thumb.

"What is it?" he asked, snappishly. "It looks like chalk pounded up. That's what it is, too, I'll be bound."

He poked about with his finger in the box, and a closer examination showed him that he was quite right in his supposition as to its character.

But what on earth could any one mean by sending a box of chalk, and taking such pains as they manifestly did to pack it, for had not Mr. Glucks stated that it was washed ashore by the tide, and yet the powder was perfectly dry, and free even from the least trace of dampness.

CHAPTER CXL.

JONATHAN WILD IS BOTH STARTLED AND GRATIFIED BY THE INTELLIGENCE WHICH THE MYSTERIOUS BOX CONVEYS TO HIM.

ASSUREDLY has Jonathan Wild not yet fathomed the mystery of this singular box, and such was his own impression.

But, in spite of himself, he could not banish the notion from his mind that danger lurked in it in some fashion or other.

Going through the little door in the wooden railings, by which his office was divided into two portions, he once more seated himself on the stool.

The box was then within reach of his hand.

Determining to shriek no longer from ascertaining what the inside contained, he suddenly, yet gingerly, took hold of it, and tilted it over on to its side.

Of course, when this was done, the powder ran out.

An exclamation came from Jonathan's lips.

Just peeping through the white chalky mass was a fragment of paper.

"A communication," he cried. "What a strange circumstance! What can it be, I wonder?"

He turned the box upside down as he spoke.

The powdered chalk slid down the slant of his desk.

Then there remained fully revealed to him a piece of writing paper, folded into the shape and semblance of a letter.

In the curiosity he felt to know what this letter contained, he forgot all his recent alarm, and took hold of it.

The superscription was as follows:—

Private.

MR. JONATHAN WILD.

The handwriting was of a very ordinary kind, and looked as though the person who had written it was used to having something larger in his fingers than a pen.

Jonathan slowly unfolded this epistle.

It was not secured in any way; probably the writer considered that the manner in which he had placed it in the box made it unnecessary.

When the sheet was fully outspread before him, and the first words met his eye, one of those awful roars, to which the thief-taker at times gave utterance, burst from his lips.

Then he continued reading with avidity.

We will place the document before the reader in its precise words.

It commenced thus:—

"Mr. Wild,—

"Respected Sir,—This comes from George Hawkins, and you will, I take it, be much surprised at receiving a letter from me in this fashion, but I couldn't see no other way as I could send it to you.

"Of course you will remember the suspicions which I communicated to you about Colonel Thorne, who you fancied must be a highwayman on his own account, namely, that he and Captain Howlet, the pirate, was one and the same person, which suspicion is no longer—such being the truth.

"When we parted, which was, as you know, several months ago, I said I would try to find out, by joining the pirates. Well, after a great deal of trouble, I got to be admitted a member of the band, the particulars of which, being too long, and not having no convenience for writing, I can't set down.

"I want to tell you what I know in a few words, though whether I shall be able to send you the letter is more than I can tell, having already written two, but have not been able to get out of the cave where the pirates all live, which is in the rock as: Colonel Thorne's house, called 'The Larches,' is built on.

"I have been a long while finding out which would be the best way for you to make a successful attack upon them, and at last I have found out, and you may rely upon the information which I send you as being quite correct.

"The particular cliff which the cave is in you will be able to find easy enough, it being, as I said before, the one as the house is built on. Well, in the side of the cliff there is a kind of crack, for I can call it nothing else, which is the entrance.

"But you will have to come in a boat, and bring a ladder with you, for the way into the passage as leads to the cavern is in the top part of this crack in the cliff.

"You won't have much trouble in getting in if you once find the place, for there is only a wooden door to stop you, which you could break down at a blow.

"The pirates don't suspect at all what I am, and I have been very careful in my behaviour. They think themselves quite secure, and in no danger of detection.

"The sooner you come, Mr. Wild, and make the attack, the better, for, just at present, all the men are in the cave, and I think some little time will elapse before they set out upon another cruise. I ought not to forget to tell you that they number twenty altogether, and that they all wear masks made like an owl's head when they attack any vessel, and they certainly do look very awful when they have got them on—enough to terrify any one who is not up to their devilment.

"Howsoever, Mr. Wild, I shall have to finish this here letter, although I have got a great deal more to say; but I am afraid some of the men should catch me, and wonder what I am at. I should never have been able to write to you at all if I hadn't smuggled the things in with me to do it with, though that's neither here nor there.

"I needn't tell you what renown you will gain, Mr. Wild, if you succeed in bringing this gang to justice, for they are that daring and ferocious, that, to my certain knowledge, people are afraid to go to sea for fear they should fall into their hands.

"I trust that what I have said on the outside of the box will make any one who finds it forward it to you, for I shall have to watch my opportunity, and throw it into the water when the tide is running in. I shall have to run the risk whether it comes to you or not, but if I don't hear from you in ten days, I shall send again, and trust to being more lucky.

"Mr. Wild,

"I am your very humble servant,
"GEORGE HAWKINS."

The reader will, of course, from what has gone before, be able to come to a tolerably correct conclusion respecting this letter.

It must be understood that Jonathan Wild made a bargain with all thieves, that if they would give him a share of their plunder, he would take care to keep them clear of the law.

But any one who would not submit to his exactions, or any one whom he found had cheated him, or made the attempt to do so, were marked out for immediate vengeance; and that vengeance consisted always in effecting the capture of the offending person, and, if they still refused to come to terms, lodging them in Newgate, preferring and substantiating a mock charge against them, and having them found guilty, and executed at Tyburn.

Rarely, indeed, did he fail in accomplishing this; and at last it grew to be quite a settled thing, if Jonathan Wild appeared against a person, that he was condemned to death.

Jonathan, to see that no one escaped his clutches, always had spies about; and from some of these he had heard the rumours and speculations which were rife concerning Colonel Thorne, who appeared in London so erratically, and who, when there, spent money in so lavish a manner.

In a moment, when he was made aware of these facts, Jonathan Wild jumped to the conclusion that this Colonel Thorne was a highwayman, and that the money he spent so freely was acquired by levying contributions upon the purses of others.

But he could bring nothing definite against him. Spies he sent out after him in abundance, but all the intelligence they could bring him was, that when he left London it was to visit an estate which he had upon the sea-shore, and which was appellationally designated "The Larches."

He learned, moreover, that, during his stay at this place, he led almost the life of a recluse, being very rarely seen abroad, and permitting no visitors, except at long intervals, to the mansion.

He sought in vain for the knowledge he required to convert his suspicions into certainties.

One of the men who had been appointed more especially to the business of watching Colonel Thorne—by name George Hawkins—had, while at Dover, of course heard the wonderful stories related of Captain Howlet and his ferocious band.

From time to time he had picked up little scraps of information, and the result of them was the suspicion that Colonel Thorne was not a highwayman, but a pirate.

This, and the reasons he had for forming the opinion, he had communicated to Jonathan Wild, and it had been agreed upon between them that Hawkins should endeavour to join the pirate band.

This had occurred about a month previous to the commencement of this history, and by Wild (owing to the number of things he had upon his mind) had been almost if not entirely forgotten, until this letter came into his hands in the extraordinary manner we have described.

In order to make all clear, however, we must state that the letter which Hawkins had so incautiously dropped, and which had led, not only to the discovery of his treachery, but to his summary execution, was one which he had written some time back, but which he had been unable to send off.

It will be perceived by comparing the two letters (the former of which is given in the one hundred and twenty-second chapter), that though they are essentially the same, yet the one which came into Jonathan's hands contains some additional and later information which he did not seem to be in possession of when the first was written.

The roar to which Jonathan Wild gave vent when he read this letter may now be fully accounted for.

No pen or language could, however, depict the eagerness with which he perused every word of it, and when he had finished it once, he read it a second time.

This enabled him to perfectly understand it, which could hardly be said to be the case at first, for Mr. Hawkins' style of composition was rather involved.

The fame of Captain Howlet had spread itself all over the kingdom, to the terror of those engaged in maritime pursuits, but, despite of all the exertions made by the naval authorities, all attempts to capture him and his band, and bring them to justice, had failed.

Now Jonathan Wild felt that he had him in his power, and that he could crush him when he chose.

CHAPTER CXLII.

JONATHAN WILD PAYS A VISIT TO THE SECRETARY OF STATE, AND THEN SETS OUT TO MAKE AN ATTACK UPON CAPTAIN HOWLET.

WITHOUT the slightest fear of contradiction, it may safely be asserted that no one was ever so impressed with the importance of promptitude of action as Jonathan Wild was.

No one had heard more about Captain Howlet and the exertions which had been made to capture him than he.

The reward, too, which had been offered for his apprehension was something over £500, but it was not that so much that tempted Wild as the personal feeling he had imbibed against the colonel, and the reputation as an indefatigable officer he should acquire by capturing him and his much-dreaded band.

It was only by occasionally having recourse to such artifices as this, that he succeeded in blinding the eyes of the public and the authorities to his real proceedings.

Knowing their value, therefore, he was always on the look out for the securing of such offenders as were of least value to him, and whose apprehension would redound most to his credit.

On this occasion he had a double stimulus for instantaneous exertion.

Hawkins had stated that all the crew were then in the cavern, but that he knew not when they would set out on a cruise.

The advantage of capturing them on land, and much in the manner of mice in a trap, was obvious, and although Jonathan had much important business on hand, he resolved to cast it all aside, and devote himself to this.

Jack Sheppard, he considered, he could make sure of at any time he wished.

Blueskin the same.

The one about whom he was most anxious was Edgworth Bess.

He could not imagine where she had betaken herself, or into whose hands she had fallen.

Little did he think they were those of Colonel Thorne.

Little did he think that by apparently neglecting his own interests, he should be forwarding them to the utmost.

But so it is with vain predestinated human beings, unable to see that which is of most importance to them, and frequently groping darkly in the opposite direction to that which they should have taken.

The grand aim of Jonathan's life now was, by one bold stroke, to secure at the same time both wealth and revenge, the two things human beings most toil after, and most of whom are satisfied with the gratification of one.

Wild was growing tired of the life he was, and had been for so many years, leading.

Not only that, but so far he had trod upon dangerous ground with perfect safety.

How much longer he would continue to do so was more than he or any one else could precisely calculate.

Up to the present time he had made himself a kind of reputation, and his dark deeds were only known to few.

He was exceedingly desirous not to outlive this reputation, dubious as it may be deemed.

Lord Donnull—who, at his suggestion, had sought oblivion of remorse in change of scene—he considered to be utterly in his power.

He held the broad acres and treasures of the Donnulls, of which he had so unjustly taken possession, at his good will only.

Whenever it should suit him, nothing would be easier than to oust him from them.

But he did not want to do this until he could step into them himself.

Yes, this was the bold and audacious scheme which the notorious thief-taker had conceived, and resolved to carry out.

The means he thought were easy.

Many would have deemed them difficult.

More considered them insuperable.

Edgworth Bess was unquestionably the rightful heir.

There would be little or no difficulty in proving her identity.

He believed that he could even compel Lord Donnull to acknowledge her.

Should he do so, that would be sufficient.

What further proof could be demanded or required?

Surely none.

All, therefore, that remained for him to do was to get Edgworth Bess into his sole possession.

Then, either by threats or persuasions, cause her to become his wife.

The latter would be the most preferable and comfortable course, could it be accomplished.

But there was the difficulty.

Edgworth Bess was determined.

She was not one to be easily intimidated into any course, if she saw she was going against her own interests and inclination.

A woman, however, Jonathan considered he was more than a match for.

All he wanted was to obtain a husband's right over her. Then she could go where and do what she pleased.

She was not in her person the object which he sought.

It was her inheritance and riches.

A consideration of these briefly-enumerated circumstances will at once have the effect of convincing the reader that Jonathan's primary object must be to get possession of the poor girl.

Now, with an exercise of that cunning for which he was so remarkable, he had calculated that the quickest manner in which he could find and regain possession of Edgworth Bess would be to release Jack Sheppard from custody, and send some one to follow him, and bring back word where he had met the girl.

We have seen how that little enterprise, cunning as it was, essentially failed for two reasons.

One was that Wilkinson did his duty of spy so badly that Jack detected him.

The other was that Jack had no idea where to find himself.

Since that time, then, Jonathan, although occupied with so many things that demanded immediate attention, had never lost sight, mentally, of Edgworth Bess.

Nor was it likely he should do so, when we consider the boldness of the step he meditated.

He had sent out men in every direction—men upon whom he could rely—to look out for her, but as yet none of them had gathered any intelligence.

But while this was going on, he must not suffer his own interests and fame to be neglected.

As in some great display of fireworks, the grandest effort of pyrotechnic skill is reserved to the last, so did Jonathan wish to accomplish some mighty deed before he carried out his intention of retiring from public life.

The apprehension and annihilation of Captain Howlet and his band, he thought, would be the most striking act he could perform, and he determined it should be the closing one of his life.

Crumpling up the unfortunate letter he had received in so extraordinary a manner, Jonathan put on his hat and left the office.

He stopped in the hall.

"Quilt!" he yelled, "Quilt!" for, since the defection of Blueskin, that worthy had been inducted into the duties of lieutenant in the thief-taker's household and affairs.

"Yes, Mr. Wild. Here I am, sir."

"Send some one for a hackney-coach."

"Yes, sir. Shall I open the door? An empty one will be sure to pass the door in a moment."

"No, send some one."

"Very good, sir."

"And, Quilt."

"Yes, Mr. Wild."

"I am going out upon a long expedition, and I want to leave you in charge of the house."

"Yes, sir. Oh! yes, sir."

"Shut up! I shall want all the men I have got, and about a dozen extra hands; there will be a good reward to share amongst them."

"When must they be ready, Mr. Wild?"

"In two hours at the latest. I shall be back by then, and as soon as I return they must start."

"I'll see to all being ready by that time, Mr. Wild."

"Get on, then, and call a hackney-coach. Stop, all the men must be mounted on good strong horses."

"I know, sir."

"Fetch the coach, then."

Having given these orders to his subordinate, Jonathan made his way to the upper portion of his mansion, where he bestowed some little pains and attention upon his toilette.

By the time he had finished, the hackney-coach was at the door.

"Where to, Mr. Wild?" asked the driver, as soon as Jonathan made his appearance. "Where to, sir?"

"Secretary of State's!" growled the thief-taker.

As he spoke the words, he entered the cumbrous, crazy vehicle, the door of which was officiously held open by Quilt, and as officiously closed after him when he had taken his seat.

The driver flogged his tottering cattle, and at a shuffling sort of trot they took their way down Newgate-street into the Old Bailey.

The interval occupied by the journey Wild employed in maturing his plans.

What they were will be best seen when he puts them into execution.

The office of the Secretary of State was at last reached, and Jonathan alighted.

The mere mention of his name was sufficient to procure him an interview with that high official personage.

To him Wild briefly recounted the intelligence which had come into his possession, and then asked for assistance.

"So complete is my information," said Wild, "that I hold him powerless within my grasp, and I shall capture him and the whole of his atrocious band without difficulty."

"You are a wonderful man, Mr. Wild."

"I try to do my duty as an officer and a faithful subject," replied the thief-taker, hypocritically, "and it delights me to find that my efforts are so highly appreciated by so discriminating a person as yourself."

Jonathan bowed deeply as he uttered these ambiguous compliments.

"I find," said the Secretary, after referring to memoranda before him, that the rewards offered for the capture or destruction of this formidable pirate and his band are very considerable. In addition to the five hundred pounds offered by the government, I find there are rewards offered by private persons, the aggregate amount of which is three hundred pounds; so if you succeed, it will be a good thing for you, Mr. Wild."

"It is not so much the reward," said Wild, as he prepared to take his departure, "for that will be equally divided among the men; but I desire to be of benefit to the community at large. Good day, my lord; I have your full permission to take whatever steps I may consider best suited to accomplish the end in view."

"You have, Mr. Wild," replied the Secretary.

CHAPTER CXLIII.

JONATHAN WILD REACHES THE ENTRANCE TO THE PIRATES' CAVERN IN THE CLIFF.

UPON leaving the Secretary of State, Jonathan Wild made the best of his way to Newgate-street.

When he arrived, although the time he had been absent was considerably under two hours, he found the men waiting for him.

This, in combination with his success with the Secretary, put him into good humour.

There were thirty men at least, all powerful, well-armed fellows, and mounted upon strong, serviceable steeds, which, while they could endure a vast amount of fatigue, yet would get over the ground at a very creditable rate.

One was waiting for Jonathan himself.

But before he mounted, he ran into his house, and hooked to his side a huge hanger, the largest size, indeed, ever manufactured, and stuffed his pockets with pistols.

Nor did he omit to take with him a plentiful supply of ammunition.

His hat, too, he threw off, and substituted another, which was curiously and cleverly supported with bands of iron, which combined all the advantages a helmet could have, without the inconvenience of the great weight.

As he sallied forth from his house, thus fully armed and accounted, he looked a very formidable individual indeed.

Vaulting into the saddle with greater agility than any one, seeing his bulky and unwieldy form, could have imagined, he gave the orders for his men to follow.

With something like a feeling of exultation at his heart, and pride to see himself at the head of so large and so well-armed a troop, Jonathan trotted off.

It was the dinner hour, and the streets were thronged with foot passengers, who turned to gaze after the thief-taker and his troop with something akin to admiration.

But curiosity was the most predominant feeling, for at that time Jonathan Wild's face was as well known as the dome of St. Paul's is to-day.

They guessed in a moment that it was an enterprise of more than an every day character which took him abroad with so strong a body guard, and many ran along upon the footpaths to see which way he was going.

But none exactly suspected his destination, or else the popular excitement would have been immense.

Soon, then, he distanced all of these, and gained the broad and well-kept Dover-road, then a much busier thoroughfare than it is at the present time, when the railway conveys persons to the town, through which it passes, and likewise to the continent.

But when Jonathan lived, the most rapid mode of transit was by means of a post-chaise; and in general the journey was performed by stage-coach.

So, as he went, he attracted a good deal of attention.

To relate minutely their progress from London to Dover would be uninteresting, since nothing of an unusual character occurred to diversify it.

Midnight had passed when they arrived.

They had made very few halts on the way, and the men were horribly fatigued.

As for the horses, they were completely knocked up; and had Dover been a couple of miles further, they would never have reached it.

Certainly Jonathan himself could not help feeling tired, as the rest did; but the hard riding did not take so much effect upon his iron frame as it did upon some of his followers.

He allowed them but a short interval for rest and refreshment.

In the mean time he made his way to the sea-shore, and hired two large eight-oared boats, which would conveniently contain himself and his men.

From this it will be seen that he contemplated making his attack upon the pirates that very night—or rather morning.

And he just saved himself by so doing.

When he had completed this business of hiring the boats, and given particular instructions for their being in readiness at the time he required, he made his way back to the inn where he had lodged his men.

This was the only rest they got.

He instructed them all to look to their weapons, and set them the example of so doing.

This done, he marshalled them down to the sea-beach at once.

The boats were there in readiness.

It was not until this moment that Wild remembered what Hawkins had said about the necessity of bringing a ladder with him.

But it was not too late to repair the omission, so he immediately sent off four of his men to borrow two in the king's name.

While they were gone, he occupied the time by placing the other men in the boats, and giving them more detailed instructions as to what they were severally to do when they reached their destination.

He had not to wait long after he had finished his instructions for the return of the men he had sent for the ladders.

They had succeeded in obtaining two, which were long and strong, and admirably adapted for the purpose for which they were intended.

One was placed in each boat, and then the order was given to push off.

This was done.

Jonathan, with a night-glass in his hand, stood at the prow of the foremost boat, directing them which course they were to take.

The men in the boat, however, knew perfectly well which was the cliff Jonathan meant when he told them it was the one upon which the residence of Colonel Thorne was situated.

The distance they had to go was not very great, but owing to the swell of the tide it took them rather a long time to reach it.

They did not dare to hug the land too close, for fear they should be dashed upon the rocks, to which they were close.

"That is the cliff, sir," said the man in the boat, who seemed to be in some kind of command over his companions.

"Row towards it, then," cried Wild, as he again carried the telescope to his eye, in the hope that he should be able to distinguish the "crack" of which Hawkins had spoken.

But they had gone too far out from the land for it to be visible in the darkness.

Their course, however, was now direct for the cliff.

With feverish impatience, which every moment deepened in intensity, Wild looked out for the fissure.

He was, to a certain extent, in doubt whether the information which had been forwarded to him was correct.

But upon the reader's mind there can be no such doubt.

Already they knew how Hawkins, by a slight carelessness, had been discovered, and how promptly his treachery had been punished.

His life had paid the penalty.

Of all this, it must not be forgotten, Jonathan was perfect ignorance, as well as of the presence of Edgeworth in the cavern.

The latter is a little surprise in store for him.

And here let us take the occasion to remark that, let Jonathan Wild's faults, and failings, and shortcomings have been what they may, want of personal courage was not one of them.

Indeed, it is questionable if there ever did exist a person who cared so little for hard knocks as he did.

And there were fewer still who received more and survived.

In the present instance not one thought of the amount of danger he might personally incur ever occurred to him.

Or, if so, he did not regard it, nor did it influence his conduct in any way.

It is always pleasing to find, in the character of such a bold, bad man as Jonathan Wild, one redeeming quality.

And, indeed, it may safely be asserted, that since the creation no person has ever existed, be he whom he may, who has been wholly and utterly bad.

In every case it will be found that there is something as a set off against the darker shades of character.

To resume.

As they approached the cliffs, we have said the anxiety of Wild increased to a very great degree.

But it was some assurance to him when the boatman stated that there were several clefts in the cliffs such as he had described.

Jonathan trusted to his own acuteness to discover which was the right one.

Very soon now, however, the eyes of Jonathan Wild were gratified by perceiving, in the dead white surface of the cliff, three or four patches of black.

Which one he should select was rather difficult to determine.

He had no time to lose.

He had recourse to the boatman.

"Which fissure," he said, "is the largest?"

"There's not much difference in any of them."

But Jonathan was not foiled yet.

"Do you know if there is one somewhere about just under the house?"

"Well, yes, there is. You see those three yonder."

"Plainly."

"Then it's the middlemost."

"Steer for that, then. I shall soon discover whether it is the one I require. If not, we must try the others till we find it."

"Ay, ay, sir."

The direction of the boats was now slightly altered, and not many moments afterwards the foremost one shot into the little cavern, if such it could be called.

Several of Wild's own men had provided themselves with dark lanterns.

By Jonathan's instructions they were now lighted.

Taking one in his own hand, he flashed it cautiously about him.

So far as he could tell, the place exactly accorded with the description he had received of it from the spy Hawkins.

But the top was too high for him to see whether the door was there or not, for the tide was three parts out.

He had one of the ladders raised, however.

The bottom part of it stuck firmly in the sand.

Then taking a lantern in one hand, and carrying a pistol in the other, he ascended it.

All the rest looked on in the deepest interest and suspense.

When near the top, Jonathan saw the cunningly contrived door, of which Hawkins had spoken.

He signalled to his men to raise the other ladder and follow him.

They instantly obeyed.

CHAPTER CXLIV.

JOHN ROOTS RAISES AN ALARM, AND IS SEEN ON THE STAIRCASE BY MATTHEW FLAOD.

WE last left Jack Sheppard, and the two men who had accepted him as a leader, in rather a ticklish situation.

It will be remembered that they had successfully made a burglarious entry into the house of John Roots, the apothecary.

Instigated by his companions, and urged on by the demon of revenge, Jack Sheppard had consented to rob his master.

From the circumstances already given, he knew he would be able to secure the whole of his master's worldly wealth.

By so doing he should ruin him.

Reduce him to beggary.

When that was the case, Jack felt that he could rest satisfied, and cry quits with him.

The stairs had been ascended.

The door leading into the carpenter's bed-room had been reached.

Success had attended them in the carrying out of their exploit so far.

Blewitt, in obedience to a motion of Jack Sheppard's hand, had taken from his pocket a bunch of skeleton keys.

One of these he had carefully selected.

Then gently inserted it in the lock.

It was a moment of anxious suspense when he, with equal gentleness, turned it round.

The lock, which was of the commonest description, yielded.

But, despite all the care and all the dexterity he could use, Blewitt could not prevent the slight noise which the bolt made as it flew back when released from the spring.

Snap!

In the intense silence which prevailed, it sounded as loud and as distinct as the report of a pistol.

But Blewitt had sufficient presence of mind to retain his hold upon the key.

Previous experience had taught him the expediency of this.

He knew that doors sometimes creaked open slightly, if not held by the hand.

But this he effectually prevented.

For full five minutes neither moved in the least.

All listened with an eagerness which cannot be conceived.

But no alarm seemed to have been raised.

Blewitt then ventured to open the door.

And in doing this he acted in a manner that would hardly have been expected.

He threw it wide open at once, with the greatest swiftness, taking care that it did not strike against any article of furniture.

The result of this was that the door was opened noiselessly.

Now, any one who likes to try the experiment can do so.

If a door is pushed open slowly and gently, the hinges will creak with a prolonged sound.

But if the door is thrown open in the manner we have described, the hinges will move noiselessly.

With all these little facts, so necessary to be known upon such enterprises as that which he had in hand, Blewitt was well acquainted.

When the door was open, he paused and listened.

The deep and regular sound of a person or persons sleeping came to his ears.

The carpenter, then, had not yet been disturbed.

He beckoned to his two companions.

They advanced.

Noiselessly then all three crept into the bedroom.

But they did not venture to take the candle in with them.

Its beams, unshaded as they were, would, they feared, awaken the sleeper.

So they stuck it upon the railing of the balusters on the landing.

Enough light from it streamed into the chamber to enable them to see what they were about.

Jack now, from the superior knowledge of the place which he possessed, took the lead.

The others followed, in readiness to render him any assistance he required.

And now, evilly-disposed as Jack Sheppard by nature unquestionably was, yet he would not allow himself to be led into murdering the carpenter, though his companions would not for a moment have shrunk from the perpetration of such a crime.

[JONATHAN WILD REACHES NEWGATE-STREET IN SAFETY WITH HIS PRISONER.]

All he intended or desired was to be revenged upon him in such a way as should bring about his ruin.

With a warped judgment, he argued that his master had ruined his life, and, therefore, it was no more than fair that he should do the same thing for him.

As, however, with cautious and silent tread, he stole across the room, something of a better feeling came over his heart.

He felt that, could he have retreated, he would have done so, leaving his purpose unachieved.

But that was not to be thought of.

The men he had with him effectually put an end to the idea.

That, during the brief interval it took him to cross the room, Jack knew to the full, the meaning of repentance, cannot be denied.

But he shook off the feeling.

Nerving himself to carry out the desperate enterprise

he had undertaken, and banishing from his mind all promptings of good, he paused by the bedside of his master.

It was a large old-fashioned bedstead, and entirely surrounded by thick curtains, so that no glimpse of the bed itself, or of its occupants could be obtained.

But the regular breathing of some person in deep slumber could be distinctly heard.

Jack made a sign with his hand to his two companions, which they immediately understood.

They sank down upon their knees, and raised the valance round the bed.

Jack had already informed them that the box containing the money was to be found there.

They crept under, therefore, in quest of it.

Nor were they disappointed in their search.

Soon they encountered something large and cold, which a touch told them was what they sought.

Gradually they applied a little pressure to it, forcing it along the floor.

The weight was enormous, and they moved it with great difficulty.

They could not avoid, too, despite the great care they took, an occasional creak, or grating sound, as they pushed it over the boards.

When this happened, they stopped and began again with greater caution than before.

A great deal of time was consumed thus, but it was unavoidable. Haste would have produced noise—and noise, detection.

At length, however, by pushing it inch by inch, they got to the edge of the bed.

As is common in many sleeping apartments, there was a strip of carpet all round the bed, and when they succeeded in getting the box upon that they were more at ease.

While this was taking place, Jack Sheppard stood at the head of the bed.

In his hand was a pistol.

He held it in an attitude to do immediate execution, in case any alarm should be given.

But the old carpenter slept soundly. He was stout and of a somnolent disposition.

They might almost have made thrice the noise they did without fearing that it would disturb him.

When the box was fairly clear of the bed, it could be seen that it was made of some dark-coloured wood, and heavily banded with iron.

The days for such things are over now. They are only to be seen at the old curiosity shops occasionally. As the iron safe came into use, so did they grow obsolete.

The former now is universally used as the depository of valuable property of all kinds, and to such a degree of perfection has their manufacture been carried, that not only is all attempt at opening one made impossible, but also by their peculiar construction they are capable of preserving documents uninjured, even though exposed to the fiercest heat.

The box was not of any great dimensions, though it was weighty.

It had every appearance of being secure.

To have tried to open it there would, the housebreakers thought, be incurring too much risk, so mustering all their strength, Flood and Blewitt lifted it up by the ends, and staggered out on to the landing with it.

They placed it down silently at the head of the stairs.

Jack now felt that he could leave his post.

Accordingly he followed his comrades from the room.

The door he closed after him, in order to prevent, as much as possible, the transmission of any sound which might be made by opening the box.

The candle now rendered them effectual assistance.

Blewitt stooped down, and made a thorough but rapid examination of the manner in which the box was fastened.

At the end of his scrutiny he gave a nod, which seemed to imply that he should be able to manage it.

He again had recourse to the bunch of skeleton keys, which had already been of such assistance to him, in opening the door of the bed room.

In addition to the keys, there were upon the ring a variety of small, bright, curiously-shaped implements.

They all differed materially from one another in some way.

These were picklocks.

In the hands of a skilful man, and one accustomed to their use, they were formidable instruments, and such as a great deal might be accomplished with.

Carefully selecting one of the picklocks, Blewitt commenced an attack upon the lock of the box with it.

Using no force whatever, but just gently moving it about, he, after a great deal of trouble, managed to get the lock back.

But, upon trial, the lid was found to be as secure as ever.

It would not move in the least.

There were no other locks visible either.

Jack could give no explanation.

What was the meaning of this for a moment baffled all.

Then the thought occurred to Blewitt that the chest might have been double locked, and that he had only shot the bolt back half the distance.

CHAPTER CXLV.

JACK SHEPPARD AND HIS COMPANIONS EMPTY THE STRONG BOX, BUT DO NOT SUCCEED IN GETTING OFF WITH THEIR BOOTY.

To immediately set about ascertaining whether this was the reason the lid of the chest could not be raised, was Blewitt's first impulse.

He again introduced the pick into the lock, and was rewarded by hearing a second snap, like the first, but rather louder.

Impatiently, for he was alarmed at so much delay, Jack took hold of the lid.

This time it came up readily enough.

All looked eagerly for the contents, but they were hidden from view by a covering of some kind of skin.

This, however, was quickly thrown off, and underneath it appeared a variety of valuable articles.

But the chest, which was about half full, contained chiefly a number of small bags, very carefully tied up.

That they contained coin was apparent at a glance.

The peculiar shape, and, in some places, the round edges of the money projecting through the canvas, made it impossible for them to be mistaken.

"Now," whispered Jack, "never mind anything but the bags. All contain money—some gold, and some silver! Fill your pockets with them, and let us be off. We have been here sadly too long already."

The two men made no reply to this speech, save at once doing their leader's bidding.

The bags disappeared one after another with extraordinary rapidity.

Jack himself took a share.

All three wore those coats which form so characteristic a portion of the costume of the period.

They were made with large skirts and enormous pockets, the capaciousness of which seemed to have no limit.

Now those in particular which Flood and Blewitt had on were made with an especial view to transporting a multitude of objects.

Between them, they were able to empty the box of every bag which it contained.

All that was left were some antique pieces of silver of no great intrinsic value, and which, in consequence, it was not worth while to encumber themselves with.

Specie, too, could not be identified, and these articles would leave a trace which, followed up, might lead to their detection.

"Now," said Jack, in a low whisper, when the last bag of money had been removed, "let us be off; we have been safe so far, and do not let us go into any danger needlessly."

"All right, Jack," said Flood; "but stop a moment."

"What for?"

"Didn't you say the old man was your governor?"

"I will tell you that history another time."

"All right; that is not what I meant."

"Go on, then."

"Stop, now, and hear what I have to say. There's no harm in that."

"Perhaps not; only we are losing precious moments."

"Pho, pho! that's all right enough."

"But what do you want?"

"Didn't he treat you very badly?"

"Who?"

"The old man."

"John Roots?"

"Yes."

"He did ill-treat me; he forced me away from this house, where otherwise I should have been at this moment. But my father swung at Tyburn through Jonathan Wild's devilry, and he always flung it in my face, until at last I got almost mad."

Jack spoke rapidly.

He spoke, too, excitedly, and, in the oblivion of the moment, raised his voice louder than was prudent.

But the circumstance was unnoticed by him.

"I thought that was it," said Flood.

"What do you mean?"

"Oh! nothing; only"—

"Only what?"

"Why, if any one had served me as John Roots has served you"—

"What?"

"I shouldn't have taken it so easy as, you have, that's all."

"How have I taken it?"

"Why, easy."

"If I have, I have made up for it now. He is a beggar. I shall ruin him—ruin him, even as he has ruined me."

"That remains to be seen, Jack. We have got a good swag, that's certain."

"We have, and, therefore, let us get off with it in safety."

"Where's the danger? If there had been any, we should have found it before now."

"Do not be too confident, Flood. Follow me. You are too much elated at our success, and you forget the absolute necessity there is for caution."

"No, I don't; but if you go away from here without settling the old man, I shall consider the job as only half done."

"Would you have me murder him as he sleeps?" asked Jack, in a tone of horror. "No! bad I may be, but I am not bad enough for that."

"Well, as you like; but I tell you, if anybody served me so, I should not sleep while he lived."

"No," said Jack. "Let us depart. I am satisfied with what I have done, and such being the case, surely you ought to be."

"Oh! I am satisfied, Jack; but don't you be chicken-hearted. You are a brave, likely young fellow, and I say, death to the man that's against you!"

"Enough, enough, Flood. Descend, descend."

But Matthew Flood stood obstinately at the top of the staircase, and Jack was afraid to make any attempt to pass him, lest a struggle should ensue, and an alarm be raised.

"Look here, Jack. I say, death to the man that's against you!"

"You are mad!"

"Not a bit of it."

"But you are."

"I say I ain't, and not only that, if you don't like the idea of stopping the old man's breath yourself, I'll do it for you!"

"No—no," said Jack, "I don't desire his death. I tell you I am already satisfied. Descend, I say, and let us make the best of our way from the spot, for I have no desire to be recognised."

"Oh! well—well! Have your own way. But if you go away and leave the job as it is, I shan't think half so well of you as what I have done."

"That I cannot help," said Jack, firmly, for his patience was almost exhausted. "But I have never committed murder yet, and I shall try to keep my hands free from the crime!"

"Pish!"

"Descend! Descend, I say, and do not by your folly imperil us any longer. I tell you I will not take John Roots' life, nor will I suffer you to take it, until you have taken mine first."

"Oh! very well—very well! If that's your game, I give in at once. Come on!"

So saying, Flood began to descend the stairs.

Jack Sheppard and Blewitt, who had kept perfectly silent during the rapid conversation which had taken place, followed.

He had not taken the part of either, for he every moment expected that an open quarrel would result.

He knew, from former experience, the obstinate nature of Flood's disposition.

He knew that when he once took an idea into his head, there was the greatest conceivable difficulty in turning him.

But on this occasion, though it was most reluctantly, he had given way.

Bitterly indeed did he live to repent his folly.

The moments that they spent in this profitless discourse upon the landing, should have been used in getting clear of the premises.

The conversation had been carried on rapidly, and it had taken up but a very small quantity of time indeed; but then a moment is enough to decide the destinies of nations.

More than once during the brief dispute, the voices of both parties had risen to a higher tone than was consonant with safety.

And once, when Jack spoke so excitedly, the familiar sounds had penetrated the chamber of John Roots.

He woke.

He heard the murmuring of voices.

The idea of thieves at once entered his mind.

But he was, for a moment or two, too frightened to move hand or foot.

Then he recovered himself.

He sprang out of bed.

The voices had ceased.

The interior of the room, from so long having been an inmate of it, was very familiar to him, and, therefore, he was able, without trouble or delay, to make his way to the door.

He tried it.

To his horror, it was unlocked!

Dreading the worst, and driven almost mad by the idea that his house had been broken into, he, without a thought of what danger he might be incurring, flung the door open, and dashed out upon the landing.

The candle on the balusters was still burning.

It showed him his box—the precious chest in which his whole worldly wealth was deposited—lying open at his feet, and despoiled of its most valuable contents.

A shout—an irrepressible shout—came from his lips when he saw it.

He fancied he heard a noise upon the stairs.

Still heedless of his danger, and thinking only of the frightful and irreparable loss he had sustained, urged on by a wild and insane hope of getting some portion of it back again, he began to descend.

When he reached the angle where the stairs formed a kind of supplemental landing-place, he caught sight of three figures.

The moment he did so, he shouted at the top of his voice—

"Murder! thieves! Help, help! Thieves! murder! Police! Help! he!"

The word was arrested on his lips.

There was a bright flash and a report, succeeded by a groan.

Flood had fired.

He hit his mark, too, for the carpenter fell headlong down the remainder of the staircase.

CHAPTER CXLVI.

GIVES AN ACCOUNT OF BLUESKIN'S PROCEEDINGS AFTER HIS ESCAPE FROM THE MURDER DEN ON THE RIVER SIDE.

THAT necessity, which the proverb says knows no law, compels us most reluctantly to leave Jack Sheppard in his present very perilous situation, while we relate some other events which were occurring at the same time, and with which the reader must be made acquainted without delay.

When Blueskin had the good luck to escape with his life from the horrible den he had so unwittingly entered, he had turned his face towards the river, with the expressed determination of finding out Jack Sheppard.

He turned towards the river for that purpose.

But ere he had got very far, the deadly sensation of weakness, which excitement had enabled him to overcome, now forced itself upon him.

His brain reeled.

His feet gave way beneath him, and he would have sunk to the ground had he not supported himself by clinging against the angle of a building.

Here he steadied himself, and to some extent recovered the use of his faculties.

The reader will remember that he had received a rather ghastly sort of wound from Wild's pistol when he rose to the surface of the Thames, near the buttress of Blackfriars-bridge.

This had bled profusely, though, of course, the cold water in which he had been so long immersed checked it to a great extent.

Still, the quantity of blood he had lost was enough to reduce any one to the utmost stage of exhaustion, without taking into account the immense exertion he had been compelled to make.

Indeed, when he sought shelter in the murder den, it will be recollected that he was just conscious he was doing something, and that was all.

The rest he had had, though brief, had in a considerable degree recuperated him, and so, when the cowardly attempt to murder him was made, he was endowed with a return of his former strength.

But it was evanescent, lasting only long enough for him to secure his safety, and then departing, leaving him weaker than before.

It was now getting into the busy part of the day, and many who passed by—for the streets were thronging with people—looked upon him with curiosity, but nothing more.

It is ever so in London. Those who walk much about its myriad streets must have noticed so obtrusive a fact, and a hundred and fifty years ago, when Blueskin lived, it was just the same.

When they saw the dirty and bedraggled condition he was in, and saw his apparel stained in many places with blood, those who had felt an inclination to help him turned away, leaving him to his fate—to live or perish as he chose.

In a little while, however, thanks to the vigorous constitution he possessed, Blueskin got so far better as to be able to stand without holding by the wall.

Then, in a devious, tottering fashion, he made his way down the street.

What the name of it was he had no idea, but after proceeding a few steps, he found it led into a wider and busier thoroughfare.

Sad indeed would have been his fate had he at that moment encountered his arch enemy, Jonathan Wild.

The thief-taker would not have scrupled to take his life, defenceless as he was, for he wished above all things to be rid of him.

Blueskin staggered on.

The people gave way, right and left, before him, allowing him a clear passage.

Suddenly there passed across Blueskin's imperfect vision the bottles of variegated hues which adorn the windows of chemists' shops.

The thought struck him that he would enter here, and get his hurts properly washed and dressed.

Money he had in his pockets in plenty, and he knew well enough that the mere sight of it would procure him every attention.

He entered the shop.

A boy of a very diminutive species, and with a look of precocious intelligence upon his countenance which was really painful to witness, stood behind the counter.

He looked rather alarmed when he saw Blueskin come in, though he was accustomed to have visits from rather rough-looking customers.

But Blueskin was in a terrible plight, and his appearance was ghastly in the extreme.

In a spasmodic sort of way the boy managed to gasp out—

"Shop!"

In reply to this call, there came into the shop, from a very dirty parlour behind it, a stout, middle-aged man, whose countenance wore a pleasing expression of kindness.

As well as he could, Blueskin, in reply to his inquiries, made him aware of what he required.

He accompanied it with the promise of paying well for what was done.

Accordingly, the chemist led Blueskin into the little dingy parlour which we have incidentally mentioned, and there proceeded to make an examination of the nature of his hurts.

But until he called for a basin of hot water and a sponge, and cleared the coagulated blood from the orifice of the wound, he could not tell much about them.

Then was revealed a long gash or furrow in his shoulder which the bullet had made.

Fortunately, when it struck him it did not lodge anywhere, but just encountering the shoulder-bone, glanced off it, and ploughed up the flesh several inches in the direction of his neck.

This, while it looked a formidable affair, really was not so, but the chemist said—

"Really, my dear sir, you are in a very bad state indeed. I am sure I don't know what I shall do for you. You require to have your wounds carefully dressed in the first place, and then rest and strengthening medicines in the second."

"The first I may have," replied Blueskin, "but the second is quite out of the question. Dress my wounds as well as you are able."

Thus commanded, the chemist set about his rather unpleasant task.

We must do him the justice to say that he performed it in a very creditable manner.

When he had finished, Blueskin was quite overcome.

Perceiving it, the chemist gave him permission to stay where he was for a few hours.

Of this Blueskin took immediate advantage, thanking him as he did so.

A few hours' quiet rest, and a couple of doses of medicine, which the chemist mixed up, as well as some strengthening food, made a most wonderful difference.

By dusk he was quite another man.

Unquestionably it would have been best for him to have persevered in his present course of treatment, but his impatience to know Jack's fate, and that also of his master's child, Edgworth Bess, made it impossible for him to do so.

Giving the chemist five guineas for his trouble and attention, he left the shop.

Upon going outside, he found himself in Union-street, Southwark.

He knew, of course, in a moment, which way to take, now that his head and mind were clear.

He directed his steps to London-bridge, intending to get that way to Newgate-street, and make some inquiries there.

He looked out for a hackney-coach for some time, but unsuccessfully.

But he walked on until he reached the Borough, where he made sure he should see one pass.

As it so happened, however, not one was in sight.

While standing and looking, he was startled by a voice at his elbow.

"Any cloesh, sir?—any cloesh? Here's shome that will just shuit you. Very sheap, too. Valk in, sir. Valk in."

Blueskin turned round before half this speech, which was spoken with extreme volubility, was uttered, and saw standing near him, in a deferential attitude, an old Jew clothes' salesman.

A flaring oil-lamp from the shop, which was the corner one, sent a flickering light upon the pavement, and by the aid of this, Blueskin looked down at his apparel, and perceiving the shocking condition he was in, did not hesitate to accept the man's proposal.

From a large assortment he selected a suit of clothes, such as he considered would best suit him.

These were quite of an ordinary kind, and such as would be worn by almost any one in the middle rank of life.

He changed his own for these, and paid the difference.

He made some improvements in his toilet, and gave himself a good washing, so that when he emerged from the clothier's he looked quite a reputable character.

There was only one thing he now required to complete the metamorphosis, and that was the services of a barber.

In London one has not far to go to find one of these shops, so without hesitation he went into the first to which he came.

In addition to being shaved—and in this latter operation he had all vestige of beard, mustache, and whisker removed from his face—he had his hair cut.

Scarcely any one would have believed that a few simple changes like these would have made the difference they did.

He now looked a gentleman.

Leaving the barber's shop, he walked to the kerbstone, and stood there waiting for a hackney-coach to pass him.

While so engaged, a ragged, shrunken, and emaciated object crawled up to him.

"Want a coach, your honour?" he said. "Let me fetch one for you. God bless your honour! I am starving!"

Something in the tone of this man's voice struck Blueskin as being familiar.

Where he had heard them before he could not think for a moment, but all at once he recollected.

With a fierce cry upon his lips, he sprang forward and grasped the poor miserable-looking being by the throat.

CHAPTER CXLVII.

BLUESKIN PLAYS THE PART OF THE GOOD SAMARITAN, AND IS REWARDED FOR SO DOING.

It was Steggs!

That miserable being, who had first of all brought upon poor Edgworth Bess so much woe and persecution.

One glance made Blueskin quite sure of his identity.

But since he saw him last a great change in his appearance had taken place.

Does the reader recollect that last occasion?

It is not actually so far back in time, but during that interval a multitude of incidents had taken place.

For this reason it may have been forgotten.

The last time, then, that Blueskin saw him was when, after his recovery at the abbey ruins from the wound Jonathan had given him, he had disguised himself, and in the most daring manner possible forced a way into Jonathan Wild's house.

He did this because he was impressed with the idea that in the cells, the situation of which, beneath the thief-taker's abode, he knew so well, he should find Jack Sheppard and Edgworth Bess.

As we have shown, he arrived there just a little too late.

Both those whom he sought had been there, but, by a strange concatenation of events, had been set free.

But on opening the cell doors in his fruitless search, he came to the one in which Jonathan had incarcerated Steggs.

That individual came forth.

He was then in a frightful state of emaciation, for the thief-taker never troubled himself much about supplying his prisoners with the necessaries of life.

Well disguised as Blueskin was upon that occasion, Steggs did not, of course, recognise him.

But Blueskin knew him, and an angry feeling welled up in his mind, but he stifled his resentment, for he felt that that was anything but a fitting time for its display.

How Blueskin and Steggs and the other prisoner, whom the former had released from the cells, succeeded in effecting their escape from Wild's house, has already been related to the reader.

On reaching the street, Blueskin had forcibly requested them to separate, and all three had taken different roads.

But from that moment, we have not heard a word respecting Steggs's proceedings.

Blueskin felt a deep-seated animosity against this man.

Was he not an enemy to his master's child?

And so, from the sudden impulse of the moment, when he heard his voice and knew him, he had seized him round the throat with a vice-like grasp.

He relaxed his hold, however, for he did not wish to crush out what life there was in him, and that, to judge by his looks, was very little.

He was in hopes he should be able to extract some information from him respecting those he sought.

Changed, as he was, Steggs did not know Blueskin, and the sudden attack had taken him completely by surprise.

He gasped for breath.

That he was really starving with hunger, the exhausted state of his body fully proved.

"Speak!" said Blueskin, sternly, drawing him aside into the shadow of the houses as he spoke. "Speak, and beware how you trifle with me, or give me a false reply. Speak, I say."

Steggs made a violent effort.

It was plain he wished to answer his interrogator, but it was beyond him.

He tried and failed.

Blueskin noted this.

He saw and felt certain that he was upon the very brink of the grave, and that unless some assistance was promptly rendered him, he would assuredly perish.

Much as he detested the man, and little as he felt inclined to do him a service, still Blueskin was certain that if he wished to obtain any information from him, he must succour him.

"Come," he said, "cheer up! Cross over the road with me to yonder public-house, and you shall have something to eat and drink."

Could Steggs, by any possibility, have commanded his voice to thank them for this offer, he would have done so.

His lips moved convulsively, but gave utterance to no sound.

He made, however, a step forward in advance.

Blueskin took him by the arm, and led him into a public-house nearly opposite the spot upon which they had been standing.

The room was almost deserted, and only partially lighted up, but there was a fire burning in the grate, which diffused both light and warmth.

"What will you have?" asked Blueskin. "Speak freely. You shall have what you desire if you will answer what questions I choose to ask you."

Steggs nodded.

Then, after a violent struggle, he said, in a faint and almost inaudible whisper—

"Brandy."

This, under the circumstances, was not the wisest thing he could have, but Blueskin was not over-solicitous about him, so long as he could give him the information for which he panted.

Accordingly he ordered two glasses of brandy.

No sooner was the fiery beverage set down before Steggs than, with a trembling hand, he grasped the glass and carried it to his lips.

He did not remove it from them until the glass was empty.

Then he fell back upon the seat like one dead.

He recovered himself, however, and, leaning forward so as to rest himself upon the table, he looked Blueskin in the face.

By the look of his countenance, it could be perceived that he possessed some faint recollection of him.

Blueskin watched him in silence for some few moments, and then, as the poor wretch seemed to have regained the use of his faculties, he said—

"Now speak."

"What do you wish to know?" asked Steggs, feebly.

"Who are you?"

"Do not question me," said Blueskin, "but reply at once to what I say."

"I will."

"Beware how you speak falsely."

"I will, kind sir."

"I give you warning, that if you do, you will pay dearly for it."

"But who are you?" asked Steggs again, who, as the brandy began to exert itself upon him, assumed his natural caution.

"That does not matter. I am one whom you have done enough to make a bitter enemy of, but if you will serve me truly, I will forget the past, and make you my friend."

"The past," moaned Steggs. "The past! the past! Would I could recall it. Would I had had the power of looking into the future, how differently I should have acted!"

"Are you sure of that?" asked Blueskin, eagerly.

"Why should you doubt me? Two paths lay open to me. I chose one. Look to what it has brought me."

"I do not understand you, but you seem much better than you did."

"I am hungry; oh! so hungry!"

"Have something to eat, then," said Blueskin, moved by the manner in which he spoke.

He knocked for the waiter, and in a few moments had a plate of bread and meat brought in, which Steggs devoured with the avidity of a famished tiger.

"Now answer me," said Blueskin; "surely I ought to expect something from your hands. Where is Edgworth Bess?"

"Edgworth Bess!"

"Yes—do not repeat my words, but answer me at once."

"I know not; I know not. I have not seen her for a long long time. But tell me, are you a friend of hers?"

"As much her friend as you have been her enemy."

"Have been," cried Steggs, "have been! I bitterly regret the past. Would that I did know where she was, and then I should have an opportunity of making some atonement for that which I have done."

"You repent, then?"

"Most heartily."

"And you know not where she is?"

"I do not. In search of her I have tramped all over London, but not the faintest trace can I find."

Blueskin groaned.

"She is not in Wild's possession," cried Steggs; "I feel almost certain of that. I have watched his house closely, but I have seen nothing to cause suspicion."

"Stay now," said Blueskin; "you are better now."

"Yes, thanks to you, much better."

"Then let us talk over matters a little, and quietly, if we can. In me you see the dearest friend that the poor girl, who is known best as Edgworth Bess, has."

"You, then, are —"

"No matter what; I am called Blueskin."

"Blueskin!" cried Steggs, starting, "then you are one of Jonathan Wild's men?"

"Not so; we are foes. Do you remember some one delivered you from the cells beneath his house?"

"I do. He was a tall and well-dressed gentleman."

Blueskin smiled.

"It was myself. The disguise was one which I had assumed for a particular purpose, but the necessity for which exists no longer. I set you free!"

"Is it possible?"

"Yes; my errand there on that night was to ascertain whether Edgworth Bess and Jack Sheppard —"

"Curse him!"

"Eh?"

"I say curse him!"

"Jack Sheppard?"

"Yes."

"Why?"

"Why, because if it had not been for him and his interference, all would have been well."

"All would have been ill, you mean," cried Blueskin, "for then you and your rascally employer would have triumphed in your villainy."

CHAPTER CXLVIII.

STEGGS AND BLUESKIN MAKE A MUTUAL COMPACT, AND BOTH RESOLVE UPON JONATHAN WILD'S DESTRUCTION.

"FORGIVE me," said Steggs, in a deprecatory, humble manner. "Forgive me. I was carried away just then by my own bad passions, and knew not what I said; but I am one who finds it very hard to put up with a blow or defeat at the hands of any one, and both of these have I experienced at the hands of Jack Sheppard."

"I have been already made acquainted with the history of the past," said Blueskin, "and can understand your breaking out when I mentioned Jack Sheppard, but you will have to look upon him as a friend if you are sincere in your desire to do Edgworth Bess a service."

"That's it. I want, if I possibly can, to make reparation for the wrong I have done her. Whether I shall succeed is more than I can say, but I shall make the attempt."

"The best of us could do no more. Then listen to me, and I will explain that which seems strange to you. I had been attacked by Jonathan Wild, and left for dead. At the same time he captured Jack Sheppard and Edgworth Bess."

"I remember," said Steggs, gloomily. "I remember. It was at an abbey in Gloucestershire."

"It was. I recovered from the terrible wound I had received, and not wishing Jonathan to know that I was still in life, disguised myself in the manner you saw."

"In the cells?"

"Yes. Of course, knowing that both Sheppard and Edgworth Bess had been captured by Wild, I made sure of finding them beneath the cells in his house. So I watched him out, and then made a violent entry into the house, gained the cells, threw open the doors of every one, released you and another, but found not those whom I had come to seek. How we got out, and the rest, you know."

"I do."

"At my command, we separated; and now, having told you so far, explain to me by what chance you became a prisoner. I thought you were friendly to Lord Doumull's interest."

"And so I was."

"Then why were you confined?"

"Cannot you guess?"

"I do not know enough."

"I will tell you, then. Jonathan Wild wished to get his lordship wholly in his power, and was jealous of me."

"I see."

"So he took advantage of me, poisoned the ear of Lord Doumull with false doubts about me, and, in the end, was captured by his myrmidons, and lodged in the gloomy and pestiferous dungeon in which you found me."

"Then you are no friend of Wild's?"

"Friend! Ha! ha! I should like to cut his throat, and I will do it, too; I will do it!"

"Do not excite yourself. You will do yourself a serious injury if you do. It seems to me quite clear that our enemies—and by 'our' I mean myself, Jack Sheppard, and Edgworth Bess—are yours; and so, surely, we ought to work together. But we will leave that for the present. Tell me what became of you after your release."

"I can do so in a very few words, but I ought first to tell you that I have been, in times back, a bad and evil man—loving wickedness for its own sake; so when Williams, who had been an old comrade of mine, sent for me when on his dying bed, and related the story about the heiress of the Doumull estates, which I daresay you know, I promised him that I would do all I could to procure her that of which she had been deprived."

"Instead of which?"

"Instead of which, as soon as I left the chamber of death, I began to turn the matter over in my mind, and consider how I could turn it to the best advantage. My judgment deceived me. I thought the best bargain I could make would be to go to the nobleman who already had possession of the estates, and take part with him. I did so. The result, I need not tell you, for you know it already. I have been justly punished."

"You have," said Blueskin, "but —"

"One moment. I have not said now that which I intended. While in the solitude of the cell in which Jonathan had placed me, I had ample opportunities of thinking over the past. I repented, but repentance came too late. Nevertheless, when you set me free, I was an altered man. From that moment I looked upon Wild as my enemy; as for Lord Doumull, I scarcely consider him, in the state in which I last saw him, worthy of the enmity of any one!"

"He is a villain," said Blueskin, "and has acted like one, and I will take good care he does not escape the penalty due to his deeds."

"But it is Wild," said Steggs, fiercely. "I hate him, and I will have his life! But you see to what I am reduced. When you saw me, I was literally dying of starvation."

"I have saved you, then, and if you are sincere in what you have just said, we shall be friends in future. We ought to both work together."

"Our ends are the same."

"They are. The one purpose of my life is to restore poor Edgworth Bess to her rights, and if you will lend me your assistance, I do not doubt we shall both succeed. As for Jonathan, we have one or two little scores to wipe off."

"Tell me what I can do," said Steggs. "Show me how I can serve you and the heiress, and how I can obtain my revenge upon Wild."

"We must consider the matter over. It is one which cannot be decided upon in a moment. I have myself sworn to bring Jonathan Wild to the scaffold, and I will do it, even though I had to perish with him!"

"I, too, have made the same oath," said Steggs, with increasing energy, "and surely, between the two of us, it will be kept."

"It will on my part. But leave that. Will you swear that you are sincere in all that you have said to me?"

"I swear I am, and if you knew all the particulars of the case, you would not ask the question. No longer will I serve those who require my services in so ungrateful a manner."

"Then, that is sufficient. I will trust you, and I bid you beware how you attempt to play me false!"

"You need not fear."

"I warn you. And now, have you found no clue to the whereabouts of Edgworth Bess?"

"None whatever."

"She escaped from Wild's cells," said Blueskin.

"Are you certain of that?"

"Quite certain. I have the best evidence of it."

"You mean, you have seen her since."

"No; but I had it from the person who set her free!"

"I understand."
 "But in some unaccountable way she disappeared, and since that time I have neither seen nor heard anything of her."

"I cannot think she is in Wild's possession."

"But you have no proof of that?"

"No; I have no proof, but I have watched his actions."

"And the result?"

"I cannot think he either has her at his house, or knows where she is."

"Ah! well. We must see. Jack Sheppard, I am afraid, is an inmate of Newgate."

"Again!"

"Yes, again!"

"How many times will that make?"

"Twice!"

"Then, if I was him, I should beware of the third."

"Pho! pho! Now, take my advice. Rest yourself and recover your strength, as well as you can. I will furnish you with money. You had better stay here, I should think."

"As you will; but in what way am I to assist you?"

"That we must consider."

"I have a plan."

"Have you?"

"Yes!"

"Is it a good one?"

"Yes!"

"Does it stand a fair chance of success?"

"I think so."

"Let me hear it, then."

"It is this."

He spoke a few words in a low tone.

What was their import will presently appear, but we cannot now disclose it.

Blueskin looked grave, and then he said—

"I am afraid it is impossible."

"How so?"

"I know by experience how hard he is to deceive."

"And I," said Steggs, "know my powers of deception! At any rate, if I make the trial, no harm can happen to any one save myself."

"No; that is true."

"Well, then, I think I ought to try it. Should I succeed, you know the advantage it will bring."

"It will."

"And is it not worth while to run a little risk for the accomplishment of so much?"

"It is; and I only hope you will succeed; but you must not think of trying for a day or so, or, at all events, until you have recovered your strength somewhat."

"Leave that to me, Blueskin; I will try my best, for I am with you body and soul, and not only that—I shall be serving your interests, and procuring my own revenge at the same time."

"The latter is a powerful inducement, no doubt. But you must be careful; the scheme, which you propose is a most difficult one indeed, and I am afraid you will find it impossible."

"Still I am willing to run the risk."

"Then you think, I suppose, no one ought to interfere. Should you succeed it will be a great thing for all of us. I shall go now and procure what intelligence I can. Do you in the meantime stay here."

"A little rest will enable me to recover my strength."

"Then employ that time in maturing your bold and daring plan. You ought to consider well before you attempt it."

"I shall do so, never fear. I am not one ready to throw my life away."

"Here is money, then. I may be some hours before I return; but do not you, on any account, stir forth. Let me feel sure of finding you here."

"You can rely upon me."

"I will leave you, then," said Blueskin, and as he spoke he set out upon his difficult errand.

CHAPTER CXLIX.

JONATHAN WILD ATTACKS THE PIRATES IN "THE SECRET HAUNT," AND ACHIEVES A VICTORY.

JONATHAN WILD could not subdue a certain amount of very natural excitement which he felt upon seeing the door in the rocks which led to the pirates' cave.

He signalled to his men.

Some portion of his excitement seemed to have communicated itself to them, for they obeyed with unusual promptitude.

The second ladder was raised.

It was fixed in a similar manner to the first, and placed close beside it.

The men rushed up both with eager impetuosity.

The ladders, of course, were very soon quite full, and they would only hold a small portion of the men.

When all was in readiness, Jonathan prepared to give the word to demolish the door.

This they were told to do at one blow, if possible, and then they were to rush into the cavern as quickly as they could, and wait just inside the entrance until they had been joined by all their companions.

But just as he was about to do this, a slight rumbling noise was heard overhead.

He held up his hand for all to be silent.

They listened rather anxiously to know what was going to happen.

All put themselves in a posture of defence.

The next sound they heard, and which followed closely upon the other, was one to which they were all familiarized.

Some one was unfastening a door.

That door was the one through which they wished to pass.

Was it possible that they had arrived at the very moment when the pirates were about to leave their abiding place?

It might be so.

Or was it Hawkins, who, from some place or other, had observed their approach, and opened the door to facilitate their entrance?

Jonathan thought the latter the more probable supposition of the two.

But for once he was mistaken.

He was not, however, in possession of one little fact which the reader is.

Hawkins, who had so cleverly joined the pirate band, and hit upon so clever a means of conveying the requisite intelligence to Wild, had been detected in his treachery, and his life had paid the forfeit.

At that very moment, instead of busying himself about Jonathan and his affairs, he was lying cold and still in the rudely-hollowed grave, into which, by the commands of Captain Howlet, he had been cast when he was cut down.

And now the reader will please carry back his recollection to that scene in the cavern, when Edgworth Bess having with so much courage and difficulty made her escape from her chaumber, had fallen once more into the arms of the much-dreaded pirate.

Upon making this discovery, the poor persecuted girl ceased to struggle, and lapsed into a strange state of semi-consciousness.

Captain Howlet carried her into the outer cavern.

Then, with apparent suddenness, he gave the order to his men to go on board at once.

In obedience to this command, they had hastily got themselves in readiness, and hurried along the passage which led to the secret door in the rocks.

The captain brought up the rear, and when the extremity was reached, the door was unfastened.

But ere they could open it, a loud voice had cried out in a tone of command, and the door was flung open in their faces.

Then rushed into the cavern a large body of men.

These were Jonathan Wild and his band, who had arrived at this, to them, fortunate juncture.

Had they been a little later, the pirates would have been aboard their fast-sailing vessel, and there all hopes of capturing them would have been at an end.

As it was, he was just in time.

The pirates were taken completely by surprise.

Their ferocious captain was, however, the first to recover himself, and he shouted to his crew to defend themselves.

Before they could obey him, however, Jonathan had succeeded in obtaining a lodgment.

His men swarmed up after him.

The place would have been profoundly dark, had it not been for the dark lanterns which Wild's janizaries had brought with them.

These they unmasked, and held in their left hands. In their right they grasped their swords.

The broad beams of light which passed through the lenses enabled them to see their adversaries distinctly, while they themselves remained invisible, for the bright light, falling on the faces of the pirates, dazzled them, and made them unable to see plainly.

In spite of the commands of their chief, they did not fight with that valiancy which one would have expected from men who had for so long a time succeeded in making themselves a terror to others.

A panic had taken possession of them.

When this is the case it is vain for the commander to hope for victory.

Jonathan's men, on the contrary, animated by the actions of their leader, and encouraged to do their utmost for the reward they would gain, fought with the greatest fury.

The pirates gave ground.

Captain Howlet, with such a feeling of ungovernable rage at his heart as to defy all power of depiction, strove to rally them.

But it was of no avail.

The retrograde movement had been commenced.

They could not stop.

Back—back, foot by foot, they went down the narrow passage leading to the large cavern.

The din of the conflict in that confined space was really terrific.

There were oaths, and cries, and shrieks, and fierce words of command.

Mingled with these were firing of pistols, and the clashing of swords.

Foremost in the fray was Jonathan Wild.

He swung his hanger round his head, and brought it down with a vigour and effect which testified in a very remarkable manner to the immense strength which he possessed.

And here he had the advantage of Captain Howlet.

He led his own men.

This, the latter did not, and could not do, for he held Edgworth Bess in his arms.

So strong was his passion for her, that he took no part in the fight, save by shouting to his men.

He kept in the rear with his prisoner.

Upon reaching the larger cavern, the pirates made a temporary stand.

There was a light here, too, which enabled them to see the numbers and position of their adversaries.

When they saw how nearly equal they were—that indeed their unexpected foes only out-numbered them by five or six—they experienced a momentary return of courage.

They began to grow conscious that they were fighting for their lives.

Finding that the various oil lamps placed about the cavern gave a tolerably bright and steady light, Wild's men threw away the dark lanterns, considering them unnecessary.

But Jonathan himself, happening to look in the direction where Captain Howlet stood, caught sight of a female form.

At that moment she struggled desperately, and uttered an ear-piercing shriek, which sounded high above all the din of the conflict, and echoed with a dreary, melancholy cadence in the off-branching caverns.

The face was turned towards him.

Jonathan saw it.

The shriek that came from the girl's lips was almost immediately followed by one of those terrible and unearthly roars to which at times the thief-taker gave utterance when anything occurred which surprised or angered him.

This time it expressed surprise.

And incredulity as well.

By what extraordinary succession of incidents came Edgworth Bess in the power of Captain Howlet, and an inmate of the pirates' caves?

He was at a loss to think.

He would have fancied it must be a case of mistaken identity, but he was too familiar with the girl's features to fall into any mistake of that kind.

He did not stop to speculate.

Rushing forward with redoubled fury, he aimed his way to where the pirate captain stood.

To reach him, however, he would have to cut his way through the whole band.

But to do this Wild did not shrink.

Right and left the pirates fell or gave way before the long sweeping strokes of his terrible weapon, which every time came down with so much force as to make a second blow unnecessary.

At last the pirates, one and all, threw down their swords and cried for quarter.

Jonathan Wild did not trouble himself to look whether it was granted to them or not, but made his way over a heap of the dead and dying to the captain, who even now would not relinquish his hold of Edgworth Bess, though she struggled most furiously in his arms.

But, upon seeing Jonathan approach, he fairly took her up, and ran with her in the direction of the excavation in the side from which the house above could be reached.

This place was quite dark.

Jonathan, however, did not stop for a light, but shouted to his men to bring one, and follow him.

The footsteps of the captain now ceased, and so had the cries of Edgworth Bess.

These had hitherto been a guide to him.

In an agony of apprehension, lest, after all, the girl should escape, he dashed forward, screaming out to his men to bring a light.

CHAPTER CL.

JONATHAN WILD CHASES CAPTAIN HOWLET, ALIAS COLONEI THORNE, THROUGH THE MANSION, AND OBTAINS POSSESSION OF EDGWORTH BESS.

JONATHAN, however, encountered no obstacle to his progress, nor could he hear anything but a slight rustling noise.

But his men, with lights in their hands, now made their way into the lesser cavern, for such it was, in which he stood.

It was, he found, of tolerable size, but as he glanced with his eagle eye about it, no trace of Captain Howlet and his prey could be seen.

But one of his men happening to glance upward, saw something, to which he called Jonathan's immediate attention.

At a considerable distance from the floor of the cavern, and climbing desperately up a rope, with Edgworth Bess in his arms, was the pirate.

This was a sight for which all were unprepared.

It was easy to perceive, from the manner in which she hung over his left arm, that the poor girl was insensible.

This would account for the cessation of her cries.

One would have thought, however, that even though she did not struggle, but hung a dead weight, it was quite impossible to ascend a rope so burdened.

But Colonel Thorne was a rather out-of-the-way sort of personage.

His gigantic form, and almost superhuman strength, for it was in keeping with his bulk, has been already reverted to.

This was one thing that assisted him.

Then another was, that he was a finished sailor.

Unlike many captains, there was no duty about ship which he could not perform with dexterity and ease.

Climbing a rope was one of them—perhaps, the one he could do best.

The knots in this rope, too, made a most wonderful difference.

But still the feat was one which few would have attempted, and fewer still have been able to carry out.

It was, let it be said, with the utmost difficulty that the pirate-chief performed it.

The rope, as the reader will doubtless recollect, had been cut by Lieutenant Morgan, and the end of it, instead of reaching nearly to the floor, as it had done at the time of Edgworth Bess making her descent, now was just about on a level with a tall man's head.

The cry that came from the lips of all, made the captain aware that he had been discovered; but so far from allowing that to daunt him, it only served as an incentive to fresh exertions, for all saw that his speed was accelerated.

Jonathan Wild, under the impulse of the moment, drew his pistol when he first saw it.

His finger pressed the trigger, and in another moment

[JACK SHEPPARD AND HIS COMPANIONS ARE ATTACKED BY THE POLICE.]

the weapon would have been discharged, but a sudden thought made him alter his intention.

That he would hit his mark there was little doubt.

But had he done so, what would have been the result?

The captain's hold upon the rope would have relaxed.

He would have fallen to the ground.

Had not the bullet slain him, the fall upon the rocky floor of the cavern most assuredly would.

Edgworth Bess was in his arms.

She would have fallen with him.

She would have met with the same fate.

Now, if there was one thing that Jonathan desired more than another, it was that the life of Edgworth Bess should be preserved, let the circumstances be what they might.

If she, through any unlucky accident, should perish, the whole of his deeply-laid plans would be annihilated—frustrated.

Accordingly he lowered the point of his weapon, and returned it to his belt.

Captain Howlet, if he had seen this threatening movement upon the part of his enemy, did not take the least notice of it, but bent the whole of his energies to the superhuman task of climbing upwards.

Strong and skilful as he was, he found that every foot he ascended cost him a greater effort than the preceding one.

No sooner had Jonathan restored the pistol to his belt, than he shouted—"Follow me, my men! Follow me!"

At the same moment he dashed forward, and grasping the end of the thick rope with both hands, commenced climbing up it.

The first was the most difficult part, because he had no hold for his feet.

When, however, he got up a little way, and could rest them upon the large knots, it became a comparatively easy matter.

It might be that the thief-taker was less expert than the pirate, but then that disadvantage was more than counteracted by his being unencumbered.

Wild's men, as soon as he had got high enough, one by one began to climb the rope, and they looked like so many rats on a string.

As the strain upon the rope increased, some very suspicious cracks were heard, calculated to excite the greatest uneasiness in the minds of those who heard them.

Jonathan, however, would not have stayed for a much greater danger than that.

Unheeding the ominous sounds, he continued his upward course; but, in spite of all his efforts, he did not gain much upon Captain Howlet, who had had an excellent start.

So long, however, as he did not reach the top of the rope much before he did, Jonathan did not care.

The darkness increased rapidly the higher they went up, for the only light of any kind there was in the place, was such as proceeded from the lanterns his men below had with them.

Not once, though, did Wild look down.

He fixed his eyes steadfastly upon the dusky form of the pirate-chief, and his burden above him.

More and more indistinct did they become, and he had to strain his vision to continue seeing them.

Suddenly, however, they disappeared.

Almost the same moment, too, the vibration of the rope from above ceased utterly.

"He has reached the top," thought Jonathan, and he increased his speed.

At this time he was probably fifteen or twenty feet from the floor of the cavern.

Hanging below him were four or five of his men.

The strain upon the rope was very great, but still not more than it could bear with safety, provided it was secured properly at the top.

But there was the question.

Directly he reached the top of the rope, Captain Howlet found the panel open, as Edgeworth Bess had left it.

This was fortunate for him, since it enabled him to gain the chamber with all the greater ease.

Thrusting her first through the aperture, the captain followed.

An awful expression of diabolical malice was on his face.

His secret was discovered.

His hand destroyed.

Himself a fugitive.

But let the extremity of his fortune be what it might, he determined not to abandon the young girl, for whom he had conceived so violent and uncontrollable a passion.

She was still insensible, and lay in a huddled-up mass upon the flooring, just where he had placed her.

So great was his fatigue, that he found himself compelled to rest a minute or two in order to recruit his strength.

He laid himself down at full length upon the floor.

But ere he had been a second in this position he crawled forward a little, and holding his head over the verge of the abyss, peeped down.

Far below he could see the lights which were carried by the men on the floor of the cavern.

Then he, with difficulty, made out the form of Jonathan Wild ascending the rope.

This every now and then cracked with the strain that was put upon it.

The sound came to the pirate's ears.

It gave him a new thought.

The malignant expression upon his countenance deepened.

Raising himself a little, he sought with his hand in his belt.

He drew from a sheath suspended from it a large and beautifully-tempered dagger.

The few rays of light that found their way into the apartment seemed to focus themselves upon it, for, as he moved it, a faint gleam betrayed its presence.

Holding this dagger firmly in his right hand, he again sank down, so that his head was over the abyss.

This time he could tell his foes were much nearer.

But he could almost have shrieked with exultation at the utter discomfiture they were about to receive at his hands, but he deemed it most prudent to stifle the inclination.

Gently, so that his foe should have no indication of what he was about, and so take the alarm, Captain Howlet felt for the rope.

It was stretched to such a degree that it felt more like a bar of iron than aught else.

With the same gentleness as he had before used, the pirate, as soon as he had found the rope, drew his knife across it.

At the first stroke, only the outside of the strands were severed.

At the second, the dagger sunk further in.

He did not remove it from its position, but gently drew it across for the third time.

A tearing noise followed.

The remainder of the rope, unable to bear the strain, was giving way thread after thread.

Those below must have had some idea of their peril, but before they could escape, the rope, with a loud snap, gave way altogether.

CHAPTER CLI.

JONATHAN WILD HAS A NARROW ESCAPE OF HIS LIFE, AND IS MORE THAN EVER DETERMINED TO BRING THE CAREER OF CAPTAIN HOWLET TO AN END.

As soon as this sound reached his ears, Captain Howlet gave way to the inclination he had felt to indulge himself in a loud shriek of laughter.

It was discordant and unmirthful, and echoed mournfully in the cavern.

It was accompanied, too, by another sound, which all but drowned it.

This was the horrible cry of fear which Jonathan and his men uttered when they found themselves falling through space.

A few fleeting seconds passed.

Then they reached the hard, rocky floor of the cavern with a dull crash.

Quickly succeeding it came the yells of excruciating agony to which those gave vent who had received the slightest injuries.

The others were either dead, or in a state greatly resembling it.

It was rather strange that the thought did not occur to the crafty and politic brain of Jonathan Wild that the first thing the pirate would be likely to do upon reaching the top would be to sever the rope, and thus cut off all access to him.

Had he thought of it, he would not have trusted himself to climb up it in the manner he had, for fear of the consequences.

The best of us are apt at times, especially during any great excitement, to omit to take into consideration all the probabilities of the case.

In this instance Jonathan did not.

All seemed safe and still, so he continued his upward course at the best speed he could make.

All at once, however, he fancied he felt the rope lengthen.

A repetition of the same thing told him that it was no fancy, but reality.

A cold sweat broke out all over him.

The rope was giving way.

Under the impulse of the moment, he did what was, under the circumstances, the very best thing he could do.

He relaxed his hold upon the rope, and slipped down.

But, before he could reach the head of the man next him, the rope above, with the snapping sound we have recorded, gave way altogether.

Involuntarily, Jonathan shut his eyes, and uttered a groan of horror.

He fully believed that his last hour had come.

The belief was shared, and the cry of horror echoed by all who hung below him.

Then they reached the bottom.

In this fortune favoured Jonathan Wild to a greater extent than such a wretch deserved.

Those who were lowest were worst off.

Received the greatest injuries.

He was at the top.

Consequently, when all fell, he never reached the rock at all, but came down on the mass of men beneath him.

The shock of the fall was great, of course, and for a minute or so he was unconscious.

At the end of that time, however, he was in full possession of his faculties, both bodily and mental.

He had scrambled to his feet before the men who had been standing below had recovered from the sudden surprise.

Every breath he drew seemed to invigorate Jonathan, and to show him that, after all, the injuries he had received from the fearful fall were very slight indeed.

"Quick! quick!" he yelled; "never mind those who are hurt! Run some of you to the entrance of the cavern, and bring the two ladders with you. Let a dozen descend into the boat, and be rowed to the nearest landing-place to 'The Larches.' Surround the house, and see that the pirate-chief escapes not!"

The men did not hesitate a moment, and well was it that they did not, but set off at full speed to the entrance.

A dozen then made their way into one of the boats which had conveyed them thither, and were swiftly rowed away into the darkness of the night.

The remainder then drew up the ladders, which were of very great length indeed.

The angles and turnings in the narrow passage leading to the cavern made it difficult for them to be carried, but these obstacles were, without much loss of time, overcome.

By the time they returned, they found Jonathan had prepared a quantity of rope, by the aid of which the two ladders were hastily but firmly lashed together.

Thus joined, they really looked as though they would enable him to gain the point he wished to reach.

The pirates had all been vanquished. Quarter had been refused to all of them, and all that remained of the much-deformed Howlet band were a few bleeding, wounded forms, from whom it would have been a mercy to trample out what little of that mysterious essence of life which clung to them.

This was not done, however.

Five men had been on the rope with Jonathan.

Three of these were dead, and so were two more upon whom it happened to fall.

The other two were only partially injured.

Jonathan got off best of all.

The time that had been taken to do all this was really very short indeed, and before Wild had thoroughly recovered his breath, he commenced the ascent of the ladders.

This time he took a lantern in his hand, in order to see his way before him.

For fear lest the ladders should give way where they had been tied together, only one man was allowed to follow him.

Against what the top portion of the ladder rested, Wild, of course, had no idea.

As he mounted, which he did fearlessly and rapidly enough, he flashed his lantern about him.

The smaller cavern seemed to be of a very remarkable shape.

Generally the height of a cavern bears some degree of proportion to the diameter.

But in this case, all such proportion was set at defiance.

The diameter of it was only a few yards, but the height seemed many feet.

The sides were smooth, white, and even.

At last, as he ascended, Jonathan came to the conclusion that this shape was not natural, but that the roof of the cavern had been raised.

As he got higher, he soon found that the sides tapered in rapidly, so that the appearance presented was that of some huge funnel.

At length he reached the top round of the second ladder.

He directed the light of his lantern upwards.

Just out of his reach he could see the piece of rope dangling down where Captain Howlet had cut it.

Could he but grasp this, Jonathan felt that all would be well.

Cautiously, for the attempt was full of peril, he mounted two more rounds, and stood upon the topmost one, holding to the wall for support.

It was an awful situation.

The least tremor of the body, the least giddiness, and he must have been precipitated to the bottom.

Nothing could have saved him.

But Wild was cool and collected.

Even now, the rope was barely within reach of his outstretched hands, but at length he managed to take a hold of it with his fingers.

This grasp he soon increased, and then, when he had it in both hands, he quitted his foothold upon the ladder, and hung, suspended in mid air, by the mere strength in his wrists alone.

It was a feat which few besides those who had trained themselves to the performance of similar feats would have attempted.

Gradually Jonathan drew his body up until he reached the spring panel opening into the chamber which had been occupied by Edgworth Bess.

He could not see into this place, for when he had to make use of both hands, he had hung the lantern to his belt, it being provided with a handle made specially for that purpose.

The panel had been left just as Bess had propped it open.

No doubt Captain Howlet felt pretty sure that he had discomfited his enemies for some time to come, and, that now the rope was cut, it was quite impossible to ascend.

But he did not know the man with whom he had to contend.

He was, as the present narrative displays, a man with an expedient brain and an indomitable spirit, which would make him rise superior to any dangers.

The faint night light which made its way into the room, enabled Jonathan Wild to perceive the outlines of the aperture.

But knowing he was unsupported, he listened before he attempted to crawl in.

All was still.

The captain was not in that part of his residence, at all events.

Jonathan, therefore, ventured to climb through the sliding panel.

But he put himself in an attitude of defence as soon as he could, for fear the pirate should be lurking somewhere in the room.

By flashing the light of his lantern round it, however, he assured himself that it was empty.

The next step was to devise some means by which he could be joined by his men, for it would never do for him to engage the pirate single-handed.

Kneeling down, then, he saw that the one man who had followed him up the ladder was at the top of it, unable to proceed any further.

"Descend," said Jonathan, "and bring back the coil of rope. I will fasten it afresh, and then you will manage easily. Quick, there is not a moment to lose!"

The man, in his zeal to obey the thief-taker, did not stop to descend the ladder step by step, but striding his legs, he slipped down the whole distance.

Quickly seizing the end of the rope, and bidding two or three others to follow him, he ran up again.

He found, upon reaching the top, that Jonathan had taken off his neckcloth, and was holding it down at the full length of his arm.

The man comprehended in a moment what it was intended for, so taking the rope, he tied one end of the neckcloth to it.

When this was done, Wild drew the rope up, and, somehow or other, managed to secure it in the same manner as before.

Then he called out to his men to ascend as quickly as they could.

CHAPTER CLII.

COLONEL THORNE TAKES A GREAT DEAL OF USELESS TROUBLE, BUT DETERMINES TO CHEAT JONATHAN WILD.

WITH the rope thus placed, Jonathan's men had very little difficulty in making their way through the secret panel into the room where their leader was waiting for them.

The ladder, too, had been found quite strong enough to bear four of their number upon it at one time.

Jonathan only waited until he had got half-a-dozen men around him, and then drawing his own sword, and holding the dark lantern in his left hand, he called out to them to do likewise and follow him.

With these words on his lips, he flung open the door, for it was not fastened in any way, and passed through it. A flight of steps was just before him, and he ran down without hesitation.

At the foot of it numerous doors could be seen leading in different directions.

Which one to take to follow in the steps of Colonel Thorne was more than he could tell.

He hoped, however, that those of his janizaries who had gone round in the boat would be in time to surround the house, and make it impossible for him to leave it.

In a systematic manner Jonathan commenced an examination of the mansion.

Everywhere his eye turned, objects of the greatest beauty and value met his gaze, and, accustomed as he was to grandeur when visiting his noble patrons, Jonathan could not restrain his astonishment at the beauty of everything which he beheld.

He lost no time, however, by looking at these. He was one, who, having once set his mind upon an idea, never allowed anything foreign to tempt him from it.

Leaving the great thief-taker to prosecute his search, which, from the size of the mansion must, of necessity, occupy some time, we will turn our attention to Colonel Thorne and Edgworth Bess.

When he had, as he thought, completed the discomfiture of his foes, he remained for some moments leaning over the abyss, gloating over the pain which he had caused.

But he did not wait until Jonathan recovered.

Just before that interesting event, feeling that his strength had in a great measure returned to him, he rose.

Edgworth Bess still lay exactly in the same position upon the floor as that in which he had placed her.

This would indicate that her swoon, caused by repeated and continued frights, still held her faculties in bondage.

Captain Howlet made no effort to restore her.

He knew that while she was in that state he should have less trouble with her, and he had firmly resolved not to fly without her, if he could possibly avoid it.

Once more, then, taking her up in his arms, and feeling, although much fatigued, scarcely any inconvenience from her weight, he strode across the room to the door leading to the staircase.

This one, it will be recollected, was, while Edgworth Bess was prisoner, kept securely locked, and he had to waste a few minutes fumbling in the pocket of his coat for the key.

At last he grasped it, and then, thrusting it into the lock, shot back the bolt.

He flung the door open and passed through.

He had no light with him, but the place was too familiar to him for that to be much inconvenience.

He descended the staircase slowly and cautiously.

Turning to the left as soon as he reached the foot of it, he made his way along a kind of corridor, and thence through a small door into a room.

"Curses on this unlucky chance!" he cried, in tones of the utmost fury. "Another five minutes, and I should have been safe on board my bonny bark, with the black flag floating over me. Then all would have been well."

A small couch was in the room, and upon this he deposited poor Edgworth Bess.

"More than all, too, I am known. The well-kept secret of so many years laid bare! But, never mind, I have yet some time before me, and I will employ that time as best I may to my own advantage and my foe's undoing! I have been a dreaded outlaw on the deep! Now shall I begin a new existence on the shore. This place I must for ever abandon. It grieves me to think so, but there is no help for it. To stay here longer will be impossible."

He was silent for a moment.

"Let me see," he said, "I will first secrete about my person, in as small a compass as I can, a portion of my wealth. I shall have time to do that, for, ten to one, if it is known how easily the house may be approached from the sea. At any rate, I will risk it, for I might as well quit life at once, as leave this place without wealth in my possession!"

While thus speaking, Captain Howlet had not been idle or inactive.

In a recess in this room was a large oaken cabinet, a marvel to look at, with its quaint and intricate carving and massive bands of iron, which served at the same time to strengthen and adorn it.

This, by means of a key which he carried attached to a ribbon round his neck, the captain opened.

A multitude of little drawers were disclosed.

Opening one of these at random, he began, with great expedition, to transfer its contents to his pockets.

It consisted of nothing but unset gems of great size and brilliancy, each one of which must have been worth a large sum of money.

This was, indeed, stowing wealth into a small compass.

That one drawer alone contained sufficient to have satisfied the wants of a moderate man during a long life.

But these the colonel did not think enough.

He opened another drawer.

The contents were the same.

And so on he continued, until he had actually stuffed his pockets with brilliants.

The wealth which he thus had in his possession must have been enormous, and it is difficult to imagine by what means he became possessed of such a collection.

However, there they were.

"Much more," said the captain, "would I gladly take away, but I cannot. I must content myself with that which I have already, and get away in safety with it. That is the next important thing to do."

As he spoke, he carefully locked the doors of the cabinet again, so that it did not present any signs of having been opened.

This done, he turned towards the couch upon which he had placed the insensible and persecuted girl.

"You," he said, "shall be the partner of my flight. I know not how it is that I have conceived so violent and unquenchable a passion for you, nor is this a fitting time to speculate upon it. Still insensible," he added. "Well, perhaps it is better so, provided her insensibility does not endure for ever."

With these last words on his lips, Captain Howlet stooped over the couch, and raised his captive in his arms.

He turned towards the door.

But, ere he passed through it, he cast one last look upon the different objects the room contained.

"Farewell, old friends," he said, in a voice of affected jocularly, and as though he was addressing sentient beings, "farewell, all of you! Heaven knows into whose possession you may fall next, but I must leave you. It grieves me to do so, but I cannot stay. It will vex me to see another the inhabitant of this place; yet, stay—I have a thought! Yes, I will do it. I shall at least prevent that!"

The colonel again placed Edgworth Bess upon the couch, in order to carry out his suddenly-resolved-upon intention.

What it was will be quickly seen.

Advancing to the fireplace, he took from the mantelshelf a tinder-box.

He next heaped a quantity of paper and rubbish on the floor.

Then, by the aid of the above-named implement, he set fire to it.

The little heap blazed up brightly instantly.

He applied the fire to different portions of the apartment.

The walls were wainscoted, and the wood, owing to its great age, was in a very dry and rotten state.

It caught the fire as quickly as the most inflammable material would.

From the position of the room, Colonel Thorne well enough knew that if the fire once got fair hold of it, it would spread with great rapidity to the remainder of the mansion, and then all attempts to extinguish it would be futile.

Grief and satisfaction struggled for mastery in his breast, as he stood for a minute or two contemplating the destruction which was taking place around him.

Colonel Thorne was human.

He loved his home.

Not a single thing was in it that did not possess some special interest to him, and so he found it was, as he said, hard indeed to leave it.

No other person, however, would lay claim to them, and he drew no small amount of consolation from this source.

Urged, however, by the heat of the flames, as well as the impolicy of staying longer, he once more, and for the last time, raised Edgworth Bess in his arms.

She moaned slightly, thus showing that, in spite of all her perils, she still lived.

The colonel carried her towards the door.

By the time he reached it, the temperature of the room had risen to an insufferable degree, and the walls were mere sheets of flame.

The reader will not fail to have perceived, by his actions, that the colonel entertained no idea of being in any imminent danger.

He calculated that some time must yet elapse before his foes made an attack upon him, if they did so at all, after the terrible repulse he had given them by severing the rope.

Leisurely, therefore, as one might call it, he had made his preparations for taking his departure.

He quite expected he should be able to do so, and be unmolested.

In this, however, he was doomed to be deceived.

He did not take into consideration the extraordinary character of the man with whom he had to deal.

He thought him disabled from taking any active measures just at present.

How woefully he was deceived!

At that very moment, the men who had been sent by Wild in the boat, under the directions of the men who were well acquainted with the locality, had reached the lawn, and formed a circle round the house, through which it would be impossible for him to pass undetected.

We have said he took Bess for the last time in his arms, and advanced to the door.

He had determined that, at all risks, she should share his flight.

He flung open the door, and would have passed out into the corridor beyond.

But just as he did so, his ears were saluted by a terrible shout.

A roar.

An exclamation came also from his own lips, and he paused where he stood.

Before him, blocking up the doorway, was Jonathan Wild and a dozen of his men.

CHAPTER CLIII.

THE COMBAT IN THE BURNING ROOM. JONATHAN WILD SAVES EDGORTH BESS, BUT HAS SOME TROUBLE WITH COLONEL THORNE.

ONE would almost have thought that, upon seeing this spectacle, the wild pirate-chief would have then and there lost all hope.

But he did not, though what he did looked almost as though he had.

Perceiving the state of affairs outside, he did not attempt to attack them, nor did he allow them a chance of attacking him, but, with the suddenness of thought, darted back into the burning room, and closed the door behind him.

This was a feat that looked like absolute insanity or suicide.

Jonathan was frantic.

Edgworth Bess, he feared, would after all be lost to him.

The pirate-chief had chosen to perish rather than surrender, and he had chosen that Edgworth Bess should perish with him.

At least, such was Jonathan Wild's idea.

The first he might have done without the thief-taker raising a finger to prevent it, but as for the second, that was absolute destruction to all his most cherished schemes.

Accordingly he shouted to his men to batter down the door, setting them the example himself.

But the wily pirate had taken care to fasten it securely on the inner side, and all their efforts to force it proved abortive.

It was not, however, with any intention of seeking so disagreeable and painful a death as that which fire would inflict which made the colonel retreat into the burning room, but he saw that it was absolutely impossible for him to cut a way through the mass of men before him.

It was not too late, he thought, to retreat into the room, and effect his escape by the window, and no sooner did the idea occur to him, than he set about putting it into execution.

The door of the room was fitted with a strong lock.

The key was inside.

To turn it took him but an instant only, and then he felt himself secure for a few minutes at least.

But by this time the temperature of the room had increased to an almost insufferable degree.

There was not much smoke, but what little there was was of a very pungent character.

He inhaled it with great difficulty.

His lungs seemed blistered by every breath he drew.

It had the effect of restoring Bess to consciousness, for she uttered a piercing shriek, which came to Wild's ears with the greatest plainness, and increased the agony of apprehension under which he already laboured.

His blows upon the door increased in fury.

Already it began to shake beneath his strokes.

Colonel Thorne, puzzled and confused by the heat and smoke and struggles of his captive, made the best of his way to the window.

But just as he reached it, and dashed it open, he found himself confronted by another body of men.

They were those who had been stationed on the outside.

A horrible curse, which made the blood curdle in the veins of Edgworth Bess, came hissing from the parched throat of the pirate-chief.

He was ensnared.

There was no way he could turn to make his escape.

Crash, crash, came the blows upon the door, and at last, with a final effort, it was sent bodily inward.

Jonathan Wild, heedless of the fierce flames, dashed in.

The form of the pirate-captain and the girl he wished to save were clearly defined from the surrounding red.

They were near the centre of the room.

The colonel had been forced there by the flames, to stop the progress of which no effort had been made, and which had already seized upon the principal portions of the building.

He saw Wild coming.

Still retaining his hold upon Edgworth Bess, he drew his sword and made a fierce thrust at him.

But Jonathan warded off the blow, and attacked him in his turn, though not with that fury which he otherwise would, for fear lest he should injure Edgworth Bess.

"Yield, villain!" he cried. "Put down the girl, or give her to me, and you shall have a chance of your life! Do you hear me? Put down the girl, I say!"

Our readers may imagine the state of Jonathan's mind at seeing Edgworth Bess in such imminent danger of losing her life. As for the colonel, he might have died a thousand times if he thought proper. His life was of no value to him at all.

But with the girl it was different.

Colonel Thorne, however, although he saw no prospect of escape from a lingering death, would not release his hold, but struck at Wild with his heavy sword.

The advantages were all on his side. Both were skilful swordsmen, but, then, Wild was afraid to strike.

The interior of the room, too, was like a furnace.

Wild's men, although he repeatedly called to them, were deaf to his calls. It looked too hazardous to enter, and they preferred braving his anger, if ever he came out again.

Of this they had some doubts, for the flames had seized upon the woodwork of the door.

The shrieks that came from the lips of Edgworth Bess, who was now in full possession of her senses, were really heartrending.

Jonathan felt that he was blistering all over, that his apparel was already dried to such an extent that the least thing would cause it to burst into a flame.

A species of madness must have seized upon the brain of the pirate-chief, now that he had realized his truly desperate position.

But he attacked Wild with the blindest impetuosity.

Suddenly, however, the thief-taker saw an opening for his sword.

To see it, and make use of it, were simultaneous events. Shortening his arm, he lunged forward with his sword. The point entered the pirate's chest.

Such, too, was the vigour of the thrust, that the point came out of the back, and the hilt, with a dull, sickening sound, struck against his breast.

A yell of mortal agony came from the colonel's lips, but, badly hurt though he was, he did not give up the contest.

But his strength lasted only a moment.

Jonathan withdrew his sword.

A gush of blood followed it.

That gush of blood seemed to be the strength of Colonel Thorne, for when it had flowed away, he staggered, and the light hold which he had kept of Edgworth Bess relaxed.

The poor girl had never ceased to struggle, and now, by a stronger effort, she succeeded in freeing herself altogether.

Jonathan saw this, and darting forward, caught her in his arms.

But he had like to have paid for this action with his life, for the captain, with what little remaining strength he had, raised his ponderous sword with the intention of bringing it down upon his head.

By a chance, though, Jonathan saw him, and stepped aside just as the weapon was descending.

Raising his own sword, he struck it from the pirate's feeble grasp, and the next moment sheathed it in his breast.

The colonel staggered, reeled, then fell heavily upon the floor.

At the same instant a shriek of still greater anguish burst from the lips of Edgworth Bess.

Her apparel was in flames.

It is a wonder almost that this did not occur before.

With great presence of mind, Jonathan, seeing that he had nothing more to fear from Colonel Thorne, pulled off his huge coat, and wrapped it closely about her person.

This, if it did not actually extinguish the flames, in a great measure subdued them.

His next proceeding was to turn his attention to leaving the burning chamber.

If we were to say that five minutes had elapsed from the time he dashed into it up to now, we should be exceeding the length of the period.

But those who have witnessed a conflagration on a large scale can tell what progress can be made during that brief interval, especially when the flames have got a fair hold.

At the time he entered, as we have seen, not one of his janizaries would obey his orders and follow him.

And now, as Wild looked round him, he was not able to see any means of exit.

He was encompassed by a huge wall of flame.

He shouted aloud to his men, in order to tell by their reply which way he ought to take, but the roaring sound which the flames produced was so tremendous, that he feared he should not be heard.

Suddenly, however, he heard a faint cry, or what to him sounded like a faint cry, though, by its intimation, he could tell that it was a loud and lusty one, but subdued by distance, or passing through some medium which only partially transmitted sound.

He turned instantly in the direction from which the sound seemed to come, but ere he could advance a pace, there was a horrible crashing noise as though the roof was falling in.

Jonathan gave himself up for lost.

But it was not the roof which fell.

It was the wall, he thought.

But it was neither the one nor the other.

He could see a large gap, tolerably free from flame, and beyond it the open sky.

The window had fallen in.

Yes, that was it.

Jonathan dashed forward.

In its fall it had smothered the flames to some degree, and though in a minute or two he knew they would burst forth with redoubled fury, yet, if he was quick, he should be able to pass through before this occurred.

Darting forward, then, and shrieking out in a half-maddened manner to his men, Jonathan reached the window.

His men had heard the shouts, and approached.

They expected he was burned to a cinder.

In a moment Jonathan handed out Edgworth Bess, and ordered them to place her in safety on the lawn.

Then he began to scramble out himself.

Already had he got his one knee upon the window-sill, which was rather high from the ground, when some one or something clutched him by the ankle.

He tried to shake off the grasp.

He tried to continue climbing through the window.

Both in vain.

A vigorous tug was given to his leg, and, although he clutched desperately at the window-sill, he was dragged backwards with tremendous violence into the burning room.

CHAPTER CLIV.

COLONEL THORNE PERISHES AMID THE RUINS OF THE HOUSE, AND JONATHAN WILD REACHES NEWGATE-STREET IN SAFETY WITH HIS PRISONER.

No sooner did Jonathan reach the ground, than he felt the grasp shifted from his leg to his neck.

Exasperated beyond all measure, and endowed by passion with more than twice his usual strength, Wild, in his turn, grappled with his opponent.

It was Colonel Thorne.

The wounds which he had received from Wild's sword had not slain him, though it was impossible for him ever to recover.

But when he fell backwards, the fire had brought him to himself, and he crawled along the floor, and with great pain and difficulty, in the direction which Wild took.

He reached the window just as his enemy was passing out of it.

Maddened with pain and rage, he determined that his foe should not escape, but perish with him, and so, summoning what little strength he possessed, he grasped him with both hands by the ankle, and dragged him down.

Then he seized him by the throat, with the tenacity of a death grasp.

But Jonathan, although he had gone through so much fatigue, was the stronger man of the two.

Yet it was questionable whether he should be able to shake off his foe in time to save himself from being burned to death.

"Jonathan Wild!" gasped the colonel, in a hissing whisper, "you have conquered me, and I know it; but you shall not live to exult over your victory. You shall perish with me."

"Never!" replied his antagonist, and at the same time feeling in his pocket for his clasp knife. "Never!"

The colonel tightened his grip.

But Jonathan had got his formidable knife.

He opened the blade with his teeth.

It fixed itself with a snap, for it was furnished with a spring to prevent it closing.

Then he stabbed madly at his foe.

At first the blows made no difference, but at length Jonathan freed himself.

Then, with the utmost haste, he rose to his feet.

To his horror, however, he found the window nearly one sheet of flame.

But to hesitate or stay longer where he was would have been fatal.

Making a desperate spring, he alighted on the sill, and thence rolled down on to the lawn a mass of burns and bruises.

Here he was picked up by his men, who, after his fall back, had been unable to assist him, and carried to a distance from the burning mansion.

He swore most horribly the while.

And no wonder.

The pain he was suffering was almost more than he could endure.

"Water! water!" he shrieked; "curse you all! Bring me water! water!"

It so happened, when he made this frantic appeal, that they reached one of those artificial little ponds frequently seen in gardens, in which gold and silver fish are kept.

This he caught sight of, and rather than wait for any one to fetch what he wanted, he commanded them to put him down.

They knew better than to disobey.

On his hands and feet, then, he crawled to this little pond, and when he reached the edge, rolled himself fairly into it.

The cold water was delightfully refreshing.

The bottom of the pond was composed of smooth stones, and the water was not more than a foot in depth, and so he fairly bathed himself in it.

His clothes were burnt and smouldering in many places.

But now they were extinguished.

His impatience, however, to ascertain the condition of Edgworth Bess was too great to allow him to stay longer in the enjoyment of his cold bath.

He scrambled out, therefore, but he was officiously assisted by his men.

His appearance would have excited the laughter of most people, and a smile did flit over the faces of his followers.

He looked like a demon.

His head and face were blackened with fire and smoke.

His clothing hung in tatters about him.

"Where is the girl?" he cried.

"Here, Mr. Wild. This way, if you please."

Jonathan growled, and followed the man across the lawn to a place where Edgworth Bess had been laid.

A garden seat had been selected for this purpose.

Her clothes had been extinguished by the men, but she was again insensible.

Her fair face and hands were burnt and blistered in many places, but she had not received anything like such injuries as Jonathan Wild.

At the first glance, so death-like did she appear, that Jonathan fancied he had had all his trouble for nothing.

But he was assured by the men that it was nothing more than a faint.

"Run, some one," he cried, "and fetch a carriage of some sort. Haste!"

A couple of the janizaries set off at a run to carry out the order.

Then Jonathan, feeling that, for the moment, he could do nothing more for the poor persecuted girl, turned his attention to the burning mansion.

It was now nothing but one mass of flames.

The colonel was right when he calculated that the fire would quickly communicate itself to every part of his dwelling.

It had done so; and, although so short a time had elapsed since he struck the first spark, the place was almost utterly consumed.

Nothing had been seen of Colonel Thorne.

The men had carefully kept watch all round, in order to see that he did not make his escape.

Jonathan gazed upon the scene of devastation before him with satisfaction.

He had triumphed.

Doubly triumphed.

The much-dreaded pirate band had been exterminated.

The pirate-chief had perished in the fire which his own hands had kindled.

He had escaped death half-a-dozen times by a miracle.

But more than all, he had recovered possession of that which he valued above all other things on earth.

Edgworth Bess.

Yes; the poor girl, who seemed fated to meet with nothing but misfortune, was once more in the power of that bold, bad man.

We fairly tremble when we think of the dangers she has, up to the present time, passed through.

But we shudder when we think of what there is in store for her.

Do not, however, let us anticipate the course of events.

It is a struggle of feeble right against powerful wrong.

Which will be victor?

By his order, Jonathan was taken to the window, through which he had made his desperate leap.

The inside of this room was now like a furnace.

Surely no one could survive in such a heat.

But suddenly, as he gazes, he observes a slight movement of some dark object within.

Jonathan strained his eyes, and approached as near as the intense heat would let him.

Yes, something moved.

But what?

Could life have had so strong a hold upon the ferocious pirate-chief as not to have quitted him.

It would seem so.

An arm was raised aloft and then another.

Then came forth a scream of agony, which made itself heard above all other sounds.

Next, one blackened arm was placed over the window-sill.

The other followed.

Then a charred and blackened mass slowly drew itself up upon it.

Jonathan turned sick at the sight.

"It will be a mercy to put him out of his misery!" he said, and as he spoke he drew a pistol from his belt, aimed it carefully, and fired.

There was a report and a shriek.

The blackened form, which was all that remained of the pirate-chief, toppled backwards into the furnace.

Ere, however, he could actually have fallen, the whole roof of the rambling building fell in, burying everything beneath its ruins.

Such was the end of the wealthy and envied Colonel Thorne, alias Captain Howlet, the pirate.

* * * * *

On the morning of the third day after the incidents just recorded, a coach, drawn by two horses, went lumbering along the Old Bailey.

The equipage itself, as well as the cattle which drew it, gave token that they had just made a long and fatiguing journey.

It was just about sunrise, but the sun had not yet made himself visible to the dwellers in the city.

At that early hour the generally busy street was quite deserted.

There was no one to observe the coach, which came up the Old Bailey from the direction of Ludgate-hill.

Upon reaching the corner, the driver turned his cattle to the right, and, after proceeding a few paces, came to a halt close to the prison wall, or rather opposite a gloomy, dilapidated house which adjoined it.

This house, which had every appearance of being uninhabited, must be known to the reader of this history.

It would seem, however, that the arrival of the coach was expected, for no sooner did it stop than the front door of the house was thrown open, and a man appeared upon the threshold.

At the same moment the handle of the coach-door was turned, and the door itself flung open.

A man emerged.

One glance at his hideous physiognomy would have enabled any one to recognise him.

It was Jonathan Wild!

Turning round, he put one foot on the step, and lifted out of the carriage a sleeping or insensible form.

That was Edgworth Bess.

The man on the threshold stood in a deferential attitude.

That was Tonks.

Jonathan Wild once more carried, as a prisoner, into his house the heroine of this story, the poor, persecuted heiress, Edgworth Bess.

Heaven help her!

CHAPTER CLV.

JACK SHEPPARD AND HIS COMRADES ATTACK THE OFFICERS AND FIND THEMSELVES OUTNUMBERED.

THE report of the pistol which Flood fired at John Roots, the carpenter, as he was descending the staircase, sounded in the silence of that house like the discharge of a cannon.

Certainly it would rouse the whole neighbourhood.

The cry, too, which came from the lips of John Roots was loud and ear-piercing.

Then he fell with a dull, sickening crash down the rest of the staircase.

"Fool!" cried Jack Sheppard, in an angry voice, turning to Matthew Flood, who was quietly replacing the pistol in his pocket. "Fool! you have ruined all!"

"Fool yourself!" roared Flood, angrily. "You'd better mind what you're at. I've got another pistol in my pocket."

"Then you had better blow your own brains out with it, and cheat the hangman, for we shall be nabbed now for a certainty."

His words were followed by the springing of several rattles in the streets, and from the upper part of the house, which was occupied by another family, came cries for help.

"I couldn't help it," muttered Flood. "If he had gone on with his shouting, there would have been an end to us, I daresay."

"You thirsted for his blood," said Jack, savagely, "and I wanted no blood spilt. I undertook the enterprise more with a view of keeping in with you than anything else, and see how you have served us."

"We must make the best of a bad bargain," said Blewitt, "and not stand haggling here. Come, Jack, settle your row with Mat. another time. Let us be off. Where is the back-door?"

"There is none."

"Are you sure?"

"Of course I'm sure."

"Then we are done for—hark!"

As Blewitt pronounced the word, several heavy blows were struck upon the shop door.

"They will find out the shutter in a moment," continued Blewitt, and then it will be all over with us. What shall we do, Jack?"

"Don't ask me," replied Sheppard, "who was stooping down over the prostrate form of his late master. 'Settle it between yourselves.'"

The two men were much disconcerted by Jack's behaviour.

They had great reliance upon him, and had every faith in his opinion.

The blows upon the outer door redoubled.

But Jack heeded them not.

Gently he raised his master's head, and tried to move him from the awkward position in which he had fallen.

But his efforts were followed with such a cry of dreadful agony from the lips of the injured man, that he desisted.

He let the head sink into the same position.

Then he heard that strange rattling sound in his throat which is the certain forerunner of death.

Feeling that he was beyond his aid, and bitterly regretting that he should have ever undertaken or shared in this night's work, he deemed his next duty was to see after his own safety.

The two men he had with him, who had first prompted him to do the deed, and to one of whom their present dangerous position was owing, were standing together.

They could not tell what to do for the best.

"What shall we do, Jack? What shall we do?" asked Blewitt, in an agony of apprehension.

"I know not."

"Is there no escape?"

"None."

"Don't say that, Jack."

"Why not? It's the truth, and may as well be said as not."

"Is there no means of getting out?"

"None, except by the window or the door."

"Our foes are there."

"I know it."

"Then we are lost."

"And through your own folly. You wanted to take his life, and I wanted you to spare it. You have had your own way, and now take the consequences."

"I am very sorry, Jack," said Flood. "Don't let's have any ill blood just now. What I did was for the best."

"How many men are outside?"

"I don't know."

"We must find out, then. Perhaps, if we are quick, we shall have a chance of getting off."

Jack Sheppard, intimate as he was with the place, was the person best fitted to ascertain these two points, so, setting his two companions to guard the staircase and prevent any one descending, he glided into the shop to reconnoitre.

No steps had actually been taken to break down the door, or it would have been demolished long since.

Those outside had contented themselves with merely hammering upon it, and demanding entrance.

Jack knew by going to the window where they had entered, and pushing the shutter the least bit open, he should be able, not only to see, but to hear all that was taking place just in front of the door.

To his dismay he found, upon putting this manoeuvre into execution, that upwards of a dozen persons had assembled.

Most of them were watchmen.

"Shall we break down the door?" said one.

"There's murder inside," said another.

"Stop till the officers come," cried a third.

"Here they are, then," said a fourth.

Another second, and a compact body of police-officers arrived upon the scene.

"Murder—murder," cried all. "There's murder being done in old Root's house. Break the door down, they won't open it."

"We'll soon see about that," said some one, in a pragmatical tone of voice. "Keep a good look, all. See that nobody leaves the premises. Now, my men," he cried to the officers, over whom he seemed to have some command, "down with the door, and be quick about it."

"All right, sir," was the reply, and a furious attack was made upon the door.

So furious a one that it could not possibly long withstand it.

The position of the housebreakers was getting desperate.

What was to be done?

Jack withdrew from his place of observation and made his way to the foot of the stairs.

"Come," he said, "we have only one chance!"

"Who is outside?"

"Twenty people, at least, and more than half are police-officers."

"Then we are lost!"

"I fear so."

"They are breaking down the door."

"You are right. I heard the order given for them to do it."

"And they will soon have it open."

"You are right."

"But what chance have we got?"

"Let them in."

"Let them in?"

"Yes!"

"But how can that be a chance?"

"Cannot you see?"

"No!"

"Come on, then, and you will."

"But you don't mean to open the door?"

"Yes, I do!"

"But how will that give us a chance? I should think that will be throwing a chance away."

"Not a bit of it; quite the reverse."

"How so?"

"They won't be prepared for such an event, will they?"

"No, I should think not."

"Of course they won't. Then they will be taken by surprise."

"I understand."

"I will unfasten the door quietly."

"Yes, yes."

"And then fling it open."

"All right."

"The moment I do so, and before they have time to recover from their surprise, dash out amongst them. Let each one look after himself, and in the confusion, we shall, ten to one, escape."

"Capital, Jack."

"Don't attempt to keep together. Let each one try to fight himself free, and let each take different directions."

"All right, Jack. Quick! quick!"

"Yes, or I shall be too late."

The door of the carpenter's shop was a strong one, or it would not have so long resisted the heavy blows that were rained upon it.

It had given way, however, in many places.

With all the speed he could, Jack made his way to the door.

He had fastened it some hundreds of times, so he was at no loss to find the bolts and lock.

As gently as he could he undid them.

But he found this a more difficult matter than he imagined, owing to the manner in which the door had been strained.

STEGGS, IN DISGUISE, SEEKS EMPLOYMENT FROM JONATHAN WILD.

He succeeded, though, in undoing all but the bottom bolt, and at the time he was unfastening this, the door was sent violently inwards.

He escaped being thrown down by a miracle.

The two men were standing in readiness to dart out, according to his commands.

He sat them the example.

Uttering a shout, which they echoed, he sprang over the fallen door into the street.

As he had fully anticipated, the officers and others, who were congregated there, were completely taken aback by this sudden sortie.

It was the last thing they expected.

But there were too many, and they stood too closely together for them to get away in the manner that Jack intended.

Before they got clear, those whom they had first attacked recovered from their surprise, and turning round, attacked them.

The chief police-officer, who, from prudential motives, had not taken any part in the affray, but stood at a little distance, like a skilful general commanding his troops, saw in a moment the state of affairs.

He instantly shouted to those on the outside of the little crowd to stop them.

This they did as well as they were able

Then a fearful struggle commenced.

Attacked both in the front and the rear, the three housebreakers stood but little chance.

Jack, however, drew a knife from his pocket, and struck out furiously with it.

But the numbers were too unequal for the contest to endure for any length of time.

They were surrounded on all sides.

Again and again, however, did Jack make violent efforts to free himself, but in vain.

CHAPTER CLVI.

JACK SHEPPARD AND HIS TWO COMPANIONS ARE MADE PRISONERS BY THE POLICE.

EACH moment, too, that elapsed served to make their hopes of escape grow fainter and fainter, for the crowd was continually augmenting.

The whole neighbourhood by this time was thoroughly alarmed, and from the adjoining courts the people poured out in shoals.

The officers closed more closely round the three struggling housebreakers.

Flood was the first captured.

A well-directed blow laid him prostrate, and before he could recover his feet, two or three of his foes fell bodily upon him, and kept him down.

In a moment afterwards Blewitt was surrounded and made secure.

Jack Sheppard saw now that all hopes of making an escape were at an end, but yet he would not surrender.

On the contrary, he fought with greater desperation and fury.

But not for long could any one contend against the force of such overwhelming numbers.

His knife was forced from his grasp.

He was seized by a dozen different hands in a dozen different places.

Then one, more dexterous than the rest, slipped on a pair of handcuffs.

He was a prisoner.

But they found it necessary to secure his ankles with a piece of cord, so furiously did he struggle.

Then, indeed, he was powerless.

As soon as this was done, the prisoners were left in charge of a strong body, of police and the remainder, headed by their chief, entered the carpenter's shop.

John Roots was a lonely man.

He occupied only a portion of the house in Wych-street himself.

The upper portion he let out to a poor but respectable family.

These had first spread the alarm by opening a window and springing a rattle.

They had, however, after hearing the pistol-shot, been afraid to descend the stairs, lest they should meet with a similar fate.

The chief police-officer and most of his followers were provided with dark lanterns.

They removed these from their belts, and unclosed the slides.

Passing through the shop into the little parlour at the back, they came to the foot of the staircase.

Here, weltering in his blood, they found John Roots, the carpenter.

An ejaculation of horror came from the lips of all.

The sight was one which they had not expected to see.

"Raise him gently," said the chief officer to his subordinates, after a few seconds' silence. "Raise him gently, and see if he yet lives."

This was immediately done.

An awful groan came from his lips.

So horrible was the sound, that all recoiled.

John Roots, then, was not yet dead.

Jack Sheppard must have been mistaken when he fancied he heard the death-rattle in his throat.

"Carefully," said the chief officer again. "Carefully."

"He is alive, sir."

"Yes, so it seems, but it is as much as he is. Let us try if we can learn anything from him as to his murderers."

"I am afraid he is too far gone, sir."

The chief officer knelt down beside the carpenter, and said—

"If you have yet life enough in your body, let your last breath be spent in declaring the name of the person who has done this deed."

The words reached the ears of John Roots.

He comprehended their import.

Hovering as he was upon the brink of another world, he, by an effort, recalled his wandering senses, and made an effort to speak.

But vainly.

The bullet from Flood's pistol had entered his breast, and lodged in his lungs, which were almost full of blood.

By a slight movement of his hand, however, he signified his wish to be raised to a still more upright position.

He was instantly obeyed.

Then once again he strove to speak.

"Tell me," cried the chief of the police, once more, "who is your murderer?"

The struggle which the old carpenter made was a fearful one.

None who witnessed it could repress a shudder.

"J-J-Ja-Jack"—

"Jack!" cried the astonished officer. "Jack who? Speak—speak!"

"Sh-Shep-Sheppard!" said John Roots, with a kind of shriek.

"Jack Sheppard?" cried the officer, in a loud tone of voice. "Are you sure that is the name of the person who murdered you?"

The carpenter nodded his head several times with great rapidity.

And that was the last thing he did.

Something else appeared to strike him—something, perhaps, which might in some way tend to qualify what he had just said—but his voice failed him.

Then a quantity of blood gushed from his mouth.

He was over.

He sank back into the arms of the officers who had been supporting him, a dead weight.

"This is a serious business," said the chief officer.

"Not only has the house been broken into and robbed, but murder committed likewise. You have heard, all of you, the last words uttered by this poor old man. You must recollect them, for the time will come when you will have to swear what you have heard."

"All right, sir; we'll recollect. There can't possibly be any sort of mistake. He spoke plain enough."

"He did."

"What is to be done next, sir?"

"Why, half-a-dozen of you had better take charge of the house, and I will accompany the prisoners to Newgate, the only place which is strong enough for such desperate offenders."

"Very good, sir."

"Leave the body just as it is. Don't touch it yourselves, or allow any one else to do so, until after the jury have been to see it."

"All right, sir."

"And don't admit any one, on any pretext, until after the inquest."

With these words, the officer made his way to the front of the house.

Here were the three prisoners, completely at the mercy of their captors.

Resistance upon their part had long since ceased.

"Call a hackney coach," cried the officer in command.

"You will find one on the rank by the church."

One of his men at once set out for the church, close to the railings of which, as at the present day, hackney coaches were always to be found waiting.

In a few minutes he returned with one of those lumbering vehicles, so long a reproach to the streets of London.

They were, however, capable of holding more persons than the present cab, so Jack Sheppard, Flood, and Blewitt were pushed in, and three police-officers followed.

There were thirteen officers in all.

Six had been left in charge of the house.

Three had entered the coach.

One sat on the seat beside the driver.

Three more upon the roof.

In this way, then, with a dense mob yelling at their heels, Jack Sheppard and his companions were conveyed to Newgate.

It was early dawn, and people generally were beginning to be astir.

The streets, too, were partially light, so that as those officers who were seated on the roof of the coach looked back, they could plainly perceive the crowd of people who were thronging after them.

But though they could see them collectively, they could not distinguish them individually.

As for Jack, he could not see them at all, nor did he wish to do so, but he could hear their yells and shouts of execration as they followed.

In the crowd was one man who, among the rest, was unnoted.

He was tall, and muscularly formed.

But, by stooping, he strove, as much as possible, to disguise this height and robustness of frame.

His desire, evidently, was to escape observation as much as possible.

But in this he was only to a partial extent successful.

Those who were nearest to him could not help noticing the peculiar appearance of his physiognomy.

It wore a strange dark tint.

But this man, whom the reader, from this description, will doubtless recognise, did not stay long in one place, or afford any of the curious gazers much opportunity of studying his features, for he hurried on, forcing a way through the thickest of the crowd.

This was Blueskin.

After leaving Steggs in the manner we have related, at the public-house in the Borough, he had gone from one place to another in search of Jack.

From reasons well known to the reader he did not succeed in his search.

Wearied out and exhausted by all the multitudinous events of the night, he was passing along Wych-street, when he heard a great disturbance.

Any unusual circumstance, of course, attracted his immediate attention.

Hurrying forward, then, he found a small crowd of people assembled before a house.

He knew it at a glance.

It was the house of John Roots, the carpenter.

With a forboding feeling at his heart that all was not well, Blueskin paused and mingled with the crowd, which every moment kept increasing.

What he saw while he waited, the reader already knows.

He heard, too, that murder had been committed.

When the three burglars had darted out of the house in the manner we have described, he lent all the aid he could to assist them to escape.

But, single-handed, he could do little or nothing against such numbers, and he was fearful of being arrested with them.

As things stood, it was clearly his best policy to keep out of danger.

Immured in one of the cells in Newgate, what assistance could he be to his young comrade?

But free, he would doubtless be able to accomplish much.

Therefore, when he saw them all three made prisoners, he followed the coach, in order to see whether Jack was really taken to Newgate, or to Jonathan Wild's house.

CHAPTER CLVII.

JACK SHEPPARD IS DULY CONVEYED TO NEWGATE, AND PROVIDED WITH AN EXTRA HEAVY SET OF JEWELRY.

The officers, however, who had taken Jack prisoner were not Jonathan Wild's men, but regular Bow-street runners.

They had been specially sent out to apprehend Jack Sheppard for his daring escape from the prison.

Therefore, being armed with a special warrant, they drove him to the Old Bailey direct, instead of taking him to the lock-up, having him brought before a magistrate in the morning, and then fully committed for trial.

The hackney-coach lumbered up to the chief entrance of the old prison-house, and the officer who sat by the side of the driver got down and knocked at the portal.

The man on the lock, who was in a kind of half sleep, had heard the carriage stop, and, anticipating from that the arrival of some one of consequence, he quickly responded to the summons for admission.

By the time the door was open, however, the officers had got down off the roof and opened the door of the coach.

Then the others alighted.

The mob formed round in a dense circle, and they pressed forward so much that it was found necessary to obtain additional assistance from the prison to keep them at a respectful distance.

Then, one by one, the prisoners were handed out.

Blewitt happened to be nearest to the door, so he came first.

He was dogged and sullen, and made not the least attempt at resistance.

As a matter of course, his presence was greeted by a yell of execration.

The distance from the coach door across the pavement to the door leading into the prison was but short, so he was not exposed for long to the popular indignation.

He was hustled in.

Jack and Flood sat opposite to each other, so there was little to choose who should come out first, but Jack hung back.

It is possible that he had some insane idea of making his escape, for when Flood was dragged out, and while he imagined the attention of the officers was occupied by so doing, he looked through the window of the coach, next to which he sat.

But, if he had any idea of making his escape, it vanished when he saw how completely he was hemmed in by hostile faces.

He uttered, however, a slight exclamation, though he stifled the sound as much as he possibly could.

Among the crowd of faces he saw one that had not an unfriendly expression upon it.

It was a face well known to him.

He was evidently there to bid him be of good cheer.

It was Blueskin's face.

The next moment, however, he was seized by the officers and dragged out.

His ankles had been tied together with a cord, but, in order that he should be able to walk into the prison, these bonds were severed.

The moment Jack found these limbs at liberty, the first use he made of them was to salute his captors with several hearty kicks, each one of which drew loud curses from their lips.

But there were too many of them for him to gain much by resistance.

By main force he was dragged out and hurried into the lodge, where a dozen or so of turnkeys had assembled, and where Flood and Blewitt still stood.

The moment he was fairly in, the ponderous door was closed after him with a clang, at once shutting the world out from him.

The first thing that attracted Jack's attention after his arrival, was a slight bustle and confusion at the other end of the lodge.

He was well enough acquainted with the interior of Newgate already to know what it meant.

The governor was coming.

His old enemy, Mr. Noakes.

Excited and out of breath, for, upon receiving the intelligence that Jack had been recaptured, he had jumped out of bed, hastily attired himself, and hurried down to the lodge.

"Ha! ha!" he said, with an air of triumphant satisfaction, the moment he perceived Jack, and was convinced by ocular demonstration that the agreeable intelligence which had been brought to him was true. "Ha! ha! my young spark, so we have got you safe back again, have we! Well—well, I thought so. It was very unwise of you to escape; you might have known you would be taken again. You won't get away this time, I'll take good care of that. There's Godfrey, the turnkey, that you murdered in the corridor. You will have that to be tried for."

"But he has committed another murder since that, Mr. Noakes," said the chief police-officer.

"Another murder!" cried the governor, starting back a step. "How? where?"

"He has committed a burglary as well, and these two men, who belong to Jonathan Wild, assisted him."

"But who has he robbed?—who has he murdered?" asked the governor.

"His old master, John Roots, the carpenter, in Wych-street."

"Ha!"

"I have left six of the men there in charge of the premises, to watch that nothing is touched."

"Quite right, Mr. Skellum—quite right."

"He will have to be brought before a magistrate in the course of the morning, I suppose?"

"Oh! yes."

"Then I must be in attendance to give my evidence, which, of course, will procure the committal of all three of them to the assizes."

"They won't have long to wait, then."

"No, sir."

"The sessions begin the day after to-morrow. You had better stay with me, Mr. Skellum. What's the time?"

"About a quarter to five, sir."

"Oh! ah! Very well, then it will be about five hours before we want to start to Bow-street. We must take care to make them secure for that time. Come with me, Mr. Skellum, and after that we can breakfast together."

The governor was wonderfully condescending.

But there was a reason for it.

He was curious to learn the particulars of Jack's apprehension.

Mr. Skellum looked pleased.

The governor was always rather chuffy with the officials under him.

Indeed, in more respects than one, he resembled his great prototype, Jonathan Wild, with whom it will be recollected he was upon tolerably good terms.

Consequently, Mr. Skellum felt much flattered at having this amount of condescension shown him.

"Groots!" cried Mr. Noakes. "Groots! Where's Groots?"

"Coming, sir," replied a voice, and directly afterwards a man appeared, who looked as though he had been rather hastily aroused from a deep slumber.

"Get ready three sets of irons—the heaviest you can find, and be quick about it."

Groots, who at that time was the smith employed to rivet the fetters on the limbs of the prisoners, disappeared.

Two turnkeys followed him.

Immediately afterwards they returned, dragging behind them a mass of iron, which raised a thousand lugubrious echoes in its passage over the stones in the corridor.

They were left in a confused heap, just between the governor and the prisoners.

"Are they all the same weight," asked the former, as the smith began separating them into three heaps.

"No, sir; they isn't."

"Which are the heaviest?"

"These, sir," replied Groots, pointing to one lot. "The others be main heavy, but this set is heavier by a good bit."

"So much the better," replied Mr. Noakes; "you will put them on this young spark. It isn't the first time you have done a similar job for him, and see that you do it better than the last."

The smith, hearing these words, looked up.

Upon seeing Jack, he knew him instantly.

"Oh! yes. I recollect," he said. "Well, if he gets out of these, I'm a Dutchman."

Jack smiled contemptuously.

Of this Mr. Groots took no sort of notice, but, as soon as his little preparations were completed, set about riveting the irons upon him.

Jack Sheppard had sufficient good sense not to exhaust himself in struggling uselessly against superior numbers, so he quietly submitted to the irons being placed upon him.

Flood and Blewitt seemed to take their cue from him, for they behaved in a precisely similar manner.

So far all being well, the governor proceeded to accompany them to the dungeons.

And here let us take the opportunity of reminding the reader that a cell in Newgate in Jack Sheppard's day was a very different thing to what it is now.

The prison itself, even, has been wholly rebuilt, and the only traces of the ancient edifice which now exist, are those buried beneath the present Newgate-market.

The cells now are uniformly clean, well-ventilated, and light.

Then they were devoid of all these comforts.

It was considered that the strongest cells were those deepest down in the prison, and it was towards these that the prisoners were led.

Doors innumerable, and corridors without end, were passed through. Staircases were ascended and descended.

But, on the whole, the downward staircases preponderated.

A very strong escort of turnkeys and officers accompanied them, and, both before and behind, the narrow passages were filled up with their bodies, so that, had they been free from the heavy manacles, they could not have had the least prospect of escape.

The three prisoners were placed in three different cells, and there secured.

It seemed almost foolish to take so much trouble, when their sojourn would be so short, but they knew the slippery customers they had to deal with, and, therefore, did not abate any precautions.

The governor, at any rate, was determined that the fault should not be laid to him if they got free.

Having seen all secure, he posted a sentinel before the door of each cell.

Then he returned to his own portion of the prison, to properly dress himself, and partake of the breakfast which he had invited Mr. Skellum to share with him.

This was done, and, during the discussion of the meal, as we have hinted, he managed to extract from the police-officer a very ample account of the whole of the circumstances attendant upon Jack Sheppard's apprehension.

"He will swing," said the governor, triumphantly. "I am sure of it. And a good job, too; for, as you know, Mr. Skellum, I have got into no end of disgrace through his getting away the time before."

CHAPTER CLVIII.

THE MAGISTRATE AT THE BOW-STREET POLICE-COURT DULY COMMITS JACK SHEPPARD, MATTHEW FLOOD, AND WILLIAM BLEWITT TO TAKE THEIR TRIAL AT THE ENSUING SESSIONS FOR BURGLARY AND MURDER.

No doubt the reader can easily believe that the reflections of Jack Sheppard himself, in his cold and cheerless dungeon, were of anything but a pleasant description.

In the bitterness of his heart, he over and over again cursed himself for having listened to the proposals of the two men to commit a burglary at John Roots'. Over and over again did he curse them for acting in the manner they did, and causing him to be apprehended and lodged in prison.

So short a time, too, had elapsed since he had succeeded in effecting his last escape, and during that time he had positively done nothing.

The whereabouts of Edgworth Bess, and whether she was still alive, were things he knew not, and had failed to ascertain.

That, if alive, she was detained somewhere against her own inclination, he felt confident, or, long ere this, she would have found some means of communicating with him.

There was every reason, now, that he should be free and unshackled, to ascertain her whereabouts; for it had become the master-passion of his soul to see the poor persecuted heiress triumph over her enemies, and be placed in possession of her inalienable rights.

When that was done, he felt that he could resign himself to the tender mercies of that evil fortune which seemed to have beset him, but not till then.

One ray of consolation, however, found its way into his otherwise darkened soul.

Blueskin was free.

He had seen him.

By some means which he had yet to learn, he had been successful in getting out of Jonathan Wild's clutches.

He had, then, one powerful friend at liberty, who would use his whole exertions not only to freeing him, but also in finding Edgworth Bess.

From him he felt there was everything to hope.

So it will be seen that, desperate as his condition appeared to be, he did not despair.

But he made no attempt to get free from his bonds.

That, he was well aware, would be the work of many hours, and in a little while he would be visited.

There was one thing, however, that Jack did not know, but which, if he had, would have given him greater uneasiness than anything else.

In his dying moments—with his last breath, so to speak—surrounded by those who were ready to swear to his words, John Roots had solemnly declared that Jack Sheppard was his murderer.

Being in full possession of all the facts of the case, we know very well that he was not guilty of this crime, though John Roots undoubtedly laboured under the idea that he was, and had spoken in accordance with that conviction.

But, when all other things are reckoned, all will see how damaging and destructive this statement would be to him. By what means would he be able to prove his innocence? Who would believe his most solemn asseverations? No one.

Of this great peril he was, however, ignorant, and perhaps it was as well he was so—he was wretched enough already.

The five hours he had to wait passed laggingly enough in these gloomy meditations.

He was aroused from them at length, however, by hearing his cell door unlocked.

The governor and Mr. Skellum, accompanied by a posse of constables, entered.

In much the same fashion as they had been brought there, all three of the housebreakers were marched back to the lodge.

On reaching this place, the services of Mr. Groots were again called into requisition.

The irons which he had been at so much pains to rivet on were struck off.

A couple of hackney coaches were then called. Jack and his two comrades, with three police-officers, were stowed in one.

The governor and Mr. Skellum in the other.

It was in this manner, then, that Jack was taken to Bow-street, in order to have his examination before a magistrate.

He, as well as Flood and Blewitt, were securely handcuffed.

Jack was on the watch to take advantage of any little circumstance that might occur of a character that would tend to favour his escape, but none occurred, and his janitors were too much on the alert for him to make the least effort to save himself.

And so the court was reached.

It was very soon after ten when they arrived. Several little cases were on, and several more had to follow.

Jack and his two companions had to wait till the last.

Flood and Blewitt were taken in first.

Mr. Skellum stated the case to the magistrate in very few words.

The depositions were then taken.

The prisoners, who refused to say a word of any kind, were duly committed to take their trial at the next assizes, which would commence on the morrow.

Jack Sheppard had been kept separate, because there was a charge of a distinct and different nature to be brought against him.

As soon as Flood and Blewitt were removed, Jack was placed at the bar.

He did not glance around him at the crowd of idlers who thronged the court, but fixed his eyes upon the magistrate.

The clerk of the court, taken from a printed form, read over, in a mumbling voice, the charge against him.

The first witness who appeared in the box was Mr. Noakes, the governor, as the first count against Jack was his having broken out of prison.

He swore, of course, in the most positive manner as to his identity, and, at the same time, related all those events with which the reader is familiar, including, also, the death of the turnkey, Godfrey, who had been killed in consequence of Jack causing him to fall down a flight of stone steps.

Mr. Skellum next took his place.

In a clear and brevilquent manner he gave the magistrate a full relation of all the occurrences of the preceding night.

Among the rest was, of course, the dying declaration of John Roots.

At this intimation, coming so abruptly and unexpectedly as it did, Jack changed countenance.

He knew, of course, his perfect innocence of the crime thus imputed to him, and he was about to utter an indignant denial, but a second thought made him silent.

In it, however, he fancied he could trace the spirit of his master's malevolence towards him, but whether he was right or not in this is hard to tell. In all probability, John Roots believed that it was Jack who shot him.

The case, of course, excited the utmost attention, and Jack found himself the Observed of all observers.

The clerk of the court took down Mr. Skellum's statement in full, and, when this was done, two of the officers were called to give corroborative evidence.

This they did in a remarkably clear manner.

There was not in the crowded court one person who did not believe Jack guilty of the heinous crime of which he was accused.

After this, the usual question was put to the prisoner as to whether he had anything to say, or any questions to ask.

But Jack shook his head, and was silent.

He knew quite well that nothing he could say would tend in any way to dissipate his guilt, and perhaps his words would be construed in such a manner as to make him appear still worse.

Therefore he was wisely silent.

The magistrate took upon himself to make several remarks upon the case, and concluded by committing Jack to Newgate, as he had the other two.

He was then removed from the dock, but, as he descended, his eyes fell upon the countenance of one man, who stood near the door of the court.

It was lighted up with a demoniac smile of triumph and gratified revenge.

The face was one awful in the extreme to look upon.

The skin was black and scorched.

The hair singed.

The eyes bloodshot.

He nodded his head at Jack in a particularly disagreeable manner.

Jack knew him.

It was impossible for any one having once looked into that hideous physiognomy, to mistake it.

It was Jonathan Wild.

Jack had only a moment to glance at him, however.

But on his way from the dock to the door of the court, Jack noticed another face.

It was one which he fancied he had seen somewhere or other, but he could not recollect where.

He, too, nodded his head to him, but in a manner expressive of friendly feeling towards him.

Jack nodded in return, and then the door was closed behind him.

Once more was he securely pinioned, and led to the hackney-coach, which was waiting before the door of the court, and in which Flood and Blewitt were already seated.

In very much the same manner as he had been brought there, Jack was taken back to Newgate.

His reflections were of a peculiarly bitter turn, but, notwithstanding that, he had his eyes open to everything that was occurring around him, and in readiness to take advantage of anything he might see likely to serve him.

But there was none.

The fact of his having performed the unparalleled and hitherto disbelieved feat of breaking out of Newgate, caused them to be more than ordinarily watchful of him.

What would Edgworth Bess think, should she hear of what had taken place?

He felt that he should be for ever ruined in her estimation.

He felt his anger rise when his eye fell upon the two men who had been the chief means of bringing this trouble upon him.

Then he thought of Jonathan Wild, and a deep curse came from his lips, as he remembered that he was the primary cause of all the trouble he had known.

CHAPTER CLIX.

BLUESKIN AND STEGGS MATURE THEIR PLANS AGAINST WILD.

As Jack will be tolerably safe in Newgate for some time to come, we feel that we can leave him there for a time, and turn our attention to other personages in this eventful drama.

We have already hinted that Blueskin, after he parted with Steggs in the manner related in a former chapter, searched long and unsuccessfully for some trace of his young friend, Jack Sheppard.

In the manner he was dressed he felt pretty sure he should escape notice, unless, indeed, he was to come face to face with his old master, Jonathan Wild.

Then, indeed, his position would be a dangerous one; out that was a remote contingency, and one that he would have to take care to guard against.

As a last hope, and not without considerable apprehension he had ventured into the "Black Lion."

It may, perhaps, be as well to state that, previous to this, he had been to the "Fountain," in Gilbert-passage, and there learned that Jack had called and inquired for him.

The landlord also imparted the additional intelligence that he had brought two more men with him, who, from the description given, Blueskin recognised at once.

From Johnson, at the "Black Lion," however, he got no information whatever.

Then, upon going down Wych-street in the direction of the Borough, for day was close at hand, he had seen the crowd in front of John Roots' house.

What took place from that time to when he looked into the window of the coach as it stopped opposite Newgate, we already know.

Blueskin's principal motive in following the coach, was to see whether Jack was really taken to the prison or to Jonathan Wild's house, and he could not help experiencing a certain amount of satisfaction when he found it was not the latter.

He was also desirous of letting Jack know that he was safe, and that his present whereabouts was known to him.

He imagined Jack would gather this much by the expression of his countenance.

He lingered until the ponderous lodge-door of the prison was closed, and then, without further delay, he separated himself from the throng of people.

But he had been observed by several, and, in order to avoid them, he hailed a hackney-coach which was passing by the top of the street and got into it, giving orders to be driven to the Borough.

By the time he reached this place it was broad daylight, and people began to make their appearance in the deserted thoroughfares.

The public-house was closed, and, not wishing to disturb the inhabitants, he made his way to the stables attached to it.

Here he found persons moving about, and, upon stating who he was, they permitted him to lie down on some hay in the loft.

He had not been long in this place before he fell fast asleep, nor did he awake until nearly nine o'clock.

Hastily descending the ladder, he crossed the yard and entered the house, the usual daily business of which had commenced.

Upon inquiry, he soon found his new friend Steggs.

A wonderful change had taken place in his appearance, more than one would believe could have been effected in so short a period.

In answer to his eager questions for intelligence, Blueskin told him all he knew.

"Come with me," he added, as he concluded. "He will certainly be taken before the magistrate this morning, in order to be committed to take his trial."

"It will be a case with him this time, I am afraid."

"Things look black, but still they may improve. Now, I should attend the examination myself, only I am afraid of being recognised. You would not run so much risk, because you are not so well known as I am."

"Well?"

"I want to know at once what takes place, because my future operations will greatly depend upon it."

"I see."

"I will go with you to the court, and wait somewhere for you while you are inside. Take particular notice of all that is said and done."

"I will."

"That is agreed, then. Let us start at once."

"But Jonathan Wild?"

"What of him?"

"Do you think he will be there?"

"I know not. I fancy, very likely he will, and yet I don't know. I could not hear anything of him while I was inquiring."

"Do you think he would recognise me?"

"No. I am sure he would not; you have so greatly altered, I should never have known you had it not been for your voice."

"I see, and Jonathan has no need to hear that."

"None at all; and, even supposing you are there, he will hardly notice you among the crowd."

"You have not forgotten the scheme I proposed to you?"

"No."

"I shall have to be very careful."

"You will, but we must defer talking about that until after we learn the result of the examination."

"I think I could find a disguise that would answer the purpose."

"I have no doubt you could, but then you never know what may happen, and I want to be quite sure. Would that I could discover some trace of Edgworth Bess."

"You have still been unsuccessful?"

"Quite. I cannot find any one who can give me any information respecting her."

"Then we must wait with patience, and see what the current of events will turn up."

"I cannot tell what more we can do, but come, if we do not start at once we shall be too late, for the court opens at ten."

"I am ready," said Steggs. "Which will be our best way?"

"By water will be the quickest and nearest."

"Good."

The pair sallied out from the inn, and quickly reached the river side, where they hired a boat to take them to the Savoy-steps.

At that period, of course, the river steamboats were unknown, and the journey was performed by light boats, or wherries as they were called, which were rowed by one man.

Nothing occurred during their transit from one bank of the river to the other deserving of particular notice.

The Savoy-steps were reached in a short time, for the tide was in their favour.

Landing, they made their way with all speed to Bow-street.

Upon arriving here, however, they found that the court had been open some time.

Blueskin, pursuant to an arrangement between them, stopped at a coffee-house in Russell-street, while Steggs went alone into the court-house.

He was allowed to pass unquestioned, and by degrees wormed himself into the densest part of the throng.

Here he watched and waited.

Presently, however, as his eyes were turned towards the door, he saw that person enter whose presence he above all things wished to shun.

Jonathan Wild.

Steggs did not, however, let his eyes rest upon him for a moment, lest the thief-taker should perceive him.

He stood in such a manner that his back was turned towards him.

Our readers must recollect that, though Steggs had to all appearance repented of the past, and turned the friend of those whom he had before assisted to persecute, yet he had a deep grudge against Jack Sheppard.

There are some natures so constituted that they can never forget or forgive an insult or an injury, and Steggs was one of these.

At first, therefore, when Jack was placed in the dock, he recollected the defeat he had met with at his hands, and he rejoiced at the peril of his situation.

But it was only for a few moments that he gave way to this feeling.

He stifled it.

With the greatest attention he listened to every word.

He involuntarily shook his head, as the details were one by one laid bare.

It was Steggs who had nodded in a friendly manner to Jack, as he was leaving the dock.

Then Jack, although he had only a confused recollection of his face, nodded again.

Steggs turned away instantly, and it was well he did so, for Jonathan Wild had observed the movement, and looked round like lightning to see what friend of Jack's was present.

He was unsuccessful, however, for Steggs had the back of his head towards him.

But he had another means of detection left.

Nothing would have pleased him better than to have made his way to the room in which Jack Sheppard was, but he controlled his inclination.

He wanted to know most who had nodded to him. Planting himself, then, against the doorway, he narrowly scrutinized everyone as they went out.

Jack's examination concluded the day's business, so all made a move to leave the court.

Steggs was not long before he perceived his enemy's manoeuvre.

He felt himself in a very awkward position.

To hold back, however, would only be to insure detection.

Perhaps, if he went with the stream, he would be unnoticed.

He fairly trembled, however, when he saw Wild's bloodshot eyes glaring around, and there were many others who were as uneasy as himself.

But for once chance favoured him.

He had taken care to place himself in the deusest part of the crowd, and a considerable crush took place at the door.

In this crush Steggs dropped his hat.

It was done quite unintentionally, but he immediately availed himself of the incident.

He stooped down to pick it up, and, while doing so, managed to pass through the door.

He was unnoticed.

Once outside, he ran as fast as he could to the coffee-house, where he had agreed to meet Blueskin.

Then, having made him acquainted with all particulars, the two sat down and deliberated upon the scheme which Steggs had proposed, and the result of which was to be the total destruction of Jonathan Wild.

CHAPTER CLX.

THE GOVERNOR OF NEWGATE IMPARTS A PLEASANT PIECE OF INFORMATION TO JONATHAN WILD.

TIME, the unfold of all mysteries, will speedily reveal not only the nature of the plot against the thief-taker, but also the amount of success with which it is crowned.

Leaving, therefore, Blueskin and Steggs to arrange its minor details, we will go back a little.

After the destruction of "The Larches," Jonathan Wild had Edgworth Bess conveyed in a coach to Dover.

He stopped at a small but respectable inn, where the still insensible girl was placed in bed, and medical assistance immediately sent for.

An examination showed that although she had been scorched in many places, the burns were nearly all of a superficial, and none of a dangerous character.

Jonathan received the intelligence with much satisfaction.

He was in dread that after all his trouble he should lose her, and all his carefully-constructed plans would then be destroyed.

By his orders, the landlady of the house procured for Edgworth Bess a complete change of raiment, for those she had on were little better than tinders.

Jonathan himself, from the numberless wounds and burns he had received, stood greatly in need of medical treatment, but he disdained the idea altogether.

Besides he could not spare the time.

No sooner was he aware of Bess's safety, than leaving the inn, he hastened back to the burning ruins.

But the fire had reached its culminating point, when the roof fell in, and that in a great measure extinguished it.

All that now remained was a huge smouldering heap--in some places glowing red, in others emitting a dense black and suffocating smoke.

There was nothing to be gained by standing there and watching, Wild thought, so he called to his men to follow him away.

Little did he think how large an amount of booty he would have gained had he taken the trouble to sit the ashes.

The greater portion of his band was with him, but there were others in the cavern below, to which Wild directed those men who had landed to lead him.

It was reached in a very short time afterwards.

The destruction of the pirate band had been complete.

Upon issuing the order that all the dead should be left upon the ground, and the wounded led out as prisoners, only five wretched-looking objects could be found.

They were all who remained of the much-dreaded pirate band.

These Jonathan had securely bound, placed in the boats, and rowed ashore.

His own men were all terribly fatigued, and many of them had received hurts of such a character as precluded their immediate removal from where they were.

Jonathan himself, however, determined not to stay, and accordingly as soon as he had made those arrangements which he could not avoid staying to do, he ordered a carriage, and set out for London, taking Edgworth Bess with him.

The poor girl was hardly in a fit state to be removed, but Jonathan did not feel safe with her unless she was within his own house in Newgate-street.

The doctor, however, had told him that no particular harm would result from the journey, but advised him not to take it unless circumstances made it imperative.

This was enough for Wild to set off without delay.

How he reached Newgate-street we have already seen.

"Tonks!" he cried, as soon as that individual had closed the door behind him.

"Yes, Mr. Wild!"

"Send some one for Mr. Snoxall at once."

"Yes, sir!"

"And when he comes, let him wait for me."

Still holding Bess in his arms, who had been in a strange death-like trance during the whole of the journey, and which may be attributed to fright and exhaustion, Jonathan crossed the hall, and though the effort was almost beyond his strength, carried her up two flights of stairs.

Then, pushing open a door which was only partially closed, he entered a room which the dim and ghostlike light of early morning, as it struggled through the window, showed to be furnished as a bed-chamber.

As carefully as possible, Jonathan laid the poor heiress upon the bed.

He felt his heart sicken with dread as he gazed upon her pallid countenance, which seemed like that of a corpse.

Should she die, farewell to the daring, ambitious dream with which he had indulged his fancy.

His policy now was to take as much pains as he could to keep her alive.

When he had attained his ends, when the broad acres which owned the Downmills as their owners were fairly his, she could die as soon as she pleased.

He should never trouble himself about her then.

Feeling that he could do nothing, and anxious for the arrival of the apothecary, who has already more than once made his appearance before the reader, Jonathan left the room, carefully locking the door after him.

He descended the stairs, and entered his office.

Upon the desk were a number of communications, but none of them of particular importance, or connected with this history.

In about a quarter of an hour, Mr. Snoxall arrived.

Without any circumlocution, Jonathan led him up into the bedroom.

"I leave this young girl in your care," he said; "recover her."

Mr. Snoxall felt her pulse.

Then shook his head.

The action increased Jonathan's alarm.

"She is very bad," remarked the chemist.

"Restore her to health," said the thief-taker, "and you shall have a hundred guineas for your pains; nay, two hundred if you will do it quickly."

"I will try my best," replied Mr. Snoxall. "She is in a very precarious state, and rest and medicine are absolutely necessary. Above all," he added, "there must be mental quietude, or what I do will be of slight avail."

"I leave her with you," said Jonathan. "Remember your reward."

With these words on his lips, he turned on his heel, and departed.

Scarcely, however, had he reached the ground floor of his abode, than he heard a loud summons for admittance.

Wondering who it could be, at that early hour, he stood where he was, and waited.

"Where's Mr. Wild?" asked a voice, which Jonathan immediately recognised.

It was that of Mr. Noskes, the governor of Newgate.

"Come in, sir," said Tonks, "he will be down directly."

"I am here," said Wild, as he stepped forward.

"Ah!" exclaimed the governor, "I have important news for you."

[JONATHAN WILD ENRAGES JACK SHEPPARD BY HIS TAUNTS.]

But the man bore the scrutiny unflinchingly.

The reader doubtless suspects who it was.

It was Steggs.

He had very carefully disguised himself—so carefully, indeed, that no one, not even Lord Donnull, could have recognised him.

The cringing manner he had assumed, partly because it was one that he could act without much difficulty, and partly because he considered he should best deceive Jonathan by it.

Wild did not know him.

Clever as he was in penetrating a disguise, that of Steggs baffled him.

He was careful, too, to change his voice.

"What do you want?" asked the thief-taker; "speak! I've no time to lose."

Steggs twirled the hat more rapidly between his fingers, and appeared confused.

"What do you want?" roared Wild, again.

"Mr. Wild!" stammered Steggs.

"Well!"

"You employ a goodish many men, sir."

"Ya-ah!"

"I am a poor fellow."

"Ya-ah!"

"I can't get no work."

"Ya-ah!"

"Mr. Wild, will you take me into your service? I am sure I'll serve you faithfully."

Jonathan was about to reply at once in the negative, but a sudden consideration induced him to alter his mind.

He looked still more keenly at his visitor.

Now was Steggs in danger.

The scheme he had proposed was, indeed, a bold one.

It was to enter Wild's service.

To profess himself to be his most devoted adherent.

To worm himself as much as he could into his secrets.

Then when he felt that he had him securely in his power.

When he felt that he could not escape.

Then he should turn against him. Achieve his ruin.

But the scheme, bold and daring as it was, would not be very easy to carry out.

Jonathan was a man not easily to be deceived.

Should he discover the imposture, Steggs would have to suffer for it.

Jonathan Wild, although he had a great many men in his gang, was always careful not to engage one without he had evidence of his having committed a felony.

Then he could do just what he liked with him, because of his being able at any time to bring a charge against him.

Now Steggs was not liable to this.

But something about him—in all probability, his humble or rather servile manner—seemed to please him, and he felt inclined to waive this objection.

Besides, he thought it would not be long before he got a hold upon him of some sort or other.

The defection of Flood and Blewitt had, of course, made a vacancy in the number of his personal adherents.

The man before him desired to enter his employ.

He was ragged and starving, and he thought he should have some claim upon his gratitude—not that Wild ever had much idea of that, for in his own self he was almost a stranger to it.

"Are you willing to do my bidding?" he growled, looking fiercely upon Steggs. "It will be no child's play, I can tell you!"

"Try me, Mr. Wild," whimpered Steggs. "Give me a trial, do, sir! Oh! dear."

It was like the spider asking the fly to walk into his parlour only once.

"I will," said Jonathan, after a moment's consideration, "and you will find that if you will only do your duty you will have a good place, and earn heaps of money."

"Mr. Wild," said Steggs, "you will always find me to be your very humble servant on all occasions when I shall be of the slightest service to you."

"Don't say too much," growled the thief-taker. "Serve me faithfully. I am sick of the treachery of those around me, and wish to find some one in whom I can confide and rely. I shall put you on your trial, and if you try to play me false in any matter, you know the result."

"Oh! dear."

"A ride to Tyburn, and a dance upon nothing."

"Oh! dear."

"What makes you say, 'Oh! dear?'"

"It's a way I've got, Mr. Wild, that's all."

"Ya—ah!"

"May I consider the matter as settled, sir?"

"Yos. I shall keep a sharp eye upon your movements."

"And if you are satisfied, Mr. Wild?"

"You shall have nothing to grumble at."

"Thank you, sir. Oh! dear."

Bang! bang! went Wild's cudgel on the desk.

Wilkinson appeared.

"This man has entered my service," said the thief-taker, in a disagreeable voice. "See that he is treated properly."

"Yes, Mr. Wild. Oh! dear, yes, sir, of course."

Wilkinson was surprised.

But he did not dare show it.

Steggs followed him out.

As soon as he was alone, Jonathan resumed his meditations.

From the expression of his countenance, it might be gathered that they were of a particularly pleasing nature.

He was interrupted by his business, a detail of which would prove anything but pleasing to the reader.

At length, towards evening, he put on his hat, and left his house, muttering as he did so.

"It will do me good to see him, and now I have had some work, why shouldn't I have some pleasure? Ha! ha!"

CHAPTER CLXII.

BLUESKIN, BY MEANS OF A HEAVY FEE, RETAINS THE SERVICES OF AN EMINENT LAWYER ON BEHALF OF JACK SHEPPARD.

IMMURED in one of the darkest, deepest, and strongest cells in Newgate, was Jack Sheppard.

It was far—very far indeed—beneath the surface, and a faint reflected light was all that illumined it.

The walls were slippery with moisture, and covered in many places with glittering exhalations of a nitry character, while on the floor the damp had collected in a number of tiny pools.

It was, in truth, as cheerless a place as could well have been imagined.

The little aperture near the roof, and which, for the want of a better appellation, we suppose we must call the window, was unglazed, and defended with strong iron bars.

It seemed almost a mockery to place them there, for what fettered prisoner would be able to climb up the smooth slippery stones, which afforded neither hand nor foothold.

The door which opened into the stone passage was of itself a masterpiece of strength.

It was plated on the inner side with sheet iron.

The frame of the door was also sheathed with iron.

That, indeed, seemed something through which it would be impossible to force a passage; but, beyond that, there was the stone corridor protected by just such another door, and many more, before the street could be reached.

What man was there, who, in the full possession of health and strength, and provided with every tool requisite for his purpose, who could have worked his way to freedom undetected?

We are not afraid to say no one.

But Jack Sheppard had no tools whatever.

He was fettered, too, in such a manner that no one could have got free from them.

Round his waist was a broad iron ring, weighing many pounds.

It was secured by a padlock.

A ring was fixed in one part of it, and through this a chain was linked, which was fastened at the other end to a large iron staple cemented in the stonework.

And not only this, but his ankles were encircled with iron rings, to which long links of chain were affixed, and riveted to his girdle.

Then his wrists were secured in a similar manner, except that the chain which connected them was formed of small links, and was not attached to the iron ring round his middle.

Thus loaded—for it is stated, upon good authority, that the aggregate weight of the fetters worn by him on this occasion exceeded two hundred and thirty pounds—he found it a matter of considerable difficulty to move at all.

Did not escape, then, seem out of the question?

It did; and even Jack lost all hope when he reflected upon the obstacles he would have to overcome before he could get free.

Gloomily, then, after he had been left to himself, he sat down upon the stone bench and thought.

And the more he thought the more he gave way to despair.

What the result of the morrow's proceedings would be, when he was put upon his trial, he already knew.

Was Jonathan Wild to triumph?

It seemed so.

Blueskin was at liberty, and doubtless would do all he could to serve him; but Jack was one of those who place but slight reliance upon the proceedings of others, preferring to depend upon his own.

And when he saw his inability to aid himself, it made him doubtful of the ability of others.

Slowly and wearily the hours wore away, but he made no movement.

He bent his head in sorrowful dejection.

What had been his life?

A brief and unhappy course, to meet with a violent termination.

His most bitter thought was the revulsion of feeling which Edgworth Bess would feel towards him upon hearing the account of the murder.

He had seen her for the last time, he thought; and, even should he, by some chance or other, regain his freedom, she would never treat him as she had formerly done.

This was hard, indeed, to bear, for, despite the difference there was in their position—or, rather, rank—he loved her with his whole heart.

The passion was a wayward one, no doubt. It could not be otherwise in such a fierce spirit, but, after his own fashion, he did love her.

It was not, however, that he ever thought of her becoming his wife. He looked up to her as being something as far above him as the stars, and, like them, only to be admired at a distance.

But, above all things, was he desirous of standing well in her opinion. He would gladly have gone through fire and water, or endured a thousand deaths to do her service; and a good word from her, or a smile of approbation, he would have felt to be an ample reward.

It must not be forgotten that the by far greater portion of Wild's enmity towards him was induced by his espousing the cause of the poor heiress. Had he consented to aid Wild in his iniquitous designs against her, he would have had the thief-taker on his side.

But it is questionable whether the enmity of such a man as Jonathan Wild was not preferable to his friendship.

Had he in reality been guilty of the heinous crime of which he had been accused, Jack would not have felt it half so much as he did. He almost felt that he could be content to die were that stigma removed from his name.

His ruminations were interrupted just as it was growing dusk, by the entrance of a jailor into the dungeon.

"Here's a visitor for you, Jack," he cried. "Walk in, sir, if you please."

Jack looked up eagerly.

His first thought was that it was Blueskin who had come to pay him this visit, and he was somewhat disappointed when he saw standing before him an individual whom he had certainly never seen before, and who his dress proclaimed to be a lawyer.

"Your name is Sheppard, I presume," he said, with a bow and a smile.

"Well, sir."

"I have been sent here."

"Indeed!"

"Allow me to say, in fact," added the lawyer, with a satisfied smile at his own wit.

"By whom have you been sent?" asked Jack, suspiciously, for he fancied in this he could detect some deep-laid scheme on the part of his arch-enemy. "By whom have you been sent?"

"I will tell you, Mr. Sheppard, for the gentleman who paid me my fee had an idea that you would mistrust me, and therefore put me in possession of a kind of password, if I may so speak, by which you might know it was to your own interest to speak freely to me."

"And what is it?"

"The name by which the gentleman is often called by those who are intimate with him, is Blueskin, on account of the colour of his face. By others he is called Mr. Joseph Blake. Neither of these, however, is his right name."

"I am aware of that," said Jack, "and so are fifty more."

"That may be, my dear sir, but don't be so impatient. He told me this much, and then said that you were the only person now living, save one, who knew his real name."

"That is quite true," replied Jack, whose suspicions began to dissipate. "But did he tell you his real name, in order to convince me that you were really sent by him?"

"He did."

"Then tell it me at once. I shall then have all the doubts I feel removed."

"The name is—"

"Say it in a whisper," cried Jack, interrupting him. "The turnkey may be listening, and I know he wants it kept from all such ears. Now tell me."

The lawyer put his mouth to Jack's ear.

"Stephen Ticknor."

"Enough," said Jack. "Such is, indeed, his real name, as he confided it to me. Did he say that it was known to but one other person besides myself?"

"Yes."

"I know to whom he alludes, and that person, although the name may be familiar to him, does not identify it with Blueskin."

"So much the better, then, my dear sir, as it forms a sort of additional proof that I was really sent by him, and with the intention of doing you a service."

"It does. Tell me the particulars."

"Certainly, if you wish it, though time is precious, and I have much to say to you."

"Go on."

"To be sure. This morning, then, I was visited in my chambers in Lyon's Inn by this friend of yours, who gave me a highly satisfactory fee, and engaged my services to employ a counsel to defend you on your trial to-morrow."

Jack shook his head.

"I am afraid it will be of little use. The case is too clear against me."

"It does seem very so," replied the lawyer. "Your friend could not give me all the particulars, so I went to Bow-street to read over the depositions."

"Mr. ——" said Jack, and he paused, for he did not know the name of his visitor.

"Cunningham," suggested the lawyer, blandly. "Mr. Jacob Cunningham."

Jack bowed.

"What I was about to say was this—I have an enemy."

"Ha!"

"An enemy, too, of no ordinary kind—an enemy above all to be dreaded."

"That is awkward."

"An enemy who is all powerful. He will appear against me, and it is notorious that, if ever he gives evidence against any one, that person is sure to be convicted."

"I can guess who you mean."

"Doubtless."

"The description is quite sufficient," said the lawyer.

"You mean Jonathan Wild."

CHAPTER CLXIII.

THE GOVERNOR OF NEWGATE AND JONATHAN WILD CONSULT TOGETHER AS TO THE BEST MEANS OF RENDERING MR. CUNNINGHAM'S SERVICES OF NO AVAIL.

"I do," said Jack. "He has been, and is, my evil genius. Through him my father was brought to the scaffold, and he has sworn, over and over again, that I shall die at the hangman's hands."

"I have heard," remarked the lawyer, "that one of his characteristics is, that, sooner or later, he never fails to keep his word."

"It is so," responded Jack, gloomily.

"But come—come," said Mr. Cunningham, "this won't do; it isn't business. Never mind Jonathan Wild just at present. We will decide what to do with him by and bye."

"You might spare yourself the trouble."

"Pho—pho—not all. I have been paid well, and I shall try my best to earn it. There is this about it, too: it would be a very glorious thing to overthrow Jonathan Wild—a very glorious thing indeed."

"No doubt."

"Then let us do our best. If we don't make an effort we are sure not to do it."

"But the case is so clear."

"Never mind that."

"And there are so many serious counts in the indictment, that it would be impossible for me to be acquitted on all of them."

"Stay—stay. Don't take things for granted quite so much. Listen to me."

"What is it?"

"Tell me, if you can, what counts there will be. Take a moment to reflect, and then tell me calmly."

Jack did so.

"The first," he said, "will no doubt be for committing a robbery at the residence of a Mr. Hadley."

"Hum," said the lawyer, as he made a note of the circumstance in a note-book which he produced; "and am I to consider that there is sufficient ground to support that count?"

"If you mean," said Jack, bluntly, "did I commit the burglary, I answer, yes."

"Oh! a burglary was it?"

"Yes."

"You said a robbery before."

"Did I?"

"Yes; and they are two rather different things, you

Figure 1 consists of two panels, A and B, showing Northern blot analysis. Panel A displays 18S rRNA levels, and Panel B displays GAPDH mRNA levels. Each panel has three lanes labeled 'control', '100 nM', and '1000 nM'. Molecular weight markers are indicated on the left of each panel. In Panel A, the 18S rRNA bands are visible at approximately 18S and 28S positions. In Panel B, the GAPDH mRNA bands are visible at approximately 2.2 kb and 2.0 kb positions. The intensity of the bands increases with the concentration of the treatment, particularly at 1000 nM.

1. The first part of the document is a list of names and titles, including "The Hon. Mr. Justice" and "The Hon. Mr. Justice".

1. The first group of people who are interested in the results of the study are the researchers themselves. They want to know if the study was successful in achieving its goals and if the data collected is reliable and valid. They also want to know if the study has contributed to the field of research and if it has any practical implications.

1. The first part of the document is a list of names and titles, including "The Hon. Mr. Justice" and "The Hon. Mr. Justice".

1. The first step is to identify the problem or question that needs to be answered. This involves understanding the context and the specific requirements of the task.

2. The second step is to gather relevant information and data. This can be done through research, consultation with experts, or by analyzing existing data sets.

3. The third step is to develop a plan or strategy to address the problem. This involves breaking down the problem into smaller, manageable parts and determining the best approach to solve each part.

4. The fourth step is to implement the plan. This involves carrying out the tasks and activities that have been identified in the plan.

5. The fifth step is to evaluate the results. This involves comparing the actual outcomes with the expected outcomes and identifying any areas for improvement.

6. The sixth step is to communicate the findings. This involves sharing the results of the analysis with the relevant stakeholders and providing recommendations for action.

7. The seventh step is to monitor and review the process. This involves keeping track of the progress of the project and making adjustments as needed to ensure that the project is completed successfully.

8. The eighth step is to document the process. This involves creating a record of the steps taken and the results achieved, which can be used for future reference and learning.

9. The ninth step is to reflect on the experience. This involves thinking about what was learned from the project and how it can be applied to future projects.

10. The tenth step is to celebrate the success. This involves acknowledging the achievements of the team and the successful completion of the project.

THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO PRESS

1. The first part of the document is a list of names and titles, including "The Hon. Mr. Justice" and "The Hon. Mr. Justice".

1. The first step is to identify the key components of the system. This includes understanding the hardware, software, and data involved. 2. The second step is to define the requirements for the system. This involves determining what the system needs to do and what it must be able to handle. 3. The third step is to design the system. This includes creating a detailed plan of how the system will be built and how it will be tested. 4. The fourth step is to implement the system. This involves building the system according to the design and testing it to ensure it meets the requirements. 5. The fifth step is to maintain the system. This involves monitoring the system for problems and making changes as needed to keep it running smoothly.

[illegible][illegible]

100

Figure 1: Northern blot analysis of 18S rRNA and GAPDH mRNA levels in various cell lines. The blot shows bands for 18S rRNA and GAPDH mRNA across 12 lanes. Lanes 1-4 are untreated cells (MDA-MB-231, MCF-7, BT-20, BT-20). Lanes 5-8 are cells treated with 10⁻⁶ M doxorubicin for 48h. Lanes 9-12 are cells treated with 10⁻⁶ M doxorubicin for 48h in the presence of 10⁻⁶ M cyclosporin A. GAPDH mRNA levels are consistent across all lanes, while 18S rRNA levels are significantly reduced in lanes 5-8 compared to lanes 1-4.

1. Chlorophyll a (Chl a)
 2. Chlorophyll b (Chl b)
 3. Chlorophyll c (Chl c)
 4. Chlorophyll d (Chl d)
 5. Chlorophyll e (Chl e)
 6. Chlorophyll f (Chl f)
 7. Chlorophyll g (Chl g)
 8. Chlorophyll h (Chl h)
 9. Chlorophyll i (Chl i)
 10. Chlorophyll j (Chl j)
 11. Chlorophyll k (Chl k)
 12. Chlorophyll l (Chl l)
 13. Chlorophyll m (Chl m)
 14. Chlorophyll n (Chl n)
 15. Chlorophyll o (Chl o)
 16. Chlorophyll p (Chl p)
 17. Chlorophyll q (Chl q)
 18. Chlorophyll r (Chl r)
 19. Chlorophyll s (Chl s)
 20. Chlorophyll t (Chl t)
 21. Chlorophyll u (Chl u)
 22. Chlorophyll v (Chl v)
 23. Chlorophyll w (Chl w)
 24. Chlorophyll x (Chl x)
 25. Chlorophyll y (Chl y)
 26. Chlorophyll z (Chl z)
 27. Chlorophyll aa (Chl aa)
 28. Chlorophyll ab (Chl ab)
 29. Chlorophyll ac (Chl ac)
 30. Chlorophyll ad (Chl ad)
 31. Chlorophyll ae (Chl ae)
 32. Chlorophyll af (Chl af)
 33. Chlorophyll ag (Chl ag)
 34. Chlorophyll ah (Chl ah)
 35. Chlorophyll ai (Chl ai)
 36. Chlorophyll aj (Chl aj)
 37. Chlorophyll ak (Chl ak)
 38. Chlorophyll al (Chl al)
 39. Chlorophyll am (Chl am)
 40. Chlorophyll an (Chl an)
 41. Chlorophyll ao (Chl ao)
 42. Chlorophyll ap (Chl ap)
 43. Chlorophyll aq (Chl aq)
 44. Chlorophyll ar (Chl ar)
 45. Chlorophyll as (Chl as)
 46. Chlorophyll at (Chl at)
 47. Chlorophyll au (Chl au)
 48. Chlorophyll av (Chl av)
 49. Chlorophyll aw (Chl aw)
 50. Chlorophyll ax (Chl ax)
 51. Chlorophyll ay (Chl ay)
 52. Chlorophyll az (Chl az)
 53. Chlorophyll aza (Chl aza)
 54. Chlorophyll abz (Chl abz)
 55. Chlorophyll acz (Chl acz)
 56. Chlorophyll adz (Chl adz)
 57. Chlorophyll aez (Chl aez)
 58. Chlorophyll afz (Chl afz)
 59. Chlorophyll agz (Chl agz)
 60. Chlorophyll ahz (Chl ahz)
 61. Chlorophyll aiz (Chl aiz)
 62. Chlorophyll ajz (Chl ajz)
 63. Chlorophyll akz (Chl akz)
 64. Chlorophyll alz (Chl alz)
 65. Chlorophyll amz (Chl amz)
 66. Chlorophyll anz (Chl anz)
 67. Chlorophyll aoz (Chl aoz)
 68. Chlorophyll apz (Chl apz)
 69. Chlorophyll aqz (Chl aqz)
 70. Chlorophyll arz (Chl arz)
 71. Chlorophyll asz (Chl asz)
 72. Chlorophyll atz (Chl atz)
 73. Chlorophyll auz (Chl auz)
 74. Chlorophyll avz (Chl avz)
 75. Chlorophyll awz (Chl awz)
 76. Chlorophyll axz (Chl axz)
 77. Chlorophyll ayz (Chl ayz)
 78. Chlorophyll ayz (Chl ayz)
 79. Chlorophyll azz (Chl azz)
 80. Chlorophyll azaa (Chl aza)
 81. Chlorophyll abz (Chl abz)
 82. Chlorophyll acz (Chl acz)
 83. Chlorophyll adz (Chl adz)
 84. Chlorophyll aez (Chl aez)
 85. Chlorophyll afz (Chl afz)
 86. Chlorophyll agz (Chl agz)
 87. Chlorophyll ahz (Chl ahz)
 88. Chlorophyll aiz (Chl aiz)
 89. Chlorophyll ajz (Chl ajz)
 90. Chlorophyll akz (Chl akz)
 91. Chlorophyll alz (Chl alz)
 92. Chlorophyll amz (Chl amz)
 93. Chlorophyll anz (Chl anz)
 94. Chlorophyll aoz (Chl aoz)
 95. Chlorophyll apz (Chl apz)
 96. Chlorophyll aqz (Chl aqz)
 97. Chlorophyll arz (Chl arz)
 98. Chlorophyll asz (Chl asz)
 99. Chlorophyll atz (Chl atz)
 100. Chlorophyll auz (Chl auz)
 101. Chlorophyll avz (Chl avz)
 102. Chlorophyll awz (Chl awz)
 103. Chlorophyll axz (Chl axz)
 104. Chlorophyll ayz (Chl ayz)
 105. Chlorophyll ayz (Chl ayz)
 106. Chlorophyll ayz (Chl ayz)
 107. Chlorophyll ayz (Chl ayz)
 108. Chlorophyll ayz (Chl ayz)
 109. Chlorophyll ayz (Chl ayz)
 110. Chlorophyll ayz (Chl ayz)
 111. Chlorophyll ayz (Chl ayz)
 112. Chlorophyll ayz (Chl ayz)
 113. Chlorophyll ayz (Chl ayz)
 114. Chlorophyll ayz (Chl ayz)
 115. Chlorophyll ayz (Chl ayz)
 116. Chlorophyll ayz (Chl ayz)
 117. Chlorophyll ayz (Chl ayz)
 118. Chlorophyll ayz (Chl ayz)
 119. Chlorophyll ayz (Chl ayz)
 120. Chlorophyll ayz (Chl ayz)
 121. Chlorophyll ayz (Chl ayz)
 122. Chlorophyll ayz (Chl ayz)
 123. Chlorophyll ayz (Chl ayz)
 124. Chlorophyll ayz (Chl ayz)
 125. Chlorophyll ayz (Chl ayz)
 126. Chlorophyll ayz (Chl ayz)
 127. Chlorophyll ayz (Chl ayz)
 128. Chlorophyll ayz (Chl ayz)
 129. Chlorophyll ayz (Chl ayz)
 130. Chlorophyll ayz (Chl ayz)
 131. Chlorophyll ayz (Chl ayz)
 132. Chlorophyll ayz (Chl ayz

[illegible]

Figure 1 is a schematic representation of the experimental design. It shows a sequence of events: a subject is presented with a stimulus (a word), then a response is generated (a word), and finally, the response is evaluated (a word). The response is then used as the stimulus for the next trial. The process is repeated for multiple trials, with the response being evaluated and the stimulus being updated accordingly.

1. The first step in the process is to identify the problem or issue that needs to be addressed. This involves gathering information and understanding the context of the problem.

... ..

10. The Commission has also received information from the Government of the Republic of the Congo that the Government has been providing military training to the armed forces of the Republic of the Congo, which is a member of the Organization of African States.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA
DEPARTMENT OF THE ARMY
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF STAFF
WASHINGTON, D. C.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA
DEPARTMENT OF THE ARMY
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF STAFF
WASHINGTON, D. C. 20315

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA
DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR
BUREAU OF LAND MANAGEMENT
WASHINGTON, D. C. 20250

THE COMPANY WILL BE MADE TO THE EXTENT OF THE
THE COMPANY WILL BE MADE TO THE EXTENT OF THE

1. NAME _____

$\frac{1}{2} \times \frac{1}{2} = \frac{1}{4}$

IN THE SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

1. The first step is to identify the problem or question that needs to be answered. This involves understanding the context and the specific requirements of the task.

1. NAME _____
 2. ADDRESS _____
 3. CITY _____
 4. STATE _____
 5. ZIP _____
 6. PHONE _____
 7. DATE _____
 8. SIGNATURE _____
 9. PRINT NAME _____
 10. PRINT ADDRESS _____
 11. PRINT CITY _____
 12. PRINT STATE _____
 13. PRINT ZIP _____
 14. PRINT PHONE _____
 15. PRINT DATE _____
 16. PRINT SIGNATURE _____
 17. PRINT NAME _____
 18. PRINT ADDRESS _____
 19. PRINT CITY _____
 20. PRINT STATE _____
 21. PRINT ZIP _____
 22. PRINT PHONE _____
 23. PRINT DATE _____
 24. PRINT SIGNATURE _____
 25. PRINT NAME _____
 26. PRINT ADDRESS _____
 27. PRINT CITY _____
 28. PRINT STATE _____
 29. PRINT ZIP _____
 30. PRINT PHONE _____
 31. PRINT DATE _____
 32. PRINT SIGNATURE _____
 33. PRINT NAME _____
 34. PRINT ADDRESS _____
 35. PRINT CITY _____
 36. PRINT STATE _____
 37. PRINT ZIP _____
 38. PRINT PHONE _____
 39. PRINT DATE _____
 40. PRINT SIGNATURE _____
 41. PRINT NAME _____
 42. PRINT ADDRESS _____
 43. PRINT CITY _____
 44. PRINT STATE _____
 45. PRINT ZIP _____
 46. PRINT PHONE _____
 47. PRINT DATE _____
 48. PRINT SIGNATURE _____
 49. PRINT NAME _____
 50. PRINT ADDRESS _____
 51. PRINT CITY _____
 52. PRINT STATE _____
 53. PRINT ZIP _____
 54. PRINT PHONE _____
 55. PRINT DATE _____
 56. PRINT SIGNATURE _____
 57. PRINT NAME _____
 58. PRINT ADDRESS _____
 59. PRINT CITY _____
 60. PRINT STATE _____
 61. PRINT ZIP _____
 62. PRINT PHONE _____
 63. PRINT DATE _____
 64. PRINT SIGNATURE _____
 65. PRINT NAME _____
 66. PRINT ADDRESS _____
 67. PRINT CITY _____
 68. PRINT STATE _____
 69. PRINT ZIP _____
 70. PRINT PHONE _____
 71. PRINT DATE _____
 72. PRINT SIGNATURE _____
 73. PRINT NAME _____
 74. PRINT ADDRESS _____
 75. PRINT CITY _____
 76. PRINT STATE _____
 77. PRINT ZIP _____
 78. PRINT PHONE _____
 79. PRINT DATE _____
 80. PRINT SIGNATURE _____
 81. PRINT NAME _____
 82. PRINT ADDRESS _____
 83. PRINT CITY _____
 84. PRINT STATE _____
 85. PRINT ZIP _____
 86. PRINT PHONE _____
 87. PRINT DATE _____
 88. PRINT SIGNATURE _____
 89. PRINT NAME _____
 90. PRINT ADDRESS _____
 91. PRINT CITY _____
 92. PRINT STATE _____
 93. PRINT ZIP _____
 94. PRINT PHONE _____
 95. PRINT DATE _____
 96. PRINT SIGNATURE _____
 97. PRINT NAME _____
 98. PRINT ADDRESS _____
 99. PRINT CITY _____
 100. PRINT STATE _____
 101. PRINT ZIP _____
 102. PRINT PHONE _____
 103. PRINT DATE _____
 104. PRINT SIGNATURE _____
 105. PRINT NAME _____
 106. PRINT ADDRESS _____
 107. PRINT CITY _____
 108. PRINT STATE _____
 109. PRINT ZIP _____
 110. PRINT PHONE _____
 111. PRINT DATE _____
 112. PRINT SIGNATURE _____
 113. PRINT NAME _____
 114. PRINT ADDRESS _____
 115. PRINT CITY _____
 116. PRINT STATE _____
 117. PRINT ZIP _____
 118. PRINT PHONE _____
 119. PRINT DATE _____
 120. PRINT SIGNATURE _____
 121. PRINT NAME _____
 122. PRINT ADDRESS _____
 123. PRINT CITY _____
 124. PRINT STATE _____
 125. PRINT ZIP _____
 126. PRINT PHONE _____
 127. PRINT DATE _____
 128. PRINT SIGNATURE _____
 129. PRINT NAME _____
 130. PRINT ADDRESS _____
 131. PRINT CITY _____
 132. PRINT STATE _____
 133. PRINT ZIP _____
 134. PRINT PHONE _____
 135. PRINT DATE _____
 136. PRINT SIGNATURE _____
 137. PRINT NAME _____
 138. PRINT ADDRESS _____
 139. PRINT CITY _____
 140. PRINT STATE _____
 141. PRINT ZIP _____
 142. PRINT PHONE _____
 143. PRINT DATE _____
 144. PRINT SIGNATURE _____
 145. PRINT NAME _____
 146. PRINT ADDRESS _____
 147. PRINT CITY _____
 148. PRINT STATE _____
 149. PRINT ZIP _____
 150. PRINT PHONE _____
 151. PRINT DATE _____
 152. PRINT SIGNATURE _____
 153. PRINT NAME _____
 154. PRINT ADDRESS _____
 155. PRINT CITY _____
 156. PRINT STATE _____
 157. PRINT ZIP _____
 158. PRINT PHONE _____
 159. PRINT DATE _____
 160. PRINT SIGNATURE _____
 161. PRINT NAME _____
 162. PRINT ADDRESS _____
 163. PRINT CITY _____
 164. PRINT STATE _____
 165. PRINT ZIP _____
 166. PRINT PHONE _____
 167. PRINT DATE _____
 168. PRINT SIGNATURE _____
 169. PRINT NAME _____
 170. PRINT ADDRESS _____
 171. PRINT CITY _____
 172. PRINT STATE _____
 173. PRINT ZIP _____
 174. PRINT PHONE _____
 175. PRINT DATE _____
 176. PRINT SIGNATURE _____
 177. PRINT NAME _____
 178. PRINT ADDRESS _____
 179. PRINT CITY _____
 180. PRINT STATE _____
 181. PRINT ZIP _____
 182. PRINT PHONE _____
 183. PRINT DATE _____
 184. PRINT SIGNATURE _____
 185. PRINT NAME _____
 186. PRINT ADDRESS _____
 187. PRINT CITY _____
 188. PRINT STATE _____
 189. PRINT ZIP _____
 190. PRINT PHONE _____
 191. PRINT DATE _____
 192. PRINT SIGNATURE _____
 193. PRINT NAME _____
 194. PRINT ADDRESS _____
 195. PRINT CITY _____
 196. PRINT STATE _____
 197. PRINT ZIP _____
 198. PRINT PHONE _____
 199. PRINT DATE _____
 200. PRINT SIGNATURE _____
 201. PRINT NAME _____
 202. PRINT ADDRESS _____
 203. PRINT CITY _____
 204. PRINT STATE _____
 205. PRINT ZIP _____
 206. PRINT PHONE _____
 207. PRINT DATE _____
 208. PRINT SIGNATURE _____
 209. PRINT NAME _____
 210. PRINT ADDRESS _____
 211. PRINT CITY _____
 212. PRINT STATE _____
 213. PRINT ZIP _____
 214. PRINT PHONE _____
 215. PRINT DATE _____
 216. PRINT SIGNATURE _____
 217. PRINT NAME _____
 218. PRINT ADDRESS _____
 219. PRINT CITY _____
 220. PRINT STATE _____

1. The first step in the process is to identify the problem or issue that needs to be addressed. This involves gathering information and understanding the context of the problem.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

THE

1. The first part of the document is a list of names and titles, including "The Hon. Mr. Justice" and "The Hon. Mr. Justice".

100

THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO

1. Mr. J. Edgar Hoover
2. Mr. Clegg
3. Mr. Glavin
4. Mr. Ladd
5. Mr. Nichols
6. Mr. Rosen
7. Mr. Tracy
8. Mr. Carson
9. Mr. Egan
10. Mr. Gurnea
11. Mr. Hendon
12. Mr. Pennington
13. Mr. Quinn
14. Mr. Nease
15. Mr. Gandy

1. The first group of people who are interested in the study of the history of the United States are the people who are interested in the history of the United States.

[Illegible text]

"Who is coming?" he added.

His quick ear had caught the sound of a footstep.

Another moment, and there was a knock at the door.

"Come in!" roared the governor.

A turnkey appeared.

"If you please, sir, I've come to say, according to orders, that the lawyer has just left Jack Sheppard's cell."

"Very good," said the governor; "that will do."

CHAPTER CXLIV.

JONATHAN WILD TAUNTS JACK SHEPPARD, AND NEARLY PAYS FOR HIS PLEASANTRY WITH HIS LIFE.

JONATHAN WILD sprang to his feet as soon as the turnkey left.

"Mr. Noakes."

"What is it, Mr. Wild?"

"Have you a man about the place that you can trust?"

"I don't know. What is it to do?"

"Let some one follow the lawyer when he goes out, yet without seeming to do so."

"I see."

"And watch where he goes."

"That's it, Mr. Wild."

"We can make up our minds what to do when he comes back."

"So we can."

"Be off with you, then."

"I shall be too late, if I don't make haste."

Mr. Noakes precipitately left the room as he spoke, in order to send the spy upon his errand.

In a few minutes he returned.

"It's all right," he said.

"Can you depend upon the man you have sent?"

"I think so."

"Has he ever done a similar job for you before?"

"Oh! yes. The fact is, Mr. Wild, I've got rather a hold upon him."

"I see."

"So that he dares not be false to me, because, if he was, his life would be sure to pay the forfeit."

"Ha! ha! You understand that sort of thing, I perceive. There's nothing in the world like employing people who can't call their lives their own, but who feel they hold them entirely at your good pleasure."

"That is precisely my opinion, Mr. Wild, and I am glad to find that a similar one is entertained by you."

"Never mind compliments. What are we to do with this confounded lawyer?"

"Ay! that's it."

"He must be got out of the way."

"Exactly."

"What would be the best way of doing it?"

"That I should rather leave to your superior genius."

"Ya—ah! That will do! Suppose we were to make him drunk?"

"Yes."

"And then, when he was quite helpless, suppose we were to put him into a post-chaise, and have him driven fifty or sixty miles into the country, and left at some place where he would not be able to find a conveyance to return."

"Capital, Mr. Wild, capital, if it can only be done!"

"I have accomplished things that looked a great deal more difficult than that."

"I am aware of it, Mr. Wild."

"And I will do this, or I will never attempt anything again! You leave that part to me. Just let me know where he is to be found."

"I shall be able to do that."

"Then you need not trouble yourself any further."

"I quite understand, and then, if that is managed, Jack Sheppard's condemnation will follow as a matter of course."

"Mind he don't play you any trick and get off again. I should advise you to keep a sharp eye upon him. He seems to have a kind of faculty for prison-breaking."

"You need not alarm yourself, Mr. Wild. He is quite safe, and will be. Take my word for that. Why, at this present moment, he must be loaded with at least two hundred weight of iron."

Jonathan smiled grimly.

"His fetters did not give him much trouble the time before, you must recollect. Don't trust too much to them, but keep a sharp eye upon him—that is the best thing you can do."

"Should you like to pay him a visit?"

"That was the very thing I came to do, only you asked me in here."

"Oh! ah! So it was. Well the lawyer has gone now, so you will find him disengaged."

"It will do me good to see him," said the thief-taker, "and why should not I? I have got a piece of news to give him, too, which will disturb his rest a little."

"Have you, indeed?"

"Yes, I shall settle him, don't fear, and by this time on Monday he will no longer be here to trouble us."

As he spoke, Jonathan went to the door of the room, and, on opening it, went out.

The governor followed.

A little passage communicated the lodge of Newgate with this room, and having traversed it, the governor said to one of the turnkeys—

"Take Mr. Wild to Jack Sheppard's cell."

The man rose to his feet, and prepared to do the governor's bidding.

Mr. Noakes did not attempt to follow the thief-taker to his victim's cell. He was afraid his presence would be considered an intrusion.

And Jonathan, he knew, amiable as he seemed disposed towards him, was the last man to brook anything of that sort.

Accordingly Wild stalked after the turnkey in solitude and silence, until he arrived at the door of the cell in which Jack Sheppard was confined.

He ran his eye over the complicated fastenings with something like satisfaction. He felt that there was little probability of even Jack's undoing them.

He noticed, too, its situation, and could not help giving the governor credit for the discretion he had exercised in selecting it.

After the lawyer had left him, Jack had sat down with a somewhat lightened heart.

Hope had once more become an inmate of his breast.

He had but a slight knowledge of legal business, but he had often heard of its intricacies and chicanery.

Perhaps, he thought, a clever enough man might be found, who, by a skilful appeal to the jury, or by subversion of evidence, might procure his acquittal.

Certainly he did not look forward to the morrow's trial with the same amount of gloomy foreboding that he had done hitherto.

Before, however, he had indulged in these reflections for any great length of time, he was aroused by hearing the bolts withdrawn, and the lock of his cell-door shot back.

Curious, again, to know who should be his visitor, and thinking that most probably it was Mr. Cunningham who had returned, in consequence of having thought of some question he had omitted to ask, he rose to his feet, despite the difficulty he had to do so.

But, to his vexation and anger, his old, implacable foe, Jonathan Wild, stalked in.

For a moment or two this strange pair stood confronting each other in silence.

The cell door was closed, leaving them alone together.

The thief-taker folded his arms leisurely over his chest, and then looked, with a sneering and triumphant smile, into the countenance of his helpless enemy.

Jack returned his gaze boldly and defiantly, and even in the deep glow of the dungeon the fierce, burning hate which held a place in his heart, could be seen to blaze out in his eyes.

Jonathan saw it, and had it not been from his conviction that while he stood where he was the prisoner could not reach him, he would have drawn back several paces.

Some time had now elapsed, as, doubtless, the reader will remember, since those who now stood glaring upon each other had met face to face.

How long the silence would have continued it would be hard to say. Jack had determined not to be the first to speak.

At length Jonathan gave utterance to that strange and awfully diabolical laugh of his which would almost have sent a weak-nerved person into fits at once.

"Ha! ha!"

The sound ceased even more abruptly than it commenced.

Nothing more unmirthful could well be imagined.

There was no movement of the facial muscles, as there always is in genuine, and usually in simulated, laughter. The same expression of feature was preserved, and the sound produced by simply opening the teeth a little way, and suddenly expiring breath.

Jack Sheppard shuddered imperceptibly as it grazed upon his hearing.

It sounded in his ears like the mocking laughter of fiends.

"So you're safe again, Master Jack," said Wild, after another, but shorter pause. "Your lodgings are not very comfortable, but then you have one consolation, you won't have long to put up with them. Ha! ha!"

Again came that horrible laugh.

It seemed to freeze the blood in Jack's veins.

But he took no notice of Wild's words, he only gazed yet more fiercely upon him.

"Had a lawyer in to see you, I hear. I hope he will be successful in getting you off, but I am going to appear against you myself, and you know what that means, I dare say."

Still Jack made no reply.

His silence enraged the thief-taker more than he would have liked to confess.

It was only by an effort that Jack maintained his composure.

"You won't speak, won't you!" continued Wild, sneeringly. "Ah! well, as you like, it don't matter to me, but I could tell you something that would make you open your mouth, or I am mistaken."

Jack felt, as might be expected, a strong desire to know what his foe alluded to, but still he persisted in his determination not to speak.

"Never mind, my fine fellow, you'll ask me just now, and then I shall have my revenge upon you. Jack, you're doomed! You may have got some false hopes or other from your lawyer; they always misrepresent facts. There is no hope of escape for you! You will as surely swing at Tyburn next Monday as the sun will rise upon that day!"

Another pause.

"I shall come and see the show, and I shall take care to bring another with me to witness it. To be sure, she is in rather a delicate state of health, owing to the way she has been knocked about lately. But by Monday she will be well enough to accompany me, and I shall take care she does so."

"Who?" roared Jack, hoarsely, though he scarcely required to be told. "Who?"

"So you have spoken at last, eh? That was the charm that had power to loosen your tongue. I thought I should be able to do so, if I had a little patience. Ha! ha! Can't you guess, Jack, who it is? I am sure you can, if you try. It's your old sweetheart, Edgworth Bess—my wife, that is to be. She has promised, and it's all arranged. She's at my house waiting for me now. You wouldn't believe how loving she has got. She—"

"Liar!" yelled Jack, "liar!"

CHAPTER CLXV.

JONATHAN WILD HAS A NARROW ESCAPE OF HIS LIFE FROM JACK SHEPPARD, BUT IS RESCUED BY HIS FRIEND, THE GOVERNOR.

As he uttered these words, which he did with extraordinary vehemence, Jack seized his manacles near their junction with his wrists, and, swinging the massive chains over his head, aimed a tremendous blow at his tormentor.

Jonathan had succeeded in his object of arousing Jack's passion.

He was pleased accordingly, and sought to aggravate him still more.

He thought, however, that where he stood Jack could not reach to harm him.

But in this he was deceived.

The heavy fetters came down with fearful violence upon his right hand.

The pain was great—so great, indeed, as to extort a yell from his lips.

Ere, however, it had died away upon his lips, he sprang forward with the intention of strangling Jack, so greatly did the pain from the blow inflame his passion.

But Jack saw him coming, and stepping back a pace or two, he swung the fetters once more in the air, and this time brought them down upon Jonathan's head.

An enormous crack was the result.

But Jonathan's skull was not made of very tender stuff, or it would have given way long ago under the blows it had received.

He was half stunned, however.

He staggered.

But before Jack had time to give him another blow, he closed with him.

Jack lost his footing immediately.

Upon equal terms Jonathan weighed at least thrice as much as he did, and now he was incumbered with the iron work, he stood no chance at all.

It was impossible for him to keep his feet.

In his rage, Jonathan evidently forgot the elaborate plan of revenge he had concocted against him, and which had so nearly reached a consummation.

He was intent only upon putting his enemy to death.

When down, however, Jack grappled firmly with him.

A great noise, of course, had taken place, and still continued.

It reached the ears of the turnkey without.

He just gave one glance at what was taking place, and then hurried off to spread the alarm.

In less than a moment he returned with several of his mates and the governor of Newgate himself, by whose orders the frantic combatants were parted.

But the separation was not effected without a great deal of trouble.

When accomplished, both looked very much the worse for the encounter.

As for Jack, he lay almost in a state of insensibility, and he was allowed to do the best he could for himself, for, of course, Mr. Noakes had every attention paid to his villainous friend.

In addition to the blow upon his right hand and arm, and the one on the head, which had been given by the fetters, Jonathan had received a number of scratches and contusions.

"Brandy!" he yelled, as soon as he recovered the use of his voice; "brandy, I say! Curse you all—brandy! It's in my coat pocket, I tell you!"

Jonathan spoke as though he had mentioned this circumstance before, but the hint was quite enough, so the turnkey put his hand in the pocket, and brought forth a tolerable-sized flask.

As soon as he caught sight of it, Jonathan clutched at it with his left and uninjured hand, and, carrying it to his lips, did not move it again while a spot of the contents remained.

Then he flung it down on the dungeon floor with a shout, and had not the turnkey, kept a firm hold upon him he would have again sprang upon Jack, defenceless as he was.

It was at this moment, as it so happened, that Sheppard recovered himself sufficiently to sit up and look around.

The governor approached the thief-taker and whispered—

"Come, come, Mr. Wild, do not let us have any more of this; remember, I shall get into trouble. Only wait till to-morrow, and then all will be well."

"Ha! ha!" said Jonathan, in shrieking tones. "Of course, to-morrow. He will be sentenced to-morrow, and on Monday he will swing at Tyburn, as his father did before him. I had forgotten that. Ah! a thousand curses!"

Jonathan had forgotten something else.

That was his arm.

But pain soon reminded him of it.

His fury rose again, and imprecations of so terrible of a nature came from his lips, that the very turnkeys, used as they were to that sort of thing, fairly trembled.

"Call back your words," screamed Jack, vainly endeavouring to regain his feet. "Call back your words. Admit that you lied when you spoke to me."

"That touches you, does it?" said Jonathan, who, after his storm of curses had begun to subside into a calm. "You shall smart for this. It is one more score against you, which will be wiped off at the same time as the others."

"Call back your words," again cried Jack, who, finding he could not rise to a standing posture, had crawled as far towards his enemy as the chain by which he was fastened to the floor would allow him. "Tell me what you said was false."

"It is true!" screamed Wild, "it is true! You wondered where she was, no doubt, and so did I. But I have found her, Jack—the thing which you failed to do. I made her a prisoner, and she is at this moment in my house, which she will leave for the first time, under my escort, to witness your execution!"

"It is false!" cried Jack, "false as your own heart, and I am a fool to place any credence in what you say. I might have guessed your object was to make my confinement as bitter as possible, but you have overshot the mark."

"You can disbelieve me, if you choose. You can fill yourself up with the idea that she is in some place of safety. But on Monday, Jack, you will be undeceived, for you will see her under my protection at Tyburn."

Jack fairly howled with rage. He tried in vain to articulate his words.

The governor of Newgate here interfered, and, after a little trouble, persuaded Jonathan to leave the cell.

No one cast a glance upon poor Jack.

The ponderous door was closed and locked, and he was left to his own reflections.

Painfully, and after repeated struggles, he got up off the floor, and seated himself upon the low stone bench, which served alike for chair and bed.

"What shall I do?" he groaned, not with the pain of the hurts he had received, but in deep agony of spirit. "What shall I do to save her? Can it be possible that her evil fortune is so much in the ascendant as to have placed her once more in that villain's hands! I will not, cannot believe it!"

He wiped the blood and perspiration from his face as he spoke.

"I had the miscreant in my power," he said. "Would that I could have maintained my advantage, or been armed with a knife, which I could have sheathed in his heart. I should then at least have had the consolation that Edgworth Bess had one enemy the less, and I almost think I should have been willing to die!"

A sudden pain made him utter a faint cry and cease speaking.

Wild had manled him dreadfully.

The irons had bruised his body at every turn.

"Can it be really true?" he asked himself again.

"Would that I could see Blueskin, or find some means of communicating with him, but there is no hopes of my doing that—none at all! I must remain where I am, alternately swayed by hopes and fears. If she is really a prisoner in his hands, heaven help her, for she has need of it! Her peril is of no ordinary character."

He paused again.

"Would I was free!" he cried, "would I was free! I should not care then. Can these bolts and links confine me? No! I will be free! I will save her!"

As he spoke, he made a desperate effort to break away from his fetters by main force, but his own sense ought to have shown him the futility of making such an attempt as that.

The strong iron yielded not in the least, but cast him back more bruised and strengthless than before.

He lay for a little while utterly exhausted, and unable to move hand or foot.

Then a partial state of insensibility ensued.

It would have been a mercy had it been perfect.

No one came to visit him.

At the appointed hour, the man whose duty it was to supply the prisoners with food, opened the door a little way, and brought a loaf and pitcher of water into the cell, and then went away.

Darker and darker grew the cell as the fair and beautiful daylight faded away, until at last it became impossible to distinguish anything in it.

Then Jack roused a little.

Doubtless the cold air which swept in was the cause.

He resumed his old seat.

His limbs, however were stiff and cramped.

Then once again he began to think.

He made no attempt to lie down or to sleep; the latter, he felt, would be utterly impossible.

And so he remained through the long, weary hours of the night, listening to the lapse of time as it was noted by the clock in the belfry of St. Sepulchre's.

At length, towards morning, he fell into a kind of doze, produced by exhaustion more than anything else.

From this he was awakened by the entrance of several persons towards morning.

His irons were taken off, and he was allowed to wash his face, and make himself otherwise presentable.

Then some more routine was gone through, which it is hardly worth while to trouble the reader in detail with.

Jonathan Wild and Mr. Noakes had so managed, that his trial should take place very early in the morning of the first day of the sessions.

Their motive for this will presently be made apparent, if it is not already guessed at by the reader.

Flood and Blewitt were, of course, brought into the dock upon a charge of burglary and murder, and Jack Sheppard was placed along with them.

CHAPTER CLXVI.

IN WHICH JACK SHEPPARD IS PLACED AT THE BAR OF THE OLD BAILEY, TO TAKE HIS TRIAL FOR THE MURDER OF JOHN ROOTS.

THE court was very full.

That was the first thing that struck Jack, after giving a hasty glance around.

He then began to look more particularly.

His two companions—if such they should be called—stood with sullen mien and doggedly ferocious countenances, awaiting the pronouncement of that doom which they knew it would be impossible for them to avoid.

Should the present charge fail of substantiation, Jonathan Wild, they knew, would be prepared with another.

From these, Jack looked among the crowd of white-wigged barristers before him, and made a vain endeavour to distinguish Mr. Cunningham amongst them.

He was not there.

Alas! there was every reason to fear that the thief-taker had succeeded in carrying out the scheme he had prepared.

Then Jack looked in the faces of the spectators, in the hope that among them he should find one, at least, which he should recognise as belonging to a friend.

But this hope was disappointed.

He was aroused from this occupation by hearing the harsh, cracked voice of the clerk of the arraigns, as that individual began to read the indictment.

Jack tried at first to comprehend it, but, finding it was totally beyond his power, he again looked at his surroundings.

One judge was on the bench.

He was a stranger to Jack.

On his left hand was the jury-box; but, in the cold and apathetic-looking faces which they all, without exception, wore, he could gather nothing reassuring.

But, happening to glance down where several of the prison officials were standing, he perceived his two greatest enemies, the governor of Newgate and Jonathan Wild.

Jonathan looked up at him with a triumphant smile.

His face still bore the marks of the preceding evening's contest, and his right arm was carried in a sling.

So absorbed was Jack with the contemplation of his hideous physiognomy—or rather, so fascinated did he seem to be by the thief-taker's basilisk gaze, that he did not notice the clerk of the arraigns had finished reading the indictment, and that the court was waiting for him to plead, until a turnkey touched him on the arm and reminded him of it.

He found that the eyes of all present, spectators, jury, witnesses, judge, were upon him—but, nevertheless, he subdued the embarrassment he felt, and replied in a clear, calm voice—

"Not guilty!"

The plea was entered, and then the trial actually begun.

The Crown prosecuted.

The Attorney-General rose to state the case to the jury.

He paused a moment, and arranged his robes, while the slight bustle and confusion in the court subsided to perfect silence.

This was soon obtained, for upon the faces of the spectators generally was an expression of deep interest.

They had heard already some particulars of the case, and longed for fuller details.

One of the junior counsel at the table now handed the Attorney-General a brief, and he commenced his address as follows:—

"My Lord, and gentlemen of the jury,

"Three men—one so young as scarcely to have earned the title—now stand before you at the bar of this court, to answer to a charge, the penalty of which, if it be substantiated, is death by the hands of the executioner.

"Ample evidence will be laid before you, as to the particulars of the crime, but before the several witnesses are called, I feel it to be my duty to call your attention to one or two circumstances of a very important nature.

"In the first place, though all three of the prisoners are charged in the indictment with the crime of murder, with malice prepense, and though they were unquestionably all three concerned in it, yet evidence will be given which will tend to fix the onus of the guilt upon one of the prisoners only, and absolve the others from it.

"At least the evidence will serve to show by whose hand the deed was actually committed, though, as I need scarcely tell you, the other two standing by were accessories, and are equally guilty in the eyes of the law.

"Gentlemen of the jury, I shall now lay before you a plain statement of facts, after which I shall proceed to call witnesses, who will depose to the truth of what I advance.

"In Wych-street, in the Strand, near the church of St. Clement's Danes, there resided for many years a worthy and respected inhabitant of this great city, by name John Roots, and by profession a carpenter.

"About six or seven years ago this said John Roots took into his service, as apprentice, one John Sheppard, the youngest of the three prisoners at the bar.

"It was an act of charity and benevolence upon his part to take this lad and put a trade into his hands, for he did not receive, as is usually the case, any premium with him.

"There is another circumstance, too, which places the conduct of the carpenter in a more estimable light. The father of this John Sheppard was a notoriously bad character, and, after a brief course of villainy, expiated his crimes at Tyburn.

"I will not say that it is just or right, but certain it is that the consequences of a crime always fall upon the son of the perpetrator, and so it was in this instance.

"Few people in the city of London, knowing the antecedents of this misguided young man, would have ventured to take him into their service.

"But John Roots generously and magnanimously waived this objection.

"Soon, however, to his deep and infinite regret, he found that his kind-heartedness was misplaced—thrown away, in fact—for the apprentice proved to him a perpetual trouble and annoyance.

"Still he thought he might be able to train his plastic spirit and curb his vicious temper, but he found all his efforts unavailing.

"The heaven of evil was in him, and it worked out, nor could its progress be stayed.

"It will be out of my province to relate all that took place. Let it suffice to say that on the night of the tenth day of August last, John Roots sat up until a late hour for his recalcitrant apprentice, and at length, wearied out, went to bed.

"He was awoke by hearing a furious hubbub in the street, and, upon going to the window, he found it was caused by this Jack Sheppard, who, maddened by drink, was reviling his kind and indulgent master, and uttering most diabolical threats of vengeance.

"From this time John Roots lost sight of the unworthy object of his bounty, but the police soon heard of his exploits, for he turned housebreaker at once, associating himself with one Joseph Blake, against whom a warrant has been issued.

"The house of a highly respectable gentleman, named Hadley, was selected for the scene of their first exploit, and from which they succeeded in taking a considerable booty.

"Mr. Hadley was fired at by one of the burglars, it does not appear which, and was severely wounded.

"That active and enterprising officer, however, who has recently increased his claim upon the gratitude of the public by exterminating, first a nest of coiners, and afterwards a band of ferocious pirates, took the matter in hand, and in a little while caught Sheppard, and lodged him in Newgate.

"He was placed in a cell and heavily ironed, by the instructions of Jonathan Wild, who declared him to be a most desperate character.

"It seems almost beyond belief, but it is unquestionably true, that, by some means or other, the prisoner managed to free himself from his fetters, and, by digging under the door of the cell, made his way into the outer passage.

"It is supposed, for there is no witness of this transaction, that Sheppard met one of the turnkeys, Godfrey by name, and, taking him somehow at a disadvantage, dashed his brains out. At all events, the body of the officer was found shortly afterwards in that condition.

"From prudential motives, we decline to give any minute details of his escape. In a word, although it was deemed an impossibility, this youth contrived to get from the strongest prison in England."

The counsel paused for a moment, in order to regain his breath, while Jack found himself the universal object of the public gaze.

It is a most uncomfortable feeling to have the eyes of hundreds of people fixed upon your face, and Jack found it to be so.

But the counsel hastened to resume his address, which he had already extended to rather an unusual length.

"Upon making his escape, one would have thought he would have abandoned his evil course of life; but no, quite the reverse, for, in a day or two afterwards, he and this same Joseph Blake committed a highway robbery on the Dover-road.

"Jonathan Wild, whose zeal in the pursuit of criminals of all descriptions never abates, as soon as he learned the particulars of the escape, set out after the fugitives, and was fortunate enough to secure both upon Blackfriars-bridge.

"I am scarcely right here. Blake was not captured. He sprang over the parapet into the river, and though Mr. Wild chased him for some time in a boat, he was unable to capture him.

"Sheppard, however, was left upon the bridge, in charge of the two men who now stand beside him at the bar.

"What took place between them can only be surmised, but it appears pretty clear that, by holding out some inducement or other, Sheppard succeeded in making the two men false to their trust.

"Immediately, as I may say, after this, the three villains directed their steps to the house of Mr. John Roots, and there committed a burglary.

"Of the heinousness of this crime, so black with ingratitude as it was, I shall not say a word. Some things are best and most forcibly described by silence.

"The house was entered and robbed. The master of it, as is supposed, was aroused by the noise, and, going to the head of the stairs, raised an alarm."

CHAPTER CLXVII.

THE COUNSEL FOR THE PROSECUTION CONCLUDES HIS ADDRESS TO THE JURY, AND THE FIRST WITNESS IS CALLED.

"THAT sound proved, gentlemen of the jury, to be his death-warrant.

"He was shot with a pistol, and fell down the staircase.

"But the officers of justice, who had been on the lookout for Sheppard near this spot, heard the alarm which was raised, and hastened to the residence of the carpenter, round the front door of which several watchmen and a crowd of persons were collected.

"The door was found to be fastened, and, as admission was denied them, the police-officers, under the orders of their inspector, Mr. Skellum, proceeded to break it down, and effect a forcible entry.

"No sooner was the door broken down, gentlemen of the jury, than, with a boldness that cannot but be wondered at, the three prisoners made a vigorous rush, and tried to force their way through the crowd.

"So unexpected was this attack, that they very nearly succeeded in getting off, but, luckily for the welfare of society, these depredators were beaten back, secured, and lodged in Newgate.

"On entering the house, the unfortunate tradesman,

[JACK SHEPPARD, BY THE AID OF HIS FRIENDS, MAKES A SECOND ESCAPE FROM NEWGATE.]

Mr. Roots, was found by inspector Skellum and his men weltering in his blood at the bottom of the staircase.

"It was found that he was not yet dead, so, having raised him to a sitting posture, they asked him for the name of his murderer.

"He made several unsuccessful attempts to speak, and at last managed to gasp out two words, which were, however, clearly articulated, and Inspector Skellum and the men who stood near him are ready to take their oaths what those two words were.

"Those two words, gentlemen of the jury, composed a name.

"And that name was Jack Sheppard—the name of the youngest prisoner at the bar."

Again the prosecuting counsel paused, and made a reference to the bundle of papers he held in his hands.

Again did Jack find himself the object of universal attention, and this time he could see, owing to the manner in which the charge was made against him, that very little, if any, popular sympathy was on his side.

More than once during the counsel's address, an indignant denial of the facts there stated rose to his lips, but, each time that he would have spoken, he fortunately managed to control himself.

He remembered the words of his lawyer, Mr. Cunningham, that he was on no account to speak, and, although he could not see that gentleman anywhere in the court, he resolved, let what would be the temptation, to obey him.

The counsel spoke again.

"Such, my lord and gentlemen of the jury, is the case against the youngest prisoner at the bar. I have dwelt rather fully upon it, and may incur from some the charge of prolixity, but I wished to give, if possible, a brief but clear relation of all the facts concerned, in order that you, my lord, and you, gentlemen of the jury, might all the more readily come to a decision, and, if I succeed in doing this, I shall certainly be held guiltless of unnecessarily taking up the time of the court.

"To dwell upon any of the features of this case would be supererogation. I cannot help expressing a belief that it would be impossible to find in the annals of criminal jurisprudence an instance of blacker ingratitude, treachery, and wickedness than that of this unhappy young man.

"He has scarcely passed the frontiers of manhood, and yet we see him burdened with a life time of crimes. Young as he is, three persons have received their death at his hands.

"And now, my lord, and gentlemen of the jury, I must conclude by directing your attention to the two other prisoners.

"As you will have already perceived, the case against them is included in the one implicating Sheppard.

"They suffered themselves to be lured by his specious promises and representations.

"They suffered themselves to be led into crime by him.

"They were captured in the very act of escaping from the very house where the burglary and murder had been committed, and upon their persons was found the principal portion of the booty, which has been identified as belonging to John Roots.

"Such, gentlemen of the jury, is the case for the prosecution, and the only thing that now remains for me to do, is to call the several witnesses who are in attendance here to-day to give their evidence, after hearing which I shall be able to leave it in your hands for decision, and, if the prisoners can be found not guilty of the crimes with which they are accused, then no one will rejoice or be more glad than myself, for it is always a disagreeable duty to bring accusations against a man.

"But if, on the other hand, gentlemen of the jury, you should be of opinion that the evidence I am going to produce is of such a character as to fix the impression of their guilt upon your minds, then I will call upon you in the name of justice, and those bonds by which society is linked together, not to shrink, disagreeable though it may be, from returning a verdict in concordance with that impression, in order that the strict letter of the law may be carried out, and in order that others may be deterred by witnessing their deplorable fate from acting in a similar manner."

The counsel for the prosecution sat down.

By means of his artfully-woven address, he had managed to turn the tide of popular favour against Jack and his companions, who were now regarded with positive loathing and abhorrence by the whole of the spectators.

A conviction of the guilt of all three had been forced upon the minds of all.

There was something terribly circumstantial about the whole of the details, and, if the evidence tallied with the statements of the counsel for the prosecution, then it would be impossible for any one to entertain the shadow of a doubt as to their guilt.

Jack's anxiety increased.

As he looked round and round the court, attentively scanning each face, the hopes which Mr. Cunningham had caused to spring up in his breast faded one by one away.

He was not there.

How was it?

Jonathan Wild's face that moment came within the sphere of his vision.

The thief-taker fixed his eyes exultingly upon him.

There was upon his face a look of triumphant malignity and satisfaction such as would have befitted the countenance of the arch fiend himself.

In a moment Jack connected the non-appearance of his lawyer and the triumphant expression of the thief-taker's face, and his heart sank still lower within him.

Silence was now cried, and then one of the junior counsel got up to call the witnesses.

But before he spoke, the judge, who had been rapidly taking notes of the main facts in the address of the counsel for the prosecution, looked up, and adjusting his spectacles, asked—

"Who appears for the prisoners?"

The question met with no response.

Then one of the ushers repeated the question in a low tone of voice.

Flood and Blewitt shook their heads to imply that no one had been employed by them.

"Some one has been retained to defend me, I believe, but I do not see the gentlemen here."

"Who was it?"

"Mr. Cunningham."

"But he is a lawyer. Oh! I suppose he was to instruct the counsel?"

"I think that's it."

"Then shall I call Mr. Cunningham?"

"Yes, if you please."

"Who appears on behalf of the prisoner?" again asked the judge.

"The two prisoners, Flood and Blewitt, my lord, are undefended, and the youngest has employed Mr. Cunningham to instruct counsel."

"Where is Mr. Cunningham? Is he in court?"

"Mr. Cunningham!" shouted the usher.

But there was still no reply.

The name was taken up outside, and repeated all over the building.

There was, however, no response made.

"Mr. Cunningham does not appear to be in court, my lord."

"Then the business must go on without him. Perhaps some one will watch the case."

A young man rose, and sat down again.

The action was considered sufficient.

When Jack found that Mr. Cunningham was not present, the little hope that held precariously to his heart deserted him utterly.

He had no chance now.

The junior counsel, who had risen to call the witnesses, now cried—

"Simon Gnof!"

"Here," said a wheezy voice, and a man elbowed his way into the witness-box, where he was duly sworn.

"Is your name Simon Gnof?" asked the junior counsel.

"Yes, your honour."

"What are you?"

"A watchman, your honour."

"You need not say your honour every time you reply to me, but simply answer my questions."

"Yes, your honour."

The counsel smiled, and so did most in the court.

"You are a watchman, you say. Where is your beat?"

"From the railings round St. Clement's-church to the corner of Newcastle-street, your honour."

"That will do. Now, can you tell me what took place on the night of the tenth of August?"

"Yes, your honour."

"Do so, then."

"It was just turned of midnight, and as I was a coming round the church railings, I heard some one a making a noise in Wych-street. Up I goes, and there I finds Mr. Roots' apprentice a shaking his fists, and swearing he'd be revenged on his master."

"What next?"

"I went to take him up, your honour."

"Well?"

"And then he knocked me down."

"Knocked you down?"

"Yes, your honour."

There was a general laugh at this, for the watchman was a great bony giant, six feet high at least, by whose side Jack Sheppard looked a pigmy.

CHAPTER CLXVIII.

JONATHAN WILD, IN A MOST ARTFUL MANNER, GIVES HIS EVIDENCE AGAINST JACK SHEPPARD.

"SILENCE!" cried the usher. "Si—lence!"

"Can you point out the person who knocked you down?" asked the junior counsel, as soon as the laugh had subsided.

"To be sure I can, your honour. It was young Jack Sheppard. Lor' bless you, I've knowed him years. There he stands."

"Will you point him ont, and swear positively that he was the person you heard vowing to be revenged upon Mr. Roots the carpenter?"

"Yes, your honour."

The usher, who was standing near the witness-box, handed the watchman his long white wand, with which he pointed full at Jack Sheppard.

"That will do," said the young counsel. "You can stand down."

Mr. Gnoff descended from his elevated position, the counsel who had accepted the duty of watching the case not deeming it necessary to put any further questions to him.

"Call Jonathan Wild!" cried the counsel.

"Jonathan Wild!" repeated the usher.

In obedience to this call, the celebrated thier-taker, with an assumption of great humbleness, took his place in the witness-box, and when he took the oath, kissed the book in rather an ostentatious manner.

Then he looked round the court in what he fancied was a very amiable way, and made a deep circular bow to the assemblage generally.

"Your name is Jonathan Wild, I presume?"

"It is, sir," said Wild, in such a different tone of voice, that Jack Sheppard could hardly believe it was his enemy who had spoken.

"Do you know the prisoners at the bar?"

Before he replied, Jonathan pretended it was necessary for him to scrutinize all three very attentively.

"Yes," he said, at length, with great deliberation.

"Yes, I know them all three."

"Oh! very good, then, perhaps you would have no objection to tell the court what do you know about them?"

"Certainly not!"

"Stay a moment, Mr. Wild!" said the judge, "I would take notes of what you say?"

"Very good, my lord!"

"Now, go on."

"Yes, my lord! the prisoner nearest to me is, I believe, named Matthew Flood!"

"Matthew Flood!" repeated the judge, as he wrote the name.

"He was employed by me as a kind of supernumerary police-officer. The same may be said of the man standing next to him, who calls himself William Blewitt!"

"Very good, Mr. Wild, that will do. Now, what about the other?"

"Jack Sheppard?"

"If that is his name!"

"I believe it is, sir!"

"What information can you give the court concerning him?"

"A great deal, sir, I am sorry to say, and none that will redound to his credit."

"Confine yourself to particularities, if you please, Mr. Wild."

"Certainly, sir. I have known the prisoner from his childhood. I knew his father too."

"Hold!" shouted Jack, who could restrain himself no longer. Hold! I say, mention not his name."

"This interruption is very unseeming on your part, young man," said the judge. "Be silent, sir."

"We will not mention his father," said Wild. "I was, however, merely going to observe that he was a notorious highwayman, and suffered at Tyburn about twenty years ago."

Jonathan had gained his point.

That little bit of family history, he imagined, would tell well with the jury.

Nor were his calculations far wrong.

The judge took a note of it.

The jury exchanged looks, and whispered with each other, and apparently made a note of it also.

"Now, Mr. Wild, what can you tell us about the prisoner at the bar?"

"The first I heard of him was in consequence of a burglary, committed at the house of a highly respectable gentleman, named Hadley, which I traced to him and a man, named Joseph Blake, whom I had dismissed from my employ."

"What next?"

"I chased both from one place to another, till at last I came up with them at a ruined abbey on the borders of Gloucestershire, where I captured Sheppard after a most desperate resistance, which resulted in the death of Blake. At least, he was left as such; but it seems, by some means or another, he escaped."

"Is this man in custody?" asked the judge.

"No, my lord, he is not, though a warrant has been issued for his apprehension."

"Go on."

"I brought Sheppard a prisoner to Newgate, from which place he managed to make his escape and regain his companion, with whom he committed a highway robbery on the Dover road on the following evening."

"Did you capture them?"

"Yes, upon Blackfriars-bridge. I overpowered Sheppard, but Blake threw himself over the parapet into the river. I left the two other prisoners at the bar to keep guard over Sheppard, while I went with the rest and took a boat down the river; but Blake managed in the end to elude us."

"You then returned to Blackfriars-bridge, I presume?"

"I did, sir, with all speed; but on reaching it, I found that both prisoner and guard had disappeared. Important business immediately afterwards took me from London, and when I returned, the first intelligence I received was that the three prisoners were safely lodged in Newgate."

"That is all, Mr. Wild, I suppose."

"Well, nearly all. I visited Sheppard in his cell last night, in order to learn, if I possibly could, where his comrade in iniquity was likely to be found. But, taking me off my guard, he made a furious attack upon me with his heavy fetters; and I have no doubt, had it not been for the timely interposition of the turnkeys, he would have put an end to my life."

This was another of Jonathan's master-strokes.

"That is all, Mr. Wild," said the junior counsel, "without my friend here for the defence wishes to put any questions to you."

The young barrister, who had gone through the form of watching the case, shook his head negatively.

Jonathan left the witness-box in triumph.

His evidence damaged the prisoners fearfully, and none knew it better than himself.

"My lord," said the junior counsel, addressing the judge, "I have here the names of several witnesses who will testify to Sheppard having broken out of Newgate, and caused the death of Godfrey, the turnkey; but as this case is one in which all three are implicated, I imagine the ends of justice will be met by passing over that clause in the indictment, and treating only with this."

The judge inclined his head.

"Call Mr. Skellum."

The police-officer, under whose direction the little force which had apprehended Jack and his companions was, stepped into the box and was sworn.

"Will you be good enough, Mr. Skellum, to relate what took place on or about the night of the twenty-fifth of this month?"

"Yes, sir."

"Begin, then."

"By instructions received, I went, accompanied by twelve police-officers, to the 'Black Lion' public-house, to see if I could find any trace of Jack Sheppard, who had escaped from Newgate."

"Just so; go on."

"Towards morning, as we were going down Wych-street, from the direction of Drury-lane, we heard an alarm of thieves, and, upon hastening forward, we found the alarm proceeded from the house of John Roots, the carpenter, round whose shop-door a number of people had already assembled."

"Go on, if you please."

"Understanding that the robbers were within the house, we were about to effect a forcible entry, when we heard the loud report of a pistol."

"Who do you mean by we?"

"Myself and my men."

"Very good; what next?"

"We set to work in good earnest to batter down the door, but, as it was a very strong one, it for some time resisted our efforts. At last we forced it from its hinges."

"Did you hear anything on the inside?"

"No, sir, all was quiet; but just as we knocked down the door, out rushed the three prisoners! They fought desperately, and made the strongest efforts to make their escape, but, thanks to the exertions of the men who were with me, they were prevented from achieving their end."

"Did you make them all prisoners?"

"We did, sir."

"Turn round and look at the prisoners at the bar. Are you ready to swear that those are the three men whom you captured?"

"I am quite ready to swear to them, sir."

"That is enough. What was the next step you took?"

"Having made sure the prisoners were safe, I spoke to half-a-dozen of the officers, and made my way into the house."

"Did you find anything?"

"Yes, sir."

"What?"

"The body of John Roots!"

"Where did you find this?"

"At the foot of the staircase."

"In what condition was it?"

"Swimming in blood!"

"From whence did the blood proceed?"

"From a bullet wound in the chest."

"And you heard a pistol fired while you were outside?"

"Yes, sir."

"Did you search the prisoners?"

"All of them, sir."

"And did you find them armed with pistols?"

"All carried them, sir. We likewise found in the pockets of Flood and Blewitt a number of bags of money, which can be sworn to as belonging to John Roots."

"And what did you do upon finding the body in the state you describe?"

"I had him raised up."

"Was he living?"

"Just, sir, and that was all."

"Was he in possession of his senses?"

"Oh! yes, sir. He understood me when I spoke to him. I asked him if it lay in his power to pronounce the name of his murderer."

"And did he do so?"

"Yes, sir."

"Who did he say had done the deed?"

"Jack Sheppard!"

CHAPTER CLXIX.

MR. JUSTICE POWIS PASSES SENTENCE OF DEATH UPON THE THREE PRISONERS, AND MR. CUNNINGHAM MAKES HIS APPEARANCE WHEN IT IS TOO LATE.

"Now Mr. Skellum," said the junior counsel, "this is a very important point. Now, knowing this, are you prepared to swear that the name pronounced by Mr. Roots was Jack Sheppard?"

"I am, sir, and what is more, the men who were with me will corroborate what I say, for they all heard it as well as myself."

"Very good, Mr. Skellum. That is sufficient. You then, I presume, conveyed the prisoners to Newgate?"

"I did, sir."

"That will do, then. You can stand down."

Mr. Skellum accordingly stood down, and several of the officers were called, who swore most positively as to the purport of the last dying words of John Roots.

They all swore, too, to the identity of the prisoners. In fact, that was a thing which admitted of no dispute.

This concluded the case for the prosecution, so the young counsel sat down.

The barrister who had, at the request of the judge, taken upon himself to watch the case, had certainly done no more, for he had not taken the trouble to interrupt the proceedings once.

The clerk of the arraigns rose and said—

"Are there any witnesses for the defence?"

Of course a negative was the reply.

The judge then rapidly commenced turning over the voluminous notes he had taken during the trial.

At last, having adjusted his spectacles to his satisfaction, he commenced summing up.

The court was intensely silent.

He spoke in a low tone of voice, but every word he uttered was heard with the utmost distinctness.

"Gentlemen of the jury—

"It has never fallen to my lot, since I have taken my seat upon this bench, to have a clearer case brought before me than that which has just now been brought to a conclusion.

"As you are aware, it is my duty, when summing up, to call your attention to any difficult or doubtful points, or any places where the evidence of one witness clashes with that given by another, but, on the present occasion, I have no such duty to perform; for, from first to last, the case is as clear and complete as any case could possibly be.

"The evidence given by the various witnesses has in every instance corresponded, or fitted in, with that given by the rest.

"It is stated, upon the most incontestible evidence, that the youngest prisoner at the bar had a feeling of ill-will towards his master, John Roots.

"Whether there was, or whether there was not, any just cause for this ill-will, is quite extraneous to the present inquiry. With the motives which gave rise to it we have nothing whatever to do. It existed, and Sheppard swore to have his revenge.

"Then we have also, upon the clearest evidence, that a burglary was committed and John Roots murdered.

"The alarm was raised, and the three prisoners who stand now before you were taken in the very act of escaping.

"It will be seen, too, that the crime of murder attaches itself to the youngest prisoner only, for the murdered man, with his latest breath, declared that he, and he alone, did the deed.

"But the penalty for both crimes is precisely the same—namely, death."

"And I am bound, also, to add that if you feel any reasonable doubt as to the guilt of either of the prisoners, it is your duty to give them the benefit of such doubt; but if, on the contrary, you feel that no doubt exists, then it is your duty, as members of that society whose welfare is so essential to you, not to shrink from the recordation of your verdict."

The jurymen, after the termination of this address, did not pause a moment to deliberate, but just turned round in their seats, and the foreman sat down.

"Gentlemen of the jury," said the clerk of the arraigns, "have you decided upon your verdict?"

"We have."

"Do you find the prisoners guilty or not guilty?"

"We find the prisoners Blewitt and Flood guilty of burglary, and we find the prisoner Sheppard guilty both of burglary and murder!"

A moment's silence followed, and then the clerk, turning towards the prisoners, asked the stereotyped question—

"Have you anything to say, why sentence should not be passed upon you?"

Flood and Blewitt were silent, for they knew it would be perfectly useless to say anything.

But Jack Sheppard, the moment the question was put, replied to it with extraordinary vehemence.

"Yes!" he cried, and his voice rang through the crowded court, "Yes, I have a great deal to say why sentence should not be passed upon me! I declare I am innocent! I have not been fairly tried, and innocent facts have been twisted and contorted till they have assumed their present shape! Jonathan Wild is my enemy, and has sworn to hang me! I am innocent! I am innocent!"

The judge paid apparently little or no notice to this appeal.

He stooped down and fumbled about under his desk.

He was feeling for the black cap.

At length he found it, and having adjusted it upon his head, proceeded to pass sentence of death in the usual form.

"Prisoners at the bar, you have this day been tried by an impartial jury, and found guilty of the crimes of which you severally and jointly stand accused, and all that now remains for me to do is to pass sentence of death in the prescribed manner.

"I cannot do so, however, without expressing my sentiments upon the matter. In particular, I allude to the youngest prisoner, Jack Sheppard.

"It is my firm conviction that were we to look back into the dim ages of the past, and bring to light each individual case of base ingratitude, we should fail to find one so base, so black, as this unhappy young man's presents.

"He, besides, seems to have become enamoured of crime for its own sake alone. The awful fate of his father has not had the effect of deterring him in the least.

"As the counsel for the prosecution very justly said, under the circumstances, few persons in the city could be found who would be willing to admit him as a member of their family. But Mr. Roots charitably put all that aside. His intention was to teach him a trade, by which he would always be able to earn a decent livelihood, and make him a decent member of society.

"We have seen his reward.

"And this is the more to be regretted because there are many placed in a similar situation through the misdeeds of their parents, and all these will now have to suffer for his misdeeds.

"Let me earnestly entreat you, young man, to occupy the brief space of time which is allotted to you before you quit this world for ever in religious exercises, and I sincerely trust that you will be successful in making your peace with your justly-offended Maker."

The judge paused, and then addressed himself to Flood and Blewit.

"As for you," he said, "no words can sufficiently reprobate your conduct. Your duty was to watch over the peace of this city, and prevent the commission of crime; but, so far from doing so, you have colloqued with another, and set the example of committing it. No pity can be felt for either of you, and I have never been more reconciled to the disagreeable duty I am now performing than I am upon this occasion.

"The sentence of this court upon you is, that you be removed from the bar at which you now stand, and taken to the place from which you came, and thence to the place of common execution, where you are to be hanged by the neck until you are dead, and may the lord have mercy on your souls!"

A deep and awful silence followed the pronouncement of this sentence, but before the prisoners could be removed a great hubbub arose at the entrance to the court.

Then a man in a state of the greatest possible excitement, rushed in.

Jack knew him at a glance.

It was Mr. Cunningham.

"My lord, my lord!" he cried, "my lord, I appeal to you. I was engaged to defend the prisoner at the bar, but some of his enemies, fearing the result of my interposition, decoyed me away, and I have only just been able to return. I find I am too late. My lord, I believe in the innocence of my client."

The judge moved his lips, and the desire to know what he had to say was strong enough to make Mr. Cunningham silent.

The jailers, too, whose duty it was to remove Jack from the dock to the condemned hold, paused to see how this new phase in the proceedings would eventuate.

"Mr. Cunningham," said the judge, "you are in a state of great excitement, and only partly conscious, doubtless, of what you are about. For that reason I will look over the breach of etiquette you have committed in bursting into the court in so unceremonious a manner. Your client—if such he is—has been fairly and impartially tried for the crimes of which he stood accused. He has been found guilty, and the last sentence of the law been passed upon him, and you must know that in criminal cases there is no appeal."

"But, my lord"—

"As to your having been decoyed away by some one inimical to the prisoner, that has nothing to do here. You must bring that charge at another time and place. Usher, clear the court!"

The judge rose abruptly from his seat, and pushing aside a crimson curtain, vanished from view.

Behind that curtain was a room, upon a table in the centre of which were some very delicate and tempting refreshments, provided at the expense of the good city of London for his refectory.

He sat down to a calm discussion of these, as though nothing at all was the matter.

In the meantime Mr. Cunningham was hustled out of court.

Jack was tapped on the shoulder by one of the turnkeys.

It was vain to resist.

Besides, he was crushed in spirit.

He accompanied them without a word, and in less than five minutes was an inmate of the condemned hold in Newgate.

Jonathan Wild triumphed at last.

CHAPTER CLXX.

A VERY STRANGE AND MYSTERIOUS EVENT HAPPENS AT JONATHAN'S HOUSE WHILE HE IS ABSENT AT THE TRIAL.

On the morning upon which the trial took place, a great deal of gossip was going on in Wild's house.

Upon one point all, however, quite agreed, and that was, that all three would be found guilty and condemned.

Knowing that Jonathan would not return for some time, they thought the opportunity of making merry should not be lost, so one of the number was sent over to the "Magpie."

On his return, he brought with him a plentiful supply of drink, so all the men who were in the house sat down to enjoy it.

There were several present whose names are familiar to the readers of this history.

For instance, there was Tonks, and Wilkinson, and Levee, and Arnold.

"Who is this new hand Johnny has taken on?" asked the latter.

"I don't know."

"He seems rather a queer fish, don't he?"

"Very."

"Well, where is he?"

"I don't know. Who has seen him this morning?"

No one had.

"Perhaps Johnny has sent him out on some business or other."

"May be. But I say, mates—"

"What?"

"Keep a sharp look out on what you do. He aint one of us, that's certain, and he's sure to turn spy."

"Well, he had better not be caught at it, that's all."

"Be careful—that's the best plan. He's too civil and too humble by half."

"Curse him, he's an interloper. Can't we invent some way of getting shut of him?"

"I don't know."

"I should think we could, if we tried."

"I can't help thinking it very strange he is not here this morning. I don't believe he has been sent out."

"Well, we shall see. It aint often, mates, that we have an opportunity of carousing together, like we have this morning, and so don't let a lubber like that spoil our fun."

"No, no! Bravo! all right! we wont! Hurrah! Here's success to Jonathan Wild, and long life to him, the villain!"

At this moment there came a slight tap at the outer door.

Commonplace as was the sound, yet it made all start, and look terrified.

It was Wilkinson who rose and opened the door.

One of the band entered.

He had been at the court.

"Is the case on?"

"Yes, mates."

"Well, how are they bringing it in?"

"Why, you see, Johnny's giving his blessed evidence. Lor! how I wish you could see him. It's a sight to look upon, I can tell you; he's the very image of a lamb."

"Ha! ha!"

"Why do you laugh?"

"At the idea of Jonathan being a lamb."

"Well, he is; and ain't he a gammoning the judge! The day will go against Jack Sheppard as safe as eggs."

"Oh! we all knew that—we"—

The speaker paused.

He was interrupted in what he was going to say by a shriek so loud, so shrill, so awful, that all those bold and hardened men were riveted to their seats, so appalling was the sound.

Ere, however, it could fairly die away, the shriek was followed by another, in a very different note.

This last shriek, too, differed from the former materially.

The first was a prolonged sound.

The latter a succession of short screams.

The men now recovered a little from their surprise, and sprang to their feet.

"Good God!" said one, "what's that?"

A loud crash followed his ejaculatory question.

"Murder!" cried another; "it's murder!"

"Murder, where?"

"It is upstairs. I'm sure the sound came from upstairs. There's something going on there that ought not to be."

"What shall we do?"

"Fetch Jonathan."

"No, no; let us go up and find out what it is. It will be time enough to send for Jonathan then."

"So it will. Come along."

Upon this, the whole of the men made their way in a dense throng to the foot of the stairs.

They began to ascend very rapidly, but as they got higher and higher their speed abated.

The first landing was almost total darkness.

But one of them, bolder than the rest, threw open a door leading into a room in the front of the house.

A broad beam of light streamed through it.

Ejaculations of alarm and terror burst from their lips.

It revealed, lying at the foot of the second flight of stairs, a female form, in a strangely huddled-up attitude.

Blood was upon her clothing in many places.

For a moment all stood looking on in silence.

They were almost afraid to speak.

Presently one asked—

"Who is it?"

The question aroused the others, and two or three at once sprang forward, and tried to lift the prostrate form.

Upon doing so, her face was turned towards the light.

"Hallo!" said the one who first saw it. "May I be scragged if it ain't Mary Milliner!"

"Mary Milliner?"

"Yes."

"You don't say so!"

They all crowded forward in order to obtain a better view.

But the inspection only served to confirm what their companion had said.

It was Mary Milliner.

A groan came from her lips when she was touched, and heaving a deep sigh, she expired.

"Dead as a nut!" said the one who had raised her up, and as he spoke, he let go her head, which fell with a disagreeable dab upon the edge of the bottom stair.

"What's the meaning of this?"

"Shall we send for Johnny?"

"She's quite dead," said another. "Well, well! I thought she was very bad in the doctor's hands. What made her fall down stairs, and break her blessed neck like that for?"

"But I don't believe she did fall down."

"Why not?"

"Didn't we hear two screams?"

"To be sure we did."

"And the first scream warn't a bit like t'other."

"No, it was not."

"We haven't heard all."

"That's quite certain."

"Let's go on."

"Up higher?"

"You go first."

"No, you."

At last, in a body, as before—having first moved the body of Jonathan's mistress out of their way—they ascended the next flight of stairs.

But upon reaching the top, all was still.

There were no signs of violence, nor any sounds indicative of it.

This landing, too, was better lighted than the other, so when another door was opened, they were able to see all about it quite plainly.

The first place to which all simultaneously turned their eyes, was the little flight of stairs leading up to the attics.

But at the foot of these there was not, as they had all expected, another ghastly-looking female form.

"What are we to make of this, mates?"

"Go higher. It's no good stopping here."

"Come on, then."

The attics were reached and searched.

But nothing whatever out of place was found.

Puzzled and bewildered, the men went down again to the second landing.

Here two or three less adventurous than their companions had lingered.

"There's nothing up above. We've searched every part?"

"What are we to make of it?"

"It's very strange."

"Very."

"My inside is all of a tremble."

"So's mine."

"Let us look about us. What door is that open?"

"The one leading into her room."

"Whose?"

"Mary Milliner's."

"Let us go in."

They did so, but nothing whatever that would tend to explain what they had seen met their view.

The apartment afforded every indication of having been recently occupied, but there was nothing to indicate that its inmate had left it under any peculiar circumstances.

There was no elucidation of the mystery there.

The men were more terrified than ever.

They went out again on to the landing.

Two other doors, leading into bedrooms, opened from it.

One of these they looked into and found empty.

The other was the one in which Edgworth Bess was confined.

The door of this was locked, and they found it impossible to obtain an entrance.

Jonathan had the key.

But they knocked upon the panel.

No sound was returned.

The summons was repeated, but with the same result.

A consultation now took place, which terminated with their going down to the second landing.

Here they found the body of the thief-taker's paramour in the same way as they had left it.

But, though she was beyond all question quite dead, yet there was nothing whatever to show by what means her death had been brought about.

Moreover, upon making a closer examination, they found a long black-bafted knife sticking in her breast, and it was from this wound that the blood upon her clothing had come.

"Let us leave her just as she is," said Quilt Arnold. "Don't any of you touch her. I will run round to the sessions-house, and tell Jonathan what has happened."

He started off as he spoke, and soon afterwards returned with the thief-taker, who left the court the moment after sentence was pronounced.

A look of great anxiety was on his face.

The mysterious occurrence troubled him not a little.

CHAPTER CLXXI.

SHOWS HOW THE PRESENCE OF STEGGS IN THE THIEF-TAKER'S HOUSE TURNED OUT A FORTUNATE CIRCUMSTANCE FOR EDGWORTH BESS.

STEGGS had a difficult part to play.

Jonathan's regular men looked upon him with the greatest suspicion and distrust.

But he was so very humble to all of them, that they could do nothing.

Almost the first discovery he had made, after being installed in his new place, was that Jonathan had a prisoner upstairs.

But he did not know who.

His heart, however, whispered to him that it was poor Edgworth Bess, whom now, to give the man credit, he was more willing to help and serve than he had been formerly to persecute.

Should his surmise as to who Jonathan's prisoner was turn out to be correct, he would have to keep the strictest possible watch over his behaviour, or he would not be able to render her much assistance.

Upon the morning when the trial took place, Steggs managed to withdraw himself from his companions.

He crept upstairs, and hid himself in Jonathan's private room.

Then, when he had ascertained that the thief-taker had left the house, and would be absent from it for several hours, he proceeded to put a pre-determined plan into execution.

Leaving his hiding-place, he crept stealthily up the second flight of stairs.

Upon reaching the top he paused, for he heard a faint movement.

The stairs were dark, so he crouched down upon them.

Some one was coming.

One of the doors upon the landing opened.

Crouching down still lower, he watched and waited.

A woman came forth.

Who she was Steggs had no idea.

Her proportions were rather immense, and she was what many would call a fine-looking woman.

The reader will no doubt judge this was Mary Milliner. And so it was.

The little fracas between her and her amiable consort is, doubtless, fresh in the recollection of the reader.

Upon the occasion referred to, Jonathan had drawn his sword and transixed her with it.

She was then handed over to Mr. Snoxall, under whose care she remained for some time in a very precarious condition. But at length she nearly recovered from the effects of the wound.

She was, however, afraid to show her face to the thief-taker, for fear he should treat her to some further ill-usage.

It was not long, however, before she learned that Jonathan had brought home a female prisoner, and confined her in the room adjoining hers.

Mr. Snoxall, of course, was her informant.

From him she elicited these important facts.

The female prisoner was young.

She was fair.

She was beautiful.

She was ill, and Jonathan had manifested the greatest desire to have her brought to a proper state of health.

Moreover, that he had offered the man of physic the very large sum of two hundred pounds if he was successful.

Now, when we take into consideration the position which Mary Milliner held.

And the violence of her temper.

We shall certainly see cause enough for her to be suddenly inflamed with jealousy.

In fact, it amounted to a frenzy.

Woman like, she jumped immediately to the conclusion that her Jonathan had brought her there with matrimonial designs.

She did not, however, take into calculation that the prisoner might have the greatest possible aversion to her jailer.

She did not think she would sooner suffer a thousand deaths than become the bride of such a man.

On the contrary, she thought she would, to use her own expression, jump at the offer as soon as it was made her.

But she determined she would have no rivals in the affection of her Jonathan.

Accordingly, on that morning—an eventful one it seemed destined to be—she resolved to put an end to the prisoner's existence.

Arming herself with a knife, and uttering some very diabolical threats, she emerged from her own room.

Steggs, however, had not the advantage the reader has, of being in possession of the facts which have gone before, and though he heard her muttering to herself about something, and was able even to catch a word here and there, he could not, for the life of him, think what she was after.

He fancied at first that she was going to descend the stairs, but he found she passed the top of them, and went to the door which Steggs knew perfectly well, opened into the chamber occupied by Edgworth Bess.

His heart beat rather painfully when he saw this, but felt thankful he was at hand to protect, in case any danger should threaten her.

And now Mary Milliner, after a good deal of fumbling, produced a skeleton-key from her pocket, with which she unlocked the door.

No sound followed this movement, and after a little hesitation, the woman entered.

Steggs crawled swiftly and stealthily forward.

He knew the difficulties of his situation.

But, just as he reached the door, that horrible scream had arisen, whose ear-piercingness had so startled the unizaries who were carousing below.

Edgworth Bess was sleeping when Jonathan's mistress unlocked the door.

Mr. Snoxell had administered a narcotic the night before, and she had not yet recovered from its effects.

But the slight clicking of the lock partially aroused her.

The footsteps of her foe completely did so.

She opened her eyes, and looked up.

To her unbounded surprise, she saw a huge woman leaning over her.

It was under the impulse of the moment that she uttered the scream.

There was something in the expression of the woman's face, and a baleful look in her eyes, which frightened her. Steggs bounded forward.

He was just in time.

Mary Milliner had drawn the knife with which she had provided herself from its sheath in the bosom of her dress.

She held it suspended in the air.

Another moment, and it would have been brought down with the full strength of her powerful arm upon the breast of Edgworth Bess.

But, ere she could achieve her fell intent, Steggs had grasped her wrists.

He could not prevent it descending, however, but he averted it.

It sank deeply into the clothing of the bed.

Then he shifted his grasp from her wrist to her neck, and a furious struggle commenced.

It was during that struggle that Mary Milliner uttered the short, sharp, shrill screams.

But Steggs quickly found that, in point of mere bodily strength, he was no match for his opponent; and therefore, with great suddenness, he drew the knife from the bed, and plunged it into her breast.

The blow was almost immediately fatal.

The blade had reached some vital part.

Then Steggs thought how awkwardly he was situated.

What should he do?

How should he avert suspicion from himself?

An idea flashed across his fertile brain in a moment, and he at once proceeded to carry it out.

He dragged the now almost helpless woman from the room.

Then to the top of the stairs.

Exerting his whole strength, he then picked her up and pitched her over the balusters.

She fell to the bottom of the flight, a distance of twelve feet at least, like a log of wood.

So far, then, all was well; but then Steggs knew that an alarm would be immediately raised, the body found, and the upper portion of the house thoroughly searched.

Should he be discovered, suspicion would at once fall upon him.

What excuse could he make to account for his position there?

None.

At least, none that would be satisfactory.

Where was he to conceal himself.

Hiding-places in plenty there no doubt were, but then was there one which would not be pried into?

Hastening back to the door of Edgworth Bess's room, he took the skeleton-key out of the lock, where Mary Milliner had left it sticking, and, entering the chambers, close the door after him.

Then he locked it on the inner side, and returned the key to his pocket.

Feeble as Edgworth Bess was, she saw that the actions of Steggs were the actions of a friend and not a foe. Besides, had he not saved her from a horrible death?

Approaching the bedside he said, in a low emphatic tone.

"Do not cry out or make the least noise. In me you see a friend who will defend you to the full extent of his ability. But I cannot single-handed fight against so many."

"What is it? Tell me, I cannot think."

She pressed her hands over her eyes, as she spoke in the manner of one much confused.

"Wait a little," said Steggs, "Hark, cannot you hear them coming?"

The tramping of many footsteps on the stairs followed his question.

"Yes! yes! I hear them."

"Be silent, then, and I will tell you all presently. If anyone knocks, do not reply to them. Jonathan himself is from home. If any one enters, profess entire ignorance of everything. Do you understand me?"

"Quite."
"Good, then I will conceal myself, and now be silent. If our voices were heard, we should be ruined."

With the foreboding feeling at his heart that he was going to find that something dreadful had happened, Jonathan Wild made his way upstairs to the room containing his fair prisoner.

He thrust the proper key into the lock.

CHAPTER CLXXII.

SHOWS THE READER THE CAPITAL PLAN WHICH BLUESKIN DEvised FOR JACK'S ESCAPE.

JACK SHEPPARD is in the condemned hold, as that portion of the prison was called which was exclusively set aside for the reception of those upon whom the dread sentence of death had been passed.

The time has passed wearily for him, and as minute after minute elapsed, he felt that he was hastening to his doom.

He had given up all hopes of making his escape.

The large cell in which he was placed was shared by his two comrades in guilt, and three turnkeys, who were relieved every two hours.

Thus they were never suffered to be alone.

At length the morrow, which was Friday, came.

The day wore away.

Jack heard of no one.

Several, however, had come to visit Flood and Blewitt.

It must be understood that just inside the door by which prisoners were admitted, and which was placed at the top of a little flight of stone steps leading down into the Old Bailey, was a kind of vaulted apartment or vestibule generally known among the officials as "the lodge."

When you stood inside this place, and the door by which you had entered closed, you would have seen several other doors.

One led into a little ante or waiting-room, which had been fitted up for the accommodation of such turnkeys as might be off duty.

Another led to the governor's house, and three or four more to different parts of the huge building.

But just opposite "the wicket," for so the door leading into the street was designated, was a door of so peculiar a character that we are obliged to describe it.

It was formed of bars of iron laid crosswise, one over the other, so as to form a kind of network.

When any visitors came, they had to stand in front of this grating, while the prisoners in the condemned hold were allowed to go up a flight of steps and stand on the other side of it.

In this way the conversation took place, with the bars between them.

Blewitt and Flood then, as we have said, had been permitted to go up to this grating several times, as one or other of their friends came to see them.

But no one came to see Jack until just before the closing hour on Friday night, when the agreeable intelligence was brought to him that some visitors were waiting for him.

Like the rest, he ascended the flight of steps.

To his surprise and disappointment, he found his visitors were two gaunt-looking, shabbily-dressed women, who sent up a howl of lamentation as soon as they saw him approach.

Jack's quickness of perception immediately showed him that there was something more in this than met the eye.

He pressed himself, therefore, as closely as he could against the bars, and scrutinized their features narrowly.

One of the women did the same as he did—namely, press against the bars, while the other set up a more lugubrious howling than before.

"Jack!" said a voice, which Sheppard instantly recognised. "Make no movement, utter no exclamation of surprise at seeing me in this disguise, but it is the best I could think of. Jack, I have come to help you to escape!"

Escape! How the word thrilled through every nerve in Jack's body.

And who was it that spoke?

"Blueskin!"

"I couldn't come before, Jack, nor I couldn't think of anything, but now I've got a scheme all cut and dried. I can't give you full explanation, but we must set about it at once. We can talk the while."

"But what are you going to do?"

"I will tell you. Howl away," he added, to the other female, who was no other than the landlord of the "Black Lion."

"Jack."

"Yes, Blue."

"Do you see the top of the door?"

"Yes."

"The spikes, I mean."

"Yes—yes."

"Do you think you could squeeze between them if one was taken out?"

With a beating heart Jack looked up before he replied to this question.

Along the cross-barred iron gate which we have described, was a row of sharp iron spikes.

They were seven in number.

Jack measured the distance.

"I think I could get through if the middle one was broke off, but how can it be done? We shall be seen."

"Leave that to me," said Blueskin, "so long as you can through. Look here."

As he spoke he produced from beneath his clothes a curious looking instrument.

It was a miniature saw, of the kind used for sawing timber into planks, and used by two men.

It was, however, formed of the finest-tempered steel.

Its length seven or eight inches at the utmost.

One side was cut into a number of fine sharp teeth.

"Now, Jack!" said Blueskin, "there's the little tool that will help you to escape."

"I see."

"Take hold of your end through the bars, so, that's it. I will take hold of the other. Place it close to the bottom of the middle spike and draw it gently backwards and forwards. It won't make much noise, because it is well oiled, and you will see how soon it will be through the spike. As soon as it is we will pull you down. Now then, set about it. Howl, Joe."

Joe did howl, and Jack, with fresh hopes in his breast, caught hold of one end of the tiny saw, and commenced drawing it backwards and forwards in the manner that his friend Blueskin had directed.

As he had told him, the sound which it produced was slight indeed, and such as would not be likely to attract observation.

And besides, the landlord, by keeping up a continual affectation of intense grief, drowned all slight noises.

"Where is Edgworth Bess?" was Jack's first question when the saw had fairly got to work.

"In Wild's power."

Jack groaned.

But his companion noticed that he worked with greater eagerness than before.

It was astonishing to see with what rapidity the saw cut into the spike.

One would have thought it was wood.

But then the iron of which it was composed was of the softest character.

The turnkeys were about, and though several of them looked, not one noticed what was going forward.

At length the time came for the prison to be closed.

The spike was almost sawn through, but not quite.

"We can't manage it to-night, Jack," said Blueskin.

"We had better give up at once. It's no use spoiling a good thing."

"But it will be noticed."

"What? the place we have been at work upon?"

"Yes."

"Pho, pho, no danger! Let go of your end."

Jack did so.

Blueskin next rubbed what grease there was clinging to the bar, and the fine dust that had mixed with it in the crevice in the spike, and then what they had done was imperceptible.

"There you are, Jack. Now lie down to-night with a lightened heart. You will be all right to-morrow."

"You will come again?"

"Oh! trust us."

"Now then, you women," said one of the turnkeys, in a surly voice, "time's up, and you must be off at once."

[EDGORTH BESS IMPLORES STEGGS TO SAVE HER FROM JONATHAN WILD.]

"Good-bye, Jack," said Joe Johnson, in a choking voice, which was admirably assumed. "Good bye, Jack."

"Good-bye," said Sheppard.

As for Blueskin, he did not speak. He was fearful if he did that some tone of his voice might be recognised, so he contented himself with waving his hand.

The man on the lock was well known to him.

He had seen him a hundred times, and he felt far from comfortable when he saw him hold open the door to allow them to pass out.

But, with ready thought, he drew from his pocket a dilapidated handkerchief, and buried his face in it, pretending to be overcome with grief.

In this he was followed by Joe Johnson, who set up in addition one of those dismal and awful howls of his, which echoed through the prison.

"Now, you old woman, be off," said the turnkey. "It's good your howling and snivelling. Scragged he will be to a certainty."

"Oh! my poor dear Jack," moaned Johnson, making a movement as though it was his intention to return to the grating and take another farewell of the prisoner.

But the turnkey rudely pushed him towards the steps, and closed the door after him in such a manner that Joe was obliged either to descend the steps of his own accord, or be thrust down them.

Of course he preferred and adopted the first alternative.

Both the plotters were delighted with the success which had hitherto attended their daring enterprize.

They crossed over to the Old Bailey, and, upon turning the corner of Fleet-lane, where he felt certain none of the officials of the prison could see him, Joe slapped his comrade on the back and indulged in a loud laugh, to the no small astonishment of a boy who happened to be by.

But Blake administered rather a severe caution, for they were not yet in a position to triumph, though certainly they had got on very well so far.

In spite, however, of all he could say, Johnson was unable to control his laughter, which, though not so vehement as before, had subsided into a very audible chuckle.

CHAPTER CLXXIII.

THE CONDEMNED HOLD IN NEWGATE. BOB BAINS RELATES THE STORY OF HELL-AND-FURY.

WITH what different feelings Jack Sheppard left the grating and returned to the condemned cell!

When he emerged from that gloomy habitation he had almost lost all hope.

He had already begun to feel resigned to his fate.

But what a change there was now.

It seemed, indeed, as though he was already at liberty.

He was careful, however, to conceal his elation, and he changed the expression of his countenance to one of sombre despair.

His footsteps, which upon the first impulse had been springy and elastic, he altered also.

Any change in his demeanour would, he knew well enough, be immediately noticed by those who were appointed to keep guard over him, and if it was of a hopeful character, they would immediately conjecture that he anticipated making his escape, and such a watch would be kept upon his movements as to make it impossible.

Already, in consequence of his former daring feat, they were unusually vigilant, and his best policy evidently was to act in such a manner as would cause them to abate that vigilance rather than increase it.

Fully alive to all this, Jack re-entered the condemned hold.

His appearance would have deceived the acutest observer, so admirably did he counterfeit deep and hopeless grief.

He walked in and sat down on the stone bench assigned to him with the air of one who has done with life.

But he brooded over the plan his friends had formed, and weighed in a more accurate balance his chances of escape.

It grew dark rapidly, until at length those six persons who sat in that dreary place were unable to distinguish the outlines of each other's faces.

Then, and not till then, for he felt it would be a relief to do so, Jack permitted his countenance to be the true index of his thoughts.

The more he pondered upon the plan, the more feasible it seemed.

Daring he had in plenty to enable him to attempt it, and, besides, he had this incentive that, let him do what he might, they could only hang him. The chances were all in favour of his bettering his position, and none for making it worse.

Then he thought of the poor heiress, Edgworth Bess, who had made so deep an impression on his heart, and, in spite of his self-command, he was almost betrayed into uttering a bitter execration upon the head of her persecutor and captor.

Fortunately, however, he controlled himself and was silent, though mentally he heaped up curses on his head.

But still he had hopes that that providence or good fortune, which had hitherto watched over her, would continue to keep her under its care.

Blueskin, who felt almost as great an interest in her welfare as he did, knew where she was, and would not he do everything he could to shield her from the machinations of the thief-taker?

He consoled himself with the idea that he would.

By that time to-morrow he himself would be at freedom, and then he should be content.

How long the time would seem, though, before that morrow came! What a many long weary hours would have to pass away before it came.

He resolved—and wisely—to determine in what manner he should employ himself as soon as he got free, and what should be the first step he should take.

With Blewitt and Flood the case was very different.

A change had come over them, but it was a change in no way resembling that which had come over Jack.

They had given up all hope.

They had come to the clear and definite conclusion that no chain of events, however remarkable, could avert their doom.

They were as certain they should die at the appointed time as they were that they were then in existence.

But instead of this conviction abasing them, as one would naturally suppose it would have done, they, with a rude and wild philosophy, determined that what little space of life remained to them they would enjoy and pass in the most agreeable manner they possibly could.

There were many obstacles in their way, but then, as we have before stated, they had been visited during the day by several of their companions, who had supplied them with money.

Under the old criminal code there was, as is well known, many abuses, and not the least of them was allowing prisoners to receive money, with which they could purchase whatever they thought proper.

And with those condemned to die a greater licence was allowed than with any others. Indeed, they were permitted to have just whatever they liked at their country's expense.

This is how it is when, in reading over the criminal annals of the past century, we find malefactors going to the scaffold in a state of intoxication.

Some even were all but incapable of motion, and almost deprived of sense, but the ebriety generally manifested itself in acts of ridiculous and disgusting bravado.

The first use, then, which Flood and Blewitt made of the money they had received was to hand it to one of the turnkeys, and order a quantity of drink.

This was fetched in, and the wretched prisoners, and those who had been appointed to watch over them, joined in a debauch.

The night was spent in the most boisterous revelry—singing songs at the top of their lungs, and telling tales in the lives of notorious depredators.

Jack had, of course, been asked to join the company, and judging that he should best keep off suspicion by consenting, he did so.

A steaming glass of hot gin and water was placed before him, and a regular carouse began.

No one would ever have dreamed that three of that bacchanalian company had been doomed to die in so short a time.

But so it was.

The picture we have drawn is neither an exaggerated nor an untrue one.

The glasses were filled and emptied with extraordinary rapidity, and the more rapidly these processes were gone through the more uproarious did the company become.

Louder and louder grew the peals of laughter as the fiery stimulant mounted to their brains.

At length, one of the officers put his empty glass down on the table, and smacking his lips with satisfaction, said—

"Ah! my lads, this is what I call fun, and no gammon! That's the style to do it! Why, I never recollect but one jolly set out like this here."

"When was that?" asked Blewitt.

"Oh! many a year back now. That was a lark, I can tell you!"

"Order—order!" cried the voices; "order, everybody! Order for Bob Bains! He's going to tell us a story."

By degrees silence was obtained.

"Oh! it ain't no story particular that I've got to tell you," said the officer who had first spoken, and who had been called by his comrades Bob Bains; "but I recollect now a matter of fourteen year ago, when a werry remarkable character was ketched, and brought to the old stone jug."

"Who was he?"

"You mean, what was his name?"

"Yes."

"Ah! that's what I can't tell you."

"Can't tell us?"

"No."

"How's that? Hadn't he got a name?"

"I s'pose he had, but nobody never knew what it was."

"And wasn't it never found out?"

"Not as I knows on."

"But surely there was a name you used to call him by?"

"Oh! yes; he had a sort of nickname, but it wasn't his real one."

"And what was the nickname?"

"Hell-and-Fury!"*

"Hell-and-Fury?"

"Yes. Rather a rummy name, warn't it?"

"Very."

"So everybody says."

"But why was he called that?"

"Because it was a word of his—a sort of—sort of a—"

"What is it, Jim?"

"Blest if I know."

"Herplective?"

"Yes, that's it. A sort of a herplective as he was always making use of. For instance, if he was astomished, he'd say, 'Hell-and-Fury!'"

"Oh! that's it?"

"Yes. Consequently, you see, he got to be called that for a name for want of a better, and I shouldn't wonder if that isn't the way half the people come by the queer names they've got."

"I shouldn't wonder; but what were you going to tell us?"

"About Hell-and-Fury!"

"Of course."

"Why, it's about fourteen year ago since he was brought into the old stone jug."

"What was he?"

"I ought to tell you that first. He was a real out and out hightobyman."

"One of the jolly old sort?"

"Yes, there was nothing of the sneak about him. He'd take up his station in the middle of the road, and when a carriage came by, he would ride up to the window as bold as brass, and, drawing a pistol, cry, 'Hell and fury! Hand over what you've got, or I'll sink every one of you!'"

"My eye!"

"You may well say that. He was the daringest chap as ever I've heard tell on, bar none."

"And you've had a pretty good experience?"

"I believe you. Why, I was born in this old place, and I have never slept out of it since, and now I'm getting quite an old man."

"Hear, hear," cried the rest, banging their glasses on the table, impatiently. "Let us hear what you have got to say about 'Hell-and-Fury!'"

CHAPTER CLXXIV.

RELATES HOW HELL-AND-FURY WAS BROUGHT TO NEWGATE IN A CARRIAGE AND FOUR, AND HOW JERRY ABERSHAW DANCED A HORNPIPE IN HIS FETTERS.

"ALL right, mates; all right. But don't be so impatient."

"You're so awfully long-winded."

"Well, then, I'll sum it up in a few words. He played the hightobyman for some time with very great success, and nobody could capture him. People got afraid to travel about, for, if he stopped decent-looking folks, and they had got no money with them, he used to ill-treat 'em awful."

"Did he?"

"I believe you; but at last they nabbed him, and it was the cleverest trick that ever I heard of."

"How they nabbed him, do you mean?"

"Of course I do, stupid; how you keep cross-questioning a fellow; and if it hadn't been by a trick, they would never have caught him to this day."

"What was the trick?"

"Why, a party of officers hired a magnificent carriage drawn by four beautiful horses."

"Whatever for?"

"Wait a bit, and I'll tell you. This was kept very quiet, but, when all was in readiness, ten of the best police officers all armed themselves and put on various disguises. The carriage was going to start from Edgware, so they made their way one at a time to that place. One who knew how to drive four-in-hand was disguised as a coachman, and another of them, dressed in plain clothes, sat by his side. Two more were disguised as footmen, and wore a very rich livery indeed. Of course, they stood at the back of the carriage."

"Yes—yes."

"Then the other six officers, dressed in plain clothes, got inside the carriage, and, preparations being quite complete, they set off towards London."

"I see it now."

"No you don't. Hold your row, or else I stops this blessed minute!"

"No—no!" cried the rest. "Never mind him, go along."

"Well, then, as I told you, when they had all taken their seats, the carriage was driven in the direction of London, and a very aristocratic turn-out it looked, I can assure you, and was enough to deceive anybody."

"They calculated that it would deceive Hell-and-Fury if he happened to be on the road; and so it did, for just after they passed through Kilburn-gate, they heard the clatter of horse's hoofs, and a mounted man rode up."

"Halt!" he cried, to the coachman. "Halt, I say! Hell and fury, if you don't pull up, you are a dead man!"

"These words were quite enough to let the officers know they had got hold of the right person, so the one who played the part of coachman drew up with all the pleasure in the world."

"Seeing this, Mr. Hell-and-Fury rides up to the coach-window, and catching hold of it by the top, lets it down with a crash, while he put a pistol inside with all the boldness you can think of."

"But inside the carriage was quite dark, for they had not lighted the lamp, so he did not notice what a many people were inside."

"'Hell and fury!' he cried. 'Your money or your life! Quick! I have no time to lose.'"

"While this was going on, you must know, the two footmen, according to a previous arrangement, slipped down off the board at the back, and coming round to the side, one caught hold of him by one arm and the second by the other."

"Hell-and-Fury turned round with an oath, and tried to shake off his foes; but it was all to no purpose. They were used to that sort of thing, and besides, the two strongest men in the force had been selected to do the job."

"By the time he had twisted himself round, the two got off the box and laid hold of the bridle of his horse, while the others opening the door, rushed out in a body, and he was overpowered."

"He struggled manfully, however, to the last, but it was all to no purpose. What chance had one man got against ten who were bent upon taking him prisoner?"

"Accordingly, after a time, they pinioned him and put him inside the carriage, while the one whose seat he had taken mounted the highwayman's horse, and rode on in advance to Newgate to bring word that the celebrated Hell-and-Fury was caught, and that they were bringing him there securely bound and a prisoner."

"The greatest excitement took place, of course, and every preparation was made for his arrival, when, sure enough, soon afterwards the carriage drove up to the door of the lodge."

"He couldn't complain of the way they brought him, for I should think he is the only highwayman that ever has been or ever will be brought to Newgate in a carriage and four."

"Well, when it stopped, they opened the door and lifted him out all bound as he was, for they were afraid to loose him, and in that state carried him to the strongest cell in the prison."

"There they put him in some heavy irons—the very same ones, Mr. Sheppard, that you had on before your trial," remarked the speaker, by way of parenthesis, and looking at Jack as he spoke.

"What next, Bob?"

"Well, in course of time, as you may suppose, he was had up afore the beak, and a case of highway robbery brought agin him, which was fully proved, and so he was cast for death."

"After that, of course, he was brought here, and I was one that sat with him. It turned out while he was here that he had some rich and powerful friends, who tried hard to get him off, and who supplied him with lots of tin."

"He was a perfect gentleman when you came to know him, though he was able to act the blackguard uncommonly well; and it's my private belief that he was the rakish, good-for-nothing son of a family of rank; but nothing more was known of him except what was guessed, and which, of course, might be right or wrong, though, I fancy, I can see through a deal board as well as here and there one.

* A fact.

"I can tell you one thing, however, that we all had a merry time of it while he was here, and we all looked forward with great sorrow to the time when we should have to part. As for money, he throw guineas about as if they were halfpence, and ate and drank of the best of everything that was to be had.

"Of course, we were all invited to have a share, and there used to be quite a fight to see who should be put in the cell with him—and you know, mates, that's a duty we all shirk if we possible can.

"It was quite the reverse with him, he was such a jolly companion. He used to tell us the rummiest tales of what he'd done in his time, and I thought at times I should have laughed till I died. He was enough to make the very walls laugh.

"Well, the night before he was scragged we had the jolliest jollification, barring this here, as has ever been had in the prison, and he no more cared for to-morrow than we did—nor half so much, indeed."

"And was he tucked up?"

"Ah! yes," exclaimed the narrator, wiping away a tear, which the hot gin and water had doubtless helped to produce; "I bid him farewell, and away he went. It was a real pity he should come to grief, that it was!"

"And you never found out his name?"

"Never from that day to this, nor anything about him. But he had got some rich relations, and I have no doubt was descended from some noble family or other."

"And did he die game?"

"As a cock! and he made such an elegant bow when he stood up in the cart that all the people cried 'Shame!' and if they hadn't been very quick, he would have been rescued."

"Ah! there's been some game coves in this place in my time," said another of the turnkeys. "Fill my glass, if you please. Thank you. Now, the gamest that ever I heard of—and it strikes me he'll beat Hell-and-Fury—was Jerry Abershaw."

"Oh! yes!" responded several. "I remember Jeremiah; he was an out-and-outer, with no gammon!"

"He certainly were," observed Bob Bains, reflectively. "He certainly were."

"To be sure he was! If Hell-and-Fury was brought in a carriage and four, he never did what Jerry did."

"What was that?" asked Jack.

"Why, he was such a desperate chap that they did not put him in the condemned hold here, but locked him up in a cell with a set of fetters on."

"Oh! indeed."

"Well, when the morning for the execution came, what do you think he did?"

"Escaped?"

"Oh! dear, no; we took good care of that."

"What was it, then?"

"Why, when he was brought out to have his irons struck off, before being put into the cart and driven to Tyburn—you won't believe it!"

"What?"

"He actually broke away; and though he had no end of ironwork about his wrists, folded his arms across his breast—so!"

The turnkey placed his arms in the position he described.

"Well, then, you must know, he had got all the fetters on that go round the waist and ankles. He actually—mind you, I saw it myself—danced a sailor's hornpipe all round the yard!"

"Wonderful!" ejaculated Jack.

"And that's not the most wonderful part either, for, not only did he make every step quite perfect in spite of the weight of the iron, but he made the fetters clank together and keep time like music."

"Impossible."

"Oh! it's quite true, I can assure you, ain't it Bill? You saw it as well as me."

"Certainly," replied the man appealed to, who was the third turnkey. "Certainly. As you say, I saw it; and it's quite true; we were all quite astonished at it, the governor, the sheriffs, the hangman, and chaplain, and everybody, and none of us attempted to stop him till he had finished. But, as you have been telling tales among you, I have thought of one myself which is quite as rummy, if not more rummier than any we have heard yet."

"Let's have it, then, if it ain't a long 'un."

"Oh! it ain't a long 'un."

"Very well, then, fire away, for it will be our turn off directly."

CHAPTER CLXXV.

IN WHICH THE STORY OF THE QUAKER HIGHWAYMAN IS BROUGHT TO A TERMINATION.

THIS was true.

The guard was changed every two hours, and, as the last speaker had remarked, their two hours were nearly up, so that the tale, if they were to hear it at all, must be a short one, so as to be ended before three other men entered to take their places.

The turnkey began as follows:—

"If you won't interrupt me," he said, "by asking questions and making remarks, I shall very soon get to the end."

"We won't interrupt you, then. What's the tale about?"

"Some of you must have heard about it, I am sure. It's the quaker highwayman."

"Aminadab Gilchrist?"

"That's the man."

"Ah! that was a rum start. The idea of a quaker, dressed in broad cloth, being a highwayman."

"Ah! well. Order—order. Fill up the glasses, and let us hear the tale straightforward."

This proposal was immediately acceded to, and for a minute or so nothing was heard but the clinking of glasses.

Then the table was knocked until order was restored.

"Well, mates, it's a matter of twelve or fourteen years since the events took place I am going to relate. Ah! they were the good old times. People then wasn't so blessed particular as they is now.

"Never mind that, though. You must know that a highwayman then was rather a remarkable character, and he was thought a good deal of by both great and small.

"There was a good many tobymen on the road at the time I am speaking of, but there was none so celebrated as Captain Blackford.

"But you mustn't think, as you perhaps might, that he called himself Captain because he had got a gang of men under him. He merely, in a manner of speaking, assumed the name.

"Whenever he was met with, he was alone. He had no comrades, and never robbed in company with others.

"He was a very remarkable chap, I can tell you; and, talk about daring, he was the daringest that ever lived. He'd stand still to be shot at, and never move a muscle, and, somehow or other, the bullets did not seem to hurt him.

"He used to ride a magnificent horse—a real beauty. It would have fetched any money if it had been put up for sale.

"Well, this Captain Blackford and his mare used to do some astonishing things, and if ever any one was either going from or coming to London and carrying a booty worth having, Captain Blackford was sure to stop them. He never let one escape.

"He must have had some means of learning all this, of course, but, whatever it was, it was never found out.

"Rewards were offered for him, and all manner of dodges tried, but they were all of no avail. He was too old a bird to be caught by chaff, and they soon got tired of laying traps for him.

"Well, things went on, and he could be heard of almost every night, sometimes on the north road, sometimes on the western, and sometimes on the Dover road.

"One of the rummiest things about him was that he never injured anyone. He carried pistols, but he was never known to fire them. There was something terribly persuasive about the tones of his voice, when he commanded them to stop and hand over their cash, I suppose, for he never failed to get what he asked for.

"As I told you, he was fired at many and many a time, and he used to stand to let them, and took no notice, until at last the people began to get more frightened than before, and used to think they were dealing with some one who was not of this world.

"There was something else about him, too, that was very strange. As you must all know, there is always a house or two in London where a knight of the road is to be met with when he is off duty, but it was not so with Captain Blackford. At all the kens he was as great a mystery as anywhere, and they knew no more of his whereabouts than anybody else did.

"As I told you, he used to ride a beautiful horse—always the same one—and as for speed and strength, I should think her equal was not to be found.

"Of course, as the officers were sent out specially to capture him, they got upon his track more than once, and gave him chase, but they never could catch him. He would fly before them on the road, and they would think they were gaining on him, when all of a sudden he would disappear, as though he was a ghost, and no after searching would find him.

"All this, you may be sure, made him more feared than ever, and increased his reputation not a little.

"At length, however, it was noticed that he always disappeared somewhere about the same spot, and that put the officers a little on the scent.

"The clue was a faint one, and they resolved to follow it up, but they could find nothing whatever that looked suspicious.

"There was only one residence near this place, and that was called Friendly Hall, and was occupied by a highly-respected quaker gentleman, by name Aminadab Gilchrist.

"He was very well known, and universally looked up to and admired, in spite of his peculiar creed, and, indeed, he was considered one of the first gentlemen in the county.

"This threw the officers off the scent again. They would as soon have thought of looking for the sun at midnight as Captain Blackford, the notorious highwayman, at Friendly Hall.

"They kept a sharp watch all round the place of disappearance, in the hope that they should see their prey make his appearance there again. But in this they were always disappointed. They would hear of him twenty or thirty miles off.

"Well, all this looked very strange, and everyone's excitement and curiosity got wound up to the highest pitch.

"Then the summer came, and during the warm light nights nothing at all was heard of him.

"It is really astonishing how soon the world forgets any one. This was a notable example. Before the winter came round again, he was no more thought of than if he had never existed.

"They were soon reminded, though. The secretary of state was coming up from Bristol in his carriage—no, let me see, I almost think it was Bath; however, that don't matter a straw—he was coming up to London, anyhow, after a few month's absence, when, having almost reached the end of his journey, he was stopped by Captain Blackford, and robbed of everything valuable he had with him.

"This created a great fuss, and the secretary of state doubled the reward, and added a couple of hundred pounds out of his own pocket.

"This started the officers again with fresh spirits, for altogether the sums now offered for his capture amounted to six hundred pounds.

"They set out, and for a long time were unsuccessful in meeting with him, but at length, on the Uxbridge-road, they heard a couple of screams, so, riding forward, they came to a carriage, the occupants of which had been robbed by the very individual of whom they were in search.

"From inquiry, they learned he had not left five minutes, and had taken the direction of the open country.

"This was enough for the officers. Away they went, and soon heard the clatter of a horse's hoofs upon the ground. But although they spurred their horses to the utmost, they were unable to come up with him, and they returned to Bow-street defeated and disappointed.

"But they were determined not to be conquered, and kept up the chase.

"The winter, I recollect, set in very early, and in September we had several very heavy falls of snow, which succeeded each other with little intermission.

"After one of the snow-storms a sharp, hard frost had set in, and the snow, which lay upon the ground was covered with a strong, crust-like ice, and which crackled and gave way before everything that was put on it.

"This was just the state of the road when the officers made another excursion after Captain Blackford.

"At Tyburn-gate they came up with him once more.

"He was standing there, waiting for the pike to be opened.

"The officers were upon him almost before he was aware of it, but, turning round his head, he saw their dark forms plainly revealed against the white ground.

"At this moment they called to him to surrender, but he took not the least notice of what they said.

"All he did was to back his horse a little, and as the pikeman would not open the gate, he leaped over it.

"As soon as the officers saw what he was about, they hastened forward and fired upon him, but whether any of their shots proved effective was more than they could tell; at all events no notice was taken of them.

"The gate was opened, and they all dashed through.

"They had now, they considered, the finest possible chance of hunting him down if they kept close after him, for the track which his horse made in the snow was very distinct, and consequently could be easily followed.

"Somehow or other it almost seemed as though the highwayman had overlooked the circumstance of leaving so plain an index as to the road he had taken as he did, but what happened afterwards tended to some extent to explain this.

"Away they went, however, at full speed, until the same familiar ground was reached where he had so often disappeared.

"Now, they thought, surely they would get at the heart of the mystery.

"The place at which this disappearance had taken place was where the high-road took a sudden curve round to the right.

"On one side of the road was a low hedge, with several immense meadows beyond.

"On the other side was a kind of park, or rather plantation, belonging to the gentleman quaker, Aminadab Gilchrist.

"But this was screened from the road by a high wooden paling, composed of upright pieces of wood, made so as to lap over one another, and the top of which was at least eight feet from the ground.

"Behind this grew some trees, and the top of the woodwork was defended by sharp iron spikes.

"It was clear no mortal horse could ever have leaped such an obstacle as that.

"This paling was of great length, extending to a distance of at least a mile, perhaps more.

"On reaching this place, then, for the highwayman still kept in advance, the officers found, as they had fully anticipated, that their prey had disappeared."

CHAPTER CLXXVI.

THE REMAINDER OF THE NIGHT IS SPENT BY THE PRISONERS AND THEIR JANITORS IN A CONVIVIAL MANNER.

JUST as the turnkey reached this point in his narration, and when, of course, the interest of his auditors was fully excited, a trampling of footsteps was heard outside, and the door of the cell was thrown open.

It was the three men who had come to relieve their comrades, whose term of duty had expired.

But, by the request of the prisoners, and the consent of the new comers, the three whose turn was off remained a little longer while the tale was finished, which, as can be seen, is rapidly approaching its termination.

An interruption of several minutes' duration, of course, occurred, but in a little while silence was restored.

"Now then, Jim," they cried, "make a finish of it."

"Hear, hear."

"You have done it well so far; keep it up."

The turnkey smiled and nodded his head at this compliment, then went on.

"I said when they got to the usual place the highwayman had disappeared.

"Being quite determined this time not to be baffled, they pulled up, and alighted from their steeds.

"The prints of the horses' hoofs could be plainly enough distinguished up to a certain point, and there they stopped.

"This was at the side of the tall paling I have described.

"He had been riding at full speed, keeping close under the shadow of this for some time, but there was every indication of his having come to a halt.

"But just beyond that spot no hoof marks could be seen.

"What was the meaning of it?

"The officers searched closely all round about, and presently one discovered a splash of blood on the paling.

"This drew their attention more particularly to that one part of it, and the result was that they found a small door, but so cunningly contrived as to escape all observation, and almost the closest search.

"It is quite certain it would never have been found by the officers, although in a manner of speaking they were led to it, if it had not been for the splash of blood.

"They did not stand upon any ceremony, but set about battering the door down, which they easily did.

"Neither fastenings nor hinges were visible from the outer-side, so that the means of opening it were secret.

"The door soon ceased to be an obstacle to them, and then upon going through, they found their suspicions confirmed.

"The trees grew very thickly together, but there was a winding path through them just wide enough for a horse.

"The snow lay upon this path as it did upon the high-road, and there were the horse's footprints quite plain and distinct.

"Here and there, too, when they looked, they distinguished spots of blood, which showed that the highwayman was wounded by the discharge at Tyburn, and, therefore, they calculated upon finding him in a very helpless condition indeed.

"The little narrow path was about half a mile long.

"Upon reaching the end of it they found themselves in a large and well-cultivated garden.

"Still following the track, they came at last to the stables attached, or rather belonging to, Friendly Hall.

"The door was locked, but they broke it open.

"The stable was one that would hold about a dozen horses. There were stalls for that number, but only four horses at present occupied it.

"One of these was in a profuse sweat, and gave every token of the hard riding it had had.

"With little or no doubt upon their minds, the officers left two of their number in charge of the stables, while the rest proceeded in a body to the hall.

"No single ray of light from any window indicated that the inhabitants were up.

"But having surrounded the premises in such a manner that they felt certain no one could leave without their knowledge, the officers proceeded to the front door of the mansion, and gave a loud summons for admission.

"They had to repeat this before any notice was taken, and then a window in one of the upper stories was violently thrown up, and a head projected from it.

"When the officers commanded the door to be opened in the king's name, the head was quickly withdrawn, and, after a little delay, they were allowed to enter.

"All was quiet, and the officers began to fear, that after all, Captain Blackford would be one too many for them.

"Where is your master?" asked one.

"In bed, sir," was the reply.

"Then tell him he is wanted. Ask him to step down. We will wait here in the hall till he comes."

"The servant departed upon this errand.

"The officers more than suspected the identity of Captain Blackford with Aminadab Gilchrist, and a little time would set those suspicions at rest, or confirm them.

"The highwayman had been wounded.

"If the quaker proved to be un hurt, it would be tolerably good evidence that he was not the man. If he was, it would fix it on him at once.

"You can imagine how impatiently they waited for the servant to return.

"At length he came.

"My master is in bed, as I told you, and is suffering from severe indisposition. Therefore, he cannot see you."

"Oh! indeed! What time did he go to bed?"

"At his usual hour."

"What time is that?"

"Half-past ten."

"Did you see him then?"

"Of course."

"Very good! Was anything the matter with him then?"

"Not as I know of, but he may have been took ill in the night."

"So he may; and I consider it my duty to take you a little while, and we will go up and see your master."

"The servant was much surprised, but made no resistance.

"The remainder of the household was now getting a-stir.

"The servant they had prisoner they compelled to conduct them to the door of his master's bedroom.

"They knocked, and then, as no answer was given, tried to enter.

"But the door was locked.

"The usual command to open was given, which was not obeyed, so they broke that door down also, despite the remonstrances of the servant, who was thoroughly terrified and alarmed, and without any idea of what was amiss.

"All made a rush into the apartment, which was dimly lighted by an oil lamp on the mantelpiece.

"As they entered, their ears were assailed by a groan.

"A sight met their gaze for which none were exactly prepared.

"Lying half across the bed, and literally bathed in blood, was the bold highwayman, Captain Blackford.

"There could be no doubt about the matter. He was in his well-known dress, a portion of which, however, he had attempted to remove when he seemed to have sunk back upon the bed through weakness.

"Is that your master?" said one of the officers to the servant. "Beware how you speak falsely!"

"The man appeared to be much surprised at seeing his master in such a garb, and he looked attentively in his face before he gave any reply, and then he said—

"Yes, that is master."

"And what is his name?"

"Aminadab Gilchrist."

"This was enough. It was quite clear that the rich and respected quaker, and the much-dreaded highwayman were one and the same person."

"Is that all?" asked Blewitt, as he perceived the narrator paused.

"Well, almost. The wound that he had received at Tyburn was a fearful one, and how he managed to reach home alive is a mystery. He must have been only partially conscious of what he was about."

"And did he die then?"

"Oh! yes. A very little while after the officers broke in he breathed his last. He had bled to death!"

"How extraordinary."

"Wasn't it? You can't think what an excitement it created at the time, and especially among the quakers, who managed in some way to make out that he did not properly belong to their sect, but had only joined it in order to better carry out his designs, but they were glad enough to own him when he was rich and wanted to collect anything."

"I'll warrant that."

"But though he made so much stir, the recollection of him soon died away. I had even forgotten him myself, until your tales to-night put him into my head again."

"And so that was the end of the quaker highwayman?"

"Yes."

"Well, all I can say is, it is a first-rate tale, Jim; but, however, it's time we were off now."

"So it is."

"Good night all, then," said the three turnkeys who were released from duty, and as they spoke they left the cell.

The other three then sat down in the seats which they had occupied, and the same sort of thing went on.

But Jack Sheppard took this opportunity to throw himself down upon the rude pallet prepared for him.

He was tired and weary.

Besides, he wanted to think over his own concerns, though the tales he had heard had the good effect of making the time appear to pass away more quickly.

Flood and Blewitt were evidently anxious to drown thought, and certainly the means they took were best qualified to achieve this end.

Even now they were in a state of semi-intoxication.

But they continued to pour down their throats glass after glass of the hot liquor before them, until, at length, their boisterous mirth and mock joviality lapsed into silence.

Overpowered with drink, they sunk into a deep sleep, from which they did not awake till late the next morning. Jack slept, too, and for a long time also. His stomach was not used to excess of liquor, and what he drank produced a great effect upon him.

But he felt thankful when he learned that it was almost mid-day. There was all the less time to wait until his friends arrived and helped him to escape.

CHAPTER CLXXVII.

JACK SHEPPARD SUCCEEDS IN EFFECTING HIS SECOND ESCAPE FROM NEWGATE.

A REMARKABLE contrast was afforded by Jack Sheppard and his two companions.

He felt cheerful, and even happy.

They, on the contrary—the artificial spirits which the drink had caused having evaporated—were moody, sullen, and despairing.

Jack was longing for the time to pass, and cared not how quickly one minute succeeded to another.

They, on the other hand, cursed and swore because they had not longer to live.

With two such characters the reader can feel but little sympathy.

Such wretches as they were deserved nothing but death.

They were not fit to live.

During their long and iniquitous career they had perpetrated a whole catalogue of crimes, the bare recapitulation of which would make any one shudder.

More drink was called for, which they drank with redoubled thirst, but Jack refused to take any of it.

He wished to keep his head as cool as possible, and his hand steady and ready for work.

The difference in the elapsion of time when one is anxious for it to pass, and when we are a little behind in what we have to do is very great, and must have been noticed by everyone.

Jack found it so, but at length the welcome news was brought to him that some friends of his were waiting to see him.

He could not forbear giving a glance round his person and at his two companions, so certain did he feel that he was then seeing the last of them.

Then, with a light heart, he sprang up the little flight of stone steps, and a moment afterwards stood at the grating.

Blueskin and Johnson were standing there, attired as they were the day before.

The former spoke first.

"Jack!" he said.

"Yes, what is it?"

"We are rather late, so you will have to be quick."

"Yes, yes. Give me the saw."

"Here it is."

"All right."

"But be careful how you use it. The turnkeys are about."

"Where?"

"In the ante-room."

"What are they doing?"

"Having their supper, I think. Something to eat and drink, at all events. Now, Joe," he added, turning to his companion, "howl."

Johnson obeyed by taking a handkerchief from his pocket, and pretending to cry.

Quickly and silently the saw was drawn backwards and forwards across the spike, having been fitted into the crevice made on the preceding evening.

The time they had chosen for attempting to carry out their enterprise was certainly best.

It was Saturday.

The hour was that just before the prison doors were closed.

The men, feeling that the day's work was over, were generally in the habit of assembling in the little room set aside for their use, and here they were at the present.

Even the man on the lock had joined them.

Our friends had the lodge all to themselves.

To be sure, from where they sat, more than one of the turnkeys could see into it, and more than once they looked, but did not see that anything unusual was going forward.

The behaviour of Johnson, the landlord, was a finished piece of acting.

They had no idea that he was other than what he seemed.

Jack, too, from his daring, was rather a favourite with the prison officials, and therefore they were willing to allow the interview between himself and his two female companions to be as private as possible.

Great credit is due to Blueskin for having hit upon the idea of choosing female apparel for a disguise, since there was no other that would have been so well calculated to avert suspicion as that was.

Backwards and forwards, with a rapid, yet steady motion, went the little saw, and every time its teeth sunk deeper and deeper into the iron.

At length the spike was so far sawn through, that Jack thought it not worth while to continue it any longer.

Releasing the little tool which had been of so much service to him, he caught hold of the spike with his right hand.

Then putting out all his strength, he bent it backwards and forwards until it was broken off.

Now came the most difficult part of all.

His heart beat with painful quickness, but there was no time for hesitation.

Indeed every thing would depend upon the rapidity of their actions.

No sooner was the spike fairly broken off, than by the command of his companions, Jack climbed up the gate, and thrust his head and shoulders through the space between the other spikes.

There was only just room, and had he been bigger than he was he could never have got through, but he was remarkably slender.

With a great effort he got his arms through, and then his two companions caught hold of them and pulled him through.

A moment more, and he stood upon the stone floor of the lodge.

One obstacle, and a most formidable one, that interposed itself between him and freedom was overcome.

But scarcely had he fairly gained his feet, than one of the turnkeys in the ante-room got up off his seat, and came towards them.

Fortunately he was perceived by Johnson, who pushed Jack close against the grating, and stood before him, speaking as though he was on the other side.

Blueskin assisted him in this manoeuvre.

The turnkey evidently did not perceive that anything was wrong.

He paused just on the threshold of the ante-room, and said—

"Now, you women, make haste; we are going to close the doors. Time's almost up, you know."

Joe Johnson responded to this speech by an admirably-affected burst of grief.

"Oh! hold your row!" cried the turnkey, turning away. "Make haste and say good-bye, and stop that awful howling."

He then resumed his seat.

Jack had scarcely dared to breathe while this was taking place.

Discovery, indeed, seemed imminent.

But he was all right again directly.

"What next, Blue?" he whispered.

"Be quiet; don't speak so loud."

"Be quick, then."

"Stand where you are; I will slip across to the door. Look, the key is in the lock."

Jack did look, and by a rapid glance assured himself that the ponderous key of the outer door had been left sticking in the lock.

"Well—well."

"I will steal across, turn it rapidly, and fling the door open."

"I see."

"You must both, then, be prepared to rush out, and I will do the same. Do you understand?"

"Quite."

"Good, then."

"But which way are we to turn when we get outside?"

"I had forgotten. At the corner of Giltspur-street I have a horse and trap. Get in and drive off."

"And you?"

"I shall be there as soon as you are."

With these words Blueskin, having first looked into the ante-room, glided across the lodge to the front door.

He was unseen.

With great swiftiness, then, he seized the key, turned it round in the lock, and flung the door open.

Jack Sheppard and Johnson made one bound, and then rolled down the steps into the street together.

The noise they made at once attracted the attention of the turnkeys, who instantly guessed what had happened.

But ere they could reach the door, Blueskin, with great presence of mind, had withdrawn the key, and closing the door, locked it on the outside.

He heard a frantic howl of rage as they dashed themselves against it.

He did not wait, though, to see what they did. He was content in having succeeded in placing a barrier to immediate pursuit.

He could just distinguish the forms of his two companions flying before him, and that was all, for it was quite dusk.

But an immense commotion was taking place within the prison.

The huge bell, which was silent except when a fire took place, or a prisoner escaped, was tolled vigorously.

The alarm was spreading, and would soon be all over London.

Trampling feet could be heard along the streets.

But, knowing that their lives depended upon it, the three friends made their way at full speed in the direction of which Blueskin had spoken.

At the corner of Giltspur-street there, sure enough, was a horse and trap.

A boy was in charge of it.

With all speed they scrambled in.

Jack first.

Then Johnson.

They had to wait a moment for their companion, but he soon reached them, and got in at the back.

Johnson took the reins, and laid the whip with an unsparing hand over the horse's neck, which started forward at a breakneck pace.

But several loud shouts from the rear let them know they were both seen and pursued, while a loud cry was raised—

"Stop thief! stop thief!" which was taken up by every throat.

But, paying no heed to these cries, Johnson kept urging the animal to increased speed, while above all other sounds could be heard the loud tolling of the Newgate bell.

CHAPTER CLXVIII.

JONATHAN WILD IS UNABLE TO ELUCIDATE THE MYSTERY OF MARY MILLINER'S DEATH.

It is quite time now that we turned our attention to Edgworth Bess.

When Steggs had disposed of Mary Milliner in such a summary manner, and created so much consternation among Wild's men, he returned to her room, and locked himself in.

Then, in a few words, he gave Edgworth Bess an outline of what had taken place.

That Jonathan would, before long, pay a visit to that apartment, he did not for a moment doubt, and, therefore, he set about removing everything calculated to excite suspicion in the thief-taker's breast.

As we know, when Mary Milliner attempted the life of the poor heiress, Steggs had seized her wrist, but he was not able to prevent the weapon from descending.

He diverted it, however, and it had sunk deeply into the bed clothes, but without wounding Bess in the least.

Then he had struggled with the ferocious female, and, finding he could achieve a victory by no other means, bestowed upon her the same fate as she had intended for her imaginary rival.

He had next drawn her out of the room and flung her over the balusters.

So quickly was the whole of this performed, that the blood did not begin to flow from the wound to any great extent until she reached the bottom of the second flight of stairs.

Consequently, there was no trace to lead them to the chamber door, nor were there any stains within the chamber itself.

This Steggs assured himself of, and arranged the clothes so that the place where the knife had pierced them should not be noticed, unless upon a close examination.

Then he calmed the fair and much-excited prisoner as well as he was able, and gave her every assurance that he was her friend.

And, indeed, his actions had proved it.

Then he told her how necessary it was for him to conceal himself, and that, if he was found by the thief-taker, his life would be forfeited that moment; he also particularly cautioned her not to say a word if she was questioned, or seem to know anything of what had taken place, except having heard a noise.

To all this did Edgworth Bess give her consent, and promise to act accordingly.

It was, then, just at this moment, that Jonathan Wild reached the door of the room.

He thrust his key into the lock.

Steggs crawled under the bed.

The wards of the lock would not act just properly, probably in consequence of having been locked with a skeleton key.

It might have been owing also to Jonathan's excitement, but, be it what it might, he had to make one or two efforts before he could get the bolt back.

Then he flung the door open and strode in.

To all appearance, however, everything was well.

Edgworth Bess half sat up in bed when he entered, and then shrunk back again in undigested terror and disgust.

It was no small satisfaction for Jonathan to see that his prisoner was there, and all right.

He breathed rather more freely.

"What is it?" he growled. "What does it all mean? Tell me at once."

"What?"

"What? The meaning of this noise!"

"Why should you ask me? I have only just been awake by it."

"True, I am a fool. There is nothing here. Nothing."

"Release me," said Edgworth Bess. "Release me. I have learned that I am in your house, but how I came here is a mystery beyond my comprehension. Release me, I beseech you."

"Pah! Be silent. You lose labour. Do you think, after the trouble I have taken, and the risks I have run to get you here, that I should be fool enough to let you go again? Oh! dear no."

Bess wept.

"I shall keep you here until you are well, and until you are of age. Then you shall be mine. Wholly mine. You and your possessions also."

"Not if I can help it," muttered Steggs, beneath the bed, but not loud enough to be overheard.

"Never!" said Edgworth Bess, boldly. "I do not fear you. Jack Sheppard will soon find where I am, and, not only that, a means of rescuing me."

"Ha! ha!"

A horrible and cold-blooded laugh it was, which seemed to curdle the blood in the young girl's veins.

What could it mean?

That was the question that instantly surged up in her mind.

She dreaded some ill to Jack.

But she concealed her terror.

"Ha! ha!" said Jonathan, again. "Jack Sheppard rescue you? Ha! ha!"

"Yes," said Bess, keeping down her agitation, and speaking with tolerable firmness. "He has rescued me before, and he will do so again."

"Ha! ha!"

Bess was silent.

She was unable to speak.

That horrible laugh had some meaning, doubtless as hideous as itself.

[THE EXECUTION OF FLOOD AND BLEWITT AT TYBURN.]

"It's very strange," said Wild, "but I had intended to come up and have a little talk to you about Jack Sheppard. Ha! ha!"

Bess was still silent.

"In fact, I was going to ask you whether you would feel obliged to me if I allowed you to see him?"

"See him? When? Where?"

"See him. Yes. What do you say?"

"You cannot be in earnest!"

"I am. Now, if you like, I'll tell you when you shall see him."

"When?"

"On Monday morning."

"On Monday?"

"Yes. To-day, as I daresay you know, is Friday; so you won't have long to wait."

"But where shall I see him?"

"Here, from one of my front windows."

"Will he be in the street, then?" asked the poor girl, innocently, for she had no idea what the villain meant;

but yet that it was something terrible she could surmise, both by the expression of his countenance and the manner in which he spoke.

"Oh! yes. Now, shall I be candid with you?"

"I do not understand you."

"Well, then, between ten and twelve o'clock next Monday morning, Jack Sheppard is going for a ride in an open carriage. You will be able to see him pass, and if you like you shall stand at the window."

"What do you mean?" asked the poor girl, bewilderedly, "what do you mean?"

"Just what I say."

"But how do you know what he will do on Monday?"

"I do know it."

"I will not believe you."

"Well, you need not. Will you if you see him?"

"Speak plainly to me; you will kill me with suspense. Tell me, oh! tell me, what you mean."

She burst into an agony of weeping as she spoke.

Something whispered to her heart that Jack was in some great danger.

But of what kind?

She was at a loss to think.

"Calm yourself," said Jonathan, with a derisive grin; "and if you like you can comfort yourself that Jack will find you out and rescue you. I am not afraid of it. Good day."

In his anticipated triumph over Jack, Wild forgot what had been his errand to that room until he opened the door and stalked out on to the landing, where several of his men were standing.

They gazed at him inquiringly, and then he recollected what had happened.

Now it must not be supposed that it was out of regret for the loss of Mary Milliner that Jonathan was anxious. He would have been only too glad to get rid of her at any price.

But it was the mystery of her death that troubled him.

How could it have come about?

By whom could she have been slain?

Where was the assassin?

He searched his house from top to bottom—pried into all its numerous hidden nooks, but without learning anything to satisfy him.

How should the mystery be elucidated?

Mr. Snoxall was called in, who gave it as his deliberate opinion that the wound could not have been inflicted by her own hand.

There was no means of learning anything from the woman herself.

She was quite dead.

So Jonathan was thrown all abroad.

With an angry snarl, he, towards evening, made his way into his front room, and there sat down to think.

To try if he could make anything out of this mysterious and horrible event.

But it was quite in vain.

He doubted his men.

He fancied that they knew all the particulars of the affair, and, for reasons of their own, kept them from him.

This was the block in the path of discovery, and he stumbled over the obstacle.

Steggs knew it not at the time he had done the deed, but he could not have hit upon a means better calculated to unsettle the thief-taker, and fill him with alarm than that.

But he was in great danger.

Fortunately he was forgotten by his new master.

Steggs was by no means free from danger. If he was asked for, he would be in a very awkward predicament indeed.

Suspicion would be thrown upon him at once.

But Steggs was shrewd and long-headed.

He calculated correctly all the difficulties of his position.

He knew what there was to contend against.

He knew the best means to set about it.

We shall see now how he got out of his present dilemma, and if he is successful, we shall have a better opinion of his abilities in future.

CHAPTER CLXXIX.

IN WHICH STEGGS CONVEYS TO EDGORTH BESS SOME INFORMATION RESPECTING JACK SHEPPARD.

So soon as he felt certain that Jonathan Wild had really left the room and gone downstairs, Steggs rose from his place of concealment, and looked with the utmost solicitude on the face of poor Edgorth Bess.

She was weeping bitterly.

Her heart told her that the thief-taker's hideous pleasantries concealed some deep villainy.

But what was it?

Something connected with Jack.

He was a prisoner.

But beyond that point her thoughts did not go, and so soon as she caught sight of Steggs bending over her, she sprang up to a sitting posture, and clasping her hands together, said—

"Friend! friend! You tell me you are my friend. Am I to believe you? Are you, indeed, such?"

"Show me in what way I can prove it to you, miss," replied Steggs, respectfully.

"Jack Sheppard."

"What of him?"

"Tell me—tell me! You heard what—what Wild said."

"Every word, miss."

"What does he mean? Oh! don't keep me in suspense. I cannot understand him. He promised that I should see Jack Sheppard."

Steggs groaned, and shook his head.

"Speak—tell me!" said the fair prisoner. "Tell me at once, I pray! Let me know the worst!"

"It's a bit of his devilment, miss. I thought you would have understood him. Prepare yourself to hear the worst. Jack Sheppard!"

"What—oh! what?"

"Is a prisoner!"

"Oh! heavens. Where is he confined? In this house?"

"No, miss."

"Where then?"

"In Newgate!"

The words fell like ice upon the young girl's heart.

"Newgate?" she repeated, mechanically, and shuddering as she pronounced the word, "Newgate?"

"Yes, miss."

"But of what is he accused?"

Steggs was again silent, and uttered another groan.

"Don't take on so," he said; "it's all Wild's doings."

"Oh! heavens! why is such a villain suffered to live?"

"That's more than I can tell you, miss; but he won't live much longer to persecute people if Reuben Steggs is spared."

"Is that your name?"

"It is, miss."

"I have heard it before. Jack mentioned it. Ah! I remember it now. You are no friend of mine. You are an enemy. You are the associate and accomplice of Lord Donnull."

Bess shrunk back with palpable abhorrence.

"You are mistaken in me," said Steggs, humbly. "I am your friend, and will prove it in any way you like. I was the accomplice of your uncle, and leagued with Jonathan against you; but they treated me badly—they tried to deprive me of my reward—that which alone prompted and tempted me to take the course I did. Wild played the treacherous villain to me, as he does to every one. But I shall be even with him—I shall be even with him!"

"Shall I trust you?" asked Edgorth Bess. "It is hard to have to doubt every one, and fancy you see an enemy in every face, but I have suffered enough to make me."

"Let my actions speak, miss. Did I not save your life?"

"You did, but"—

"But what, miss?"

"You might have done that out of no good feeling to me."

"I deserve this," said Steggs, "I deserve it. But, in spite of your bad opinion of me, I will prove myself your friend."

"I will take you at your word," said Edgorth Bess, after a brief pause; "if you deceive me, if you betray me, may heaven forgive you."

"Thanks! thanks!—will you believe me? I can tell you a great deal which will all serve to show that great an enemy as I once was against you, I am now devoted entirely to your interests."

"Say on, then. Tell me all you know; tell me, I beseech you!"

"Where shall I begin?"

"With Jack Sheppard. Tell me where he is, and explain Wild's extraordinary behaviour."

Steggs sighed.

"He is a prisoner in Newgate," he said.

"Of what is he accused, and who is his accuser?" asked the poor girl, with a beating heart.

"I will answer your last question first. Four persons, and I count you and myself as two of them, have a common and a deadly enemy, who is all-powerful, and who will do his most against us."

"Mercy!"

"You know who I mean?"
 "I do."
 "The villain who has just left us."
 "Jonathan Wild?"
 "Even he. The other two, miss, are Jack Sheppard and Joseph Blake, or Blueskin, as he is often called."
 "Ah! yes, I know. I remember him. Where is he?"
 "Is he, too, a prisoner?"
 "No, miss, he is free, but in momentary danger of being captured. He is a firm true friend to you, and all in whom you take an interest."
 "I knew that."
 "That is well! Then he, too, is a friend of mine. We are linked together to achieve one object."
 "And that is?"
 "The downfall of the villain Wild, and, as a matter of course, your restoration to those rights which you have so long stood dispossessed of."
 "I believe you. Truth is in your face. I will trust you now entirely. Once more, then—tell me, and tell me freely, all you know about Jack Sheppard."
 "I would rather not, miss."
 "Why not?" And yet you call yourself my friend."
 "What shall I do?"
 "Prove that you are such by telling that which I want to know."
 "It is ill news."
 "You alarm me more by speaking as you do, than if you let me know the worst at once. Tell me, I pray you."
 "He is a prisoner, then, in Newgate. Wild has sent him there. He is accused of"—
 "What—what—oh! what?"
 "Robbery and"—
 "And what? Why keep me in this suspense?"
 "Murder!"
 "No—no. Impossible. I do not believe it. Will not. He is bad. He is guilty. I know that. But it is not his fault. Circumstances have conspired to cause it. This is but some deep malignity of Wild's. Has he been found guilty?"
 "I know not, but I fear so. Whenever Wild appears against a prisoner, he is sure to be condemned. His trial came on this morning."
 "Impossible."
 "It is true; and so, wishing to see you and assure you that even here you had a friend watching over you, I took advantage of his absence to ascend. As you know, I came just in time to save your life."
 "Who was that woman? But stop, before you tell me any more. Let me hear all about Jack Sheppard."
 "You know almost all now, except the better part of it. He was tried this morning, but I don't know the result. However, Blueskin and myself have determined to set him free."
 "Then there is hope."
 "Every hope; though Jonathan does not think so. He thinks that little matter quite settled. You must know that from some of the windows in this house a view of the top of the Old Bailey and a part of Snow-hill can be had, and on a Monday morning, when people are taken to be executed, they are placed in a cart and conveyed to Tyburn. Now, do you understand what Jonathan meant?"
 "Oh! heavens; is it possible for such inhumanity to exist?"
 "It seems so. But no villainy is too black for Jonathan."
 "And he really thought of showing him to me on his way to the scaffold. Heaven forgive him."
 "He has need of such a prayer. But be of good heart. Rely upon it, Blueskin will leave no means untried to effect his freedom. You know, too, that Jack is not one to give up merely because he is confronted by a few difficulties."
 "I know he is not. Nor is he one to commit a murder. I am sure he is innocent, at least of that."
 "Doubtless," said Steggs, compliantly, for he did not wish to anger her by dissenting to what she said.
 "What am I to do?" she said. "Would that I was at liberty."
 "That is Blueskin's wish, even more than your own; but, as Jack's case is the most urgent, he imagined that he should please you best if he turned his attention first to him."

"And he was right—quite right. When Jack Sheppard is free, then attempt my release. But, if he perishes, I shall not care to live."
 "But," said Steggs, hesitatingly, "you must not forget that you are a lady, both by birth and wealth, and—and—he—that is Sheppard—he is—you understand—he"—
 "Cease. I know what you would say, but I shall not listen to it. When I was friendless—helpless—he generously stood my friend, and all that he has endured has been caused by me. Had he consented to assist Wild in his schemes, he would not now be the object of his hatred. We were equal when we first met, and nothing shall make me feel my position to be different, to his when we are together, as I trust we soon shall be."
 "You are just," said Steggs, "but still I only wanted to remind you of that which I thought you had most likely forgotten."
 "No—no. But what shall you do? How shall you contrive to leave me?"
 "Let me manage that. As soon as I can I will learn the result of the trial, and see Blueskin. The next thing will be to let you know all that has taken place."
 "Do so—do so, and accept my earnest thanks."
 "You have faith in me?"
 "I have."
 "That is enough, but, ere I try to leave, I should like, if you will give me permission, to enter into some particulars, in order that you may not only comprehend my position, but your own at the same time."
 "Speak—speak!" cried Edgworth Bess. "I am impatient in the extreme to hear."

CHAPTER CLXXX.

THE PERILS OF STEGGS'S POSITION IN WILD'S HOUSE BECOME GREATER AND GREATER.

ENTREATING the poor girl to be calm, Steggs, at her request, drew a chair up to the bedside, and commenced the revelations to which he had alluded.

But as the reader is already in possession of all the facts which he had to communicate, it will be scarcely necessary to set down his words upon this occasion.

Let it suffice to say that he was as good as his word, and by making her understand his own peculiar position in Wild's household, he enabled her to comprehend her own, and the views and intentions of the villainous thief-taker.

He unfolded also his own plot against him, and showed her the extreme likelihood of its success, but, in spite of what he said, she trembled at the thought of the frightful amount of risk he would run.

To some extent, however, he reassured her.

At length, when he had finished, he prepared to leave. They parted with the mutual understanding that Steggs should take the first opportunity of letting her know what had happened.

And now came Steggs's greatest danger.

It would be impossible, however, for him always to stop where he was, and the sooner he got out the better.

Accordingly he unlocked the door with the skeleton key, and locked it after him as silently as he possibly could.

Creeping forward, then, he reached the head of the stairs, and ere he ventured to descend, looked down.

He more than half suspected that a man would be there to watch who ascended and descended the staircase.

Of course, if he was seen doing the latter, suspicion would immediately fall upon him.

His absence he had no doubt had already excited comment.

Peeping down, he saw that what he expected was really the case.

At the foot of the second flight of stairs, and near the spot where Mary Milliner had fallen, a man was stationed. Steggs looked more closely, in order to ascertain who it was.

It was Wilkinson.

To go downstairs unseen by him was an impossibility. Then what was he to do?

His safest course, he knew, would be to get in at the front door, but then what means had he of gaining the street?

He did not know of the disused passage leading from the back yard into Newgate-market, or he would have availed himself of that.

Clearly no good was to be got by descending, so he turned to the attic stairs.

Up these he crept as silently and stealthily as a cat.

The upper part of the house was tolerably familiar to him.

"If, now," he muttered to himself, "I could make friends with the people who live next door, all would be well. I must try it on. If I fail it can't be helped. I have no other chance."

What Steggs meant by making friends with the people next door will be very quickly seen.

As we have before stated, there was immediately above the landing at the top of the attic stairs, a trap-door opening on to the tiles, by means of which Jack Sheppard had once entered Wild's house.

It was out of his reach as he stood on the floor, but Steggs thought that by standing on the top of the massive balustrades, he should be just able to reach it.

He made the attempt, and found the feat practicable.

Carefully balancing himself, he pushed against the trap-door, to see whether it would open.

He quite expected to find it fastened in some way, and, therefore, it was an agreeable surprise for him when he found it yield before the pressure he applied to it.

He pushed it partially upwards and open, and caught hold of the edge with his hands.

Then, after numerous struggles, and by assisting himself against the walls, he managed to draw himself up, and finally crawled through the aperture.

He closed the trapdoor carefully, and then glanced around.

Just before him was the roof of the huge city prison.

That was on the west side of Jonathan Wild's house.

On the east side was a house, similar in appearance to the thief-taker's, which was occupied by a shoemaker and his wife.

At least, they were the responsible tenants to the landlord.

How many more shared the occupancy of the premises with them it would have been hard to tell.

It was, in fact, a house let out in lodgings.

The shoemaker and his wife, and half a score of children occupied the basement.

The ground floor was let to another family, and so on, with the different floors above, so that there must have been, upon a moderate calculation, one hundred people in the house at least.

There are many such houses to be found in London today.

The traffic up and down the stairs was immense, so the front door was never closed except at night, in consequence of the continual going in and out.

All this Steggs had previously noticed before he ventured upon entering the thief-taker's employ.

His observation proved to be of service to him.

With great show of reason he calculated that if he could get inside the house he should be able to leave it unnoticed and unperceived.

The different lodgers must have visitors to see them occasionally, and they would of course be allowed to pass out unquestioned.

If he should be stopped he had two excuses ready to use as circumstances should require.

Steeping down, so as to be out of sight of any one in the street, he crept over the roof of Wild's house, and on to the one next to it.

Here was a trap-door just like the one he had just come through.

In fact, those two formed part of a row of houses which were built at the same time, and upon the same plan.

His chief danger, he felt, would be the contingency of any one seeing him make an entry into the house in so surreptitious a manner.

He placed his ear over the door and listened.

All was still.

He then tried to raise it a little, and, after some trouble, succeeded, for the rain had greatly swelled the wood-work.

When it was open about a couple of inches, he tried to peep down.

But all beneath was darkness.

He listened, but no indications of any persons moving about reached his ears.

Rapidly, then, and cautiously—for he did not know how soon this favourable condition of things would terminate—he opened the trap-door still wider, and pushed himself through.

Then dropped on to the landing.

He made a slight noise, of course, as his feet struck the boards, but still not much.

The landing had seemed in total darkness when he looked down from the light above, but now he found it was faintly illuminated.

Without pausing a moment, then, he crossed the landing to the head of the stairs, and descended them as fast as his legs would allow him.

He heard a door opened above, but he paid no attention to it, except that it served to make him accelerate his speed.

The staircase was dark and awkwardly constructed, but he made his way down it without falling.

The last flight was reached.

Another moment, and he would have been in the street.

But when he reached the bottom, he saw the landlord of the house standing at the front door, and leaning his back against the post in a lazy attitude.

From his appearance, Steggs came to the conclusion that he had been standing there for some time.

He knew he was in the habit of doing so for hours.

He might ask him a question.

Besides, he wished to keep out of his sight.

In the hope that he would move from his post, Steggs drew back to a dark corner of the stairs and waited.

Here the time passed slowly.

He could see the landlord, but to his intense aggravation, he made no offer to move.

He looked up and down the street with the listless air of one who has nothing whatever to do, and who knows not how to pass the time away.

How long he would have stood there is hard to say, but he was interrupted by a shrill voice, which came from the lower regions.

"Thomas!—Thomas! You idle, good-for-nothing lout, why can't you come to your dinner when it's ready for you?"

The landlord said not a word, but turned round, and submissively walked down stairs.

This was the moment Steggs seized upon, and he was out into Newgate-street like a shot.

And now arose the rather important question—should he take advantage, now he was out, of the opportunity of seeing Blueskin, and learning the result of the trial, or should he return at once to Wild's house.

After a little deliberation, he decided upon the former. He would make what haste he could, and it would not take him long.

Accordingly he directed his steps to Drury-lane, where he had little doubt he should find the person he wished to see.

When he reached the "Black Lion," Blueskin and the landlord were endeavouring to think of some plan by which Jack's release could be effected.

Here he learned the result of the trial, and, indeed, all he wished to know.

In his turn he communicated his own adventures in Wild's house.

But he could not stay for any lengthened conference.

On his return he was accosted by Tonks, who was, perhaps, less ill-disposed towards him than any other one of Wild's men.

"You have come in just in time," he said.

"Why?"

"Johnny's upstairs, and he has just called me to say he wants you."

"Humbly, yes," said Steggs. "I'll go up at once."

CHAPTER CLXXXI.

IN WHICH JONATHAN WILD PLAYS ENTIRELY INTO STEGGS'S HANDS.

Tonks looked up rather curiously after him as he ascended the stairs, and as he turned away, he muttered—

"I'm blest if I can make that chap out at all! I must keep an eye upon him to find out what he is arter."

Upon reaching the door of the thief-taker's room, Steggs tapped gently at it.

The usual growing summons to enter was heard, so he opened the door.

Steggs was careful to keep up the humble character he had assumed.

He stood in an attitude of great submissiveness waiting for the thief-taker to speak.

It is questionable whether he could have hit on any quality that would have so much recommended him to Jonathan.

"Get a chair," said Wild, after a moment's pause, "and sit down. I want to talk to you."

Steggs obeyed, but not without a great deal of misgiving.

"Can I trust you?" was Wild's first question, and as spoke he looked keenly in the face of this new member of his band. "Can I trust you?"

"I am your servant, Mr. Wild. Try me, if you please."

Steggs judged the thief-taker would be better pleased with this reply than if he had uttered no end of protestations as to his fidelity, and he was right.

"If you are willing to devote yourself entirely to my interests, to be faithful to me in everything, you shall be a rich man. I have wealth—incalculable wealth—but I have much to achieve, and I want some one upon whom I can rely to assist me. You shall have a share of that wealth of which I have spoken if you are content to do as I require."

"Yes, Mr. Wild. As I said before, let me know what I have to do, and you may depend upon its being done faithfully."

"Good! I have chosen you from the rest of my men because I distrust them all. Now, tell me, do you know how to solve the mystery of Mrs. Milliner's death?"

"No, Mr. Wild, I am sorry I don't; but I will try to find out."

"Do so, do so. Look, here are ten guineas. Take them as an earnest of the payment I shall award you if you do my behests and continue faithful."

He took ten guineas from his pocket as he spoke, and gave them to Steggs, who extended his hand to receive the coins.

"Many thanks, Mr. Wild. Oh! dear, I really do hope you will accept my thanks. Tell me what I am to do."

"Upstairs," began Jonathan, slowly, "on the second floor, I have a prisoner confined in one of the bedrooms."

Steggs nodded his head, assentingly, as though that was the first he had heard or knew about it.

"I wish her to be carefully looked after. I have my suspicions; but—no matter—no matter! Your first duty, you understand, will be to take up your position on the second landing, in front of the door which I will show you, and watch it attentively, taking care that no one goes in to see the prisoner but myself, and that the prisoner does not escape. Do you understand me?"

"Perfectly, Mr. Wild, perfectly. You shall be obeyed, sir. Oh! dear, yes, you shall be obeyed."

"Look to it. You will find it no small advantage to have me for your friend. You would find me to be much dreaded as an enemy. You have only to be faithful to the trust I repose in you."

"When shall I commence this duty, if you please, Mr. Wild?"

"Now, at once. Keep a sharp look-out, and any little circumstance which may occur, and which seems suspicious, let me know of it."

"I will, Mr. Wild. You may depend upon me," said Steggs, rising.

"Let me caution you," said Wild "against treachery. If you are guilty of it, I shall be sure to detect you, sooner or later, and then woe be to you!"

Steggs shuddered involuntarily.

He had never heard the thief-taker speak so calmly before, and he fancied he had never known him to be so terribly in earnest.

It was strange to see how Wild favoured Steggs's views—played into his hands, in fact.

Muttering another sentence about obeying his commands to the letter, he withdrew.

He made his way upstairs at once, and took up his position before the chamber door.

Steggs was a man who felt always doubtful of success.

Here was the very thing he had been scheming to do placed in his grasp without the least trouble.

He would have felt better pleased if he had had difficulties and dangers to contend against before he secured his object.

He sat down on the stairs, and thought of his own situation—of that of the fair prisoner he had determined to set free—and the chances there were of his performing his ulterior designs.

All seemed favourable.

Fain would he have put an end to that suspense which he knew Edgworth Bess must be suffering, but he dreaded to be caught communicating with her.

He must wait.

He felt consoled that he should be there as a guard over her. He would not suffer any harm to come to her while he was able to defend her.

And so, watching and waiting, the long, weary night passed away.

Very early indeed, Wild came up to see the sentinel.

"Is all well?" he asked.

"Yes, Mr. Wild; I have kept watch all night, but no one has moved—nothing has happened."

"Be away as little as you can; I will take care to make it known among the men that you are here on this special service for me."

"Oh! dear. If you please, Mr. Wild, yes. They seem very unfriendly with me, indeed, and I shouldn't wonder if they don't invent all manner of tales about me." "Heed them not; they will have no weight with me. I know them well, the cowardly, villainous set. They all live in hopes of seeing me hanged some day, but I will take care they don't. Ha! ha!"

"But, Mr. Wild"—

"What?"

"You will excuse me"—

"What is it?"

"I have not had anything to eat since yesterday!"

"Ah! yes; I had forgotten that. Never mind, I will have some breakfast sent up to you at once. Have you thought over what I said to you last night?"

"I have, Mr. Wild."

"I have some great schemes in hand, but I cannot carry them out myself; I want some one who will serve me faithfully to assist me in them. That person will have for his reward a fortune."

"Oh! Mr. Wild."

"Yes, a fortune! Bear in mind, a fortune! You have the chance; let me see that you are faithful to me."

"I have not had an opportunity of proving it to you, Mr. Wild."

"I know that, but so far very good. I am satisfied. I have never yet found any one who would be true to me and my interests. It has been my fate to be betrayed by those whom I most trusted."

It seemed rather strange, but such, indeed, was the case.

Jonathan Wild had never had one person who was faithful.

And now, in the present instance, he was doomed to the same fate.

After a few more words of similar import, Jonathan descended the stairs.

Steggs was avaricious.

He could not help it.

It was a kind of instinct firmly implanted in his breast, and which nothing would be able to eradicate.

When the thief-taker had left him, he sat down on the stairs again, and, covering his face with his hands, he muttered—

"What shall I do? Is Jonathan sincere? He seems so—suppose I was to trust him. Suppose I threw myself heart and soul into those schemes which he alone has power to form, and which could be better carried out by two than one. I know not, I know not. A man ought to look after his own interests. The question is, is Jonathan sincere? If I could once be sure upon this point I should know how to act. As it is, I am bewildered."

Steggs was silent.

Presently the man came up with his breakfast, and this interrupted his chain of thought, for he was all but starving, so many hours had elapsed since he had taken food.

The man who brought the meal put down the tray without a word.

The reader can see the danger in which, even W, Edgworth Bess was placed.

Steggs was one who had no fixed notions of good and evil. There are many others like him, who are anxious only to secure their own good, even if it be at the expense of another's detriment.

The motives which had led him to espouse the cause of Edgworth Bess were not so much a desire to see her instated in her rights, as it was to be revenged upon Jonathan Wild and Lord Donnull.

But, upon coming before the thief-taker, he had found him willing to reward him, and that in a most liberal scale, for serving him.

He had already ten guineas in his pocket as an earnest of what was to come.

Over and over again did he ask himself the question—

"Is Jonathan sincere?" and from the manner in which he uttered it, it could be told, that he only wanted to be assured of that fact, to devote himself wholly and solely to his interests.

We tremble when we think of the awful position in which those three persons are cast in whose fortunes we feel so deep an interest, and all through the avarice of a man who, they believed, was really in earnest in his desire to help them.

Should he join Wild, alas! for Edgworth Bess. She would have no room to hope.

Blueskin, too, and Jack Sheppard, would quickly fall into his clutches, and be ruthlessly disposed of.

But leaving Steggs to weigh over this question in his mind, and come to some decision, we will turn our attention to the doings of the great thief-taker himself.

After leaving Steggs, he went over to the eating-house in Giltspur-street, where, having dispatched a hearty meal, he returned to his office, and settled down to the ordinary business of the day.

CHAPTER CLXXXII.

JONATHAN WILD DISCOVERS THAT JACK SHEPPARD HAS ESCAPED, AND PURSUES HIM WITHOUT DELAY.

THE tolling of the alarm-bell was the first indication Jonathan received that Jack Sheppard had escaped.

As soon as he heard the ominous sound he started to his feet, with a tremendous oath upon his lips, and listened.

Room—boom—boom!

The sound rose above all the other din of the noisy city.

"What is it?" he cried. "Curses! Is it fire? or is it an escape? No—no. Not that—not that."

He listened again, and found what he most dreaded to hear realized.

It was not fire.

There were only two occasions when the huge alarm-bell was rung.

One was for fire.

Another was when a prisoner had escaped.

But, if the bell had rung forth for the former reason, there would have mingled with its alarm the awful cry of "Fire."

That cry, however, did not come to Wild's ears.

All he heard was the murmur of voices.

He threw up the window with a crash.

Then those cries which had before been indefinite and indistinguishable could be plainly heard.

"Stop thief! Stop thief! Stop them! An escape! Break jail! An escape! There they go! Stop thief!"

"A thousand curses," yelled Jonathan Wild, bringing the window down, and putting on his hat. "A thousand curses! Jack Sheppard has made a second escape!"

More like a madman than a sane being, he rushed down the stairs.

"Open the door, fool!" he yelled to the man on the lock. "Get a dozen horses saddled at once, and call men to ride them. Let them be well armed."

So saying, he sprang through the door, and alighted on the pavement, without touching any of the steps in his course.

On reaching the corner of the Old Bailey, he was met by a throng of people, who were all going in a contrary direction to himself.

But he did not care. He fought his way through like a maniac, and he forced the people to give way before him.

Panting—breathless—and almost exhausted, he reached the lodge of Newgate.

He endeavoured to buoy himself up with the hope that it was some other prisoner who had escaped, not Jack Sheppard.

Should it be so, how glad he would feel. He would not stir an inch to assist in his recapture.

"Who—who has escaped?" he asked. "Who has escaped? Tell me—tell me! Where is the governor?"

"Here," said a voice, and Mr. Neakes, in a state of the utmost bewilderment, elbowed his way forward.

"Who has escaped?"

"Jack Sheppard!"

"Jack Sheppard?" yelled Wild, although he had fully anticipated what the reply would be. "Jack Sheppard? A thousand curses!"

"Look here!" said the governor, and, as he spoke, he showed where Jack had broken off the spike.

The thief-taker understood all at once.

He did not wait to hear any more.

Every moment was taking his prey further and further away from him.

He dashed out of the lodge again, and fought his way to the door of his own house.

Here he found the horses waiting, and his men mounting.

"Quick," he screamed at the top of his voice, for he had never been in such a state of excitement before. "Quick. Mount, all of you, and follow me. Have your pistols ready in your hands. Jack Sheppard has escaped!"

Uttering these words, he sprang on to the back of the horse which had been provided for his use.

He looked round him.

The direction in which the people were running afforded him a pretty good idea of the direction which the prisoners had taken.

That was up Giltspur-street into Smithfield.

He had no spurs on, but he dashed his heels violently against the horse's sides, and was round the corner like a shot.

In a disorderly throng the men followed.

Their hoofs made a tremendous clatter, and the people opened, and allowed them to pass through unimpeded.

Across Smithfield and up St. John's-street went Wild, at the very top of his speed.

He soon reached the foremost rank of those on foot, and he could tell by their cries that the fugitives were not much further in advance.

This urged him to make fresh exertion.

When Blueskin got into the cart, it will be remembered Johnson already had the reins in his hands, and he drove off at once.

Blueskin's first act was to disencumber himself of the female apparel which he had on, and which proved a great hindrance to his movements.

This did not take long, nor did it give him much trouble.

He flung the bundle into the street.

Then he took from his pocket a brace of pistols, and got them ready for immediate service.

These he placed in Jack's hands.

Then, taking two others, he prepared them in the same manner, reserving them for his own use.

And now the sounds of pursuit became more unequivocal.

Johnson lashed the horse furiously, and they tore along at a terrific speed.

It was not, however, it must be understood, the people who first gave the alarm who kept up with them. They could not have made speed enough.

But the alarm travelled.

The cry passed from mouth to mouth, and was taken up with a rapidity that was really astounding.

From every house, from every alley, and every street, the people poured in countless shoals.

Despite his efforts, Johnson could not make the horse out-distance these.

It was a fleet, long-winded animal, too, and it got over the ground at a most prodigious rate.

But now they heard loud cries and shouts in their rear, showing that something fresh had taken place.

Then followed the clattering of horses' hoofs.

Clearer—clearer, louder and more distinct, became the sound.

They looked back.

The crowd of people parted right and left.

Then through the channel which was thus made, came a troop of horsemen.

It was fancy at first which made them think the foremost rider was Jonathan Wild, but they soon found that it was really him.

They heard the loud tones of his disagreeable voice, now hoarse with continued shouting.

They saw him wave his arms in an excited manner to his men.

That they were gaining on them was quite evident.

Blueskin cocked the pistols, and quietly told Jack to do the same.

Johnson gave all his attention to the horse.

But in spite of all his efforts he could not make it go at the same rate as those which had to carry men upon their backs, instead of having to draw a cart containing three people after it.

Still the rate it went, at was really astonishing.

Neither Johnson nor Blueskin had anticipated so sudden and energetic a pursuit. They were in hopes of getting to a distance before the escape was discovered.

However, there was nothing left to do now but to fight for their lives and liberties.

"Halt!" cried Wild, as soon as he found himself near enough to be heard. "Surrender, I say! It is in vain to fly. Surrender, or I fire!"

Of course no notice was taken of this speech, except that Johnson gave the horse a few more cuts with the whip to make him go faster.

But Jonathan was as good as his word.

They saw him raise his arm.

Then there was a bright flash and a report.

He fired.

But the shot was aimless, and the bullet flew high above their heads.

"Shot for shot!" exclaimed Blueskin.

He levelled one of his pistols as he spoke, and fired.

Being in a cart, he had a much better chance of taking a correct aim at anything than Wild had on horseback.

But still the shot did not seem effective.

Jonathan did not slacken his speed in the least.

He was now most alarmingly close behind them.

His troop of men, too, were closing up.

Blueskin had not noticed Jack.

He had crouched down in the back of the cart.

He held in his hand one of the pistols he had received.

He was resting the barrel of it on the backboard of the cart, and endeavouring to cover his old foe.

When he had a good aim, he determined to fire, and so rid himself for ever of his implacable and barbarous enemy.

For a long time, owing to the jolting of the cart, he found his attempt an unsuccessful one.

But he got accustomed to the motion, and besides, they were in a smoother bit of road than any they had yet had.

Feeling certain that the pistol covered the whole body of his enemy, he fired.

At the same moment he pulled the trigger, or so it seemed to him, Wild swerved slightly in the saddle, and he fancied he heard him utter a cry of pain.

But about this last he was not quite sure.

Suddenly Jonathan raised his arm and fired again.

But his shot went wide of the mark, for at that moment he threw up his arms with a yell of pain, and after swaying for a moment from side to side upon his horse, he fell headlong to the ground.

Whether by accident, or whether by design, at any rate his feet were disengaged from the stirrups, for as he fell with a crash into the roadway, his horse galloped on without him.

This put a moment's stop to the pursuit, a very great thing for our friends, since it enabled them to increase the distance between them and their pursuers.

The country had now been reached, and on both sides of them were meadows and hedgerows, which make an English landscape so enchanting.

CHAPTER CLXXXIII.

FLOOD AND BLEWITT RECEIVE THEIR JUST DUE, AND ARE EXECUTED AT TYBURN.

JONATHAN WILD'S men, when they perceived their leader fall headlong into the roadway, pulled up at once.

That was their first impulse, though they did not know whether they should be acting rightly by so doing.

They raised him up.

He groaned slightly, and then fell into a state of insensibility or death.

Which it was his men could not tell. There was not one, perhaps, who did not wish it was the latter, but they all doubted, because they had a deep-settled conviction that Jonathan would die at Tyburn.

What to do was a question they asked each other, without being able to elicit a reply.

While they were deliberating and undecided, the fugitives had got out of sight and hearing.

At length they resolved to construct a kind of litter or bier, using whatever came readiest to the hand for that purpose.

On this they placed their helpless leader, and four carried it along.

Blood flowed in great quantities from two wounds.

One was in the breast.

The other in the head.

Without the least signs of life, he lay, an inert mass, just where his men placed him.

It was not long before they met those who were following on foot.

It was deemed desirous to avoid these if possible, so the janizaries and their burden took an abrupt turn to the left.

They had not gone far in this direction before they saw shining in the distance one of those red lamps which were then invariably hung before the doors of surgeons.

Seeing this, a couple ran on first to call the man up, in order that Jonathan's wounds might be attended to at once.

By the time they had explained the nature of their errand, those who carried the body of the thief-taker arrived.

Here his wounds were dressed, during which operation Jonathan recovered from his swoon.

But it was only a partial regainment of his senses, for his memory did not come back to him.

The surgeon, fearing some violence which might make the wound even more dangerous than it was already, administered a powerful opiate, which had the effect of sending him to sleep at once.

Then, by the direction of the surgeon, he was taken to his own house in Newgate-street, and placed in bed.

Here he remained during the rest of the night, and the whole of the next day and night succeeding.

It was not until Monday morning that he awoke.

In the meantime the utmost consternation took place in Newgate.

The governor was like a madman.

The various officials by whose negligence Jack's escape was greatly assisted shook in their shoes.

All London rang with the fame of the youth who had twice, and with so short an interval between, broken out of the strongest prison in the kingdom.

It would not be going too far to say that in every house in the metropolis it furnished the subject for conversation.

No time had elapsed for any notice to be taken of it by the government, though all knew a rigid investigation would be the result.

Jonathan's mishap, too, was much spoken of.

The prisoner and his accomplice had not been secured.

But while the officials in the prison were so fearful of the consequences of what had taken place, they had become extra vigilant.

Blewitt and Flood were most closely watched.

They heard of the escape of their companion with mortification and regret.

They had become almost reconciled to their fate so long as they thought Jack was going to share it with them, but now he had escaped they were discontented.

They were violent, too, and they had the greatest trouble to keep them in order.

So Sunday passed.

Monday came.

At a very early hour the people began to assemble in front of the prison, for although a hanging in those days was a by no means unusual sight, yet there were special events connected with this one which made it of peculiar interest.

At Tyburn, too, the people collected in great numbers, and by the time appointed for the procession to start, there was quite a line of people all along the Oxford-road, from the prison to the place of execution, which was about two miles distant.

The sheriffs and the governor whispered together, and talked over Jack's extraordinary escape.

The place where he had broken the spike off and squeezed through, was pointed out to them, but the aperture was so contracted that they could scarcely bring themselves to believe that it was possible for a human being to get through, however lithe and agile he might be.

The governor tried all he could to conciliate the sheriffs, for he dreaded that one of the results of the inquiry which would be made respecting the escape would be his own dismissal.

He felt very thankful that Jonathan was incapacitated from attending.

From him he had everything to dread. He knew how particularly he had set his heart upon having Jack hanged that very Monday morning.

He could, of course, justly or unjustly, lay all the fault upon his shoulders.

He gave a sigh of satisfaction when he thought how remarkably safe he was in bed, unable to stir, and set about superintending the hanging preparations with a better heart.

But he would not have felt quite so inspired if he had been able to take a peep at the celebrated thief-taker at that very moment.

He had woke up.

Woke up for the first time since his mishap, with a clear memory and perfect recollection of what had taken place.

He was thinking things over, and wondering how long he had lain there, and whether Jack had been recaptured, when his attention was directed to the door, which some one opened quietly.

In another moment, and treading as though he had eggs beneath his feet, Mr. Snoxall crept into the room.

He was surprised to find his patient awake, and staring at him in a manner that proved, beyond doubt, he was restored to consciousness.

Jonathan raised himself up in bed a little, and then in a very serious voice, he asked—

"What is to-day, Mr. Snoxall?"

"To-day?"

"Yes. What day of the week is it?"

"Monday, Mr. Wild."

"Monday?" shrieked the thief-taker. "Monday? What is the time?"

The apothecary took from his fob an enormous silver watch, and said—

"Ten minutes to ten, Mr. Wild."

The impatience and anxiety with which Jonathan waited for this reply cannot be conceived.

But when he heard it a hideous grin overspread his features, as he replied—

"Ah! then, I am in time. I won't be cheated of that, at least."

"In time for what?"

Wild made no reply.

He jumped out of bed.

"Murder!" cried the apothecary. "Murder!"

"Hold your row! Give me my clothes!"

"But, Mr. Wild—"

"Give me my clothes!"

"But consider."

"Jonathan made such a ferocious grimace at this moment, that Mr. Snoxall ceased to make any further remonstrance.

He did as he was desired.

In a very short time Jonathan was fully attired.

The wound in his breast was not a serious one, being little more than skin deep.

The bullet was almost spent when it reached him, and it had just glanced against his ribs.

But the one in his head, and which had produced his insensibility, was another affair

It was of a most formidable and dangerous character.

But it had been skilfully treated, and Wild was one who soon recovered from an injury.

The wound was going on most favourably, but Mr. Snoxall dreaded this sudden excitement.

Jonathan had it redressed, but would suffer no bandage to be placed over it. It was simply strapped up with plaster.

His head was quite bald, which was to some extent an advantage, so far as healing the wound went.

This done, he put on his wig and hat.

He was now quite dressed, and, at first sight, looking none the worse for the fearful injuries he had received.

It was one of Jonathan's ideas to try and make himself appear invulnerable, and he often kept up the appearance at the expense of great bodily pain.

In the present instance, although he carried things off with a high hand, he felt far from well.

He left the bed, soon followed by Mr. Snoxall, and descended the stairs.

When he reached the hall below, however, such a frightful feeling of weakness came over him that he almost sank to the ground.

But he rallied himself, and called for brandy.

Mr. Snoxall was horrified.

He gave his patient up for lost.

Quilt Arnold brought him a tumbler full of brandy, from a cupboard in the office, where a good supply of the spirit was always kept.

Jonathan drank half of it off at a draught.

He did just pause then to draw breath, but that was all.

One more gulp, and the remainder disappeared.

He felt giddy and sick for a moment afterwards, but the factitious vigour which the brandy induced was soon apparent.

His eyes gleamed with unnatural lustre.

"My horse!" he cried, "my horse! Fetch him! Quick!"

Tonks darted off to execute this commission.

In a few moments he returned, to say that the horse was at the door waiting.

Jonathan walked along the passage with a tolerably steady step, and mounted.

CHAPTER CLXXXIV.

JONATHAN WILD RIDES TO TYBURN AS PART OF THE PROCESSION, AND WITNESSES THE EXECUTION OF HIS TWO FOLLOWERS, FLOOD AND BLEWITT.

THE first thing that attracted Wild's notice, after he mounted, was the immense crowd of people which he could see stretching before him down Snow-hill.

Then, immediately afterwards, his ears were assailed by a cry which he had heard too often, and knew too well, not to understand.

The cry came from the mob.

It signified that the procession was about to start.

Griming in a more ghastly and hideous manner than before, Jonathan guided his horse to the top of the Old Bailey.

Not without difficulty, he drew his heavy cutlass from its sheath.

The people made way for him.

He was known.

His appearance was greeted by some with a cheer.

By others with a loud yell of derision and hatred.

But, paying attention to neither of these, for Wild knew how to estimate the opinion of a mob assembled on hanging mornings, he contrived to force his way down the street until he joined the procession.

He nodded in a friendly and semi-respectful manner to the sheriffs.

He scowled at the governor, who felt remarkably uncomfortable at seeing him abroad so soon.

Still Jonathan pushed on till he came to the cart in which the two prisoners were seated.

Then he wheeled his horse round and walked by the side of it.

His eyes gleamed with baleful triumph, and the two men, after one glance, turned away, unable to bear that basilisk-like gaze.

And so the procession went on—and on.

THE HORSE FALLS EXHAUSTED ON THE ROAD, TO THE DESPAIR OF JACK AND HIS FRIENDS.

Round the corner of the Old Bailey into Skinner-street, down Snow-hill, and up the opposite steep ascent.

It was customary to make a pause for a moment or so at this place, in order that the horse who drew the cart might recover a little from his exertion.

But the hangman, who was driving, soon whipped him up again, for as he glanced up to the clock of St. Andrew's Church, he saw that they were already a little behind time.

The immense and densely-packed mob hooted and yelled, and hissed, as they usually did upon such occasions.

The procession was of tolerable length.

But those in the van had no small difficulty in forcing a passage through the compact and living mass.

It was not that they did not shrink from the horses' hoofs, or the cutlasses of the officers, but the pressure was so great that they could not retreat.

When they had passed the end of Gray's Inn-lane, however, the crowd was very much thinner.

But this was only felt by those in advance, for as the procession moved, the people walked with . . .

The jollity and bravado which Flood and Blewitt had exhibited in the condemned hold had quite departed now.

Moodily—their eyes bloodshot, and their heads bent down upon their bosoms, they listened to the exhortations of the chaplain who, attired in full canonicals, sat on the opposite side of the cart.

But the voice of the man of God could barely be distinguished above the din of the crowd, who kept up a perpetual roar.

There was very little, if any sympathy felt for the two men in the cart.

Had Jack been there, according to Wild's intention, the case might have been very different.

On—the dismal procession forced its way.

Holborn was passed, and St. Giles's reached.

In the High-street was a public-house, which was stated to be half way between Newgate and Tyburn.

At this public-house, from time immemorial, it had been customary for the procession to halt for a few minutes for refreshment.

A bowl of punch, provided by the landlord, was brought out, which was held to the lips of the condemned men, some of whom barely tasted it, while others would drink a large quantity.

This custom was not departed from in the present instance.

All came to a halt.

At this place the pressure was awful, for people who wished to have a good view of the prisoners, had taken up their stations there hours before.

The police-officers, however, cleared a space, and ranged themselves round it in a circle.

The bowl of hot steaming punch was brought out.

The landlord of the public-house carried it.

He held it aloft.

The people gave a loud cheer.

Blewitt was nearest, so he had the punch presented to him first.

He drank with avidity, and was repeatedly cheered by the populace for so doing.

Then it was handed to Flood, who made an attempt to swallow a mouthful, but failed.

The poor wretch was completely overcome by the immediate prospect of that death which he had so often seen inflicted upon others.

The people hissed.

This seemed to revive him a little, and he looked round with lack-lustre eyes.

Then he made another effort to drink.

But with no better success.

Finding this to be the case, and stimulated by the quantity of the hot beverage of which he had previously partaken, Blewitt uttered an awful oath, and asked for the remnant.

Then, amidst vociferous cheering, he swallowed the whole—drained the bowl to the dregs.

The landlord, admiring his pluck, held up the empty vessel with the bottom uppermost, upon which he tapped with his fingers, to signify that it was empty.

There was another cheer, and then the order was given for the procession to resume its march.

Up the narrow crooked High-street they went, then the refuge of the lowest of the low, and the haunt of the most vicious persons in all England, and round the corner into Oxford-road they went.

No shops and houses then lined the spacious street. It was a country high-road, with gardens and meadows on either side.

Keeping steadily along this, and going at a better speed, they at length approached their destination.

Long before the gallows itself was in sight, they could tell by the shoals of people which they met.

All round the ill-omened spot, a crowd denser than any through which they had forced a passage, had congregated.

Through this they would never have got, had not a body of officers, mounted on horseback, kept a kind of lane for them to pass through.

Seated as they were, the wretched prisoners could not see in advance without turning their heads.

The gallows came in sight.

That strangely formed instrument of execution, the like of which has been seen by few now living, with its three triangularly placed upright pieces of timber and transverse beams.

But though they did not look, they could tell it was in view.

The hoarse cries of the people told them that.

Besides, the different objects on the road were familiar to them, and they knew the spot from which the first view of the gallows could be obtained.

At length the procession passed through the two ranks of police-officers of which we have spoken.

They had occupied that position since daybreak.

As the procession passed through, they turned in, and formed part of it.

Jonathan still rode by the side of the cart.

He had not once moved from that position after taking it.

There was a clear space all round the scaffold.

It was kept by a body of halberdiers, who stood two deep, and formed as firm a barrier to the crowd as a wall would have done.

This open space was reached.

The chaplain grew more earnest in his exhortations.

Blewitt, however, maddened by the fiery drink he had swallowed, broke out into a song, the burden of which was taken up by the mob.

He had resolved to die game.

But Flood, who all his life had been so blustering a bully, was quite weighed down.

He seemed already like one dead—very certain it is that he was quite unconscious of what was taking place around him.

The cart was driven beneath the fatal beam.

The horse, who had been well trained to his work, stopped of his own accord.

The executioner stood up, and was received with that awful howling cry with which the dread functionary of the law is always greeted.

Unmoved, however, by this demonstration of popular dislike, the hangman drew deliberately from his pocket two small white bundles.

He unrolled them one after the other, and then it could be seen what they were.

They were the white caps which are drawn over the faces of the condemned, in order to hide the convulsions produced by strangulation.

Flood and Blewitt were already pinioned.

They were forced to stand up in the cart.

The white caps were drawn down over their faces.

An officer supported Flood, or he would have fallen.

At this awful moment, when he stood upon the threshold of another world, and when the horror of his position would, one would have thought, been most deeply felt, Blewitt moved his feet about, and endeavoured to dance in the bottom of the cart.

CHAPTER CLXXXV.

RELATES WHAT TOOK PLACE AFTER THE EXECUTION OF WILD'S TWO JANIZARIES

It was a horrible and disgusting spectacle.

The chaplain turned away his head.

But the mob, when they perceived what was taking place, applauded him.

The sounds reached the ears of the deluded ruffian, and he continued his dance with greater energy.

It was the hangman who put a period to the performance.

He shook Blewitt roughly, and then his assistant slipped a rope round his ankles, and forming it into a running noose, drew it tight.

He was then securely pinioned and quite helpless.

The expression of his face could not be seen, and so no tongue can tell what the odd-shaped cap covered.

The ropes had been fixed to the fatal beam in readiness.

Long practice had imparted dexterity to the hangman's movements, and he, with great rapidity, seized one of them, and hastily tied the noose under his neck.

The same operation was performed upon Flood, who had not recovered from his state of stupor and then the preparations were complete.

Like some grim spirit of evil Jonathan Wild stood beside the cart.

He had eyes for nothing save the two men.

The immense crowd of people, the authorities, all and every one in fact, were unheeded by him.

Not a single movement that they made escaped his watchful gaze.

When all was ready, and the chaplain had left the cart, the hangman and his assistants descended.

The latter walked to the horse's head, for the reader must understand that the men about to be hanged were not standing upon a platform of any kind, but in the bottom of the cart.

The assistant then took a thick-thonged whip from the place where he had stuck it between the shafts.

He struck the horse a sharp blow with it, and then drew him forward.

The cumbrous wheels belonging to the vehicle revolved.

The doomed men felt all that interposed between them and death slipping from beneath their feet, and they powerless to prevent it, though several convulsive movements which they made showed how they endeavoured to do so.

With a rumbling sound the cart was drawn quite away, and then all that was left was two pendant figures hanging from two of the triangular-shaped beams.

But the ceremony was scarcely over.

It would have taken some time for the men to have strangled themselves by their own weight alone, so to put them out of their misery, the hangman seized them by the legs in rapid succession, and hung with his whole weight.

A few convulsive shudders followed, and then all was over.

Limp and inanimate their bodies floated idly in the breeze, which was just strong enough to make them move to and fro.

Jonathan Wild, as soon as the deed was fully accomplished, raised his hand, and pointing towards the lifeless forms, cried—

"Three groans for the murder of John Roots!"

His words were caught by the foremost in the crowd and instantly responded to, and the cry was at length taken up by the whole of the assemblage.

Upon this, the governor of Newgate, who had kept as much out of Wild's sight as possible, drew near.

Jonathan greeted him with an angry scowl.

Mr. Noakes observed it, and wished he had kept back, but he could not retreat, so he said—

"Mr. Wild! Mr. Wild!"

"Well?"

"I trust you don't bear me any malice for what has occurred."

"Why not?"

"It was not my fault, nor the fault of any one in Newgate. I wanted him hanged quite as much as you."

"Bah!"

"You might believe me, Mr. Wild."

"You should have taken more care."

"I took every care."

"It does not look like it."

"Who would have suspected it? I never should; and whether you like to believe me or not, the turnkeys, who were sitting at the other end of the lodge, were talking about his former escape, and saying how necessary it was for them to be vigilant."

"And yet he escaped again?"

"He did, and I can't make out how. I should say it was impossible for any one to have squeezed through so small a space."

"Well, well, Mr. Noakes," said Jonathan, whose blood-thirsty spirit must have been to some extent appeased by what had just taken place, "it is no good there being any ill blood between us; we shall get on best if we continue friends. As for Jack Sheppard, the only way that you can atone for his escape is to recapture him with as little delay as possible."

"I have tried my best to do that, Mr. Wild, and it will be strange indeed if I do not succeed."

"Do so—do so. Both Jack and his accomplices would have been safe ere now had it not been for the wound I was unlucky enough to receive. I feel it now—I feel it now."

The thief-taker reeled in the saddle as he spoke, and, perhaps, would have fallen to the ground, had not his friend, the governor, lent him his assistance.

Jonathan was giddy.

But by an effort he mastered the feeling.

"You came out too soon, Mr. Wild," said the governor, "and now you are suffering for it."

"No, no. It is nothing. I am all right now. It was just a little giddiness, that was all."

"I am glad to hear it."

"Enough, Mr. Noakes. On this spot, and in sight of those two villains yonder, I swear that I will take no rest until Jack Sheppard swings there like they do. It will not be long before I keep my oath, for I have many important matters to attend to; but revenge sets them every one aside, and must be the first gratified."

"You will, then, take the matter personally in hand, and quite independent of what the government may do?"

"Certainly; and, as I have the strongest motive to urge me on, I shall be almost certain to succeed."

"I shall try to beat you, Mr. Wild; but there is no need for us to stay here any longer, without you wish to see the crowd disperse; and if you wait for that, you will have to stay here some time; and look, the sheriffs are going."

"We will follow them, Mr. Noakes."

The governor was well pleased to find Jonathan so amicably disposed towards him, and the pair joined the procession, which was then in the act of leaving.

The governor kept close to the side of the thief-taker, endeavouring to still further conciliate him.

By the time they reached the Old Bailey, they were quite good friends.

Jonathan repaired to his own house. He had carried things off pretty well, but he was in such a state of exhaustion that he could scarcely support himself in the saddle.

Quilt Arnold heard him arrive and opened the door.

He saw his master swaying backwards and forwards in imminent danger of falling.

He ran down the steps at once, and assisted him to alight from his steed.

Then he half carried him into the house.

Just as they entered the hall, Mr. Snoxall, who had been up to see his patient, descended the stairs, and a meeting took place.

Jonathan's countenance was ghastly in the extreme.

"Brandy!" he gasped; "give me brandy!"

"I told you how it would be," exclaimed Mr. Snoxall; "I knew very well what would be the result! Now take my advice, Mr. Wild—"

"Bah! silence! Brandy, I say."

Quilt Arnold had long since learned the policy of immediately complying with the thief-taker's orders, so he started off to fetch the brandy.

He returned with it in a few moments.

Jonathan drank of it deeply.

The influence of the stimulant soon made itself apparent.

But the strength which it produced was but of a factitious character.

Mr. Snoxall spoke again, and this time he was listened to.

"Mr. Wild, if you would only be guided by me."

"In what?"

"You are suffering from fearful wounds, or rather the weakness which those wounds have caused. The brandy you drink, although it may endow you with a momentary strength, will soon depart, and leave you weaker than before."

Jonathan felt the truth of all this, and the conviction also dawned upon him, that if he neglected his own health, he should be balked of his revenge and all his schemes of aggrandizement which he had formed.

This made him rather more temperate than usual, for he asked—

"What should you advise, Mr. Snoxall?"

"In the first place, rest."

The thief-taker felt how acceptable rest would be to his tried and debilitated frame.

"Rest not only of the body, but the mind," added the apothecary.

Jonathan grinned.

"Can you not give me a medicine that will have the same effect, and allow me action?"

Mr. Snoxall shook his head.

"Then give me brandy!" cried the thief-taker; "brandy, I say, and more of it. Brandy—brandy!"

CHAPTER CLXXXVI.

RETURNS TO STEGGS AND EDGORTH BESS.

HAD not Jonathan Wild's constitution been as strong as iron, it could never have withstood as it did the attacks which were made upon it.

The brandy mounted to his brain.

A mist of blood seemed to envelop all things.

But that soon passed away, and he again felt that he possessed a moiety at least of his ordinary strength.

For a pursuit after Jack Sheppard, to be of any avail, he knew it ought to be instituted at once, and he could trust the conduction of it into no other hands than his own.

Mr. Snoxall's proposal was one that he could not listen to at all.

Turning round, then, he gave orders to Quilt to get together as large a troop of men as he could, all mounted and armed, and he would place himself at their head and commence a vigorous pursuit of Jack Sheppard.

In the meanwhile he went over into Giltspur-street and made a good meal, which he washed down with plentiful potations of port wine, which he sent for from a contiguous public-house.

By the time he had done this, Quilt had managed to assemble a body of men somewhere about fifteen in number.

These were all in the pay of the thief-taker.

In pursuance of the agreement made between them, Quilt came over and told Wild, who was much the better for the food he had eaten and the wine he had drunk.

He mounted his horse, and no one to have seen him perform the act would have guessed his true condition.

The word of command was given to the troop, which immediately put itself in motion.

Jonathan led them up Giltspur-street and through Smithfield, into the open country.

But leaving the relation of what took place during his journey, and the success he met with to another chapter, we will go back a little, and turn our attention to a less repulsive character in our history.

We allude to Steggs.

When we saw him, and left him last, it was as a sentinel before the door of the room in which poor Edgworth Bess was imprisoned.

Jonathan Wild had uttered some tempting promises to him, and a struggle took place in his mind as to whether he should accept them or not.

Fortunately Steggs already knew Jonathan's treacherous nature. It had been displayed already.

Doubtless, had he been sincere in what he said, or if Steggs could have believed him to be sincere, the condition of Edgworth Bess and her two defenders, Blueskin and Jack Sheppard, would have been sad indeed.

For a long time Steggs sat and pondered, unable to decide as to which way he should act.

He was dazzled by Wild's promises.

They were not unsubstantial ones either, for at that moment he could feel ten guineas in his pocket—the earnest—the first instalment of his future reward.

One thing only, perhaps, rose above his avarice, and that was his revenge.

Even this he would like to purchase as cheaply as possible.

Steggs recollected the injuries he had received at Wild's hands.

The desire for revenge increased.

He felt that it would be a greater satisfaction to witness the downfall of the thief-taker than it would be to witness his elevation.

"I will play into his hands," he said; "I cannot do wrong then. I will fall into his views, but it shall be warily! I shall soon find whether he intends to be false to me or not, and I shall know my course."

Having the means of entering the chamber in which Edgworth Bess was confined whenever he thought proper, he longed for an opportunity of communicating what he had learned from Blueskin, for he with common cunning wished to keep in with both parties, and then side with the one which seemed to offer him the greatest advantages.

But he dreaded to enter the room while Wild was in the house, or anywhere near at hand.

The thief-taker remained in his office the whole of the day; and it being Saturday night, he was engaged in totalling up his week's profits, when the clanging of the alarm bell of Newgate smote upon his ears.

He dropped his pen, and then rushed out.

Jonathan had left orders that Steggs was to be supplied with food at regular intervals, and it was soon after this event that the waiter from the eating-house in Giltspur-street came up with a meal on a tray.

This man was, of course, full of Jack's escape, the account of which Steggs received without astonishment.

In reply to his questions, however, the man told him that Wild had mounted a horse and set off in pursuit.

That he would be absent for some time, and that he should hear his return, Steggs felt certain.

Here, then, was the opportunity for which he had longed.

Accordingly, as soon as the waiter took his departure, he crossed the landing on tip-toe, and tapped at the door.

A faint "come in" followed, and inserting the skeleton-key in the lock, he turned it in the wards and entered.

The poor prisoner started up, and greeted him with a wan smile.

Steggs had a heart.

That smile touched it.

It is wonderful what an alteration a little thing will produce.

When he saw that smile, Steggs forgot Wild and all his glittering promises; he forgot his avarice, and the desire to render a service to the poor girl who looked up to him so confidently, and who believed him to be her friend, rose paramount to every other feeling.

"Tell me, tell me," she exclaimed, in a feeble voice, "tell me all you know at once. This suspense will kill me! Where is Jack?"

"He has escaped."

A cry of joy, which she could not have suppressed had her life depended upon it, came from her lips.

Steggs looked terrified.

He was afraid that some one would hear her, and held up his hand.

She saw it, and asked, in a suppressed voice—

"Is it—is it true? Can it really be true? Has he escaped?"

"Be silent, I beg," said Steggs, "for my sake—for your's—for Jack's!"

"Oh! yes, I will not cry out again, but I could not control myself before. Answer me! Oh! you cannot tell what I have suffered from suspense during all the weary time which has elapsed since I saw you last. Don't keep me in that suspense any longer, pray do not, but ease my heart. You told me that he was in Newgate!"

"I did, and so he was. He has been tried, and cast for death, but he has escaped. I have seen Blueskin."

"Have you? When?"

"Yesterday."

"Well?"

"He told me he had a plan arranged by which he hoped to be able to accomplish Jack's escape."

"He is a good friend."

"Since then I have not seen or heard anything of him, but I have just learned that the plan has been successful."

"Thank heaven!"

"Can you hear that bell tolling?"

The loud clanging of the alarm-bell could be heard quite plainly in the chamber.

"I do; I have heard it for some time. What does it mean?"

"It means that a prisoner has broken out of Newgate, and the prisoner that it tolls for is Jack Sheppard!"

Edgworth Bess clasped her hands together and listened. She thought she had never heard such sweet music as that dissonant bell, but soon another thought struck her, and she said—

"But has he got quite free? Do they pursue him?"

"No and yes."

"What do you mean by no and yes?"

"He has not got quite free, inasmuch as his foes are hard upon his track, and foremost among those in pursuit is Jonathan Wild."

"Oh! heavens, what am I to suffer from that man! He persecutes me and all who befriends me. I am afraid his malice will only be appeased by death."

"Do not be too much alarmed."

"There is danger."

"I admit that, but you must bear in mind that Jack has Blueskin with him, and that together they have more than once proved themselves a match for the thief-taker."

"True—true."

"If they are pursued, it does not follow that they will be captured."

"You give me new hopes."

"I desired to do so, and am glad I have succeeded. And now listen to me."

"I am listening, my friend."

"Strangely enough, Jonathan has selected me from among his other men to place confidence in, and has given me one particular duty to fulfil."

"What?"

"To remain outside this door as a sentinel, in order to see that no one enters this chamber who is not privileged to do so, and to see that you do not escape."

"Is it possible?"

"It sounds impossible, does it not? but we are all in the hands of fate. Jonathan has made offers and promises to me that would be enough to shake any man, provided I might be faithful to him; but the question is, would he be true to me?"

CHAPTER CLXXXVII.

EDGORTH BESS WINS STEGGS OVER TO HER INTERESTS. STEGGS folded his arms together and bit his nails, as he propounded this important question.

Edgorth Bess raised her head, and looked him keenly in the face.

A vague idea of danger crossed her brain.

"He has not shook you?" she said, interrogatively, though her heart told her that he had. "You know him too well to believe in his sincerity. Jonathan Wild never yet kept faith with any human being, and never will."

"He did shake me," said Steggs. "But I am firm again now. I will be your faithful friend for ever."

"I hope so. You will find it more to your advantage in every way, for I shall never play you false. Has Jonathan offered you money to join him in his plans? If so, you shall have just double what he has promised, if you take my part and assist me in recovering my rights, for there is no witness so important as yourself."

"I confess, with shame, that I listened to his words, and that which he said made a deep impression on me; but that is over now—believe me, it is over, and I shall be faithful to you. I feel that I can trust you, and Jonathan has already shown too much treachery for me to believe in the sincerity of his promises."

"I am glad that you take that view of the case. He would not be faithful to his word. He has great schemes on hand—I know that well, and I have no doubt he would be able to carry them out more easily if he had an instrument which he could use; but rest assured, that, when the work was finished, and there was nothing more for it to do, it would be cast aside."

"That is it—that is it. But I will be even with him. I will fall in with his schemes. I will profess to help him, and so I will. I will assist him to reach the highest pinnacle to which he has aspired, and then when I have done that, when he feels that he has triumphed, I will cast him down from the giddy eminence, and so great will be his fall, that he will never rise again."

There was a wild excitement about Steggs as he thus spoke, and he uttered the words, which came easily to his lips, with a dramatic force which many an actor would have tried in vain to imitate.

"Dismiss that thought," said Bess. "Leave him to himself. The plan you propose is too dangerous—by far too dangerous, when you consider the nature of the man with whom you have to deal. Dismiss the thought, and devote yourself wholly to my interests. Believe me, that will prove your best plan of action, and the one that will bring you the greater profit."

"No, no, I have set my heart upon the scheme. Blueskin knows and has approved of it, and so would Jack if it was communicated to him. I am here to carry it out, and I will do it, or perish in the attempt. I shall not, however, neglect you. On the contrary, you shall be sheltered from all personal violence at his hands, and, if possible, be set at liberty. I was a fool to listen to what he said, but it was the money which blinded my judgment. But that is quite past. It will never occur again, and my original resolution shall be carried out."

Truly was Steggs an enemy much to be dreaded, and so the reader will find as the narrative proceeds.

Edgorth Bess shrunk back, terrified at the vehemence of his manner.

He saw the action, and controlled himself.

He spoke, after a moment's silence, in a much calmer and more rational tone of voice.

"Listen to me. While you are here you are, perhaps, as safe as you could be anywhere, especially in your feeble state of health. You must forget that you are in a prison, and feel assured that while I remain a sentinel at your door, no harm can possibly come to you; neither at the hands of Wild himself, nor at the hands of any of his janizaries. I shall be all the time close at hand to protect you."

"Accept my thanks. They are all that I am able to offer you now, but I hope the time will soon be at hand when I shall be able to recognise your services in a more substantial manner."

"Enough. I am a poor man—a very poor man; and it is the want of money which has driven me to do that which I have done. But it is over."

"You shall have wealth, if that is what you crave. Oh! how I long to hear that Jack has escaped! If he has done so, then I should wish to be with him; and, if nothing better could be done, I would leave England with him, and in some other country live content, foregoing all my wealth."

"Don't speak of that."

"Why not?"

"I should be loath indeed to afford Jonathan Wild so great a triumph as that. Stay here, as I proposed."

"The place is hateful to me."

"No doubt—no doubt. But, then, you should consider your weak state. You would be unequal to much exertion."

"I am very ill."

"You are. I wonder you are still in life. And now listen to me. With respect to yourself, Jonathan's plans are as clear as noonday."

"To you they may be, but they are not so to me. If you can, explain them to me."

"Willingly, because then you will see that, for the present, you are safe; and that you have nothing much to fear from the thief-taker, if you do not exasperate him."

"Tell me, then, at once."

"You are not yet of age?"

"I know it."

"What is your age? Everything depends upon that."

"I must be nearly twenty."

"Then you have one year of safety. When you are twenty-one you will be mistress of and responsible for your own actions. Do you understand?"

"Yes—yes."

"Until then you are not your own mistress, nor would the law hold you accountable for your actions. Now, can you guess what Jonathan will do?"

"No."

"He will keep you here a prisoner, and take every care of you until you are of age."

"Yes—yes."

"And then he will find some means, I do not say what, of forcing you into a marriage with him."

"Mercy!"

"Do you understand now?"

"I do—I do, indeed. I have heard something of this before."

"He will then be your husband and your master. Immediately after this he will take steps to recover your wealth and title, and when he has succeeded in this, he will step forward, and, as your husband, lay claim to it all."

"The monstrous villain!"

"He deserves the title. You can see now his policy. But he shall be thwarted. Fear nothing. Do not be cast down. Until the time I mention, you are perfectly safe. Let me advise you, then, to keep yourself calm, and get well as soon as possible. I will watch over you, and, as early as I can, will communicate with Jack and Blueskin, who shall decide what had best be done. Does this content you?"

"It does—but" —

"But what?"

"Fain would I leave this place at once."

"You may well wish it, but you are safest here. While you are a prisoner, Jonathan will attempt nothing, so do not precipitate matters, or hurry him into doing what he would not."

"I will try."

"Above all, keep a good heart. You see, Jack Sheppard has escaped; and now I will tell you something more, which ought to make you happy."

"What—what?"

"When you are in full possession of your rights, you will have the command of almost unbounded wealth, for though your uncle has lived freely, yet all is so strictly intailed, that he can make away with nothing. Wealth is power. You will have great—very great influence. Your intercession would go a long way towards obtaining a pardon for” —

“Jack Sheppard,” interrupted Bess, eagerly.

“Yes, Jack Sheppard, or any one else in whom you might feel an interest.”

“That does indeed give me hopes. I will be guided by what you say in every particular. Come to me as often as you can, for your words are the only consolation I receive. Try to see Blueskin as early as you can, and hear what he says.”

“He will be able to judge best,” said Steggs, “and when he is prepared, we shall see what can be done towards escaping, but let it be how it will, it is necessary for you to be in good health and strength.”

“I will try—I will try. I feel better and stronger now than I have done since I have been in this dreary place. When shall you see Blueskin?”

“That is more than I can tell. Both him and Jack are pursued by Jonathan Wild, and there is no knowing how far he will chase them, or how the pursuit will terminate. Hark! what is that?”

A confused noise came from below.

“I must leave you now,” said Steggs, “it will be unsafe for me to stay any longer. I must see what has happened. Perhaps Jonathan has returned.”

“You will see me again as soon as you can?”

“I promise you I will, and now good night.”

“Good night.”

Steggs locked the door, and peered over the balusters. Something of an unusual character was taking place below.

CHAPTER CLXXXVIII.

THE HORSE FALLS DEAD UPON THE ROAD, LEAVING JACK SHEPPARD AND HIS COMRADES IN AN AWKWARD SITUATION.

WHEN Jack fired the pistol and shot Wild in the head, he did not stop to see what injury his old foe had received.

On the contrary, Johnson whipped the horse, and made him go at a still greater speed.

The poor creature was almost exhausted, but it had a capital spirit, and struggled onward.

Blueskin and Jack saw Jonathan fall off his horse on to the roadway, but in another moment he was out of sight in the darkness.

The former made his way to the front of the cart.

“Off with your woman’s toggery, Joe,” he said, “you will find it inconvenient if the time for action comes. I will take the reins a bit.”

Johnson said not a word in reply, but handed him the reins.

He then, without any difficulty, slipped off the female apparel with which he had disguised himself, and which he had put on over his ordinary clothing.

He rolled it up in a bundle, and threw it out of the cart.

“Now, which way shall we take, Joe?” asked Blueskin. “I did not think the pursuit after us would be so hot, and I am quite out of my latitude.”

“I have been wondering which would be the best way to take,” replied Johnson. “We are out of the hearing of our pursuers. Suppose we were to take the first turning to the left, and make our way across the country in a westerly direction?”

“Agreed, that will do as well as anything. You had better take the reins again.”

Johnson did so.

“I am afraid the nag won’t carry us much further. She seems all but done for now.”

“Take it easy when you get round the corner. Ten to one if we do not throw them entirely off the scent.”

“I hope we shall be lucky enough to do so. That was an awful downer Jonathan had. I heard the crash myself.”

“It was, and it will be a good thing if it puts a stop to the pursuit altogether.”

“I am afraid there will be small chance of that. This escape, and the daring manner in which it was effected, will make a tremendous uproar. What do you think, Jack?”

“I think so. But tell me, where is Edgworth Bess?”

“A prisoner.”

“In Wild’s house?”

“Yes.”

“Heaven help her, then!”

“Heaven will help her.”

“Do not take me far from London. Do you hear? I shall not rest a moment until I have set her free, and placed her somewhere in safety.”

“We will talk of that directly. She is in no immediate danger. Do you remember Steggs?”

“The accomplice of Lord Denmoll?”

“Yes, that is the man.”

“What of him?”

“Jonathan Wild’s treachery has made him our friend, and he is now as anxious to serve Edgworth Bess as he was before to persecute her.”

“Is he sincere?”

“I think so.”

“Why?”

Blueskin then proceeded to relate what had taken place, and put him in possession of all facts.

But Jack was far from satisfied.

He doubted Steggs.

And while the poor heiress was in Wild’s house he dreaded the worst.

Besides she was ill, suffering, and he determined to see her.

He had heard with joy that she had refused to believe him guilty of the crime for which he was condemned to death.

He would know no rest until he had seen her.

He was, in truth, weary and tired of life, and would willingly have laid down there and then and died, had it not been for her.

She it was who formed the tie which bound him to existence, and that tie was too strong to be easily broken.

But he felt that he should be quite content to surrender up himself, if he could only see her in safety and in possession of those rights and honours of which she had so long been deprived.

“I shall yet triumph over the villain Wild!” he exclaimed, with emphasis. “He has tried hard to bring me to the scaffold, but all his efforts have been abortive ones. Now I will try what I can do. He shall suffer the death he has been so anxious to inflict upon me, and then I shall feel content.”

“Here is my hand in that matter,” replied Blueskin; “I will join you in it, and assist you heart and soul. We are not very well circumstanced to carry out our intention, but much can be done when you are determined. Jonathan Wild shall swing at Tyburn before he is much older.”

“And a good job too,” chimed in Johnson; “and” —

He paused abruptly.

The horse had continued going at good speed, and was now in a kind of half gallop, when he suddenly fell to the ground as if struck down by lightning.

The shafts of the cart snapped asunder in a moment, and the three friends, wholly unprepared for the event, were pitched out violently into the roadway.

The horse was dead.

He had gone as long as his muscles would sustain him; they had been stretched to their utmost tension, and he had given way all at once.

When he fell he never moved in the least.

Blueskin and Johnson were in the front of the cart, and were pitched out in a moment, while Jack was thrown out over the side.

All alighted on the hard road with considerable force.

Fortunately, however, neither were much hurt, and after a minute or two, during which they recovered their senses a little, all three scrambled to their feet.

They were much bruised and shaken, of course, but they struggled against the sensation which the pain caused, for they knew not how soon their foes might be upon them.

To be sure they had not heard much of them for the last few moments, but they might be upon their track for all that.

A glance showed them that the horse was dead, and quite incapable of motion.

What would be the best thing to do?

If they left the cart just where it was, in the middle of the road, it would give a clue to their whereabouts.

But what was to be done with them?

Blueskin went a little way down the road, and then came to a gate leading into a meadow.

It was locked, but that was not much of an obstacle to Blueskin.

He had it open in a trice.

Then, going back, he told his comrades what he had done, and they set about disentangling the cart from the horse.

When this was done, the three easily drew the cart along, for it was of a light build, and concealed it in the meadows behind the hedge.

Then there was the horse to dispose of.

This was by far a more troublesome affair, but by their united strength they succeeded in dragging it after them, a few yards at a time, until that was in the meadow likewise.

Blueskin pulled the gate shut, and finding it had a tendency to swing open, he kept it in its proper place by means of a large stone which he rolled against it.

There were now no very perceptible traces of what had happened, but their position was much worse than it had been.

Altogether a good deal of time had been occupied, and they every moment expected to hear the trampling hoofs of their pursuers' horses on the road.

But they were not audible as yet.

"What shall we do, Johnson?" Blueskin asked.

"We cannot do better than keep straight down the road. There is a preserve not much further on, and if we are hard pressed we can take refuge in it."

This was agreed to.

They started at first to go down the road at a trot, but the pain of the bruises they had received soon caused them to diminish their speed.

They went at a walk, and even that was laborious and distressing.

And now, to add to their discomfiture, they could hear quite plainly that which they had so long expected—namely, the trampling of horses' feet.

"Where is the preserve you spoke of? The sooner we enter it the better, for I cannot keep up much longer, and the horsemen behind will be upon us directly."

It was Jack Sheppard who spoke.

He had said nothing before, but he had been hurt much more than either of the others, for the simple reason that he had fallen from a greater height and in a more awkward manner.

"It is not many yards further," responded Johnson. "Keep up, and we shall be all right. Do you see that black-looking mass before you, which seems almost like a cloud?"

"Yes—yes."

"That is it, then. Cheer up. My own bones ache so that I can scarcely move. Keep up."

Nothing more was said, except that now and then one or other of them would utter a dismal groan which the anguish motion caused brought forth.

At length the plantation was reached.

But they found that it was guarded from the road by a high wooden fence behind, and close to which grew some dense vegetation.

All were deeply disappointed and ready to give in, except Johnson, who said—

"Keep to the left. Leave the road. Before long you will come to a gap, through which you will be able to force your way. On with you at once. There is no time to lose!"

CHAPTER CLXXXIX.

JACK SHEPPARD, BLUESKIN, AND JOHNSON HAVE AN ADVENTURE IN THE PLANTATION.

THERE was, indeed, no time to lose, for the horsemen gained upon them with great rapidity.

It was practicable to skirt the plantation on its eastern side—the northern faced the road—and accordingly our friends, under the direction of Johnson, did so.

It was over a meadow that they took their way.

Ere long the palings began to present a dilapidated appearance, and they pushed on with renewed hope of quickly reaching the inclosure.

On came the horsemen at a furious pace. They did not halt at any place, so it would seem they had not noticed the fall of the horse.

All held their breaths.

There was a slight chance that they would sweep down the road, and come to the conclusion that the fugitives were not there, and this chance was fulfilled, or the first portion of it, at any rate.

They passed by the plantation with undiminished speed.

"Take cheer from that," said Johnson, "for that is a very great piece of luck. I don't say they won't come back, because they may have known for certain that we came down here. We must run the risk of that. We shall find a place where we can scramble through directly."

"What do you say to making one?" asked Blueskin. "The wood is extremely rotten, and I could pull some of it down in a moment."

"No—no. You had better not do that. The keepers may see it, and besides, it will serve to show the way we have taken. Push on a little further, and we shall find a place ready made."

Blueskin was convinced that his friend was right, so he continued his course along the palings without another word.

About two hundred paces further on, they came to a place where the fence had been completely demolished.

"This is it," said Johnson. "You can get in easily enough."

And so they could.

Just, however, as they were about to plunge among the trees, they were all startled by the loud report of a gun.

It was somewhere close at hand.

"What does that mean?" asked Jack.

"Either the poachers or the keepers are about. Confound them! Ten to one if the sound of the report does not reach the ears of the horsemen who have just passed, and cause them to return. Curse them! There they go again!"

Another report followed.

Something of an unusual nature was taking place, for a certainty, though the supposition which Johnson had uttered was a probable enough one.

By general consent he had taken the command of the whole party, and he now led them on through the intricacies of the wood.

They proceeded for some time in silence.

No more shots followed.

It was Johnson's intention to go as near to the centre of the plantation as possible, believing that he then had the best chance of eluding his foes.

Not a word was spoken, and they were careful to make no more noise in their progress than they could possibly avoid, for they knew not what unfriendly ears might be close by, but in spite of all their care they could not prevent a slight crackling now and then, as a twig or dead branch of a tree snapped under their feet.

All at once Johnson came to a halt.

His companions stopped likewise, and as they did so they heard a faint moaning sound.

They all listened intently to it.

What or who it came from they could not tell.

They had taken care when they heard the shot fired to notice the spot from which they appeared to come, and had taken a path that would lead them directly from it.

Johnson touched Blueskin on the arm.

"You are younger than I am. Creep forward stealthily a little way and then return, and try if you can find out what that means. We will stay where we are. It may be of importance to us to know, and I know Jack is too much hurt, or I should have asked him."

This was uttered rapidly and in a low tone of voice.

Blueskin replied by at once doing as he was requested.

It was an anxious five minutes which elapsed between the time of his departure and his return.

Neither Sheppard nor Johnson uttered a word, but bent all their faculties to the one of listening.

At length they heard a rustling noise, and directly afterwards, Blueskin appeared.

"What is it?" they both asked in a breath.

"Nothing to be over alarmed about, I think. Follow me quickly and quietly."

As he spoke, Blueskin glided away, and they had no resource but to follow him, and discover what was the cause of the strange sound they had heard.

After proceeding about a hundred paces through a thicket which kept increasing in density every moment, they came to a small clearing, where the trees and undergrowth had either been removed or had never grown.

In this place was a rudely-built wood hut.

Its roof was shrouded by tall trees, whose branches projected far over it, and cast it into deep shadow.

There was sufficient light for all three of our friends to note the appearance of this place with tolerable accuracy.

Blueskin had halted at the edge of this clearing, and the other two, who were following, did the same.

The former then pointed to the hut.

Following the direction of his finger, Jack and Johnson perceived near the door of the hut, and lying apparently across its threshold, the body of a man.

At least, they took it to be such, although the outlines of it were only partially defined.

Even as they gazed, there arose the same cry as they had before heard.

The connexion between this man and the shots they had heard not long before was too close to be overlooked, and they at once came to the conclusion that he was wounded.

But by whom?

That was a question none of them could answer.

Jack was young, and had, in some respects, a sensitive nature.

In the present instance, situated as they were, cold prudence would have recommended them to leave that spot as fast as possible, and leave the wounded man to take his fate, lest his foes should come upon him, and be the means of discovering them also.

But the humanity of Jack's nature would not suffer him to listen to this selfish plea. He determined to succour the wounded man at all hazards, let him be whom he may.

He touched Blueskin, therefore, on the arm to attract his attention, for he stood near enough to him to be able to do so, and said—

"You will help him, Blue, shall you not? He is hurt."

"I should like to give him some assistance, poor fellow, but we are scarcely in a position to do so."

"We are not, and yet I don't see how we could make matters worse."

"Nor I."

"Besides, if either of us were in his place, we should think it very hard to be passed by and not noticed."

"True."

"He may be too much hurt for our assistance to avail him. At any rate, we can but step forward and see, and leave him to his fate afterwards."

"Agreed."

"Stop a moment," said Johnson, "there may be more danger in this than meets the eye. Recollect, we are in very great peril. Suppose, now, this should only be some scheme to capture us?"

"Pho—pho!"

"You do not think it is?"

"I do not."

"Go on, then, by all means. I should be as sorry to leave him without ascertaining his condition as yourselves."

This point having thus been settled, all three cautiously crossed the open space.

The diameter of it in its widest part was only a few yards, so that they quickly reached the prostrate form.

Stooping down, Blueskin saw, that as they had first surmised, it was the body of a man.

The moan of anguish which came from his lips as soon as Blueskin touched him, showed that he retained full possession of his consciousness.

"Help! help!" he gasped. "I am shot. Help! help! I have come thus far. Oh! they have done for me at last. Help! help! or I die! Hark! hark! they are on my track—the track of blood! I hear the cracking of the bushes as they force their way. They come—they come!"

This speech was uttered with strange volubility, but in such a low tone of voice, that had not Blueskin been bending over him with his ear only about a couple of inches from his mouth, he could not have told what he said.

There was not much to be gathered from his words—part of them were but raving—for Blueskin's ears were quick, and he could not detect the sounds to which he had alluded.

He continued speaking, but this time with more calmness and coherence.

"Save me, and help me! Save me, and help me! Carry me into the hut—my hut. I am not much hurt. It is strong. Carry me in, and if I am to die, let me die there."

Blueskin glanced upwards.

The building was certainly strong.

The door was open.

"He wants to be carried in," he said to his comrades.

"Do so, then."

"He says he is not much hurt."

"The place will serve us, perhaps, for a hiding-place," suggested Jack, "at any rate, we can rest ourselves. I do not feel as though I could go much further."

CHAPTER CXC.

BLUESKIN, JACK SHEPPARD, JOHNSON, AND THE WOUNDED MAN ARE ATTACKED IN THE HUT BY THE OFFICERS OF POLICE.

"HELP me," then exclaimed Blueskin, "and we will carry him in and see what the inside of the place is like."

"Very good," said Johnson, and between the two the wounded man was carried into the hut.

Jack came last, and he closed the door.

A pungent smoke, as though coming from some wood fire, saluted their nostrils, and in a moment after they saw a faint glow at a little distance.

This was the fire, and Jack crept towards it.

The interior of the hut was profoundly dark, and he took his course with great caution, for he did not know what obstacles lay in his road.

At length, however, the fire was reached.

He kicked the embers with his foot, and a faint sputtering flame started up, which illumined the place with a momentary radiance.

Jack was pleased to find that there were several half-burned logs of wood upon the fire, and by knocking these about he soon succeeded in making the fire burn up well, and give a bright and steady light.

By its aid the wounded man was looked at, having been brought close to the fire for that purpose.

He was now insensible.

His apparel was soaked in blood.

He was dressed like an ordinary farm-servant.

Rapidly and skilfully Blueskin undid his clothing, in order to find the wound and ascertain its nature; but before he could do so, his quick ears caught a faint sound outside.

He sprang to his feet in a moment.

His companions had heard the same sound, and a look of alarm appeared upon their countenances.

The sound became more unequivocal.

It was the trampling of feet, mingled with the murmur of voices.

To rush to the door was an instinctive impulse which all three obeyed.

They opened it a little way, and peeped out.

A loud cry followed, and then there dashed into the clearing about a dozen men.

They were all dressed as keepers.

The truth now flashed upon the minds of all three.

The man who had been wounded was a poacher.

He had doubtless left a track of blood all the way he came, and so they were easily able to follow him.

Truly were our friends now in a most awkward predicament.

Blueskin, however, remembered what the man had said about the hut being strong, and so he closed the door in a moment, and looked for the fastenings.

There was a very large wooden bar, fixed by a pivot to the centre of the door.

One swing round, and it fitted securely in its staples.

A large bolt was at the top and bottom, and these he drew.

"He is in the hut," cried a voice. "Down with the door!"

[JACK SHEPPARD BUYS AN ACCOUNT OF HIS ESCAPE FROM NEWGATE.]

The object mentioned was immediately struck a violent blow with some heavy instrument, which made it shake in its setting.

But the door was left by our friends, and a hasty examination made of the rest of the building, which consisted of but one apartment, and without any apertures whatever to serve as windows.

This, as it happened, was a fortunate thing.

They looked rather blankly at each other, however, as they propounded the question—

What are we to do?

The blows upon the door were incessant, and it seemed that, despite its strength, it would ere long give way.

Our three friends were well armed and amply provided with ammunition, so that, provided the place stood, they would be able to maintain a siege for a considerable time.

"We must fight it out, I suppose," said Blueskin. "I do not see what other course is open to us."

As he spoke he, with the greatest calmness apparently, took a brace of pistols from his pockets and loaded them.

In this he was followed by the other two.

"Surrender," cried a voice at the door. "Surrender, or you die."

No notice whatever was taken of this speech, and the attack was renewed upon the door with fresh vigour.

When the pistols were loaded, Blueskin took one of the brands from the fire and held it above his head like a torch.

The wood of which it was composed was of some resinous quality, and it sent out a bright sputtering flame.

By the aid of this he made a fresh and more accurate examination of the interior of the hut.

He was in hopes of being able to find some other means of exit of which they could avail themselves.

But he could find nothing of the sort. Indeed, there was but one means by which the hut could be entered or left, and through which light was admitted, and that was the door which the keepers were so intent upon battering down.

When Blueskin had quite assured himself of this, he cast down the firebrand, and said, seriously—

"Jack, my friend, and you, Johnson. We have got ourselves into a pretty fix. We have run in here like rats into a trap, and I am afraid here we shall be comfortably caught."

"Not without giving them some trouble first," said Jack. "We are at bay, and now we will fight it out with them to the death. For one, I am determined not to surrender with life."

"Bravo, Jack. Now for it."

A tremendous blow was at this moment given to the door; but though it had been so long and so continually assaulted, it gave no more signs of giving way than at first—namely, that it shook in its frame.

One great cause of this, setting aside the strength of the door, was, that the keepers had no proper instruments for knocking it down.

In fact, the only ones they had at all available were the butts of their guns, and these showed more symptoms of giving way than the door itself.

"They desisted, therefore, and one of them again cried—

"Open the door, in the king's name! Surrender! or we fire upon you."

Then finding all within the hut as silent as before, and that no notice was taken of this appeal, the speaker continued,—

"Make ready—present!"

He paused, in order to give those within time to surrender, ere he pronounced the last word.

All was still.

"Fire!"

The sharp report of three guns, almost at the same moment, arose with a startling distinctness upon the air.

The three bullets with which the weapons were loaded went crashing through the woodwork.

The door was thick, but the lead found a way through it, and was flattened against the opposite wall.

It had been an easy enough matter for our three friends to get out of all possible range of the bullets, and neither of them had received the least injury.

But they saw by this how energetic the men were.

"Shall we return the fire, Blue?" asked Jack.

"Not yet. We are not in a position to do them any harm. Let them go at it. If they fire at the door, we can easily get out of the way of the bullets."

The men outside seemed rather annoyed to find that their fire was unheeded, for they re-loaded rapidly, and fired again.

But this was folly, and they soon found that some other means of dislodging those within the hut must be devised, ere they could hope to meet with success.

A cessation of hostilities now took place, during which they consulted together as to what was to be done.

They were only three in number, and did not care to send one away to procure additional assistance.

As for those within the hut, they scarcely knew what to think of the protracted stillness—whether it boded them danger or safety.

It was Jack who hit upon the thought of questioning the man, through rendering assistance to whom, they had got into this great peril.

"Who knows?" he said. "We may learn something important from him respecting the character of the men who are outside? He can tell us not only who they are, but why they pursue him."

"True! We ought to have thought of that before."

"There is plenty of time yet," said Johnson. "Let us see. I am afraid he is past speech."

All three had made their way to the centre of the hut, where the fire was burning on the hearth, and close to which the wounded man lay.

He was quite still.

Johnson knocked the fire together, and the light fell upon his face.

One glance was sufficient to show that he was either insensible or dead.

The ghastly pallor of his face made all think the latter, and Johnson said—

"I am afraid he is a gone mutton. However, if there is any life in his body this will rouse it."

He took a flask from his pocket as he spoke.

"There is a drop of pure unwatered brandy in that," he said. "I thought perhaps it would come in useful. I mostly carry some in my pocket. Blue, hold his head up a little way."

Blueskin held the man in a half-sitting posture, and Johnson poured a considerable quantity of brandy down his throat.

That the spirit was strong, the convulsive gasps which the man gave testified.

His face assumed quite a blue tinge, and he seemed in imminent danger of choking.

Indeed, the brandy must either have had the effect of extinguishing his life at once, or recovering him.

The chances were about equal.

Suddenly, however, Blueskin let go his hold, and the man's head fell with a dab on to the hearthstone, while at the same moment he uttered an ejaculation of alarm.

CHAPTER CXCI.

IN WHICH THE ATTACK OF THE OFFICERS UPON THE HUT IS CONTINUED.

THE alarm which Blueskin displayed was fully shared in by his two companions.

Johnson dropped the flask, and its precious contents were wasted on the floor.

Jack Sheppard started to his feet.

All three assumed listening attitudes.

The sound which had so alarmed them was the tramp of many footsteps, and then a voice had called out, in true military fashion—

"Halt!"

This was the cause of the effects we have described.

Danger now was imminent in the extreme.

"The police have found us," said Blueskin, in a whisper.

"I am afraid so."

"It is all over with us, then."

Blueskin was quite right.

The party of officers, after going for some distance down the lane without finding any signs of those whom they were in search, came to the conclusion that somehow or other they had passed them.

With this conviction they had turned back.

Their horses were much fatigued, and so as there was no pressing need to make much speed, they went at a gentle trot, looking carefully around them in every direction as they did so, in the hope of finding some trace of the prisoners.

It would have been their wisest policy to have done this at first.

On their return, they came of course to the plantation, and the idea that this would form a capital place of concealment occurred to all of them.

They were debating the matter when the report of the volley which the keepers fired at the door of the hut reached their ears.

To be sure, this might have nothing to do with the business they were upon, but then again it might, so, by the orders of their chief, all alighted, and the horses having been left in charge of two of their number, the remainder plunged into the wood and made their way as nearly as they could in the direction from which the sound had come.

The second volley, following so close upon the other as it did, served materially to assist them, and they pushed onwards regardless of all obstacles.

A very little while brought them to the clearing.

As soon as their leader saw they had reached their destination, he had cried out halt, and the whole troop, numbering hard upon twenty men, came to a standstill in front of the hut.

His next step was to speak to the three keepers.

"What is all this?" he asked. "Are there any persons concealed in that hut?"

"Yes."

"Who are they?"

"We don't know."

"We are in pursuit of the notorious Jack Sheppard, who has just managed to effect another escape from Newgate, and two persons by whom he was assisted. Are they in the hut?"

"That's more than we can tell, sir. As you can doubtless tell by our dresses, we are keepers, and have hunted a poacher through the wood."

"A poacher!" exclaimed the chief of the police. "Is that all?"

"I don't know. We tracked him as far as the hut by his blood, which has dropped all about. But he must have been succored by some one."

"How can you tell?"

"Not only have we heard voices within the hut, but many footprints could be seen about the door of it. We have called to them to surrender, and fired upon them, but they have taken no heed."

"We are on the right scent, I'll be bound," said the chief officer. Birds of a feather always flock together, and if we do not find the three in here it is very odd to me. At any rate, we can but try, and we shall be sure of a capital reward if we find the birds we want."

"Then you will assist us?" said one of the keepers.

"We will."

"We were deliberating when you came up what measures we should take to oust them, but were unable to think of anything likely."

"We'll see to that," said the chief officer, in an energetic voice. "Now, my lads, be lively. Place yourselves in a chain round the hut, and see that no one leaves it. We'll soon have them out, I'll be bound."

The officer thought it a piece of good generalship to give these orders in as loud a tone of voice as he possibly could, in order that what he said should reach the ears of those within, and have due weight upon them.

Indeed, with many men less courageous than our friends, this was a very likely means of obtaining a surrender, but with them the attempt utterly and completely failed.

But as they listened they could hear the officers form a circle round the hut, in obedience to the orders they had received.

There was, however, despite their bravery, an uncomfortable feeling about the hearts of all.

They looked upon their ultimate capture as inevitable and certain.

So many men would make short work of demolishing the hut altogether.

Jack was full of despair.

He thought that to be captured and taken back to Newgate would be so bitter, that death was a thousand times more preferable.

Was he doomed never again to see Edgworth Bess on earth? Had he seen that fair and persecuted girl for the last time?

Truly there now seemed little chance of his seeing her.

Two alternatives stared him in the face.

Capture.

Death.

For the first he felt that, should he once more fall into the hands of the myriads of the law, such precautions would be taken as to make it a matter of total impossibility for him to escape.

Then with respect to the latter, though not accustomed to speculate deeply upon such matters, Jack thought that if what he had heard respecting heaven and hell was true, there could be no hope then, for that the same place would receive both he could not bring himself to believe.

But the natural bravery of his disposition soon rose above this feeling.

Blueskin and Johnson looked calm and determined.

They each held in their hands a pair of loaded pistols ready for immediate service.

The disposition of the officers round the hut was soon made, and they found themselves almost able to touch one another.

The chief having seen this done, again called to those within to surrender.

But it was all to no purpose, he might just as well have addressed himself to the wooden walls of the hut.

And now a disagreeable idea occurred to the chief officer, and that was that his prey had, in some manner or other, managed to make their escape before the investment of the building by his men.

Acting under this idea, he summoned two to his side, and said,—

"Draw your cutlasses, my lads, and attack that door. You will soon have it down, I'll warrant."

Nothing loth, the officers drew their cutlasses, and began striking the door with them.

Chips flew at every blow.

It was quite clear that a little patience would enable them to effect an entrance, and perhaps more expeditiously than in any other way.

Our friends soon found out what their enemies were about, and Blueskin said,—

"We must put a stop to this somehow or another. We have plenty of ammunition. Let all three of us go to the door and fire through it simultaneously, and then drop flat to the ground before they have time to return the discharge."

"Agreed; it will hinder their operations a little, and allow us time to think, if it does no other good."

"That is a great good. Come on!"

The three then stealthily crept to the door, which was of uncommon thickness, and composed of solid oak; so that the police had not yet succeeded in making a breach through it.

Blueskin gave the word to fire in a whisper, and it was immediately followed by the report of the six pistols, which raised such a report as to be absolutely deafening.

A loud yell of pain from those without mingled with it, which pretty plainly showed that they had done some execution among their enemies.

In anticipation that their fire would be responded to, Blueskin had commanded them to drop to the floor, where they would be almost sure not to meet with any injury.

Accordingly they did so, and the policy of the movement soon became apparent.

Directly they recovered from the consternation which this vigorous assault produced, all those near the door who had firearms discharged them at it.

But none were aimed low enough down to reach our friends as they lay on the floor.

"Load again," whispered Blueskin; "but don't move."

Scarcely had he uttered these words than another volley was fired, and then the attack upon the door was recommenced.

For a little while Blueskin suffered them to go on unmolested.

Then rising as before, and his comrades with him, they stood at the requisite distance from the door, and pulled their triggers.

The six reports followed, echoed, as upon the previous occasion, by the yells and groans of those who were hit.

The attack upon the door ceased.

"If we can keep that up, Jack, I think we shall take some of the courage out of them."

"Yes; but what is to become of us when we reach the end of our ammunition?"

"What, indeed! but don't let us anticipate evil. We have done better, so far, than I could have expected."

Jack shook his head, and so did Johnson.

Neither felt so very well satisfied, nor did Blueskin in his heart, only he desired to keep up his comrades' spirits as well as possible.

The officers seemed to have retired to deliberate, for a deep silence, except that the murmuring of voices could now and then be heard, ensued.

Some new plan of tactics would have to be adopted, that was clear, for if the inmates kept up as vigorous a resistance as they had begun, their numbers would be fearfully reduced before the door could be broken down.

The men hung back, too, a great deal.

The chief himself was wounded, and the others by no means cared about exposing their bodies to so terrible and deadly a fire.

Hence, a temporary lull in the proceedings took place, while they considered what had better be done.

CHAPTER CXII.

THE OFFICERS OF POLICE AT LAST SUCCEEDED IN EFFECTING AN ENTRANCE INTO THE HUT THROUGH THE ROOF.

THAT four men, and one of them seriously wounded, should be able for any length of time to hold out against such overwhelming numbers, was absurd.

In the end their capture must take place, and the officers, while they maintained their circle round the hut, felt that it was utterly impossible for any one within the building to leave it unperceived.

Still the amount of trouble and loss they had already experienced, without having gained the slightest advantage, was annoying in the extreme.

The door seemed the weakest point at which the attack could be made. The walls were composed of solid blocks or wood of great thickness, and very securely clamped together, so there was no hope of breaking through them.

There was, however, one weak point of the defences which was entirely overlooked and never thought of.

How this was is hard to say, but the fact remains the same, notwithstanding.

The weak part in the hut was what is generally the weakest part in all buildings, and that is the roof.

In some buildings, however, the roof is quite inaccessible, but this was not the case with the hut.

It was not nine feet above the ground at the most in its lowest part.

It was composed of thatch, but not thatch simply.

Underneath the thin covering of straw was a series of wooden poles laid as closely together as their shape would admit.

These were firmly secured to other pieces of wood lying at right angles to them, the ends of which were fastened to the walls and to the beam at the top.

It was the chief of police, who was really a bold brave man, who first thought of endeavouring to make a breach through the roof.

The wound he had received made him physically incompetent to have headed the attempt as he would have wished, so he was forced to content himself with issuing orders merely.

"Kenrick," he said, addressing one of the men who next to him had the control of the others, "Kenrick!"

"Yes, sir."

"Get the men together, and attack the roof."

"Very good, sir."

"Leave the door to itself now. Make no more noise than you can possibly help, or you may be picked off in the same way as before. Ah! curses!"

The chief of police's wound gave him rather a sudden twinge as he spoke.

Kenrick moved off, and gave the order to the men, who set about obeying it with more alacrity than they had recently displayed.

The roof was reached with very little trouble, and then they commenced stripping off the thatch.

This was done easily enough.

Doubtless, they anticipated that when they had done this their work was over, but they soon found their mistake when the longitudinal beams of wood were brought to view.

They had their cutlasses drawn, however, and commenced hacking them away.

Those within seemed determined not to surrender until they had done all the mischief they possibly could, for though they saw that capture was so imminent, they fired another volley at the men on the roof.

Its efficacy was at once attested, too, by the cries which followed, and then a rumbling noise succeeded, caused by those who had been killed or wounded rolling down the roof on to the ground.

The numbers of the men were now seriously reduced, but their blood seemed to get heated by the slaughter they saw around them, and they returned to the attack with greater energy than ever.

The position of those within the hut was an excellent one, for while they were able to do so much damage, they were themselves free from all consequences of it.

They could tell exactly where the besiegers were, and take a deadly aim accordingly, but the besiegers could not so well ascertain their precise situation, though very many shots had been fired into the hut, and both Blueskin and Johnson had been slightly wounded by them.

And now one of the police-officers, by an exertion of great strength, caught hold of one of the poles we have mentioned, and wrenched it from its place.

Assistance was rendered him as soon as the others saw what he was about, and a breach in the roof was fairly and really made.

For the first time the officers could see into the interior of the hut.

But beyond a patch of darkness, they could make out nothing.

Our three friends had been tolerably well supplied with ammunition, but as they had fired a great many volleys, and as each volley consisted of six shots, they soon reduced their supply to a very small amount.

But when they saw the opening made in the roof they prepared to fire, but waited until the heads of several of their foes appeared at the orifice.

They then draw their triggers.

The police had done precisely as they had, and fired at the same moment. To be sure, there aim was not so accurate, but the bullets scattered about in rather an alarming manner.

But owing to the confined space in which their heads appeared, the three friends had done a terrible amount of execution.

The officers were again repulsed, and the whole of them who were on the roof either rolled or tumbled to the ground.

They were now in a state of the greatest exasperation, and acted more like madmen than human beings.

They could never have believed it lay in the power of three persons entrenched in a hut to do them so much damage.

But they found it out to their cost, as we have seen.

The chief of the police uttered some awful curses when he saw his men again repulsed.

Kenrick had been shot, and the officers were now without a leader.

"Fire the hut!" cried the chief, in a perfect rage. "Set fire to it. Smoke them out. That is the only way. We shall be sure to have them."

"Hurrah!" responded the others then, who all burned for personal vengeance. "Hurrah! that will do it."

Half-a-dozen rushed off for brushwood, plenty of which grew close at hand, and having gathered a large quantity, they piled it up against the door in a huge heap.

Some phosphorous matches were then produced, and several having been lighted were held to the wood.

The bottom part of the combustible heap was formed of dry leaves and twigs of trees, which caught fire in a moment, and blazed up brightly.

The flames soon communicated themselves to the upper portion.

Dense volumes of smoke arose, and the fire crackled loudly.

The police-officers surrounded the hut, and kept as close to the flames as they could, while they watched their progress with unfeigned satisfaction.

The inflammable materials had been piled against the door of the hut with considerable art, although it was done so hastily.

They were arranged so that the main body of the flames played upon it.

An ominous silence followed the last attempt to carry the hut by storm.

No sound whatever could be heard to come from the inmates of it, who had defended themselves with so much bravery and desperation.

They thought when so terrible an alternative was offered them as to be burned out by fire, that they would then and there have cried out for mercy, and surrendered.

But Blueskin was not exactly the sort of man to do that, let the peril with which he was menaced be what it might.

⑥ Rather than give in, he would fight to the last gasp.

The fire still burned.

Its violence increased, and the long, red flames that shot upward seized upon everything within their reach and devoured it.

They caught the thatched roof, and soon the whole of the top was one sheet of fire.

The roaring and crackling was terrific.

Again and again did the officers cry out aloud to those within to surrender; but on no occasion was any reply vouchsafed to their words.

The fierceness of the heat compelled them from time to time to increase their distance from the flames; but, notwithstanding that, the circle around the building was unbroken.

They were quite certain that neither of those within had left it.

Silence still.

Higher and higher mounted the red flames, fiercer and fiercer they became, but still no change was made, no cry for aid or help came from the lips of those within.

The fire was fast getting a firm hold of the entire building.

Now it was by no means the wish of the chief of the police to burn his prisoners to death.

He would have much preferred to have captured them, and taken them alive to Newgate.

Accordingly, when he found that the door was so far burnt away as not to be able to withstand any resistance, he commanded his men to dash the blazing pile away, and scatter the portions of which it was composed about the clearing.

The door was then fully exposed to view.

It was nothing more than a piece of red-hot wood.

"Forward!" cried the chief, in a loud voice, in spite of the pain which his wound occasioned him. "Forward! forward! down with the door! One blow will do it! Then you have them."

Animated by his words, and determined to put an end to the prolonged and sanguinary contest, the officers made a vigorous dash at the half-burned door.

Now that the heap was removed, the progress of the fire was very greatly stayed.

It raged upon the roof where the thatch was not destroyed, but it had not taken firm hold of the beams.

But the door was in such a state as to enable them to force a way through it.

That they would find their foes helpless and at their mercy they quite anticipated. The interior would be filled with dense, suffocating smoke.

The officers attacked the door with their cutlasses.

It was very different now, though.

Their weapons sank into it easily, and in less than two minutes it was entirely battered down.

Such an immense quantity of black, pungent smoke rushed out that they were compelled to retreat before it.

But a few minutes served to dissipate it, and then they dashed in in a body.

At first they could not credit the evidence of their senses.

The hut was empty.

CHAPTER CXCIH.

THE WOUNDED POACHER SHOWS HIMSELF GRATEFUL FOR THE SERVICES WHICH OUR FRIENDS HAVE DONE HIM, AND MAKES A GOOD RETURN.

To explain the mystery of the extraordinary and incomprehensible disappearance of Blueskin and his two companions, it will be necessary to return to their proceedings, and particularly describe what they were occupied in doing after the repulse of the enemy from the roof, and while the bonfire was made outside the door.

The last discharge which the officers had made was rather a damaging one.

All three were hurt, but fortunately, only slightly.

They were binding up their wounds, when their attention was attracted by the wounded man who had been the unconscious cause of bringing them into this great peril.

From the time of the arrival of the police-officers they had paid no attention to him.

It will be recollected that Johnson had poured a dangerously large quantity of strong brandy down his throat.

It was a case of kill or cure, and had the man to whom the desperate remedy had been applied have been less habituated to the use of ardent drinks than he was, it would certainly have resulted in the former.

But as it so happened, it revived him, though he was some time before he properly recovered his consciousness.

He had been severely hurt, but not mortally, and the swoon into which he had fallen was mainly caused by loss of blood from the system.

The sharp firing, and the noise which had ensued, did not in any way tend to restore him the use of his faculties, and it was not until the time of which we have just spoken that he had been able to come to a clear understanding of what had taken place.

But as soon as he did he called out to our three friends as we have recorded, but his voice was so faint that it could not possibly have been heard outside.

"What is it?" asked Jack Sheppard, who had not all through lost sight of the idea which had occurred to him—namely, that the man would very likely be able to give them some good advice under these perilous circumstances. "What is it?"

He stooped down over the man, who had made several efforts to raise himself, but without success, as he spoke—"Speak to me," he continued. "Do not exhaust yourself. I shall hear you if you speak no louder than a whisper."

"You have saved me."

"We have, so far."

"The keepers surround the hut—the strong, brave old but, and you have kept them at bay."

"We have, but not without much trouble. Not only do keepers surround this place, but a large body of police, also!"

"Ah! then we are lost."

"Say you so?"

"You are pursued, then."

"We are."

"Let me think a moment. You are friends?"

"We have shown ourselves such."

"Then I will trust you."

"That is right—but listen."

"What?"

"Our foes are baffled for the moment, but not defeated."

"I know it."

"They will renew the attack in some other way directly."

"I know that too."

"I am glad you understand so well."

"Yes, I have perfectly recovered my senses."

"You are better, then?"

"I think I am."

"I am glad to hear it, but are you aware that we cannot conquer those who are besieging us? do you know that in the end they must either capture or slay us?"

"I do, unless some outlet to the hut is found."

"Just so, that is it. We have searched it round and round, but the only one which we could find was the door."

"Ah! did you search narrowly?"

"We did."

"Better and better."

"What do you mean—better and better?"

"I mean it is so much the better for us. Hark! what are they about now?"

All listened.

"I know," said Blueskin at length.

"What is it?"

"They are going to employ an agent to turn us out against which we cannot combat."

"What is that?"

"Fire."

"Fire?"

"Yes. They are heaping up brushwood outside the door, and then they will set fire to it, and either smoke or burn us out."

"No—no."

It was the wounded man who spoke.

"What do you mean by 'No—no'?"

"They will neither smoke nor burn us out."

"Then you know of some secret means by which this hut can be left."

"Yes."

"But you must bear one thing in mind."

"What?"

"The police are here in large numbers, and they have formed a complete circle round the hut, so, if we do leave it, we shall fall into their hands."

"No we shan't."

"Well, then, if you know of some secret exit, let us hear what it is at once, or the news will come too late."

"I will tell you."

"What is it, then? Be quick!"

"Raise a little so that I can show you, and stir up the fire so that we can see about us."

Both these things were done.

The hut was now filling rapidly with smoke.

"Do you see yonder chest?" asked the wounded man.

He pointed as he spoke to a very large wooden chest in one corner of the hut.

"Yes, yes. We see it."

"That, then, is the outlet. Promise to take me with you, and I will show you how this place may be left in perfect safety."

"We will readily promise that, since we determined from the first not to abandon you to your enemies."

"Thanks, thanks. You will have your reward. Your danger seems great, but in reality it is nothing. Carry me to the box, and then I will show you how to leave this place."

At this moment they heard those without crying to them to surrender.

But the poacher, if such he was, heard their proposal with a disdainful smile.

He was carried by the joint assistance of the three friends, to the chest in the corner as he desired.

"Open the lid," he said. "It is not fastened in any way, and will yield readily to your hand."

"I know that," said Jack, as he raised the lid of the box. "I have tried it before."

"Oh! have you?"

"Yes."

"And could you find no way out?"

"No; nor can I now."

"Excellent!"

"Why?"

"If you are baffled by it, it makes me hopeful that our pursuers will be equally at fault."

"I trust they will; but how is this?"

"Thus."

The wounded man as he spoke took from his pocket an instrument which looked not unlike a button-hook, and, holding it in his hand, he thrust his arm into the box.

He drew it upwards slowly, and although the exertion required was more than he possessed.

But he managed it, and then the others saw to their admiration and surprise that the hooked instrument was fixed in a small staple at one end of the bottom of the box, and which came up like a door.

"There," said the poacher, in well-pleased accents, "that is such a contrivance as you don't see every day."

"It is excellent," exclaimed Blueskin. "Let me hold it up for you."

The bottom of the box was, in fact, nothing more than a trap-door, but what it covered our friends had yet to learn.

Blueskin asked the question.

"There is a flight of steps," replied the poacher, "below here, and they terminate in an underground passage which leads into some caverns, and those caverns out into the open air upon a hill-side, about three parts of a mile from here."

"Can this be possible?" ejaculated Blueskin, "to think we should have had the means of leaving this dangerous place so close to us, and yet knew it not."

"That often happens," said the poacher. "But you will have to be quick, or we shall after all be too late."

"Let me go first," said Blueskin, "and then Jack will assist you down to me."

"Very good."

Blueskin got inside the chest, and found beneath his feet a flight of steps, which, so far as he could tell, appeared to be formed of nothing but impacted earth.

"Stop a minute," he cried, "there is one thing I have forgotten now."

"What?"

"A light."

"Yes, we shall want a light," said the poacher; "have you one?"

"Yes."

"That is well, then. Make haste, or they will be upon us."

Blueskin had too many times found the utility of having a light about him to ever neglect it and be without one.

From his coat pocket he produced a dark lantern, which, though of diminutive size, was made in the best manner, and emitted a very brilliant light.

He handed this to Jack, and then Johnson took hold of the poacher by the arms and lifted him over the side of the box.

Blueskin received him in his arms.

"How many steps are there?" he asked.

"About twenty."

"We will go first, then. I will carry you. Jack show the light."

Sheppard held the lantern in such a position that its beams were directed down the steps.

Blueskin then carried the poacher down about a dozen of them, and then he paused for his companions to join him.

This they lost no time in doing, nor were they any too soon.

The hut was almost full of black hot smoke, and the door was red hot.

Johnson came last, and, as he stood on the top step, he shut the lid of the box, and then pulled the bottom after him, leaving it all secure.

The poacher, too, showed him how he could draw a bolt beneath the bottom of the box, which shot in a large iron staple, so that no one could possibly raise it from the other side.

When this was done, a feeling of greater security gathered about the hearts of the fugitives. They, indeed, really began to hope that after all they would be able to escape with their lives.

But it will be seen that they were very far indeed from being out of danger, and they were destined to have a hard struggle for life and liberty.

Having brought things so far, we shall now proceed to relate what took place when the officers forced their way into the hut.

CHAPTER CXCIV.

BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD FOR A TIME SUCCEED IN BAFFLING THEIR FOES.

WHEN the intelligence that the hut was empty was carried to the chief of the police, he refused to believe it.

All wounded as he was, the news gave him such a sudden accession of vigour, that he started to his feet and rushed in.

Then, indeed, he had the witness of his own eye-sight to the truth of what had been said.

"Search the place!" he yelled, "search the place. They must be here. They are hidden somewhere. They cannot possibly escape. Search! search!"

The officers were much enraged to think that their prey had slipped through their fingers when they thought they had it so secure, and they ransacked the place thoroughly.

In the search the chest was not, of course, overlooked.

It was opened more than once, but seeing it was empty the lid was shut down again.

There was no outlet perceivable.

The state of the hut was now such as to make it positively dangerous to remain any longer in it, though the wood, from its being hard and solid, did not burn with that rapidity which might have been expected.

Another officer opened the lid of the box, and as he did so, he held a pistol in the other hand.

Somehow or other, while the lid was raised he dropped his pistol, and it fell upon the bottom of the box.

A hollow sound was produced.

The thought struck him that he had found the secret of the disappearance, and he hastily said as much, while he even asserted that he dropped the pistol intentionally, in order to see whether a hollow sound was returned; but this, we think, was not exactly the truth, and that the discovery was made like many others—by accident alone; although many have afterwards endeavoured to take the credit to themselves.

A closer investigation of course followed, and the result of it was that the bottom of the box covered an open space in the same manner as a trapdoor.

When they had found this out the rest was easy enough. They tried first to move the box bodily, but finding themselves quite unable to do that, they set to work and knocked it to pieces.

The top of the flight of earth steps was at last laid bare to view, and then they prepared to descend.

We will now return to our friends.

Upon reaching the bottom of the steps the found themselves in a vaulted passage hollowed out of the earth, and beaten hard and flat at the floor, roof, and walls.

Along this, by the directions of the poacher, they proceeded for some distance in a tolerably straight line.

The three comrades gazed curiously around them, for all they saw was strange and wonderful.

The poacher was fast recovering from his hurts, or, at any rate, appeared to be doing so.

He walked with tolerable speed, without any more assistance than such as the sides of the passage afforded him.

They paused occasionally to listen for any sounds that would show their pursuers to be on their track, and at length the noise caused by breaking up the box came very plainly to their ears.

This let them know that danger from their foes was far from at an end.

The poacher seemed much troubled when he found the entrance to the secret passage had been discovered.

"Quick! quick!" he said, himself setting the example of going at an increased speed. "Quick! or else they will catch us after all. Make haste! If we can but get a little further we shall be quite safe. Haste! haste!"

The others ran after him as fast as they were able.

And now the passage began to grow much more limited in its dimensions.

The walls were closer together.

The roof lower.

Indications of moisture, which they had not before noticed, made their appearance upon the walls.

"We shall baulk them yet," said the poacher, as he gasped for breath after his exertion. "Look, my friends, there is a large wooden plug above your heads. Pull it—pull it out, I say; but stand aside quickly, for water will follow!"

When they heard these words, our three friends looked up to the ceiling of the passage, and there they saw, depending from it, a piece of wood, shaped something like a plug—that is to say, it was round, and grew thicker towards the bottom.

Blueskin did not stop to hesitate or question, but lifted up his arms, and seized the plug with both hands.

It seemed very firmly imbedded, and he had to work it about, first backwards and then forwards, before he could communicate to it a downward motion.

But he was strong, and soon overcame the resistance offered.

Recollecting the warning he had received, he stepped aside quickly when he felt it coming.

The plug fell to the ground.

Then through the round opening which it had filled up there rushed, with incredible violence, a stream of water about the thickness of a man's arm.

Although they felt a good deal of confidence in the smuggler, our friends viewed this with something like dismay, for how were they to escape drowning?

But the wounded man still urged them forward, and, after going a few yards more, they came to a place where another plug was fixed.

This was also drawn, and the same result followed.

Another and another were pulled out in their hasty progress, and the floor of the passage was ankle deep in water, although for some time it had had an upward tendency.

"A few more yards, and we shall be all right," said the poacher. "There is a door which we can close behind us, and secure, and then I think we can laugh at all pursuit."

"The quicker the better, then, or we shall be afloat."

"No fear—no fear. The main body of the water will flow towards our pursuers, and in three more minutes the lower part of the passage will be full. Ah! here is the door."

At this moment the little party came to a small wooden door.

It was not as large as the passage, but was a small square aperture, considerably above its level.

It was not fastened, and the poacher pushed it open, making a sign for Blueskin to pass through and assist him.

This was soon done, and Blueskin closed the door again. He gave one look down the passage before he did so, and saw that it was literally filled with water.

He was astonished.

The water had rushed in with great swiftness, he knew, but still he could hardly believe that in so short a time a sufficient quantity could have entered to fill up the passage in the way it had.

A more effectual means of putting an end to the pursuit could not have been found, though from what he had already seen, Blueskin could tell that his pursuers were not to be turned aside very easily.

He fastened the door without more ado, and then glanced round to see into what kind of a place fortune had led them.

Jack Sheppard held the lamp, but its services were not really needed, inasmuch as a soft gentle light very grateful to the vision filled the place.

"Where is this?" he asked.

"This is a cavern," replied the poacher, "beneath some hills. I ought to say it is one of a series of caverns, and as this is the innermost of them all, it is seldom, if ever visited."

"And this light—where does it come from?"

"Through numberless chinks in the roof above. They are too far off, and too small to be distinguished from here."

"And do you think we are safe?"

"I am sure of it. The officers will never follow us; but the sooner you leave the cavern and this part of the country the better."

"Can you guide us out?"

"I can."

"Pray do so, then."

"This way. I don't know who you are, but you have saved my life. That is enough. I want to know no more. When we get to the open air we will separate. I have my own business to attend to."

"We shall ever be grateful to you," replied Blueskin, as he followed his singular guide through the caverns in the direction of the outlet; "for you have rendered us a signal service. Without you we should never have escaped from our enemies."

"You have not quite done so yet; not that I think you will meet with the same lot outside; but then there may be more."

"You seem to have recovered from your wound very rapidly."

"I have. I cannot have been so severely hurt as I at first imagined."

"I am glad to hear it. But are you well enough to shift for yourself?"

"Oh! yes; besides I know not where you may wish to go. I am known to the keepers, and shall have to lose no time in getting out of the kingdom, and I have some to whom I should like to say good-bye before I go."

"Well, well. You have your own way; but if we can do anything to assist you I am sure you can command us."

"No, no. Look! here is the entrance to the caverns."

The poacher pointed to a large opening, after having passed through which our friends found themselves once more in the open air.

"And now we will separate," said the poacher, who seemed impatient to be gone. "Farewell. And if before I go you will condescend to take from me one piece of advice—"

"What is it?"

"Separate yourselves, and go each of you singly to your destination. You will thus have an opportunity of eluding your pursuers, who will before long be upon the track."

"They will. Your advice is good, and shall be adopted. Farewell."

The poacher hastened away, and, turning the sharp angle of the rock, was in a moment out of sight.

Our three friends looked at each other in silence for a little while.

They were breathless, bruised, and tired.

"This is a wonderful night of adventures, Jack," said Blueskin. "I thought at one time that there was no hope for us."

"So did I."

"How strangely that poacher behaved. I cannot half make the fellow out, and do not altogether like his ways. I think the best thing we can do is to be off."

"But not separate as he said?"

"I don't know. At all events let us go on for a little while together in the direction of London."

"Agreed."

"We might then part and each go to separate portions of the town, first arranging where we are to meet."

"Agreed to that."

"Come on, then. You are tired, and so am I; but an effort must be made. We are much too close to the hut to be safe or comfortable. Make all the speed you can. We shall be the downfall of Jonathan Wild yet."

CHAPTER CXCV.

JACK SHEPPARD PURCHASES A BILL CONTAINING AN ACCOUNT OF HIS ESCAPE FROM NEWGATE.

OVER the hard uneven ground, taking their course in as direct a line as possible, running as fast as their fatigued limbs and bruised bodies would allow them, went our three friends.

From time to time they looked back, but they could see no traces of their pursuers.

Gradually their speed abated, and at length their run became a walk, but not until London was in sight in the distance.

"Now, Blueskin," said Jack, "what do you say about our separating. For one, I must have rest, for I am completely knocked up."

"What do you think, Johnson?"

"I think to separate would be the wisest plan."

"Good, then it shall be done."

"Where shall we meet, for I fancy neither of us can tell where he will go."

"You won't want me in the business at all, shall you?" asked Johnson.

"No, my friend," returned Jack, "I do not know that we shall. I hope, however, you will believe how much I feel indebted to you for what you have done in my behalf. You have proved yourself a true friend to me."

"Don't talk about that, Jack—it's nothing, only I would do anything to oblige you and Blueskin there, and I know very well if I was to get into trouble you would not stick at a little to get me out."

"You are right enough there, Johnson, and I think you have exposed yourself quite enough for my sake, and I don't intend to be the means of getting you into trouble by being seen with you again."

"Nonsense."

"But I say it. Blueskin."

"What, Jack?"

"We have a great deal to do before our ends will be accomplished; but do not despair. I trust we shall yet succeed. I have every hope of it, eventually. Now we will separate. Where shall we meet?"

"I leave that to you. Fix the place yourself."

"No, no. You."

"Well then, I should say the best place would be at the foot of King Charles's statue at Charing-cross."

"Why there?"

"Because it is an unlikely place for us to repair to, and not only that, we should not be surrounded very easily."

"Well then, King Charles's statue be it then. At what time?"

"Ten."

"Will that be late enough?"

"Say eleven; the streets will be sure to be empty then."

"It will be safer; and if in the meantime, Blueskin, you can learn anything about Edgworth Bess, pray do so. Tell me all you can about her."

"I will; but at present I believe she is tolerably safe. She is in Jonathan's power, it is true, but he seems to have abandoned his idea of harming her—at least, she is very ill. Steggs is there, and he will watch over and protect her, rest assured."

"I shall wait and long for night. Look, already in the east I can see a faint light which shows that the new day is close at hand. We have no time to lose. I will find a safe refuge and do you the same."

Farewells were then exchanged and all three separated, yet each took the way to London.

At first, the distance between them was but trifling, but it soon increased, until they were no longer visible to each other.

It was just about sunrise when Jack fairly reached London.

The inhabitants of the huge city were not yet astir, and he hurried through the streets at the top of his speed.

It was at the north-western part that Jack entered London.

Suddenly a thought struck him.

He thrust his hands in a moment into his pocket.

He had no money.

This was a serious dilemma.

Had he thought of it earlier, Blueskin would have supplied him, doubtless, but that was not to be thought of now.

"I must have money from somewhere," he muttered: "that is quite certain, but where?"

That was the question.

He looked about him.

As yet he was upon the outskirts of the town.

"Some one must pay toll," he said, "there is no help for it. The first one that passes me will have to stand and deliver."

He turned round a corner as he spoke.

In the distance he saw some one approaching.

Who he did not care to inquire, but walked on unconcernedly to meet him until, being quite close, he raised one of his pistols, and said, in a firm voice—

"Cry out, and you are a dead man!"

The man stopped in a moment, and the cry to which he had half given utterance faded away upon his lips.

Jack held the pistol within an inch of his face.

He could almost see down the barrel.

"Quick," continued Sheppard; "your money—hand it over. Your money, I say!"

"What—what!" said the person addressed, who was a stout, middle-aged gentleman. "Robbed in broad daylight by a boy! Nonsense—nonsense!"

"Do not trifle with me," said Jack, getting irritated. "I am in earnest, and if you value your life you will do as I desire, for I should think no more of shooting you than I should of shooting yonder sparrow."

"God bless me," said the gentleman, "what a horrid little villain. However, there is nobody in sight, so I suppose I must. Here, take that."

A purse was handed, which Jack took in a moment, and finding it to be tolerably well filled, he darted off with it in a moment, leaving the old gentleman quite confused and astounded in the middle of the road.

He set up an outcry at last; but by that time Jack was out of sight.

In a little while Jack got to the Tottenham-court-road, and down this he went towards St. Giles's.

At that time only a few houses were built in the Tottenham-court-road; but to the left, towards the lower part of it, were several little streets, and turning down one of these Jack stopped at a little public-house, where they were just putting up the shutters.

He went in and obtained a bed, and here he slept until about six o'clock the following evening.

He then rose, and it being quite dark he went out into the street with the intention of finding a shop where he could purchase a new suit of apparel.

In his present attire he considered he should run great risk of being recognised.

Keeping carefully in the shadow of the houses, he stole down High-street, St. Giles's, then as now, rather celebrated for shops where second-hand clothing is sold.

He stopped before one of these houses at the corner of Dudley-street.

It was dark, but yet not dark enough to light the lamps, and this was all the better for Jack, for he by no means wished to be seen.

He stepped inside this shop, and looked out a suit of really beautiful clothes.

They were rather faded and worn, but not particularly so.

They had evidently at one time formed part of the wardrobe of one of the young bloods upon town.

They pleased Jack vastly, and after a good deal of haggling and chaffering, he bought them of the man for about twice as much as they were really worth.

He found upon inquiry that he could change them in a room at the back of the shop, and accordingly retired to do so.

In a little while, for he took great pains with his toilette, he emerged so completely metamorphosed that the man in the shop did not know him.

This pleased Jack vastly, and he liked his new clothes, which became him exceedingly well.

On emerging into the street, he looked up and down uncertain which way to turn.

A crowd of people about halfway down Dudley-street attracted his attention, and he made his way towards it at once, for he was curious respecting it.

Had he been asked, he could have given a tolerable idea of what the crowd was collected for.

[JACK SHEPPARD AGAIN ELUDES JONATHAN WILD.]

It took him but a few minutes to reach it.

In the midst of a mass of ragamuffins of all ages, male and female, was a man with a rather remarkable-looking conical-shaped hat on his head.

This man held up aloft in his right hand a bundle of printed papers, closely printed in smudgy type.

The man was bawling some such words as these—

"Here you are—here you are! A full, true, and particular account—one halfpenny, sir, thank you. Here you have a full, true, and particular account of the life of that notorious housebreaker and highwayman, Jack Sheppard—only one halfpenny each—who was tried at the last Old Bailey Sessions for the murder of his master, John Roots, the carpenter of Wych-street. Only one halfpenny each. You have also a full, true, and particular account of his trial before Justice Powis, and his condemnation to death, together with all particulars, and all for the small charge of one halfpenny—a halfpenny only! You shall read how, after he was placed in the condemned hold along with the other prisoners, and how they passed the time there!

One halfpenny each! One halfpenny each! You shall also read—which is alone worth the money—you shall also read how Jack Sheppard, by the aid of two women, escaped from the prison of Newgate, by breaking off a spike, and crawling through the grating! One halfpenny each, the life, trial, condemnation, and escape, of the notorious highwayman and housebreaker, Jack Sheppard, who is still at large! One halfpenny, sir! Thank you."

Jack, who heard these words, drew nearer to the throng, and at last mingled in it.

The attention of all present was fully absorbed by the man, who continued to speak without intermission.

He could see at the top of the bill a rude cut, representing the manner in which his recent escape had been effected.

The man's wares found a ready market.

They were eagerly bought by those around him.

"It will be a good joke," muttered Jack, half aloud, "it will be a very good joke. I will buy one of those bills myself, and read what it says about me!" "Ha! ha!"

No sooner did this rash and adventurous thought enter his mind, then he drew forth a halfpenny, and stepping up to the man, placed the coin in his hand, and received one of the printed bills in exchange.

"Sold again!" exclaimed the vendor. "Sold again to thin young gentleman in the velvet suit! Sold again!"

Those words had the effect of drawing public attention to Jack in a manner which he found neither desirable nor agreeable.

CHAPTER CXCVI.

RETURNS TO JONATHAN WILD AND RELATES WHAT SUCCESS HE MET WITH IN HIS PURSUIT AFTER BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD.

It will be recollected that after his return from witnessing the execution of Flood and Blewitt, Jonathan Wild had ordered a body of his men to collect together, and had placed himself at their head.

They were every one well mounted, and fully armed.

He led the way up Giltspur-street, for he had made up his mind to track the fugitives like the Red Indians do their prey, and never to rest until he had overtaken and captured them.

He recollected perfectly well which way he had gone on the Saturday evening, and he now went over the same piece of ground, and at tolerable speed, until he reached that spot where he had been wounded.

A savage sort of howl came from his lips, and he glared round about him like some ferocious denizen of the forest.

The great northern road stretched out in front of him so far as his eyes could reach, but there was nothing upon it which indicated the route taken by the fugitives.

He pressed onward for some distance into the open country, until he came to the turning upon the left-hand side of the way which they had taken.

He pulled up here, and his men halted also.

The question entered his mind whether they had turned down there or kept straight on.

There was nothing save chance to enable him to answer the question, and chance did it.

He came to the conclusion that they had diverged from the main path.

Such a proceeding would be natural, because it would offer a chance of escape.

Accordingly, after a few minutes deliberation, he gave the word to his men, and trotted down it.

It was now about mid-day, and the sun was shining high up in the sky, with great brilliancy and power.

All traces of summer had not quite departed, and the scene upon which Jonathan Wild and his men gazed was one of enchanting beauty.

But neither the thief-taker nor his followers were men to appreciate the beauties of nature, no matter how lavishly they might be displayed.

They saw nothing to admire in the gorgeous autumn tints which every hedge and every clump of trees presented; and the twittering of the birds, as they leaped from bough to bough, and the gurgling of a little brook, somewhere close at hand, they passed by unheeded.

But it was in truth a lovely day; such a one as puts new life and vigour into everything, and even Jonathan Wild felt exhilarated, but it was without knowing what had produced the feeling.

Before they had gone far down the lane, the attention of all present was attracted by seeing numberless kites and carrion crows in the air, flapping their wings lazily, as they all settled down in one part.

Jonathan knew what this meant the moment he saw it.

"There is a dead body of some sort close at hand," he said, "that's very clear. Smith, ride forward down the lane, and see what is the other side of yon hedge."

Smith was the name of the man who happened to be riding next to him, and the moment his imperious master spoke he rode off to obey his orders.

A few yards further on he came to a gate, which he pushed open, and entered a field.

Jonathan continued his course at about the same speed as he had all along been going, and arrived at the gate just as the man Smith was coming out again.

"What is it?"

"A dead horse, Mr. Wild."

"A dead horse?"

"Yes; and there's hundreds of birds and insects on it; it's more than half eat away."

"Ah! A horse! Stop a minute, I'll go down and have a look at it."

Wild alighted as he spoke, and left the reins for one of his men to hold.

Passing through the gate, he made his way direct to where Jack and his companions had dragged the horse after it had fallen dead upon the roadway.

As Smith had said, there were hundreds of birds and insects upon it; indeed, it was literally covered with them, and in the distance looked like a large black moving heap; but upon the approach of Wild, the birds rose slowly in the air.

A fearful and horrible spectacle was then presented to Wild's sight.

The flesh had been already half stripped from the bones, and the last rays of the sun caused it to emit a most loathsome smell.

Jonathan turned his eyes away, and scanned the remainder of the meadow.

Almost the first thing he saw was the cart.

He hastened towards it.

But there was very little information to be gleaned by its appearance; still Wild came to the conclusion that the horse and cart he then saw were the same as had served to carry the fugitives.

They might be somewhere close at hand, and in hiding, even now.

At any rate he felt sure that so far he was on the right track.

He turned back into the lane again, and mounted his horse.

"Forward!" he cried, "Forward!" We shall have them at last! I will hunt them down! Forward!"

The troop was quickly in motion, and though they went at a tolerable speed, Jonathan kept an uncommonly sharp look out on both sides of him.

Ere long, however, he saw a cloud of dust on the road before him, which showed that persons were approaching in considerable numbers.

But what sort of people they were, and whether they were mounted or on foot, was more than he could tell, for so dense was the dust, that not even his keen vision could penetrate it.

Soon, however, his ear caught the trampling of horses' hoofs, and as everything that occurred on that road concerned him, as he considered, he called out to his men to halt, and ranged them on one side of the road, in order to see who the new comers were.

They had to wait for a considerable time, for though they were evidently well mounted, yet they came along very slowly.

The dust cleared away as they came nearer, and then Jonathan Wild saw that they were officers of police.

The moment he made this discovery he rode forward to meet them, being anxious to know from them whether they had seen anything of the persons of whom he was in search.

The police-officer who rode first seemed to recognise Jonathan Wild, for he quickened his pace, and was soon by his side.

He touched his hat respectfully. A politic man was that officer, and he knew it was better to be friends with Wild than enemies.

"Good morning, Mr. Wild," he said.

The thief-taker vouchsafed to growl out "good morning" in return, and then he asked—

"Where have you been? What is your business?"

"We have pursued the prisoner who escaped from Newgate."

"Jack Sheppard?"

"Yes."

"And is that your party behind?"

"It is, Mr. Wild."

"And have you got the villain and his accomplices safe in custody?"

"No!"

"No?"

"We tried our best, and thought we should have had them more than once, but they fought like fiends, and succeeded in a most extraordinary manner in getting out of our reach."

"Tell me the particulars."

"With pleasure, Mr. Wild; but would you be good enough to ride forward, sir, and speak to Mr. Lovat, who has the command; he is badly wounded, but you will find him quite conscious, and able to speak to you."

Jonathan hardly waited to hear the end of this speech, but set his horse in motion immediately.

The main body of the officers was now only a short distance in front of him.

He was then able to see why they all came on so slowly.

A few were mounted in front, and each one led a horse by the bridle.

The others were either wounded and being carried on rude and roughly constructed litters, or else they were occupied in carrying them.

Jonathan looked at the scene of slaughter with the utmost surprise, and curiosity was very visibly depicted upon his countenance when he reached them.

Mr. Lovat, as the officer had said, was on one of the litters, which was carried by four men.

These bearers, as they might with propriety be called, were not all officers. Their numbers would have been inadequate; many were labouring people, who had been hired for the purpose.

Mr. Lovat was made aware of Wild's approach, so he ordered the bearers to come to a halt.

He raised himself up then somewhat painfully upon one arm, and looked the thief-taker in the face.

"Well—well, Mr. Lovat," said Wild, with a hideous attempt to be facetious and agreeable. "What's all this been about? You seem as though you had been in a bit of a skirmish."

"Seem!" replied the chief of police, in a voice that was more like a groan than anything else. "Seem, indeed. You mean we have been. Curse Jack Sheppard, and those he had with him!"

"With all my heart," said Wild; "but you do not mean to say that Jack Sheppard, and those two men he had with him, served you all in this fashion?"

"They did; but they must have been leagued with the devil to have done it. Oh! a thousand curses!"

Mr. Lovat fell back on his litter. The pain of his wounds would not allow him to sit up any longer.

Jonathan grinned.

He had no sympathy or feeling for another who was suffering pain. On the contrary, he rather enjoyed their agony than otherwise.

"Keep yourself calm," he said, however; "and tell me what has taken place."

"I will try."

"Are you returning to London?"

"Yes."

"I have just set out, and I have a good body of fresh men with me. Let me know all that has happened. I shall then be better able to act."

"Of course—of course."

"Commence, then. I should have been after the villains long before now, only I received a bullet wound in the head, from which I have not properly recovered; but I shall know no rest until he is once more in my power. Begin—tell me."

Mr. Lovat, in obedience to this command, rather than expressed desire, made Jonathan Wild acquainted with the whole of the exciting and extraordinary incidents which took place in and about the hut in the plantation, and ended where their further progress along the subterranean passage was stopped by a body of water.

CHAPTER CXCVII.

JONATHAN WILD DISCOVERS ONE OF THE DEFENDERS OF THE HUT, BUT NOT THE ONE HE WANTED.

JONATHAN WILD listened to this recital with mingled feelings of anger and admiration.

With all his faults, his follies, and his crimes, he was essentially a brave man, and no one can have perused this history so far without having been made cognizant of the fact.

Such being the case, he could not withhold his admiration of bravery in others, albeit those very persons were those whom he most bitterly hated in all the world.

"But if they went down this underground passage, and so left the hut, how did they pass the water when you were unable to do so?"

"Ah! that is well asked. At first we were quite puzzled, and I knew not what to think; but in the morning, when we came to make an examination of the ground (for we felt sure they were hiding close at hand) we found one part of a very wide and deep brook which flows through the plantation, completely dry."

"Well?"

"It was the keepers who first noticed the circumstance with wonder, and told us how broad, and deep, and swift the brook was. By their suggestion, we pursued our way along its banks, and at last came to where the water was flowing. Do you understand?"

"Not quite, but perhaps I shall presently. Go on."

"The water had been diverted by some means or other from its accustomed channel, and we soon found what that means was."

"What?"

"The subterraneous passage ran underneath the bed of the brook, which formed the ceiling in one part. This ceiling had been broken, and the water allowed to flow through, which it would have a natural tendency to do."

"I understand you now. You mean to say that they all went down into the passage, and then broke through the ceiling and let in the water."

"That is the conclusion we came to."

"But you could find nothing of them?"

"Nothing. We kept the closest possible watch, and searched all around; but quite unavailingly. They had disappeared."

"Very remarkable," cooieided Jonathan, as he let his head fall into the palm of his hand, in an attitude of intense thought.

"It quite baffles me, Mr. Wild. You see I was done for almost at the beginning of the affair, or else, perhaps, things would not be just as they are."

"Probably not. However, Mr. Lovat, you can make your way to London as fast as you like, only leave one of your men as a guide, and I will repair to the plantation, and see what I can find."

"Very well—very well."

"The villains shall not escape me. I have already had no end of trouble with them; but I will fix myself upon their trail, and turn aside for nothing."

"You are a wonderful man, Mr. Wild, and may, perhaps, be able to find out something. I trust you may; for it is quite time the careers of such daring offenders as these are were put to a termination."

"Curse them!" said Wild.

"With all my heart."

"Where is the man I asked for?"

"You can take Smith, Mr. Wild."

"Very good. He will do; I suppose he knows the place?"

"Quite well."

"That is enough, then. I will proceed at once, and when you get back to Newgate, let it be known that I have set out after the criminals, and that I shall quickly capture them."

"I hope you may, Mr. Wild. Good day."

"Good day," replied Jonathan; and then the course of the little procession was resumed.

Wild put himself at the head of his own men, and had Smith by his side.

It was rather more than a mile from that place to the plantation, so they were not of course, long in reaching it. They were obliged to dismount there, and proceed on foot, for no horse could have made its way through the dense mass of vegetation.

Jonathan would first of all see the hut, and examine that, which he did with a minuteness that seemed almost unnecessary.

The manner in which the entrance to the subterraneous passage had been hidden elicited his warmest admiration.

He would have descended and gone upon an exploring expedition, but the water had risen to a level with the aperture, and he was unable to do so.

He was next taken to the brook, which did not now present the appearance ascribed to it by the chief of the police, for the water was flowing onward in its ordinary manner, nor was the channel dry in any part.

The reason of this was the passage beneath had got completely filled with water, and consequently the brook ran on as before.

Through its clear, pellucid waters, however, several breaches in its sandy bottom could be perceived, for when the plugs had been drawn out, the rushing of the impetuous water through the narrow space had made them an enormous size.

With all his cunning and acumen, Jonathan Wild was at fault.

He was more than half inclined to think that the water had rushed in by accident, and that those who were in the passage at the time had perished.

He had, however, no proof of this, and he was very unwilling for this supposition to be confirmed.

He would not have felt satisfied—he would have considered himself balked, cheated of his revenge, if those whom he pursued with so much malevolence had died any other death than that which the hangman would inflict.

Accordingly he endeavoured to banish this idea, and calling to his men, gave them instructions to surround the plantation, and beat up every bush, to make sure that they were lurking nowhere there.

This was a task that occupied some time, but the men set about it in a very systematic manner, and it was very clear that if any one was concealed there they would inevitably be discovered.

For a long time however they had all their trouble for nothing. The only living creatures they disturbed were the legitimate inhabitants of the preserve, who rose in the air and uttered melancholy cries as they were roused from their perches.

Suddenly, however, one body of the men—for they had divided themselves into three portions—made a discovery of importance, if one might judge by the loud cry they set up, and which had the immediate effect of drawing all the others towards them.

Jonathan Wild made a rush to reach the spot.

His janizaries drew back, and allowed him to see a human form.

It was a man, and he was lying extended at full length as though bereft of life.

A glance showed Jonathan that he was unfamiliar with it, and he uttered a yell of disappointment.

But it was Smith who spoke, and what he said served to appease the thief-taker somewhat.

"This is one of those who were in the hut, Mr. Wild."

"Ah! Are you sure?"

"I think so. This, if I mistake not, is the body of the poacher who was first wounded by the keepers, and then took refuge in the hut."

"Is he dead?"

"Not quite, I think."

"Ah! that is well; we shall most likely learn from him what we want to know. It is quite clear he was not drowned by the water in the passage."

"Very clear."

"Raise him up a little, and let us try to extract some information from him. Keep good guard around," he added to his men, "perhaps the others are not far distant."

The janizaries, who had for a minute or two been fully occupied with looking at the poacher, now bestirred themselves, and resumed their search.

The wounded man, in obedience to Jonathan's order, was raised to a sitting posture, and then it could be perceived that he was not quite dead.

He uttered a groan, and there was a convulsive twitching about his eyes as he endeavoured to force them open.

"Hold him still," growled Wild, "and if he has got any life in him we will soon see it. Hold him still."

As he spoke, Wild took from his pocket his everlasting brandy flask, and holding the mouth of it to the man's lips, he poured an immense quantity of it down his throat.

The man gasped and struggled, and seemed upon the point of choking, when he recovered himself and looked around him.

He looked scared and terrified when he saw Wild and his men standing around him, and he made an abortive effort to rise to his feet and fly.

But too firm a hold was kept upon him for any such effort to be successful.

Finding this, and exhausted perhaps by the exertion he had made, he sank into a state of half-unconsciousness.

"Speak," said Wild, "and save your miserable life. Speak, and tell me what has become of the three men who were with you in the hut."

The poacher raised his head, and looked Jonathan in the face.

Then he shuddered, and a gurgling noise made itself heard in his throat.

He was evidently trying to speak.

But his head dropped, and his jaws fell, while his body doubled up into a strange heap.

"Confound him, he's dead!" cried the thief-taker, exasperated at this unexpected event. "Confound him, he's dead! Let us try more brandy."

More brandy was tried; but the fiery spirit had lost its potency.

The man was quite dead, and beyond its revivifying influence.

Jonathan swore in a most awful manner for five minutes, at the end of which time he had exhausted his vocabulary.

He had made sure of hearing something from this man; but he was defeated of his expectation.

But he turned with all the greatest energy to continue his search about the spot.

As the reader knows, his search could only have one result.

Those for whom he so assiduously sought were far away from there.

But Jonathan would not leave until he had thoroughly searched the neighbourhood.

At last, and most reluctantly, he was obliged to turn back towards London without having achieved anything.

Our readers can, without much difficulty, picture his frame of mind, for they have more than once perceived the amiable effect which disappointment had upon his temper.

Woe to the unfortunate individual who crossed his way.

But though he turned towards London, he had by no means given up his search.

CHAPTER CXCVIII.

JACK SHEPPARD MEDITATES UPON HIS POSITION, AND RESOLVES TO SHOW HIS ENEMIES THAT THEY HAVE NOT CRUSHED HIM YET.

JACK SHEPPARD crushed the paper which he had just purchased in an angry manner, and thrust it into his pocket.

He was annoyed to think that attention should be so pointedly directed towards him.

But he had scarcely any one to blame but himself—he had merely purchased for bravado's sake.

Taking no further notice of the idle, gaping throng, he turned round the first corner he came to, and in a moment was out of sight.

He continued walking for some little time, and then found himself in Soho.

This was a quiet quarter of the town, and he looked about him in search of some quiet-looking out-of-the-way public-house, where he could stop until the time came when he had his appointment with his comrade.

He was not long in finding that of which he was in search.

A few paces down the street he saw a projecting sign, but there was not light enough for him to see what was painted upon it.

Nor did he care to know.

The exterior of the place pleased him; it seemed to be just the place he wanted, and he entered.

He walked down the passage to the bar, and asked a girl who was standing there whether he could have a private room for an hour or two.

He was replied to in the affirmative, and, taking a small hand-lamp in her hand, the girl conducted him to a scantily-furnished room upon the first-floor.

Jack was hungry and thirsty, and having no idea what would happen during the next few hours, he determined to make a good meal while he had the opportunity.

He gave his orders accordingly, and a plentiful repast was spread before him, of which he partook heartily.

This over, he turned round to the fire, and bethinking himself of the paper he had purchased, he drew it from his pocket and began to read.

The document was a tolerably good specimen of its class. The top of it was adorned with a rude representation of the manner in which Jack had been drawn between the two spikes.

Then followed a tolerably accurate account of all that had occurred, with such exaggerated embellishments as the public taste craved for, and ended with the string of verses which invariably form an adjunct to such performances.

Jack read it through to the end, and then he dropped the hand that held the paper between his knees.

He gave himself up for the first time to a little serious reflection.

Little by little the whole of his past life was brought before him.

The retrospection was not a pleasant one.

Still, for all that, he pondered deeply over it.

The larger share by far of his thoughts was, however, bestowed upon Edgworth Bess.

He recalled to mind the strange manner in which he had first heard of her, and the still stranger circumstances under which their meeting had taken place.

There needed no one to tell Jack that he passionately loved her. He could feel it—he knew it; he knew as well that his passion was hopeless—that it could never be requited.

There was such a gulf between them that he could never cross.

But though he knew all this, he made not the slightest attempt to quench his love. He felt that so long as his heart beat in his bosom, he should love her.

It was a kind of love rarely indeed met with.

Unselfish love.

All he desired was her welfare and happiness. He felt how glad he would be to lie down and quit this life of turmoil, could he but first see the heiress triumph over her enemies, and be instated in her just possessions.

The more Jack thought, the more sad he grew.

There was a bottle of wine upon the table, and he drank of it repeatedly; but such was his state of mind, that his spirits were in no way cheered thereby.

Indeed it took no more effect upon him than if he had drunk so much water.

There was a half-choked feeling in his breast which rose up every moment in his throat, and which required all his self-control to keep down.

Poor Jack! his indeed had been a sad, sad life, and there was little prospect of its reaching a happy termination.

He could trace all, however, to the evil operations of the arch-fiend, Jonathan Wild.

He had all through been his malignant destiny, and pursued with untiring inveteracy.

To be sure, up to now, Jack had baffled and set at naught all the attempts he had made upon his life and liberty, but every day his position grew more complicated and embarrassing.

His life was forfeit to the laws of his country. He was a felon condemned to death.

He groaned bitterly.

But he cast aside as much as he could all recollection of himself.

He felt that to dwell upon the theme could do no good, and in the end unnerve and unfit him to carry out the plans which he had formed.

He turned the whole of his thoughts to a consideration of the position of Edgworth Bess.

His determination was this.

He would continue his desperate fight against adverse fate until he had seen her safe, and then—then he should be quite ready.

He trusted still to live to accomplish the downfall of Wild. Could he but see that, he felt that he should die with one pang the less.

Whether he will do this the history will unfold. It must be remembered that three determined persons were all working to one end.

Jack Sheppard.

Blueskin.

Steggs.

Jonathan Wild certainly trends upon very dangerous ground.

But he was a man of no common order, and a match generally to all who opposed him.

It will be seen that Jack's reflections all ended in the same place.

If he thought of himself, his heart rose in revenge against the thief-taker.

If he thought of Edgworth Bess, there were her wrongs to be avenged.

Such being the conclusion of his reflections, he dwelt upon it in every possible way.

He taxed his ingenuity to the utmost in the endeavour to decide upon some plan which would procure Wild's annihilation.

And as he thought and pondered upon his revenge, as his multitudinous wrongs rose up palpably before him, his brain grew heated, his blood boiled.

The wine then began to show its effects.

There was a clock in one corner of the room, and Jack glanced up at it.

There were yet two good hours to elapse before his appointment with Blueskin.

"I will play them all a trick," he said. "I will let Jonathan Wild and all the rest of the world know that I am not vanquished yet."

What idea it was which Jack had got into his head the reader will very quickly see.

He rang the bell, and called for pens, ink, and paper.

These materials for writing were placed before him.

"I will write to Mr. Applebee first," he said. "Now to begin!"

Jack was not much of a writer, but he soon set down on paper that which follows, in a hand so plain that no one could misread it.

"Safe out of Newgate.

"Mr. Applebee, printer of dying speeches, in Blackfriars.

"Sir,—I have just purchased one of your papers about my life, trial, and escape from Newgate. I must own I read it with very great interest, and I daresay a good many will do the same, which will answer your purpose and put money in your pocket.

"I write these lines to you in case you should want a second edition. If so, you can put this letter at the foot by the way of a postscript, and I beg to tell you that the person who leaves this at your house is no other than "Your very humble servant,

"JOHN SHEPPARD."

This characteristic epistle needs no comment, and scarcely any explanation.

Mr. Applebee was the name of the man who had printed the bill which Jack had bought in the street, and whose trade chiefly consisted in the production of such documents.

Jack deliberately folded up the letter and sealed it.

"Now for Mr. Noakes," he said. "He shall be favoured."

He then wrote as follows:—

"Mr. Noakes.

"Sir,—I trust you won't be offended with me for leaving your mansion without bidding you good-bye. I was very loath to do it, but circumstances compelled me. I shall be much grieved, too, if you get into any trouble on my account.

"I write these few lines to say that I am safe and well, but not very rich, and cannot afford to pay the postage of this letter, so I will call and leave it at the lodge-gate myself, and ask the man on the lock to deliver the same to you with all speed.

"Give my compliments to Mr. Jonathan Wild, and tell him from me that I live in hopes of seeing him tucked up at Tyburn some fine morning.

"From your very humble servant,

"JOHN SHEPPARD."

Jack laughed when he finished this letter, but having done so, he folded it up, and addressed it to the governor of the prison.

"This will astonish them, I take it," he said. "It will show them that I am not at all down-hearted. Let me see, there will be a tolerable reward for me now. How mad they will both be when they find how near they were to earning it. Ha! ha! I am off now. I will deliver these letters at once."

He slipped them into his pocket as he spoke and called for the girl.

Then, having paid his reckoning, he put on his hat, and set out upon his perilous and, we think, foolhardy errand.

CHAPTER CXCIK.

JACK SHEPPARD KNOCKS AT THE DOOR OF NEWGATE, AND DELIVERS THE LETTER TO THE MAN ON THE LOCK.

TERRIBLE and spirit-crushing as were the numerous incidents in Jack's life, that which we have just recorded will serve to show that they had not succeeded in wholly extinguishing that love of fun, frolic, and bravado which, in happier days, had formed a distinguishing feature in his composition.

We think the letters themselves quite sufficient to make the reader understand what he intended to do.

No good could possibly come of it.

He was exposing himself to an unnecessary risk, and his enemies would be still more exasperated with him.

But he determined to show his pluck, as he called it.

He walked with a hasty and confident step in the direction of Mr. Applebee's, the printer.

The hour was late, and few people were abroad.

A steady, persevering, uncomfortable rain, too, was falling, and had been falling for a long time, and it was this that had in a great measure tended to clean the street of people.

Jack himself soon found this inconvenient; and a hackney-coach happening to come by, he hailed it, and directed the coachman to drive him to Blackfriars-bridge.

Upon reaching this place, which they did without the occurrence of any particular incident, Jack alighted, and having paid his fare, walked the remainder of the distance.

The printer's address had been given in full at the foot of the bill he had purchased; and as the locality was well known to him, he found it easily enough.

It was a poor tumble-down looking tenement in a back street, and from its windows there came but one solitary ray of light.

There was a knocker on the door and a bell-handle on the door-post, so Jack applied himself to both means of summoning admission, and made the quiet street echo and ring again.

The appeal was answered in a little while by a man who had on over his clothing a white apron.

"What the devil do you want?"

To this polite interrogation, Jack replied—

"Is this Mr. Applebee?"

"Which Mr. Applebee do you want?"

"The one that prints the dying speeches."

"That is my name," said the man at the door.

"You are Mr. Applebee himself?"

"I am."

"That's all right then."

"What's all right?"

"I have got a letter for you."

"Who from?"

"Stop a minute."

Jack felt in his pocket and produced the letter.

"There it is," he said; "there is no answer."

As he spoke these words, he placed the letter in the hands of Mr. Applebee, and darted off into the darkness in a moment, and was out of sight before the printer had time to break the seal.

He did not run far, because of the fear he had of attracting attention by so doing.

"That is done," he said. "I wonder what he thinks of it. I have lost half of the fun now. I should have liked to have seen him when he found it all out. However, I must be content. Now, here goes for Mr. Noakes."

The distance to Newgate was not very great, so he preferred to walk.

In a little while the gloomy walls of the huge prison appeared before him.

An uncomfortable sensation swept over him when he first caught sight of it, but he quickly banished the feeling.

He had the letter in his grasp, so running up the little flight of stone steps before the wicket door leading into the lodge of Newgate, he knocked loudly at it.

The man on the lock dashed aside the piece of wood which covered the circular grating, and asked what was wanted.

"A letter for the governor," said Jack.

There was something in his voice which sounded familiar to the janitor, and he peered cautiously through the bars, but the night was too dark for him to distinguish Jack's features.

Nor did Sheppard wait for any lengthened scrutiny.

He pushed the letter between the grated aperture, and said—

"Give that to Mr. Noakes—there's no answer."

He ran down the steps as he spoke; but the man on the lock, whose suspicions were aroused, dashed open the door, while he called out to one of his comrades who was sitting in the vestibule—

"Ned—Ned! follow that chap that's just brought the letter. Hang me if I don't believe it was Jack Sheppard."

"Oh! gammon."

"Make haste. Run after him and catch him. If I am right, it will be a good thing for us, and if I am wrong it don't much matter."

Ned seemed to see the force of this reasoning, for he darted down the steps in pursuit of Sheppard.

But Jack was nowhere within sight or hearing. He had crossed the street, and hurried down one of the numerous courts that abound there.

As he did so, he heard St. Paul's clock chime a quarter to eleven.

He would have to make haste to keep his appointment with Blueskin at King Charles's statue at eleven.

Finding the streets now completely deserted, he went at a run, which soon enabled him to get over the ground.

If anything, the night changed for the worse.

The rain came down more heavily.

Jack was already soaked to the skin.

In spite of the great speed he made, however, he did not reach Charing-cross until some few minutes past the hour agreed upon.

He approached the large open space cautiously, and glanced all around him, to see whether any of his foes were lurking about.

But all seemed clear, so he crossed over, making his way direct for the statue, though such was the murkiness of the night, he could not see it until he was close to it.

There was no one there, apparently; but having pronounced the word Blue, in a low tone of voice, it was instantly responded to by the appearance of Blueskin.

He had been standing in the shadow of the stonework a few paces off.

"You are late, Jack."

"I know it; but I could not get here sooner."

"All right—a few minutes are of no importance."

"Are we quite safe here?"

"I think so."

"I looked round me carefully before I drew near."

"So did I."

"I saw no one."

"Nor I."

"I think we may venture upon saying we have the place all to ourselves, and Blue, tell me—do not keep me in suspense a moment—have you heard anything of—of Edgworth Bess?"

"Yes."

"What?"

"Be calm, and not impatient."

"I can, while anything else is spoken of. Your best course will be to tell me all you know at once."

"I saw Steggs, then. Jonathan Wild is from home, or was from home when I saw him. He had set out at the head of twenty men in pursuit of us."

"Ha!"

"Steggs took the opportunity to slip out, and I was fortunate enough to see him. Do you know the position Steggs occupies in Wild's household?"

"Not precisely. You have had no opportunity of explaining things fully."

"No more I have. Well, then, you may take this for granted—we have not a better friend, nor Edgworth Bess a more devoted adherent than her old enemy, Steggs."

"You told me that before, but I mistrust the man."

"I think you hardly just. However, we met together, and decided to accomplish Wild's destruction. We were both to unite and work to that end, exclusively of all others. Steggs made a proposal of a more daring nature than I could have given him credit for. It was to disguise himself, and seek employment of Jonathan—to pretend to be his most faithful servant—to worm himself into all his secrets—and in the end to destroy him.”

“A capital, but most dangerous plan.”

“Those were my own words, but he was bent upon it, and as no one else but himself would be involved in the consequences, I could not well say nay. He went, saw Jonathan, and, strange to relate, was engaged at once.”

“That is very strange indeed. I gave Jonathan credit for more penetration than to allow himself to be imposed upon like that.”

“But you must take into consideration the powers of dissimulation which Steggs possesses.”

“And so must you and I, Blueskin, to see that he does not act treacherous to us.”

“I do not think there is much fear! His heart is filled with desire to be revenged upon Wild and Lord Donnull, our two greatest enemies, and you know what a powerful motive that is.”

“I do; and yet sometimes gold will purchase it!”

“That I will not deny, Jack; but let me continue.”

“Go on.”

“Jonathan fell into the trap! All this happened during your imprisonment. On the morning of the trial, Jonathan, of course, was present in the court.”

“I saw him.”

“To be sure you did! Well, that was the first chance Steggs had of exploring the upper part of Wild’s house. He knew that Edgworth Bess was a prisoner up stairs, so he crept up carefully, with the intention of speaking to her if possible, and telling her that she had a friend close at hand.

“He wished to make no more noise than possible, for he did not know who might be upstairs. When he got to the second landing he heard a door open, and crouched down in a dark corner to listen, and terrified to death lest it should be some one about to descend. His fears were, however, groundless. It was Jonathan’s mistress, Mary Milliner: she was muttering to herself, but Steggs could not catch the purport of her words. He saw, though, that she held a long, bright knife in her hand.”

“A knife?”

“Listen! She approached a door, which she opened with a skeleton key. Then she passed through it. Steggs followed on tiptoe. You can guess the intention of Mary Milliner. It was to murder Edgworth Bess, of whom she was jealous! But Steggs was just in time to prevent her. He dashed in, and seized her wrist just as it was about to descend. He was not strong enough to prevent the blow, but he averted it, and the knife was buried to the hilt in the clothing of the bed, leaving Edgworth Bess terrified, but unhurt!”

CHAPTER CC.

BLUESKIN MAKES A VERY TEMPTING PROPOSAL TO JACK SHEPPARD.

“Good heavens!” exclaimed Jack, wrought up to the highest pitch of excitement by this narration; “can a woman have attempted such an atrocity?”

“She attempted it, and had it not but have been for the presence of Steggs she would have consummated her purpose. When she saw him she turned round and attacked him like a maniac. Steggs felt that he was no match for her—that she was stronger than he was. Anxious to end the struggle, then, and exasperated with her for her attempt, he took the knife and stabbed her to the heart.”

“This is wonderful,” ejaculated Jack. “Thank heaven, the poor girl escaped that peril.”

Jack was much affected when he thought of the great danger from which the heiress had so providentially escaped.

“But come,” said Blueskin, “I have much to tell you, and as it is so wet a night we shall get soaked to the skin if we stay here. I think I know a safe place close at hand upon the river side. Let us adjourn there.”

“If you think it will be safe.”

“I’ll warrant that.”

“Let us go, then, for I am cold to the very bone. We shall have to decide upon the future.”

“True.”

“Continue your narration while we walk.”

“I intended to do so, but we shall reach our destination in a few moments.”

Blueskin struck across the large open space as he spoke, with Sheppard close at his side, who related to him the whole of the strange events that had taken place at Jonathan Wild’s house.

Jack was filled with wonder and astonishment at the strange concatenation of events which had led to the thief-taker selecting Steggs as a kind of confidant, and placing him (Steggs) where he most wished to be.

“I have seen Steggs since we parted, Jack,” continued Blueskin. “I have already hinted as much.”

“What did he say?”

“Edgworth Bess had heard of your escape from Newgate with unfeigned pleasure, and trusted that you would succeed in getting to a place of ultimate safety.”

“Did she—did she believe me innocent?”

“She did. When Steggs told her of the crime of which you were accused, she expressed, in the strongest terms, her conviction that you were not guilty.”

“Thank heaven for that.”

“Hush! Here we are at the place of which I spoke.”

They halted before a dim gloomy-looking building as Blueskin spoke.

Sounds of boisterous revelry came from its interior.

“Take hold of my arm, Jack, and we will enter. That is it.”

He ascended a couple of steps, and knocked in a peculiar fashion at the door.

It was opened in obedience to the summons, and Blueskin uttered some kind of password to the man in a low tone of voice, and the pair were admitted.

The place which the two comrades now entered was one of those establishments designated by the fraternity who frequented them, a “ken.”

The man who admitted them closed the door immediately.

They were then standing in the passage, but it was so intensely dark that nothing whatever was visible.

Blueskin, however, was one of those who had been initiated into the mysteries of the place; so he walked forward for several yards with a confident step, and then he said—

“Stairs, Jack. Take care how you descend.”

The caution was given just in time.

They were at the top of a steep flight of stairs.

Descending these, they were addressed in a gruff voice by an invisible personage as soon as they reached the bottom.

Blueskin replied, and then a door was opened through which they passed, and then a singular scene was presented to Jack’s notice.

Before him was a long and not very well lighted room, at one end of which the door was placed upon the threshold of which he stood.

This room was filled with a motley company, seated round tables upon miscellaneous articles which were not at all suitable for seats.

Some thirty or forty were present, mostly of the male sex, though here and there a woman could be seen.

All, without a single exception, were engaged in talking, smoking, and drinking, and such a hubbub arose from them as to be quite deafening to the ears until they became accustomed to the din.

Blueskin did not give Jack much time, however, to contemplate this scene, for he led the way across the apartment—if such a word could be applied to such a place—to the obscurest corner, where they sat down.

For a few moments Jack could not listen to anything, until he had satisfied himself by looking curiously around him.

Blueskin, however, touched him on the arm, and said—

“Do not seem too much surprised at what you see here, or you will draw suspicion upon us. Attend to what I have to tell you.”

“Begin.”

“Directly.”

A man approached them.

He was the waiter for the establishment.

Blueskin ordered brandy and water for both.

They were quickly served.

Every moment saw some fresh arrival at the place.

Blueskin was known by many there, but he did not wish to be recognised, so he turned away his head, and drew his hat down over his face.

He bid Jack do the same, and they resumed their conversation in a tone of voice very little above a whisper.

"Steggs told me that Edgworth Bess was very much better, and more contented with her lot. He still remained outside her door as a kind of guard. He thinks Jonathan Wild intends no harm to her at present. Indeed, he is so much occupied with your affair that he has no time for anything else!"

"But what are we to do with her, Blue? It will never do to leave her where she is. Besides, it is quite time we did something for her. Think what a time the business has been under hand, and we are no more advanced than we were at first."

"I grant that; but, then, think of the tremendous difficulties we have had to contend with."

"I know we have, but we ought to see to it at once now."

"Yes, I have been thinking of it. You must understand that Edgworth Bess is under age, and that she cannot enter upon possession of her estates until she has obtained her majority."

"I have heard something of that."

"Jonathan's policy is at once simple and atrocious. Lord Donnull is wholly in his power. He can do with him what he likes—annihilate him in fact. He keeps him now just to answer his own purposes. Edgworth Bess he keeps a prisoner. So soon as she is of age, which cannot be many months' hence, she will be responsible for her own actions."

"Well?"

"Then he will force her into a marriage with him, and, by virtue of that marriage, obtain possession of the estates."

"The monstrous villain!"

"It is an awful and abhorrent idea; but while I live he will never carry it out. Now look here."

"What?"

"It appears to me that we cannot do better than set about first of all releasing Bess from her place of confinement."

"I shall agree to that, for I shall know no rest until she is free."

"But you must think what you must do after you get her at liberty."

"Ah! there is that."

"Neither you nor her will be safe in England."

"True."

"Jonathan Wild would discover you sooner or later, and then things would resume their old aspect, only there would be all the less chance of putting them right."

"I am quite aware of that, and I can tell, too, that you have some plan in your mind. Let me know it."

"Willingly. I will submit it to your approval."

"Speak on. I am full of curiosity and anxiety to hear."

"It is this. Suppose we set Bess at liberty, and then for you to fly from England with her to some foreign country, and remain there until she should come of age."

"I see."

"Then let her return. She will not have much trouble to gain her rights. When she is properly acknowledged, she will have great influence, and if she uses it, will doubtless be able to procure your pardon."

Jack's eyes glistened as he heard these words.

His heart swelled, and renewed hope animated his frame. Those few words seemed to give him a new lease of life.

Bright visions—visions, alas! never to be realized, flitted through his mind.

He felt courage and strength to go forth single-handed, and meet all his enemies and vanquish them.

"You approve of the plan, then?" asked Blueskin.

"Approve of it?" iterated Jack. "How can I do otherwise? Oh! that is indeed a glorious plan. Do you really think that it can be realized?"

"I do. There is only one thing stands in the way."

"What is it?"

"An obstacle than can be overcome."

"I breathe again."

"It is this. What we have planned cannot be carried out without money—and money, too, in no inconsiderable quantity. I need not tell you that neither of us possess it."

"I had forgotten that," said Jack. "That is indeed an obstacle. How is to be overcome?"

"That requires some consideration."

"Have you considered of it?"

"I have."

"And what is the result?"

"First, tell me whether you see the necessity of having it."

"I do fully."

"And can you see as well how useless it will be for us to achieve her freedom without we have the money in hand to carry out the enterprise?"

"I do, indeed."

"That is well, then. I wanted to impress those two things deeply on your mind."

"Why?"

"You shall know presently. Can you tell how the money could be quickest and best obtained?"

"No—no."

"Then I will tell you, and I shall try your mettle. The king's highways are open to you. Levy a toll upon all passengers. There is room now for a brave, daring knight of the road, who, with his faithful steed, will take up his position and boldly cry, 'Stand and deliver!' to whoever he might meet."

CHAPTER CCL.

JONATHAN WILD ATTACKS THE "KEN" UPON THE RIVER'S SIDE, AND JACK SHEPPARD HAS A NARROW ESCAPE OF DEATH AND CAPTURE.

THERE was a brief interval of silence after Blueskin spoke.

The words he uttered sank deeply into Jack's mind, and made a deep impression upon it.

There was something tempting and inviting in the proposal. Jack was no stranger to the wild delights of a life on the road, and he thoroughly enjoyed them.

The plan seemed a feasible one, and surely no other could be found which would be so likely to insure success.

Blueskin did not break in upon his meditations, but allowed him full time to reflect.

At length Jack looked up with a composed countenance, and then he addressed himself to him.

"What is your decision, Jack, now that you have weighed it over in your mind? Does it meet with your approbation?"

"It does, for I can think of no other."

"Give me your hand, then. Believe me to-day I have thought deeply of all this, and I am glad to find that you agree with the conclusions I have come to."

"I do, but think of the risk. The Knight of the Road perils his existence at every moment."

"And is not yours already forfeit?"

"Ah! yes, I had forgotten that."

"I thought so. Come, Jack, take a bold heart. Rely upon it, if you think for a month, you will not be able to find anything better."

"But how long will it take me to get the sum of money I require?"

"That depends upon your luck. Perhaps a week or two only."

"A week or two?"

"Yes; does that appear so very long that you utter the words in such a tone?"

"No, no; but Bess."

"She will be safe. Steggs will guard her from Wild; and should any change in his tactics take place, I shall know it at once, for he knows where he can find me at any moment."

Jack seemed only half satisfied.

He would have liked to have seen Bess free from Wild's clutches at first, and then he could have gone to work with better spirit.

But that was not to be thought of.

His ruminations, however, met with a sudden and violent interruption.

There was a crashing sound—the war of many voices.

A shrill whistle was sounded.

Every one within the apartment rose to his feet, and a scene of the greatest confusion ensued.

"The redbreasts are upon us! Fly—fly!"

[JONATHAN WILD HAS A CONFIDENTIAL INTERVIEW WITH LORD DONMULL.]

These words were uttered by some one near Jack, and he next moment the light which illumined the place was extinguished.

The darkness was that of the grave.

Blueskin caught Jack by the arm.

"The officers!" he said.

"What are they doing here?"

"I know not; but they have made an attack upon the place."

"Have you ever heard of such a thing before?"

"Oh! yes; when they have had any idea that a person of any importance was here."

"What do you mean?"

"A person whose capture was desired, or for whom a large reward was offered."

"And they are here now!"

"Yes."

"Is it Wild?"

"I have no idea."

"Do you think we can have been tracked here?"

"I know no better than yourself."

"There is a general move. What is to be done?"

"Keep still a moment!"

"I will not move."

"Pray do not; or, in this darkness, if you were once to get separated from me, I should never find you again. Do not be impatient. Every impediment possible will be thrown in the way of those who wish to enter, and if the worst comes to the worst we shall have to fight for it."

"Can we not leave this place?"

"We could leave the apartment which we are now in, but the house is doubtless well surrounded at every point so that there would be no getting away."

"But we must not stay here and be captured."

"Certainly not. Hark! Do you hear that?"

From somewhere outside they heard a man speak in a loud tone.

There was no mistaking the voice.

It was Jonathan Wild.

"There are two here," he said, "to-right. Give them up, and I will not trouble the rest, but depart at once with them. They are Jack Sheppard and Blueskin. They have been watched here, and the place is surrounded, so that they cannot escape. Give them up, and the rest of you may go free."

A momentary silence followed this speech, and then a voice cried—

"Down with Jonathan Wild! Down with him! Who can trust Jonathan Wild? Down with him! You are here in strong force to-night, my lads. Down with him, I say! Down with him; and as for giving up Jack Sheppard, that would be a shame."

"Down with him!" repeated at least fifty voices. "Hurrah! Down with him! Hurrah for Jack Sheppard, the prince of housebreakers! Hurrah!"

"You heard that?" he said.

"Yes."

"It is all right. Jonathan won't take us in a hurry. He will have to fight well."

"But cannot we leave this place? I am impatient to begone."

"Quietly. Follow me."

Still keeping his grasp upon Jack's arm, Blueskin made his way across the underground apartment.

From the other end, however, there came a bright flash of light.

Jack turned back to look.

Jonathan Wild, with a body of his men at his back, nearly every one of whom carried torches in their left hands, stood upon the threshold.

Their appearance was greeted with a yell from the throats of the members of the "family," and, armed with such weapons as they could conveniently lay their hands upon, they rushed forward and attacked Wild.

Of all that large and disorderly assemblage, there probably was not one who had not a personal feeling against the thief-taker.

He was their individual and collected enemy.

With respect to Jack Sheppard, there was not one of the lawless crew who did not regard him with feelings of the utmost admiration.

That he should triumph over Jonathan as he did, gave them unbounded pleasure.

And, then, to think that he should have twice performed the unparalleled feat of breaking out of Newgate, made them look upon him as some one quite out of the common way.

If he was there amongst them—and they had little doubt about the correctness of Wild's information—they made up their minds he should not be taken prisoner without a desperate struggle upon their part to prevent it.

In this place we may as well relate how it was that Wild came to know the precise whereabouts of our two friends.

We left him last, after his bootless search in the plantation, on his way back to London, having come to the conclusion that in the great city was the most likely place to find them.

Jonathan Wild very well knew he had in his house a species of loadstone, which would prevent Jack from going very far away from it for any length of time.

That loadstone was Edgworth Bess.

And so, calculating upon the affection of his victim, he turned towards London.

Patience, he thought, and then Jack would walk into his hands.

Without the occurrence of any incident, he reached London.

But when he drew up to the door of his own house in Newgate-street it was quite dark, being between nine and ten o'clock at night.

He dismounted quickly, and left his steed for his men to take care of.

Then, as if struck with a sudden thought, he did not enter his own house, but turned round the corner into the Old Bailey.

He paused before the lodge gate.

As he went up the little stone steps which led to it, and as he knocked at the door, he could tell that something of an extraordinary character was taking place within.

He peered through the iron spikes above the door, and knocked again—for his first summons was taken no notice of at all.

He roared out at the same time to the man on the lock.

The door was opened directly it was seen who sought for admission.

"What's the matter?" growled the thief-taker. "What's the matter?"

Mr. Noakes came forward.

He held a letter in his hand.

"Would you believe it?" he said.

"Believe what?"

Mr. Noakes made no reply.

He simply handed the letter to Wild.

The thief-taker read it from beginning to end without a word.

He could not believe that what he saw was real.

He read a second time; and then, when he found there could be no sort of doubt about the reality of what he saw, he burst out into some most remarkable curses, which even had the effect of astonishing all the turnkeys.

"Ten thousand devils!" he cried. "How long have you had this letter?"

"Not ten thousand seconds!" said the governor.

"Curses upon my delay! I should have been here sooner. Do you think this young devil's imp really brought the letter, or is it a trick of his?"

"Goggs here, who was upon the lock, is quite sure of it. He knew him in a moment, and sent Ned after him, but there was no signs of him to be seen."

"And yet he walked under your very noses. Curse him! I can't help admiring him for his courage, but he hasn't got far off, I'll wager; and I will have him back in his cell before morning."

"I only hope you will," said Mr. Noakes.

CHAPTER CCII.

JONATHAN WILD REACHES THE LODGE OF NEWGATE ABOUT FIVE MINUTES TOO LATE.

JONATHAN WILD ran down the steps into the Old Bailey.

He swore awfully all the while, and, had he worn his own hair instead of a wig, he would doubtless have torn it off by handfuls, and cast it down at his feet in the extremity of his rage.

So little time had been occupied in his visit to the prison, that the men he had left at his door, though they had dismounted, had not dispersed, but were standing in the street in a body, with their bridles in their hands.

"Mount!" he cried, as soon as he saw them. "Mount, curse you! and follow me. Jack Sheppard is here under our noses!"

Upon hearing this announcement, the men, who had been offered a good round sum each for securing Jack, scrambled into their saddles with great alacrity.

Jonathan Wild did the same, and putting themselves at their head, he trotted down the Old Bailey.

But though both he and his gang cast their eyes right and left as they passed down the thoroughfare, they could not see any signs of the person they so much wished for.

In a few minutes they emerged on to Ludgate-hill, then a much more steep and dangerous descent than it is now.

The fine rain which had been falling so steadily all the evening, had made the hill very slippery indeed, and such was the dangerous condition it was in, that Jonathan had to rein in his steed, and proceed down it at a walking pace.

Just before he reached what is now Farringdon-street, but which was then Fleet Market, his attention was attracted by a man who was running on the pavement.

This man, whoever he was, no sooner saw Wild than he changed his course, and ran straight to him.

Jonathan drew a pistol, for he did not know whether this new comer was friend or foe, but he judged it was more likely to be the latter than the former.

"Mr. Wild, Mr. Wild! Is that you? Is that you, Mr. Wild?"

"What if it is?" growled Jonathan.

"I know it is; I can tell your voice. How lucky I have met with you."

"What is it?"

"Don't you know me?"

"No."

"Stevens, Stevens; I'm Stevens."

"All right," said Jonathan.

He restored the pistol to his pocket.

Stevens was one of the men in the regular police force who were friendly to Wild.

The importance of having men of this description is obvious.

They put Jonathan on the track of many things which he would have known nothing about.

"What is the news?" asked Jonathan. "Anything important?"

"Yes."

"Is it about Jack Sheppard?"

"Yes."

"Then you shall be rewarded amply. I am now in search of him. Have you seen him?"

"Not a quarter of an hour since."

"Where, where?"

"And Blueskin with him."

"Ah!"

"I did, Mr. Wild, and so I ran off to find you."

"Where did you see them?"

"At Charing-cross."

"At Charing-cross?"

"Yes."

"Go on, and be quick."

"I will, Mr. Wild."

"Tell me all, that I may know how to act."

"I was standing close to the railings of King Charles's statue, sheltering myself, as well as I could, from the rain, when I saw some one cross the open space and stand in the shadow of the statue."

"Go on, go on."

"I thought in a moment that it was an appointment of some kind, so I did not move an inch, but screened myself as close to the railings as I possibly could."

"Make haste."

"You said I was to tell you all, Mr. Wild."

"I know I did."

"I waited and listened, and presently I saw another figure come across the square, and I could have taken my davy that was Jack Sheppard."

"However, I did not move, and up he came to the statue railings, and the one that had got there first stepped forward and spoke to the second. I could not tell what the words were, because he spoke in a very low tone of voice, but I could tell by the tones who it was. It was Blueskin."

"Make haste."

"You needn't trouble, Mr. Wild, they are quite safe. However, I'll tell you more. I stopped quite still, for I thought if I moved they would take the alarm and be off; so I listened. They came back to the statue, and stood talking for a good while."

"And could you hear then what they said?"

"No, only a word here and there."

"And what were those words?"

"I can't recollect, Mr. Wild."

"Not recollect?"

"No. It was only a word here and a word there that I heard, and they didn't make no sense at all."

"Oh!"

"However, I kept quite still, determined not to move an inch till I had housed them. As it happened, I had not long to wait. One took hold of the other by the arm, and straight across the square they went, in the direction of Northumberland House."

"You followed."

"Of course I did. I never let them be out of my sight one moment, Mr. Wild. They went past Northumberland House, and turned down one of the streets leading to the river. I followed them still, but more cautiously than before, because the street was empty, and there was consequently all the more danger of their hearing me."

"What next?"

"At the bottom of this street, and built quite upon the river's side, is a thieves' ken, which I am sure, Mr. Wild, you must know very well."

"I do. Are they there?"

"Yes, they are inside. I watched them go in."

"But, while we have been talking here they may have left."

"I hardly think so, Mr. Wild. If they have, it don't matter."

"Why not?"

"I know a man who lives in the street, so I went to him, and got him to stand in front of the door and watch whether they came out, and if they did, to follow them wherever they went, and on no account to lose sight of them."

"Very good, Stevens. You have acted most sensibly throughout this matter. You shall have an ample reward if you will come to my house in the morning."

"Shall I go with you now, Mr. Wild? I can show you the way."

"And you can speak to the man you have left on the watch."

"To be sure I can, sir."

"Then get up behind one of my men, and now, quick—forward!"

At the word the little troop put itself in motion.

Across Fleet Market—up the ascent of Fleet-street—and under Temple-bar they went.

Upon reaching the narrow turning by the side of Northumberland House, which led down to the river, the men, by Wild's orders, dismounted from their steeds.

Two were left in charge of them, and the remainder, headed by the thief-taker and Stevens, proceeded stealthily down it.

"That is the ken," said Stevens, presently, as he pointed to a faint light in the distance.

"Where is your man?"

"A little further on. I told him to keep out of sight. I dare say he is in one of the doorways."

The houses in this little narrow street were very ancient structures, and furnished with very curious porches over the doorways.

In old-fashioned country-towns others of a similar fashion may still be seen, like little houses projecting out, with a seat on each side.

Better hiding-places than these could not be wished, and, as Stevens had foretold, upon passing one of these he found his man.

Upon inquiry, he found that no two persons answering to the description of Jack and Blueskin had emerged from the ken.

So far, then, all promised well.

Jonathan Wild's next proceeding was to carefully surround the ken upon the three sides, where it was practicable, with his men.

The fourth side overlooked the river which was now almost at full tide.

It was not possible to post his men there.

Having taken all these precautions, the thief-taker proceeded to commence his attack upon the ken.

He knocked in the manner of the initiated, and the door was opened.

Then in a moment his men rushed in, overcoming all the resistance which the man who guarded the door could offer them.

The interior of the ken was well known to Wild.

It was about as celebrated a one as any in London, and he had made visits there before to-night.

He heard the alarm sounded.

His men were provided with torches, which they lighted, then drawing their swords, they hurried forward.

We have previously set down the temporizing speech which Wild made to the inmates of the ken when he requested them to give up the two persons of whom they were in search.

We know, also, how the speech was responded to by those members of the "Family" who were present, and having brought our narrative down to this point, and accounted for Wild's presence, which at first seemed rather remarkable, we will resume.

Finding that the only hope he had of obtaining his prisoners was by taking them at the sword's point, Jonathan waved his banger round his head, and uttering a shout which was echoed by the men behind him, he sprang forward, and headed the attack.

But in return he was attacked with cool determination, and he found that he should have far more trouble than he had at first expected.

The "Family" was for the most part composed of strong and desperate men, well skilled in the use of warlike weapons.

Jonathan's janizaries were a long time making an impression on them.

But we will follow Blueskin and Jack Sheppard.

It will be remembered that the former had caught hold of the latter and led him across the vault, when Wild effected his entrance.

CHAPTER CCIII.

BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD ESCAPE JONATHAN WILD BY A HAIR'S BREADTH.

"NEVER heed him," said Blueskin, when Jack called his attention to their old enemy, and turned round. "This way; follow me quickly."

Jack obeyed; for of course he wished to save his life, if such a thing was possible.

Blueskin led him to a small closed door.

There were no fastenings to it visible, but Blueskin pressed upon it in a peculiar manner with his thumb, and it flew open.

They passed through instantly, and shut the door behind them.

They were now in absolute darkness; they had not even the torches which Jonathan's men carried to aid them.

"Put your hand against the wall, Jack," said Blueskin. "We are in a passage. Step forward carefully, for we shall come to some stairs presently."

"Going up or down?" asked Jack.

"Up."

"Should we be safe, do you think, without going any further?"

"No; Jonathan will be almost sure to find us."

"I can't hear much noise now."

"Nor can I."

The sound of the fighting, which had before sounded very plainly in their ears, now almost ceased.

"What do you make of that, Blue?"

"I don't know."

"Perhaps Jonathan has changed his tactics."

"Likely enough."

"Ah! stop!"

"The stairs!"

"Yes."

"All right. Go up."

"How many?"

"Thirteen."

In the most profound darkness our friends ascended a flight of thirteen stone steps, which, either from the moisture of the contiguous river, or some other cause, were dangerously slippery with damp.

The top was, however, reached in safety, and here Blueskin paused a minute or two to listen.

But all was comparatively still. There was fighting going on somewhere, but it seemed to be below them.

"Where now?" asked Jack.

"There is a door here. Ah! we must be quick. Jonathan is upon us quicker than I thought he would be."

There was a war of voices and a crushing sound.

The door at the bottom of the steps, which fastened with a secret spring, was broken down.

Jonathan Wild was the first to dash through the opening.

He held a torch in his left hand, and the hanger, which he carried in the other, was dripping with blood.

He saw the stairs, and his eye travelled up them with the rapidity of thought.

He caught sight of two dusky figures at the top.

To do this—drop his hanger, draw a pistol from his belt, aim it and pull the trigger, were events that succeeded each other so quickly that no appreciable interval of time intervened between the first and the last.

The report of the pistol, which was of enormous size, sounded intensely loud in that confined space.

Wild did not wait to see what effect his shot had taken.

Mingling with the last reverberation of the explosion they heard his voice, crying—

"Follow! Follow! Up the steps! Quick! Quick! We shall have them yet!"

A small portion of Jonathan's band, who had succeeded in forcing a passage across the vault, where the others were still struggling, obeyed his commands, and darted up the slippery steps after him.

When our friends saw their invincible enemy so close upon their track, Blueskin opened a door, and, as soon as he and his companion had passed through, secured it as well as he was able.

They found themselves in a long passage.

"Here my knowledge of the place ends," said Blueskin, "and which way I am to turn I really do not know, and as there is no one here of whom we can inquire, we must trust to our luck, and rely upon that to guide us. If Jonathan was not so close behind us, we should be able to make an examination of the place, and see what had best be done. But it is no good to think about that now."

"Quite waste of time," said Jack. "Surely I must be bullet-proof, for that was the nearest touch I ever had. Look here!"

Jack pointed to a scratch along his left temple, from which the blood was slowly oozing.

One-eighth of an inch more and the wound would have been fatal.

"I did not know you were hit, Jack."

"Oh! it's nothing. Rather a close shave, that is all."

"Rather too close to be pleasant. Confound him, there he is at the other door! That will be down in a moment!"

While speaking, our friends had made their way hastily along the corridor in a right-hand direction, but when Blueskin spoke, Jonathan had reached the door which they had fastened, and struck it such a succession of heavy and violent blows, that its demolition was threatened every moment.

Then the end of the passage was reached.

There was no outlet to it.

On the left-hand side, however, there was a half-open door, which led into a room.

This offered them at least a chance of escape, so they rushed in.

Fortunately it was vacant.

Then Jonathan and his men burst into the passage.

The thief-taker was just in time to see the shadow of their forms pass through the doorway, and he was on their track at once.

Perspiration started from every pore in his body, and down his face and neck it ran in tiny streams.

Occasionally he would dash his hand across his eyes as he found the falling drops obscured his vision, but that was all the heed he paid to it.

Blueskin's first act when he entered the room was to lock the door.

A lock was the only fastening it had, and that was a very crackly affair.

The key was in it, however, and he turned it.

There was no time to seek for other securements.

"Is there any way out, Jack?" he asked.

"None, except the window."

"Curse it!"

He glanced round the chamber as he spoke.

There were signs about it which made it clear that it had only recently been occupied, and it would seem, too, that those who were last in the place had left it rather hurriedly.

Then he looked up at the window.

It was a large latticed casement, with two folding leaves.

"We must either stand here and fight Jonathan Wild and his crew, or jump through the window. Which shall it be?"

"Where will the window take you to?"

"I don't know, but I will soon see."

As he spoke, Blueskin pushed the table close under the window, and mounting upon it, looked out.

Or rather, he endeavoured to look out, but he found there was such a collection of dirt upon the panes that it was impossible.

He ran his hand up the middle, and felt for the fastener, which he undid, and then swung both leaves of the window open.

At this very moment Jonathan Wild, who had reached the door, and finding that it was only secured by a lock, placed one of his pistols against the keyhole, and blew the lock off at one blow.

"Quick!" said Jack. "He is here."

"All right," answered Blueskin from the window-sill. "On to the table, and through the window. There's the river Thames not above twelve feet beneath, so we shall get off, for I know you can swim. Here goes!"

Blueskin sprang out of the window before he had well finished speaking.

A heavy splash followed.

Jack obeyed his hastily-given instructions with great rapidity.

He mounted on to the table, and made a flying leap after his comrade.

But Jonathan was now fairly in the room, and he saw Jack about to spring.

His own pistols were all discharged, but he turned round swiftly, and took the one out of the hands of the man next behind him.

Then he fired it full at Jack.

But he was just a little too late.

The report of the pistol mingled with the splash which Jack made as he entered the water.

He felt bruised and blinded, and seemed to sink fathoms deep into the Thames.

Jonathan ran hastily to the window, and, jumping upon the table, seemed almost as though he was going to follow those he was pursuing, and take a flying leap into the Thames.

But a second thought seemed to come over him.

He waved his torch in the air, and cast the glimmer of its light upon the surface of the turbid river.

He placed, too, a whistle between his lips, and blew it shrilly, as a signal to those men he had set to surround and watch the house.

But this signal was hardly needed.

Already had they heard the two splashes which followed Jack and Blueskin's immersion in the Thames, and they jumped to the conclusion in a moment that their prey had taken to the water.

Lights were seen moving rapidly upon the river bank, and pistols were continually discharging.

"A boat! a boat!" yelled Wild, as he stood on the window-sill, and waved his torch round his head like a maniac. "A boat—a boat! Get a boat and row beneath this window, and I will drop into it."

His words were heard, and, after some delay, were responded to.

The boat was stopped just beneath the window, and Jonathan lowered himself into it.

He held by his hands to the window-sill, and then he had but a few inches to drop.

His first act was to seize a torch from one of the men, and make his way to the head of the little wherry, and take a careful look around him.

But nothing save the black shining water met his gaze.

There were no traces of either Jack or Blueskin, and though he rowed for a long time around the spot, and though he was aided by several other boats who put off to his assistance, he was unable to find anything that would serve as a clue.

It seemed as though they had dropped into the bosom of the river, and never risen again.

CHAPTER CCIV.

IN WHICH JONATHAN WILD REACHES HIS OWN HOUSE IN NEWGATE-STREET THOROUGHLY EXHAUSTED.

"BAFFLED once more by that devil's cub!" said Wilk, bitterly, when he found all his efforts to obtain a glimpse of his foes unavailing, and unwillingly had the boat's heat turned to the land. "I should swear they were drowned, only I feel confident that a drier death is decreed for both."

But this was but a sorry reflection to soothe Wild's disappointment.

To think that he should have taken such precautions.

He thought that he should have felt so sure that he had his prey at length in his grasp.

To think that when he would freely have wagered any amount that they could not escape from him, that they should after all, in such an incomprehensible manner, slip through his fingers.

And yet they had done so.

Stevens, the officer, who thought he had managed things so cleverly, looked terribly chafffallen.

Silent and moody, Jonathan landed close to the thieves' ken.

Here he, however, left the spot, he took one long lingering look at the river, in the hope that he should, perhaps, catch a glimpse of the forms of those he was so anxious to see.

But no, the muddy waters fell plash, plash, against the wooden piles, which had been driven into the ground to prevent the encroachment of the water, and that was all.

The dusky outlines of one or two boats at anchor could be seen, but not a trace of Blueskin or Jack Sheppard.

In anything but an amiable frame of mind, he summoned his men around him, and going to the top of the street, mounted his horse, and bent his steps towards Newgate-street.

The fact was, that what with his disappointment, and the fatigue which the weakness from his wound produced, Jonathan Wild was dead beat.

The reader must not forget that he has made some rather incredible exertions considering the debilitated state of his body.

Indeed, it would not be too much to say that no other man save Jonathan Wild could have supported himself at all under such circumstances.

At a slow pace he led the way towards Newgate-street.

When he once more arrived at his door, the first faint flush of dawn from the new day was climbing up into the sky above the roof-tops.

But he scarcely noticed this.

He dismounted.

The door was thrown open by Quilt Arnold, who had been left in charge of the premises during the thief-taker's absence.

Jonathan staggered up the steps.

Quilt said something to him.

He was just aware of that much, but what was the purport of his speech he had not the remotest idea, and he felt too faint and languid to inquire.

The stairs were straight before him, and mechanically he directed his steps towards them.

Then arriving at the foot, he grasped the balusters with one hand, and slowly ascended step by step.

Up to the first floor he went, and into one of the rooms which were upon it.

There was a bed which fitted into a little recess, and towards this he mechanically staggered, and threw himself at full length upon it.

Scarcely had he done so than he fell into a profound sleep—sleep so deep that no ordinary sound or noise would awake him from it.

Let not any one feel surprised that sleep should have come upon him so suddenly. He was almost asleep when he came up the stairs.

Nature was now having her due. Like a stern creditor, who had for a long time been set aside, she asserted her rights at last, and had them.

In his half-conscious state, Jonathan did not notice a face that peered over the balusters above, and watched his devious course across the landing.

Nor did he hear the steps of the person who descended from the upper part of the house and stole into the bedroom after him.

The dawn became more and more manifest.

The different objects in the room were being revealed by the slate-coloured light which fell upon them.

The person who glided into the room, upon reaching the bedside, folded his arms and looked down upon the countenance of the sleeping thief-taker.

That person was Steggs, who still kept his watch at the door of the poor persecuted heiress.

Eagerly and anxiously had he watched for Jonathan's return, and now he came at last.

Came, too, without bringing with him those of whom he had set out in pursuit.

"He sleeps," said Steggs, in a strange, hoarse whisper; "he is completely overcome. He is helpless, and at my mercy. What shall I do? Shall I slay him as he sleeps? One blow, and then the persecutions of Edgworth Bess and Jack Sheppard will be over. I think I will do it. Such a chance may never occur again."

Steggs ceased.

He felt in his pocket and produced a knife, which he opened, and carefully felt the point.

But even at that moment a second thought swept through his mind, and the arm which he had raised in an attitude to strike dropped powerless by his side.

Jonathan Wild knew it not—never did know it—but that night he had the narrowest escape of his life that ever he had during the whole of his vicissitudinous career.

Under circumstances of strong excitement persons will frequently, when they are alone, utter their thoughts aloud.

Steggs did in the present instance.

"No—no," he said; "that were indeed a poor revenge. I will not slay him now, though I could easily do so. I will save him—not from any pity that I have for him, but because he shall live longer, in order that my triumph shall be greater. I must be patient, and wait until he has achieved the height of his ambition—until all those daring schemes which he has projected are consummated. Then will be my time. He shall be cast down from the pinnacle of his greatness."

Steggs paused, and restored his knife to his pocket.

Brighter and brighter grew the new coming day, but the thief-taker still slept that heavy and lethargic sleep into which he had fallen.

Steggs glided away from the bedside, noiselessly, and then ascended the stairs.

A chair was provided for him in which to sit, but he passed it by, and made his way direct to the chamber in the occupation of poor Edgworth Bess.

He tapped lightly with his finger-ends upon the panel, and from the quickness with which his appeal was answered, it would seem as though the fair prisoner had been anxiously expecting him.

With the skeleton key which he had taken from Mary Milliner he opened the door and went in.

Edgworth Bess was wonderfully recovered.

Indeed, with the exception of a slight weakness, she might almost be said to have entirely recovered from the hard usage she had received.

She was up and dressed, and stood before Steggs with her hands clasped, looking him beseechingly in the face, like one who fully expected to be made the recipient of bad news.

Her apparel was ragged and torn, for it had been as roughly used as herself, and showed the effects of it, but it could not mar the beauty of her face, nor the grace of her symmetrical form.

"Speak—speak," she cried. "That was Jonathan I heard return, was it not? He has returned from his search after Jack Sheppard."

"Calm yourself," said Steggs, "you have nothing to be alarmed at. Jonathan has returned, and now lies, as I take it, in a drunken slumber, in one of the rooms below. He has only just returned, and has brought no prisoners with him."

"Thank heaven for that. Then Jack and Blueskin have once more eluded him. Oh! there is hope in that, great hope."

"There is, indeed," said Steggs. "A little patience now, and then doubtless all will be well. I shall see Blueskin soon, and from him I shall learn further particulars, and more especially the plan of action which it is his intention to adopt."

Ah! yes. For my own part I cannot see my way out of the perilous circumstances with which I am surrounded, but then they may. They are stronger-minded than I am."

"I am glad you have such a feeling of reliance upon them, since it will make their proceedings all the easier."

"Oh! if I could but leave this hateful place; if I could but be once more with them, my sufferings would not seem half so great."

"Cheer up. You may see them even sooner than you expect."

"It seems ages since I saw them last."

"It is a long time; and now let me leave you. I wish I could make you feel entirely at your ease. Believe me, while I have the guard of your chamber, no harm will happen to you. If Jonathan attempts to use any violence towards you, he dies. I do not fancy, however, that just at present you have anything to fear from him. Still, if I was found here in conversation with you, all would be ruined."

"All would, indeed. Go now at once; for though I am loath to send you away, still I feel that you have stayed here quite as long as prudence would allow."

Steggs bowed, as though he quite concurred with this opinion, and then he took his leave.

He resumed his old seat upon the chair, and leaning his head upon his hands, he busied himself in planning the means he should use to completely overthrow Jonathan Wild.

To the proceedings of this last-named individual we will now return.

The fierce beams of a noonday sun, falling directly upon his eyes, awoke him.

They did not have that effect immediately, but gradually. When the thief-taker did open his eyes, there came such a flood of light upon them that he felt almost blinded.

That feeling, however, soon passed away.

But his head was racked with such terrible pains that he knew not what to do.

He felt that if they continued long he must inevitably go mad.

Scarcely conscious, he rose from the bed upon which he had fallen, dressed just as he was, and sitting down upon the side of it, he pressed his temples with his hands, and looked about him.

On the opposite side was a large pitcher full of water.

The neck was large, and probably the whole quantity of water contained in it was nothing under two gallons.

With a cry, such as some parched traveller upon the burning deserts of Arabia might give utterance to upon seeing a pool of water before him, Jonathan Wild sprang across the room to this pitcher.

He knelt down.

Then plunged his burning, aching head into the pitcher, until it was stopped from going any further by his shoulders pressing against the brim.

CHAPTER CCV.

LORD DONMULL HAS A CONFIDENTIAL INTERVIEW WITH JONATHAN WILD, AND THE LATTER EXHIBITS SOME OF HIS OLD TREACHERY.

The gush of cold water was intensely delightful.

The burning and the pain which had before been so excruciating, vanished as if by magic.

But want of breath soon compelled him to withdraw his head.

He felt incomparably better, and so soon as he had inflated his lungs, he plunged his head in again with a still keener appreciation of the delight which it afforded him.

And so he continued this process time after time, until in the end he felt something like himself.

His next proceeding was to attend to his dress, which was rather disordered.

Jonathan Wild, however, was not the man to expend much time upon his toilette.

Upon emerging from his room, which he did with a scowl upon his face, he crossed the landing, and ascended the stairs.

Steggs was at his post.

"Is all well?" asked the thief-taker.

"All, Mr. Wild," replied Steggs. "I have not moved from my post."

"Good! Keep a good watch upon her, and the moment anything of an unusual character occurs, communicate with me."

"You may depend upon me, Mr. Wild."

"So far you have performed your duty most satisfactorily. You are sure all is well?"

"All, Mr. Wild."

"Then I will go down now. It is late, and I have business to attend to. But let me again tell you that if you will continue to serve me faithfully, your reward shall be most ample."

Steggs protested his thanks.

Jonathan descended the stairs.

Upon gaining the hall on the ground-floor, he saw Quilt Arnold in the passage.

That worthy caught sight of the thief-taker at that moment, and he came towards him as though he had some important message to deliver.

"What is it, Quilt?"

"A gentleman has been waiting to see you, Mr. Wild, ever since the first thing this morning."

"Ha! Who is he?"

"He gave me this card, which he said would be sufficient."

There was no name on the card, but simply a crest.

It was sufficient, for Jonathan recognised it instantly.

It was the crest belonging to the Donnull family.

"Where is he?" he asked.

"In No. 2."

"Bring him up to my room."

"Yes, Mr. Wild."

Jonathan turned round, and ascended the stairs again.

He entered that room so familiar to the reader, in which he sat when Jack Sheppard was first introduced to him. He had just time to seat himself when Quilt tapped at the door.

Jonathan summoned to his face a stern expression, for it was his intention to deal decisively with his lordship.

He endeavoured to impart something of his old fierceness to his voice as he said, "Come in!"

The door was opened, and Lord Donnull entered, ushered in by Quilt, who closed the door behind him and retired.

It is a long time since we have seen his lordship.

The last occasion was when Jonathan persuaded him to seek change of scene as a relief to his mind.

It will not be forgotten, too, that on the occasion of that last interview, Lord Donnull was willing to seek out Edgeworth Beas, and make all the reparation that lay in his power by acknowledging what he had done, placing her in possession of her estates, and trusting to her kindness not to expose his wrong doings.

But this was a state of things that was by no means in accordance with Wild's wishes.

Rather anxiously, then, he gave a furtive glance into the countenance of his lordship, in order to gather by its expression whether his sentiments had undergone a change.

He thought they had.

He rose from his seat as his lordship entered, and motioned him to take a chair.

"Good morning, my lord," he said.

"Good morning, Mr. Wild."

"It is some time since we met. Have you taken my advice?"

"I have, Mr. Wild. I have."

"And did you find my advice was good?"

"Yes—yes, but I cannot drown thought. I have tried to do it in every imaginable way, but vainly—vainly. The thing is an impossibility."

"I am sorry to hear you say that, my lord."

"Look here, Wild. You know the business which has brought me here as well as I know it myself."

"Indeed I do not."

"Where—where is the girl?"

"The girl?"

"Yes, Elizabeth. Is she in your power?"

"Trouble yourself no further about her."

"Is she dead?"

"I say, do not trouble yourself any further about her."

"But I cannot help doing so—I cannot help doing so."

While she lives I cannot enjoy that which I have; but if—if she was no more—then I should feel that I was sure."

"My lord," said Jonathan.

"What?"

"Will you listen to me?"

"What do you wish to say?"

"That which concerns you intimately."

"Speak on, then."

"You are nervous and excited. That is all which ails you. You should keep your hand firm and your head cool, like I do."

"I wish I was more like you. But that is useless. Now, once for all, and all for once, tell me whether the girl is in your power."

"Why do you wish to know?"

"Never mind."

"Will you not tell me?"

"Not till afterwards."

"Well, then, she is in my power."

"I thought so—I thought so."

"And tell me."

"Wild I must see her."

"This is folly, my lord."

"It may be, but see her I will, I am determined."

A dark threatening look came from the eyes of Lord Donnull as he spoke.

"My lord."

"Let me see the girl!"

"First listen to me a moment. My lord, you put this affair into my hand, did you not?"

"I undertook to bring it to a proper conclusion."

"I know you did."

"Is it too much, then, to ask you to allow things to remain just as they are at present, and not to interfere with me in any way. If it is any satisfaction to you, I will give you my word that you shall have no more trouble with her. Let me persuade you to go forth into the world and to banish all recollection of her from your mind. Will you do this?"

"You have urged this before."

"I know I have; but you have not complied with my suggestions. There are many who would envy the chance which you have got of enjoying yourself as long as you live; and after that, what matters!"

Lord Donnull shuddered.

"I wish I could be as you say; but when I came here this morning it was with the firm resolution of demanding the girl from you."

"Tush—tush! my lord; she is in safe keeping—I will answer for that—safer keeping than if she were dead; for then her bones would rise up against you. You have no reason to be afraid. Dismiss from your mind all feelings of doubt. All is well. I will answer for the girl with my life."

"I can't tell how it is, Wild, but I feel no enjoyment in my possessions. Mine is truly a wretched life."

"Tut—tut! I would willingly change with you; and now, my lord, there is a little matter which, although you have not alluded to it, I hope has not slipped your memory."

"To what do you allude?"

"You employed me in this business, and I have devoted a great deal of time to it, to the exclusion of my own affairs, which were to me of paramount importance. I have completely succeeded in doing all that I intended to do, and now I look for my reward."

"You shall have it, Wild."

"I thought your lordship would make that reply, and I rejoice to hear it; but be under no apprehension, I do not want it now. Any time will do; and as to the amount of it, why that I leave entirely to yourself."

"You shall have no reason to be dissatisfied with the amount. But, Mr. Wild, you see before you a deeply repentant man. I have done wrong, and I care not who knows it; and I would fain do justice while it remains in my power."

Jonathan frowned.

Were his schemes to be thwarted by the pusillanimity of one of his tools?

Never.

But if he did not adopt some powerful means of preventing it, he certainly would be ruined.

A thought struck him.

"My lord?"

"Yes."

"You are still in the same mind?"

"I am."

"And you would wish to place your niece in possession of her fortune?"

"Most gladly."

"Come with me, then, and I will take you to her. In my desire to see yourself righted, I have tried to persuade you to leave things to me, because then they would turn out most to your interest. But you think differently. So be it. Will it please you to come with me?"

"Certainly I will," said Lord Donnull, rising with alacrity from his seat.

"Come this way, then. You can, if you think proper, take hold of my arm."

"Is she in this house?"

"Yes."

"Then we have not far to go?"

"Oh! no. This way, if you please. Downstairs."

Lord Donnull took hold of the thief-taker's arm, and the two descended the staircase.

Upon reaching the ground, Jonathan turned and led his lordship in the direction of the grating which led to the cells.

The man who was on guard there, at a sign from Wild, unlocked the ponderous look, and threw it open.

"Is it through here, Mr. Wild?" asked Lord Donnull.

"Yes, yes. Down the steps. Take care, or you will slip."

"I did; but"—
 "But this seems like a prison," remarked his lordship, as he glanced at the stone walls.
 "It certainly has that appearance," said Wild; "but it is all the safer for that."

CHAPTER CCV.

BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPARD COMMENCE THEIR ADVENTURES IN SEARCH OF MONEY IN ORDER TO CARRY OUT THEIR SCHEMES.

THAT Jonathan Wild meditates some treachery towards Lord Donnull the readers must feel certain, because, as they are well aware, it was not in those gloomy dungeons beneath his house that Edgworth Bess was to be found.

But leaving them upon their errand, we will return to Blueskin and Jack Sheppard.

When the former reached the water, being an excellent swimmer, he quickly rose to the surface, and turned his face towards land, to be on the look-out for his companion.

He saw him fall, and swam towards the spot.

But Jack rose at some little distance.

He reached him, however, in less than half-a-dozen strokes, and the first sounds almost of which Jack was conscious, were those of his comrade's voice.

"Are you hurt?" he asked.

"No."

"Follow me, then. Swim for your life, or Jonathan will have us, after all!"

"Where shall you go?"

This was a pertinent question, but it was one which Blueskin was not able to give a direct answer to.

In fact, the leap into the Thames had been taken suddenly, and without knowing what he should do, so that he now found himself completely at a loss.

But this, certainly, was no time for deliberation now.

Jack noticed his comrade's silence, and guessed in a moment the reason of it.

"Let us swim to shore, Blue," he said. "If we go down the river, Jonathan is sure to overtake us. Let us get back to shore."

"A good idea," said Blueskin. "We will land close to the ken."

Accordingly, they swam back to the shore, just at the time Jonathan was lowering himself into the boat.

For some distance all along the river side, it was fenced in with wooden palisades, which had been driven deeply into the soft ooze at the bottom of the river.

At low tide they could not possibly have reached the top of these, because there the bed of the river was exposed, and would have swallowed them up like a bog.

But being high tide they were, after one or two attempts, able to clutch the top edge of the palings with their fingers.

Here they remained a little while, not daring to move, for fear that if they did, some sound would reach the ears of Wild, and show him where they were.

With what eagerness they watched their enemies' actions can readily be guessed.

The light of the torches which they carried made their position continually apparent.

Once they had a narrow escape of discovery.

The whole of their attention was rivetted upon Wild in the boat, and they gave no thought of those who had been left to search along the banks.

A party carrying torches suddenly appeared, and they had only just time to release their hold upon the palings and duck their heads beneath the water, when the glaring light was thrown upon the very spot they had so recently occupied.

Of course there was now no trace of them to be seen, and having satisfied themselves, the janizaries passed on, having missed their prey by a hair's-breadth.

They stayed, however, long enough to try the endurance of our friends to the utmost, for they were almost dead for want of air.

They then resumed their grasp upon the palings, and judging this to be a favourable opportunity, they drew themselves up and over.

Right glad were they to find themselves once more upon dry ground, and they shook the water from their apparel, and felt after all but little the worse for their adventures.

Jonathan's boat was far out in the stream.

The men were dispersed along the banks.

Blueskin gave one glance at the objects wherewith he was surrounded, and then he led Jack forward with confidence, for he knew exactly whereabouts he was.

In a short time they emerged into the Strand, close to the spot where Jonathan's horses were waiting.

Jack proposed that they should steal a couple of them and make off, but Blueskin overruled him.

"It will be by far too dangerous," he said. "I want to get Jonathan off our track if I possibly can for a little while, so as to allow us time to breathe, and if we take those cattle, he will be after us like a shot. No, Jack, it won't do, though I should like to spite him, nevertheless, but we shall have plenty of chances of doing so by-and-by."

"Where are we bound to, now?"

"We ought to change our clothes."

"So we ought; but where is there a place?"

"I think I can find you one in Seven-dials."

"All right."

The distance from Charing-cross to Seven-dials is not very great, and the two friends made their way towards it at full speed.

In Little Earl-street, Blueskin stopped before a house, which differed from those adjoining in having no shop window.

Indeed, it looked like a private house.

At that hour the street was quite empty.

The house before which they stopped, like the others, presented no signs of habitation.

But Blueskin rang a bell, the handle of which was concealed in the door-post, and waited patiently a minute or two for admission.

"What place is this, Blue?"

"A fence."

"Yes; I know the man who keeps it."

"Is he to be trusted?"

"Fully."

"That is all right."

"You have only to tell him you are an enemy of Jonathan Wild's."

"Oh! indeed! Why?"

"Jonathan had his only son executed about three years ago, and ever since that he has sworn to have his revenge upon him."

"And he is friends with whosoever is an enemy to Wild!"

"Yes."

"Then we shall be bosom friends, I'll swear."

At this moment the door was opened, and a little old man appeared upon the threshold.

He held a thin candle, or rather rushlight in his hand, and with his other hand he shaded it from the draught.

This caused nearly the whole of the light to fall upon his shrivelled countenance, which it lighted up with a remarkable distinctness.

The moment he made his appearance, Blueskin uttered some words in a rapid tone of voice, in a language which Jack did not understand.

But to the old man they appeared perfectly comprehensible, for his face brightened, and he stood aside, and held open the door in order to allow them to enter.

Blueskin stepped over the threshold, and Jack followed him unhesitatingly.

They halted, however, while the door was fastened, and then the old man preceded them along a passage, which terminated in a small and tolerably well-furnished apartment.

There was a large fire burning in the grate, and the atmosphere within it was most insufferably hot.

But our friends were rather glad of this than otherwise, for walking in their wet garments had chilled them.

"And what do you want with Tumposki?" asked the old man, as he set the rushlight down upon the table. "Speak! The poor Jew is always willing to listen to your commands."

"Poor Jew!" said Blueskin. "Stuff—you know you are about the richest man in your tribe."

"I? Oh!—oh! Ha!—ha! Very good. I like that. Richest man in the tribe. Ha!—ha!"

"Well, never mind your riches, old man. Do you the state we are in?"

[BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD ATTACK THE TRAVELLER ON HAMSTEAD-HEATH.]

"Yes—yes."

"We have been pursued, and all but captured, by Jonathan Wild."

Jack Sheppard looked closely into the old Jew's shrivelled countenance as Blueskin uttered the name of the thief-taker, in order to see the effect which it produced upon it.

A scowling frown immediately contracted his brows, and his small black eyes glittered brilliantly beneath his jet-black eyebrows.

"Jonathan Wild!" he cried, in a screaming voice. "Jonathan Wild! Murderer! Villain! Perjured monster! But I will have his blood! I have sworn that I will have his blood, and, by the God of Israel, I will keep my oath! Curses upon his name! I spit upon it!"

The old Jew worked himself up into a state of absolute frenzy while uttering these few words, and the whole of his body participated in his excitement.

"I have sworn the same oath," said Blueskin, "and I will surely keep it, even if I sacrifice my own life in taking his."

"And I the same," said Jack, "for he had my father hung at Tyburn."

"And my son. We are destined to be good friends, I see. Give me your hand. You hate him because he has deprived you of a father—I because he has deprived me of a son."

"We are all three against him, and his overthrow is certain."

"And immediate," said the Jew, his eyes still glittering with excitement.

"No, not immediate."

"Why not?"

"There are certain things to be done—certain plans to be brought to a successful issue—before he can be destroyed. But he lives only at our pleasure."

"Exactly so," said Jack. "I have taken an oath not only that I would compass his death, but that I would bring him to the gallows, at Tyburn. And I will do it, too. He has sworn the same thing of me, and we shall see who keeps his oath best."

"And now, Tumposki, we want your assistance. I know you will give it us, will you not?"

"What is it?"

"That you shall know presently; but, first, can not you find us with a bed, and have our clothing dried? We are most uncomfortable, and are sadly in want of rest. Will you oblige us? We will tell you our plans afterwards."

"Yes; come with me. I can take you to a place where you will be perfectly safe and secure from all discovery. You, Mr. Blake, I know; but what is the name of this young man who is with you?"

"Sheppard."

"Jack Sheppard?"

"Yes."

"Excellent. I am glad to have so bitter a foe of Jonathan Wild's beneath my roof."

CHAPTER CCVII.

AARON TUMPOSKI, THE JEW, AFFORDS BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD MATERIAL AID.

THERE was upon the table in the centre of the room a curiously-fashioned bell, and as he uttered the words which concluded the last chapter, the old Jew, who rejoiced in the rather peculiar name of Tumposki, rang it sharply.

The summons was answered by a woman, who looked as old and as shrivelled-up as himself.

"Ruth," he said, "take these two gentlemen upstairs, and show them into a bedroom. They are going to sleep here for a few hours. You will also dry their clothes."

"This way, if you please," said the old woman named Ruth. "You will not require a light—it is already day-break."

"At sunset, Aaron," said Blueskin to the old Jew, "we will descend, and talk over this business, which doubtless will turn out to your profit in more ways than one."

So saying, he followed Jack and the old woman upstairs into a comfortably furnished apartment, fitted up in an oriental fashion, as a bedroom.

Here she left them, having first thrown open the shutters, and allowed the early morning's light to enter.

Both Blueskin and Sheppard were very much fatigued, and no wonder, for the exertions they had been called upon to make were enough to make them.

The shelter they had so opportunely found was most welcome, and besides which, they had the delightful feeling that they were perfectly secure.

They occupied themselves for some time in talking over the past and speculating upon the future, but at length they dropped off into a sound slumber.

How long this sleep would have lasted it is hard to say, but at sunset the old Jew tapped at the door, and awoke them.

Their clothes were well brushed, and clean, and dry, so hastily putting them on, they descended.

They found the old Jew seated in the same apartment as he was on the preceding evening.

On the table, however, was spread a substantial and tempting repast, to which he invited them to sit down and do justice to.

Our friends awoke hungry after their long sleep, and the viands spread out before them seemed appetizing in the extreme, so they at once availed themselves of the Jew's invitation.

After this meal was despatched, they drew up to the fire and commenced the conversation.

"Aaron," said Blueskin, "Jack Sheppard and myself have certain plans which we are resolved to carry out, but we cannot do so, mind you, until we possess a tolerably large sum of money."

The Jew nodded.

"To obtain this sum of money will be our first care, and I daresay you know how we shall procure it."

"Crack a crib?"

"No, by high toby."

"Well, well?"

"We shall run a great risk, of course, for the officers are out searching for us in every direction, but we do not mind that."

"Certainly not; but what do you want with me?"

"Simply this: we are quite unprovided with the necessities requisite for our enterprise, but it is in your power to supply us with them. Will you do so?"

The Jew was silent for a moment, and then, as if ashamed of his hesitation, which was caused solely by his natural cupidity, he said—

"I will, and willingly; but what shall you do with your swag?"

"Bring it to you, of course, my dear Aaron, and we shall trust to you to give us a fair and liberal price for it, for the sooner we can obtain the sum of money we require, the better it will be for us."

"Very good. You can trust me. Now, when do you intend to start upon your expedition?"

"In about two hours' time."

"So soon?"

"Yes. Why not?"

"Oh! I don't know, only I should have thought it would have been most prudent to have waited a little while, so that the officers should have abated their vigilance somewhat."

"Pho! pho! We are more likely to succeed to-night than any other; besides, I tell you we are pushed for time, and wish to amass a certain sum as speedily as possible."

"Do so, with all my heart."

"Well, then, I hope we understand each other?"

"Perfectly."

"That is all right, then."

"What next?"

"Nothing, except that we shall want you to equip us."

"What with?"

"We are short of everything."

"Oh!"

"You know what is required quite as well as we could tell you. Horses, pistols, and ammunition are the most important."

"Of course they are. You shall have them. I will leave you here, if you like, while I go out to see about them myself. I never like trusting these matters to another."

"Much the best plan."

"I have always found it so."

"Where shall you get the horses?"

"I don't know yet."

"Well, don't go to the stables in Long-acre, for I fancy, somehow, the people there are in league with Jonathan Wild."

"Thanks for that caution. I should very likely have gone there."

"But you will not now?"

"Certainly not, as there is a doubt in the matter."

With these words, the old Jew took a hat and cloak off a peg, and putting them on, sallied forth upon his errand.

As soon as the door had closed behind him, Jack said—

"Do you know much of this Jew?"

"Not much."

"No more than you have told me, I suppose."

"No. Why do you ask the question?"

"Do you think he is to be trusted?"

"Yes."

"All right."

"What makes you suspicious?"

"He seems avaricious."

"All Jews are."

"Therefore I should not feel surprised"—

"What?"

"If he was to sell us to our enemies."

"No, Jack, I don't think that."

"Why not?"

"I grant you, that to a Jew money is almost everything, but there is one passion which will always make avariciousness succumb."

"And what is that?"

"Hate, and the determination to be revenged."

"I think I understand you."

"You do him an injustice, I am sure you do. If he intended to betray us he has had plenty of chance of doing so ere now, and you may rely upon it he would have embraced the earliest opportunity."

"So he would."

"Trust him, Jack. He will be of great service to us in more ways than one."

"He could be if he was faithful."
 "Do not offend him by showing anything like distrust. If all goes as I fancy it will, we shall be able to make sure of a safe refuge and a ready market for whatever booty we may take."

"I see all that, but it would be vexatious to be betrayed."
 "So it would, and he should pay for his treachery with his life. It should never advantage him any."

"That it should not."
 "There is no harm, however, in our being upon our guard—indeed, it is no more than we ought to be; but do not let him see that you are suspicious."

"All right."
 "He will be back directly, I daresay. Hark! I can hear some one now."

There was a faint tinkling of a bell somewhere, and then a moment after the Jew returned.

Jack looked narrowly into his countenance, but he could see there no traces of double-dealing.

He felt more satisfied.
 "I have succeeded beyond my expectation. As I dare say you know, I have within this house everything that you require, with the exception of the horses."

"I guessed as much."
 "And you guessed rightly. Precisely at half-past nine two horses will be in waiting for you at the corner of Tottenham Court-road."

"Good."
 "They are first-rate animals, sound of wind and limb, and of extraordinary fleetness; so that, if you are pursued, you will be able to show your foes a clean pair of heels."

"Are the holsters provided with pistols?"
 "Yes; I have not forgotten that."

"Very good; then where are pistols for our pockets, and ammunition to reload them?"
 "You shall have them at once."

As he spoke, the Jew went to a kind of cabinet, which stood in a recess in one corner of the room, and opened the two folding-doors.

A number of small drawers were disclosed, each one having a label, upon which a single word was written in Hebrew.

One of these drawers he took out, and put down upon the table.

It contained several small beautifully-made pistols.
 He gave four each to our friends.

Then restoring the drawer to its place, he pulled forth another, which contained shot and powder flasks.

"Will you have masks?" he inquired, when they were supplied with these.

"You can give us two crape ones; we will put them in our pockets; they may, perhaps, be useful."

"Very good. Is there anything more?"
 "I think not. What is the time?"

"Nearly a quarter-past nine."
 "It is time we started, then?"

"It is. You will find a boy holding the horses, and you have to pronounce to him clearly and distinctly the word 'Samech,' and he will deliver them up to you."

"All right. We will not forget."

CHAPTER CCVIII.

BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD SET OUT FOR HAMPSTEAD HEATH, AND HAVE SOME SERIOUS TALK RESPECTING THEIR AFFAIRS UPON THE WAY.

The night was profoundly dark, and Jack and Blueskin, as they stood upon the threshold of the Jew's house in Little Earl-street, looked up at the sky with feelings of the utmost satisfaction.

The night was one most admirably suited to the enterprise they had in hand.

The stars twinkled in the sky overhead, but there was no moon.

After exchanging a few parting words with the Jew, our two friends made their way, with a quick step, in the direction mentioned.

The hearts of both were bold and light, and Blueskin said—

"Have you found any grounds for suspicion yet?"

"None."

"And I do not think you will. So long, in fact, as you keep faith with him he will keep faith with you, but no longer."

"He will keep faith for ever, then. But I am not to tell the truth, altogether satisfied though I soon shall be."

"What do you mean?"

"If I find the horses as he has told us, and if we ride away in safety I shall be satisfied. We may even now be walking to our capture."

"You are full of strange thoughts to-night, Jack."

"Do you think so?"

"I do, indeed."

"I do not like Jews."

"That is a very common thing. I do not, for instance, but I have faith in this one."

"So much the better. My doubts will soon be either put at rest or else confirmed."

"That is very true, for here we are."

They emerged into High-street, St. Giles's, close to the corner of Tottenham Court-road.

This now busy part was quite dark and deserted. It was at that time not the centre of a busy city, but a country cross-road.

The Oxford-road had gardens on either side, and the same may be said of the Tottenham Court-road, except that a few houses were here and there built upon it.

On reaching the corner, our two friends strained their eyes in a vain endeavour to pierce the obscurity around them.

No signs whatever of the two horses could be seen, and Blueskin felt the doubts to which his companion had given utterance rise up in his mind.

He said nothing, however, but crossed over to the particular corner which the Jew had indicated.

Just as they reached it, they heard the clock in the belfry of St. Giles's Church chime the half-hour, and ere the reverberations of the last stroke had died away, there seemed to grow out of the darkness surrounding them, the dusky figures of two horses.

In a moment Blueskin pronounced the word the old Jew had enjoined, and it was immediately responded to by the approach of a boy, who held two horses by the bridle, walking between them.

"All right," said the boy. "It is just the half-hour."

"It is," replied Blueskin. "You are punctual. Here is half-a-crown for you."

"Thank you, sir."

Blueskin and Sheppard mounted.

"What time shall you come back?" asked the boy.

"Why?"

"I am going to meet you."

"Where?"

"Here."

"But I have no idea when we shall return."

"Will it be before daybreak, sir?"

"Yes, certainly; but not much before."

"All right, sir. I will be here. If you don't see me, whistle three times. I shall be close at hand."

"Enough. Are you right, Jack?"

"Quite right."

"Off we go, then."

At a gentle trot, and yet one that got over the ground quickly, our two friends made their way up the Tottenham Court-road, in the direction of Hampstead-heath.

Nothing was said for some moments.

Jack Sheppard appeared to be plunged in a profound reverie.

At length Blueskin broke the silence, which to him was irksome, by saying—

"What are you thinking about, Jack?"

He had to repeat his question before his comrade heard or understood it.

"I was thinking about our expedition, Blue."

"What about it?"

"I can hardly tell you."

"Yet you seemed very deep in thought."

"I was, for I was trying to review my position."

"What, then?"

"I was thinking about Edgworth Bea."

"I could have sworn that."

"Could you?"

"I could."

"Why?"

"Jack, listen to me."

"With all my heart."

"I have many a time been going to say this to you, but, somehow or other, I have always hesitated to do so."

"What is it?"

"This. We always speak of her and call her by the familiar name of Edgworth Bess, but you know as well as I do that that is not her title."

"I do know it. I wish it was!"

"No doubt—no doubt. Well, Jack, I like to call and think about her by that name, and so we will say nothing about that."

"What is it you do want to say?"

"In plain words, Jack, simply this: you love her?"

"I confess it."

"It is not necessary. I have seen it from the first. The circumstances under which you met with her are singular and romantic enough, but still, knowing as you do who she is, you must be aware that it would be dishonourable upon your part to show her the love you bear her."

"Blueskin, my friend, I like you all the better for that speech. Believe me, I have never once forgotten who she is and what I am. There is no need for you to tell me that there is an impassable gulf between us. I know it well enough already."

"I am glad to hear it, both for your sake and her own. As you say, there is indeed an impassable gulf between you. You could never cross it and become what she is, and surely you would not have her sink down to your level?"

"Never!"

"I thought not."

"Blueskin, my friend, I love her! I acknowledge it to you. I care not who knows it. But I do love, and always shall love her. Who could help doing so? But though I love her, that is no reason why I should tell her so, or seek to win her love in return. I can worship her at a distance, without once entertaining the thought that she could be mine."

"Jack, if you will take my advice, you will try your best to banish such a feeling from your heart. It will only be productive of unhappiness in the future."

"No—no! That is the only thing that makes life seem pleasant and endurable. Were I to discard that dream, I should be the most miserable being on the face of the earth. No, Blueskin, I cannot do that!"

"Then I am sorry to hear it."

"Why?"

"I can see mischief and misfortune in the future that will arise from it."

"Not by my causing."

"I fear it will follow."

"You need not be afraid. I have her happiness too much at heart. Curses on the villain, Wild. Were it not for him, our plan of operations would be simple and easy enough."

"You are right there; but there is one consolation, his career cannot last much longer—the sum of his iniquity is almost reached."

"I should have thought it had been reached long since. He has committed more crimes than twenty men."

"The day of reckoning is not far distant, Jack, but we have wandered away from what we were saying."

"We have, but it is not necessary to return to it. I fully understand and know all you would say to me, take my word for it."

"I will."

"That is enough. But surely you cannot have thought that I should be so base as to take advantage of her in such a way. No. Such a course would be worthy only of a villain like Jonathan Wild."

"But now, Jack, look here. Suppose we should succeed in restoring Edgworth Bess to her title and estates."

"Suppose? I have determined upon it."

"Well—well. Let that pass. Supposing we should succeed, and that any circumstances afterwards arose, such as your receiving a pardon, for instance, do you think you would be justified in making her your wife?"

Jack hesitated, and was finally silent.

"I understand your silence, Jack. You would be tempted. Think a little. There is a world—society—in which Edgworth Bess would have to move to maintain her position. Now, do you for a moment imagine that that society would tolerate and recognise you? No. You would be accused of having made use of your opportunity to entrap the affections of the heiress, and you would drag her down to the same level as yourself."

Jack was still silent.

Blueskin did not attempt to interrupt him further, but let what he had just said sink deeply into his mind. He judged the lesson necessary, and it was not given a moment too soon.

At length Jack spoke, and when he did his voice was tinged with a sadness and seriousness which he could not disguise.

"Blueskin," he said, "you have opened my eyes. I thank you for it. If you will believe me, I desire but one thing, and that is her welfare and happiness. I will try to banish the feeling of love from my heart; but rest assured, let it be how it may, I will never take advantage of her in any way."

"I can take your word, I know, Jack."

"You can."

"You are all right, after all. And I only hope that we shall be fortunate enough to meet with good luck, and have a profitable night's work."

"Stop a moment, Blue," said Jack. "That reminds me I was thinking of something else, about which I should like to speak to you."

CHAPTER CCIX.

BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD LAY IN WAIT FOR THE TRAVELLER ON HAMPSTEAD-HEATH.

"What is it, Jack?"

"Of course you know what we have agreed to do, and that is to get together a sum of money, and then afterwards to fly from England along with Edgworth Bess, and wait until she attains her majority."

"Yes; that it is the plan, and you agreed to it."

"I know I did. What I wanted to know was, what sum of money would be sufficient for our purpose?"

"I have hardly given that a thought."

"But try and form an estimate. How much should you think?"

"It would not do to run short."

"Of course not, nor would it do for us to fix upon too large a sum, and be too long obtaining it."

"Edgworth Bess is safe."

"I cannot think her so while she is in the power of Jonathan Wild."

"Steggs is there watching over her."

"I have no faith in Steggs."

"Nor in any one else, to-night."

"Except yourself, my friend."

"And you have faith in me?"

"Every faith."

"There is some consolation in knowing that."

"I am in earnest when I say it."

"I know you are, and now as for Steggs."

"What of him?"

"I think you do him a great injustice."

"In doubting him?"

"Yes."

"I do not like the man."

"Nor did I; but he has proved himself a friend on so many occasions that I cannot help having confidence in him."

"Well, perhaps it is not misplaced; but then, great as is the faith I have in you, I should not feel satisfied if you occupied Steggs's position in Wild's house."

"Why not?"

"Because you would only be singly opposed to Wild, and he is more than a match for two men. While he attempts no harm against her, of course all is well; but should he take it into his head to do so, what good would Steggs be then?"

"Not much, I am afraid."

"None whatever, and then who can tell what tempting offers Jonathan may hold out to him to induce him to take part against us and her."

"He might, certainly," said Blueskin, thoughtfully.

"Jonathan has a rare knack of bending people to his wishes. I do not feel half so easy in my mind as I did now you have begun to talk."

"You do not feel so deep an interest in the poor girl as I do."

"Perhaps not so warm a one."

"Nor so warm a one. I am glad I have made you uneasy, because I am convinced that she is not safe where she is now, and that brings me back to my first question."

"About the money."

"Yes; dismiss from your mind all ideas of amassing a large sum, because it will take too long, and because the risk will be proportionately increased. We must get her away from Wild's house at once."

"I think it would be best."

"I am sure of it. Now, you say that in about one year she will be of age. How much will keep her in comfort for that period of time? Mention the smallest amount."

"You will have many expenses to provide for, such as travelling and such like, which, in foreign countries, you will find very expensive."

"How much?"

"I should think at least five hundred pounds."

"That is a large sum."

"It is; but I do not think you could do with less."

"I am afraid not. Let us fix that as the amount. We may get it very quickly and we may not; but the moment we do possess it, let us hasten to set Edgworth Bess at liberty."

"Agreed."

"Then we will fly and not return to England until it is out of Wild's power to injure her."

"Exactly. I am glad you so much like the plan."

"I do like it, and shall always be grateful to you for devising it."

"It seems feasible."

"It does, indeed, seem more than that; but we shall find it easier to talk about it than to do it."

"What, now, is the most difficult?"

"I can hardly tell; to me they seem about all equal. We shall have a great deal of trouble in getting five hundred pounds, and I cannot see very well how Edgworth Bess is to be got out of Wild's house. Then, as for leaving England, Jonathan will take good care to make that a difficult matter."

"There are many serious obstacles to be overcome; but we must not allow ourselves to be daunted by them. More desperate things have been achieved."

"True. I am glad we have had this bit of conversation, for I think we both understand our positions better than we did."

"I think we do. I can see now that it would have been by far too hazardous to have left Edgworth Bess in Wild's house, in the manner I at first proposed, and the sooner we release her from it the better."

"I am glad to think I have brought you round to such an opinion. At this very moment how can you tell what danger she is threatened with at Wild's hands?"

"Do not speak of it, Jack, I implore you, or you will unnerve me quite. But, see, we have reached our destination. This turning on the right hand will take us direct on to the heath."

"And do you think we shall find a good booty there?"

"Yes. People are obliged to cross it, and often they have large sums in their possession. The beauty of the place is, that there are no houses near, so that the report of a pistol creates no alarm."

"I see."

"I trust we shall be fortunate to take what we want in one booty."

"That is too much to be hoped for, I think."

"Pho!—pho! I have heard of such things."

"Then I only hope we shall be so lucky, but I confess I have my doubts."

"It is all luck, Jack—all luck. This way. How confoundingly dark it is. We shall be upon the middle road directly, where we shall stand the best chance of meeting with people worth stopping."

"It is fearfully dark, Blue. I cannot tell at all where I am going."

"The old heath is always dark at night. You must keep me in sight. I know the way well. When we once get upon the hard roadway it will be all right enough."

"Go on, then, I will follow close after you."

The heath was indeed profoundly dark—much darker than any one can now expect to see it, for not only was it far away from London, but nearly thrice the size it now is.

To be sure, there were cottages here and there, and one or two gentlemen's residences, but at the present time this picturesque and romantic spot is almost surrounded with dwellings.

Relying upon his intimate knowledge of the spot, Blueskin was leading the way across a narrow footpath which led into the road, which, from the fact of its dividing the heath into two tolerably equal portions, was called the Middle-road.

This road he reached in perfect safety, and as soon as he emerged upon it, he drew in his steed, and waited for Jack to rejoin him.

As soon as he did so he said—

"Come a little further, and I will show you as good a position for attacking a traveller as any knight of the road could wish to have."

"Whereabouts is it?"

"About half-way up a rather steep hill. It is very dark."

"It can't be much darker than this."

"Oh! but it is the banks on both sides that throw a shadow upon it, even in daylight. Being on the hill, you must understand, every one who ascends, by the time he gets half-way, will be going at a slow pace, which will make it all the easier for us to stop him."

"I see. Is it far from this hill you speak of?"

"No. Only a few yards. Indeed, I do not know if it does not begin here. However, keep straight on; you will soon become sensible of the rise."

Jack soon found this to be perfectly true.

In a little time he found himself upon rapidly rising ground.

"Now walk," said Blueskin, "we have plenty of time, and we shall not only better be able to hear if any one is approaching, but if there are any, they will not hear us."

There was sound sense in this, so Jack immediately reduced his horse's speed to a walk.

The hill was a very steep one, and after ascending it a certain distance, Blueskin commanded a halt.

"Here we are now, Jack. The way we have just come is the high-road from London, and it is of course from travellers coming in that direction that we must expect the best booty from. As near as possible, we are half-way up the hill. Don't you find it very dark?"

"I do. I can just see you and your horse, and that is all. I believe if I was once to take my eyes off you I should not be able to see you again."

"That makes it so much the better. Now, listen. Can you hear anything?"

"No."

"Nor can I. However, look carefully to the primings of your pistols, so that they shall not fail you in the moment of need."

"You mean feel for your priming, for I'll be hanged if you can see!"

The clicking of pistol-locks followed.

Presently Blueskin asked—

"Are you all right?"

"Yes."

"Then ride down the hill about twenty paces, and take up your position on this side of the road. Do not move. If a traveller comes let him pass you. I will stop him at the top, and then you ride up and cry, 'Stand!' which will make him think he is surrounded."

CHAPTER COX.

BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD COMMIT A DESPERATE HIGHWAY ROBBERY ON HAMPSHIRE HEATH.

"THAT is a capital plan, Blueskin. Any one could tell you were not a green hand at this sort of thing. I quite understand what you mean, and you can rely upon my carrying out your idea fully."

"Off you go, then, and get yourself placed before any one comes. You must mind and not do anything to attract their attention, or you will put them on their guard."

"Trust me for that."

As he spoke, Jack turned his horse's head in the direction he intended to take, and descended the hill about twenty paces, as his comrade had directed.

He stopped, and then backed his horse to the side of the road, until the steep furze-grown bank prevented him going further.

Thus placed, and certainly the positions they had taken up were most admirably suited for their purpose, the two highwaymen waited patiently, listening with the greatest eagerness for any sounds which would indicate a traveller's approach.

At length their patience was rewarded.

In the far distance, and at first scarcely distinguishable above the wind, which moaned wailingly over the rugged surface of the heath, there arose the faint tramping of a horse's feet.

The sound was heard simultaneously by Jack and Blueskin, but it would never have reached their ears so quickly as it did had not their sense of hearing been stretched to the utmost.

Blueskin whistled faintly, and Jack responded, after which they were both quite silent.

At rather a sharp trot came on a single horseman.

They could soon tell that.

London, and louder, and more distinct became the sounds as he drew nearer.

That rider little thought as he came along who was lying in wait for him.

Suddenly, however, he checked his horse's speed, as though in some doubt about the way he ought to take, and this seemed evidenced by the fact that when he started again he came on much more carefully than before.

Then came the hill, which he ascended at a walk.

Immovable and silent, the two highwaymen waited for him to approach.

Seeing his hesitation, the strange idea crossed Jack's mind whether he had not received some admonition of his danger.

He was neither a stranger to, nor a disbeliever in pre-sentiments, and he much wondered whether that which was about to occur had overshadowed his mind.

But, let this be as it may, the traveller came slowly up the hill.

At length he passed Jack, who prepared for action.

Another moment, and he was near enough for Blueskin's purpose, and he immediately darted out from his place of ambush.

"Stand!" he cried, in a voice that rang with many a strange echoes over the vast expanse of heath. "Stand. If you advance another step it will be at the peril of your life!"

These words had due effect and significance upon the traveller, who halted, and, turning round, prepared to flee.

But Jack emerged from his place of concealment, and accordingly he likewise cried "Stand!"

"I am surrounded, then, it seems," said the traveller, in a loud and undaunted voice; "but I will make a fight of it for all that. Ye villains, I am an honest man, and will not yield that which I have had to labour hard to get without a struggle."

"You had best make no resistance," said Blueskin, spurring up to him, and holding one of his holster-pistols in his hand. "Give what money you have about you, and pass on! We do not want to harm you."

"I will not submit. Take that!"

With great suddenness the traveller drew from the breast of his apparel a pistol, and fired it full at Blueskin.

For a moment the latter believed he was shot, but ere he could recover himself, Jack Sheppard rode close up to the traveller's side, and seized his arm.

But only just in time.

The traveller had drawn a second pistol, and was in the very act of drawing the trigger when Jack seized him, and the position of his arm being altered, the pistol was discharged in the air.

Jack had a pistol in his other hand, and pressing it against the traveller, was about to fire, to avenge, as he thought, his comrade's death, when Blueskin, having recovered himself, grasped one of his pistols by the barrel, and struck the traveller a violent blow upon the head with the butt-end of it.

He fell to the ground in a moment, like a heavy mass of inert matter, while the horse, giving one plunge, darted off at full gallop down the hill towards London before either Jack or Blueskin could prevent it.

"Curse it all!" exclaimed the latter, in an angry voice, "this is doomed to be an unfortunate affair after all. That horse will surely be stopped by somebody before long, and then, of course, they will know what is the matter."

"Let us make haste, then," said Jack. "We will rifle his pockets and begone."

"Confound him! I never thought he would have been so desperate and handy with his firearms. What a fool the man must be to peril his life for a few paltry guineas!"

The two highwaymen dismounted, and Blueskin stooped over the traveller, while Jack held the horses, whom the firing had rendered very restive.

A faint groan from the wounded man came to Blueskin's ears as he stooped over him; but not heeding it, he commenced rifling his pockets.

He found very little to reward him for his trouble.

There was a bag of money, but no very great amount he could tell by the weight, even supposing it to be gold, when it was just as likely to be silver.

There was a watch with its appendages, and a few other personal ornaments of little value, which he took, and that was all.

While engaged in making a second and more rigorous search, he heard the loud tramp of many horses' feet, while at the same moment Jack Sheppard called out, in a voice of alarm—

"Enemies, Jack!" said Blueskin. "Enemies! I have got all there is to take. Mount as quick as you can, and follow me."

Just as he spoke, there was a bright flash in the darkness, succeeded by the report of a pistol, but the person who fired it was too far off for it to do them any injury.

Still it warned them to be speedy, and showed them that they had enemies in their rear, and who were in good earnest bent upon their capture.

The two highwaymen, however, sprang lightly and quickly into their saddles, and Blueskin set the example of going at full speed up the hill.

Jack Sheppard kept him in view, and followed hard upon his heels, but we must leave them for a little while, so that we can turn our attention to their pursuers, and relate who they were, and how it was they came to be so quickly upon their track.

To do this, it will be necessary to go back to the proceedings of Jonathan Wild.

The reader will, without doubt, remember that the last we saw of him was in company with Lord Donnull, who he had promised to take to Edgworth Bess.

But, instead of going upstairs to that bedroom on the second floor, we have seen how he led his dupe, for such the nobleman to all intents and purposes was, downstairs into the hall, and thence through the often-described iron grating leading down to the subterranean prison beneath his house.

What was his purpose will be quickly seen.

Upon reaching the bottom of the flight of stone steps, they paused for a moment in that gloomy corridor from which the cells on both sides opened.

It was dimly lighted was this corridor by an oil lamp, which hung from the ceiling and cast a flickering and uncertain radiance around it.

A cold air was in the place, and his lordship involuntarily let his teeth chatter.

"What place is this, Wild?" he asked, and not without some trepidation in the tone in which he spoke. "What place is this?"

"A part of my mansion, your lordship, and where I keep some of my most valuable possessions."

"But it is like a jail!"

"You can give it that name if you think proper. I have got a name for it myself."

"What is that?"

"Little Newgate."

"Little Newgate!" repeated his lordship, musingly, "that is a strange name."

"Why so, my lord?"

"I don't know—it seems strange. But let us go away from here; the air is cold, and I can feel it cold about my heart."

"Do you forget your errand?"

"No; but surely, Wild—surely you do not mean to say that—that?"

"That what, my lord?"

"That you have immured that poor delicate girl in such a place as this?"

Jonathan Wild made an impatient and affirmative gesture as he replied—

"You must not be too passionate. But come, it is cold standing here at the bottom of these steps. I feel chilled myself."

"Where would you take me!"

"Not much further. You seem strangely unwilling—now, I thought you were anxious to see this girl."

"I am—I am."

"Come this way, then; but let me ask you, for the last time, what are your intentions in this matter?"

"I have already told them to you."

"But has your mind undergone any change?"

"No; I am tired of this existence. Now I possess them, the wealth and rank which I once so much coveted fall upon me. Show me the true heiress, Jonathan Wild!—leave me alone with her. If she is willing to look over what I have done, I will, without loss of time, place her in a position as proud as any in this land. Show her to me, Wild; show her to me, in order that I can make this offer, which I ought to have done long, long ago, and then much misery would have been spared to me!"

CHAPTER CCXI.

JONATHAN WILD DISPOSES OF LORD DONMULL.

JONATHAN WILD distorted his lips into a derisive grin, as Lord Donmull thus spoke, while he half muttered—

"He is a fool—an ass, and fully deserves the fate to which I would predoom him; and so, with his mawkish sentimentality, he would ruin and overthrow all those glorious plans for my own aggrandizement which I had formed. Never!—never! If I take it in time, it is yet in my power to prevent that, at any rate."

"What do you say?" asked Lord Donmull, who could tell his companion was saying something, though he could not catch the import of his words. "What do you say?"

"Nothing, my lord—nothing. I was only sorry to find your lordship so despondent. Cheer up, my lord. Recollect what an important step it is which you are going to take. When it is once done, there is no undoing it."

"So much the better, Wild, so much the better. As for the reward I offered you, I consider you have fully earned it, and I will pay you just the same as if things had turned out as I at first intended. Make your mind easy about that, Mr. Wild."

"Very good, your lordship. I am here at your commands. If it is still your desire to see your niece, and offer her reparation, follow me, and I will lead you to where she is."

"Lead on then, Wild, and quickly. I am impatient to see her. Lead on. Oh! this place. To think that you could have placed such a one as she is in this noisome prison-house."

Jonathan Wild took no notice of this last remark, but convinced in his mind that Lord Donmull was incorrigible, he led the way along the gloomy corridor.

At the last door on the right-hand side he paused.

Lord Donmull paused beside him.

Where they stood was in semi-darkness.

The oil lamp did not send forth a sufficient light to disperse the darkness which hung about that spot.

How dark must the interior of that cell be which, as the reader knows, received the whole of its illumination and fresh air through the small opening above the door.

With great deliberation, Jonathan took a key from his pocket.

Standing in the obscurity which we have described, his lordship could not perceive the hideous expression upon the thief-taker's countenance.

But if he could have seen it, how his heart would have been dismayed.

He, however, had no warning.

Jonathan Wild thrust the key into the lock.

He had to apply both his hands before he could turn it in its rusty wards, but at length it gave way.

Then he pushed the door a little way open upon its hinges.

"Walk in, my lord. You will find her there. Walk in."

"But the place is dark."

"You will find it all right when you get inside."

"But, Wild"—

Jonathan's eyes gleamed.

His lordship saw the ominous brightness, even in the dark.

"Go in, my lord," he said again, seeing that his companion hesitated. "Go in, I say. You will find there all that you can possibly want."

But his lordship still lingered.

Suspicion that all was not right flashed upon his mind, and instead of advancing, as the thief-taker directed, he drew back.

"Have you determined to alter your mind, my lord, that, even at the last moment, you retract. Do not, I beg, be so vacillating. Will you see her, or will you not?"

"Where is she?"

"In there."

"Let her come here to me."

"Impossible. Enter. It can do no harm to speak to her, at any rate."

"I do not like the place—I do not like the place."

"Pho—pho; you will find it all right when you get inside. Enter, I tell you."

"No—no. I cannot—dare not—go in."

His lordship shrunk still further back as he spoke.

Jonathan Wild glared at him like a tiger.

"Cannot—dare not. Tush! tush! my lord. I'll make you!"

These last words were uttered with sudden vehemence, and darting forward, the thief-taker caught hold of the nobleman by his throat.

A faint shriek for aid was uttered, but it died away almost instantly.

"I have had enough of this," said Jonathan, in a voice of suppressed and concentrated passion. "I have had enough! Do you think I am a fool, to be played upon by your pusillanimous fears? No, they last no longer! This way! I will provide you with board and lodging for a time. Perhaps, when you show yourself more sensible, I will release you."

Lord Donmull struggled desperately.

But in the hands of Jonathan Wild, much as that worthy's strength had been diminished, he was as a child, and as little capable of making effectual resistance.

Grappling with him, Jonathan forced him to the ground, then dragged him along the stone pavement, in the direction of the open cell.

Slowly but surely he dragged him to this place, until at length, having got him upon the threshold, and summoning all his strength to his aid, he fairly lifted him, and flung him into the cell.

His lordship reached the ground with a sickening crash; but before he could recover himself enough to shriek out or move, Jonathan banged the door after him, and turned the key in the lock.

"Ha! ha!" he said, as he took his way along the corridor in the direction of the stone steps leading to the grating, "there is one fool disposed of who, if I would have allowed it, would have ruined all my plans. Curse him! But never mind; he is done with now. I must bring affairs to a crisis, however. It will not do to dally longer. Curse the girl! if she was but twelve months older than she is, all would be easy and straightforward. But it is no use to wish that; it is one of the things that cannot be altered. I must wait—I must wait."

By the time he had reached this point in his reflections, Jonathan reached the flight of steps.

The man at the grating, seeing him approach, opened it, and allowed him to pass through.

As he closed the iron door behind him, Wild said—

"Jenkinson."

"Yes, Mr. Wild."

"When you feed the prisoners please to recollect that there is a fresh one in C. 10."

"A! right, Mr. Wild. I will attend to it, sir."

Jonathan strode on.

He came to the door of the office, and here he entered.

He glanced at his watch as he did so, and saw that it was two o'clock.

"I am neglecting my private business shamefully, he said: 'but never mind, I am independent of it any day. How hungry I feel! What an intolerable nuisance it is that we should have to sleep and eat! How much more could be performed! Why, most of us, if we live forty years, spend twenty-five of them in sleep!'"

Musing thus, Jonathan went out into hall again.

Quilt Arnold was standing there.

"Has anyone else been, Quilt?"

"No one important, sir."

"Good. Have you heard anything of Jack Sheppard?"

"Nothing, Mr. Wild."

"Curse him! But let him go on, I am sure to have him in the end."

"Of course you are, sir."

"I am going round the corner to get something to eat, so, if any one comes, you will know where to find me."

Jonathan did not wait for any reply, but strode out of the front door.

Crossing over the road, he turned the corner of Giltspur-street, and entering the eating-house where he usually took his meals, he sat down and ate a hearty meal, enough to last him for twelve hours at least.

Then he returned home.

"Quilt," he said; "to-night, between nine and half-past, have a troop of a dozen men, all well mounted and armed, at the door. I shall start at that hour with them to search the highroads round London for Blueskin and Jack Sheppard. Do you understand?"

"Quite, Mr. Wild, and you may rely upon its being done."

"That is enough; see to it."

"Shall I provide a horse for you?"

"Yes, let it be a good, sound, strong one, capable of enduring a little fatigue. While I am gone you must take charge of the house."

"Very good, sir."

"I have been knocked about a great deal lately, and don't feel altogether so strong and well as I ought. I fancy it is sleep I require, so I shall go up stairs and lie down till then, so do not let me be disturbed by any one, but, if I should not be down at nine, call me."

"You may rely upon all your commands being properly obeyed, Mr. Wild."

Jonathan ascended the stairs.

But, before he entered his own sleeping chamber, he went up to the second-floor landing, where he found Stegga sitting at his post.

"Is all well?" he asked.

"Quite, Mr. Wild."

"That is right. Be watchful and faithful."

"There's nothing at all happened."

"It is very strange," muttered Wild, as he descended the stairs, "very strange. I cannot make out Mary's death at all. Confound her, too, her dead body must be somewhere in the house. It must be disposed of. I have been in a whirl ever since Jack Sheppard escaped from Newgate, and I have forgotten all about it. I must not neglect that longer than to-morrow. She must be buried, at any rate, but I would freely give a hundred pounds this moment if I knew how she had come by her death."

Thus speaking, Jonathan went into his room, and threw himself down on the bed, and was soon deep in sleep.

Edgworth Bees was safe yet.

CHAPTER CXXII.

BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD ARE CHASED ACROSS HAMFSTEAD-HEATH BY JONATHAN WILD.

JONATHAN WILD awoke with the sounds of some clock striking the hour of nine in his ears.

He leaped to his feet instantly.

On the stairs he met Quilt, who was coming up to call him.

"Is all ready?"

"Yes, Mr. Wild."

Jonathan could not get the thoughts of his quondam wife out of his head, so he said—

"Quilt."

"Yes, Mr. Wild."

"When—when Mary Milliner was killed, what became of her body?"

"It was put back into her room."

"And is it there now?"

"Yes, Mr. Wild."

"That should not have been. She ought to have been attended to before now."

"What will you have done with her?"

"Buried, of course."

"Where, sir."

"Remind me of it when I come back, and I will tell what is to be done."

"All right, Mr. Wild."

Jonathan passed out of the front door.

Thirteen powerful horses stood in the street.

Twelve of them carried Wild's janizaries upon their backs.

The thirteenth was set aside for him.

The long sleep he had had, had done wonders in refreshing him.

He felt almost like himself again as going down the steps he mounted his horse.

He was well armed, and his men also.

Which way to look for those he so wished to capture he had no idea.

He would have to trust to his luck entirely.

What his determination was is easily explained.

Beginning with that movement, he had made up his mind to patrol the various highways leading from London every night until he learned something of them.

He had plenty of ways to choose.

There was the North-road—the West-road—the Edgware-road—the Dover-road.

But after a moment's deliberation he determined to take neither of these, but go in the direction of Hampstead.

No sooner had he come to this decision than he gave his men the order to move forward.

He led the way down Snow-hill and over the bridge, across the Fleet-ditch, and up the steep ascent of Holborn-hill.

Then turning to his right, up Grays Inn-lane, he made his way in an almost direct line to the place he wished to reach.

From what we have related, the reader must be aware that Jonathan Wild must have reached the heath at about the same time as Blueskin and Jack Sheppard—neither of whom for a moment thought their enemy was so near.

But such strange coincidences will at times occur.

The only difference was, that the two highwaymen and the thief-taker reached the heath from two different points.

It was Jonathan and his party who had arrived so suddenly and unexpectedly upon the spot where the encounter with the traveller took place, and the thief-taker guessed in a moment who the robbers were.

Accordingly, he fired his pistol, though he might have known that he was too far off to do them any harm.

He stuck his spurs into his steed, however, and pursued our friends vigorously.

The steep hill tried the horses greatly.

But on reaching the top of it they loosed their reins, and truck the horses sharply.

They went down at a fearful speed.

Jonathan Wild knew the traveller must be on the road-way somewhere, for he had met his horse, and he had the conviction on his own mind that those who were flying on the road before him were no other than those whose capture he so earnestly wished to accomplish.

The grounds he had for coming to this conclusion were not very definite.

Still the idea was hanging in his mind that they were most likely to be found upon the highway.

He knew they had no means of subsistence, and that they must live.

The readiest means, he argued, that would occur to them to get what they required, would be going on the highway.

A desperate robbery had been committed.

He had arrived just a little too late upon the scene of action.

He could tell, however, by the regular beat of the horses' hoofs, that there were two persons on the road before him, and thus strengthened him in his notion that they were Blueskin and Jack Sheppard.

That he was quite correct in this chance supposition the reader does not require to be told.

He plunged his spur deeply into his horse's sides—so deeply that the poor animal would bound forward as if mad, and utter occasionally sharp cries of pain.

At the top of his voice he called out to his men, offering them every possible inducement he could think of to press forward in the pursuit.

[THE MEETING OF JACK SHEPPARD AND EDGORTH BESS.]

They tore over the rough uneven ground of the heath with a speed that was really terrific.

On their parts, although they were not able to account for his presence there just then, Blueskin and Jack Sheppard both felt sure that those who were behind them were headed by their implacable and invincible enemy, Jonathan Wild.

He was fairly on their track now, and their position was critical.

His skill in hunting down any one had been remarkably proved more than once, and, therefore, Blueskin felt that the only means by which they could escape him would be by the adoption of some stratagem.

Casting his eyes, therefore, around him, he strove to pierce the darkness, and ascertain their precise whereabouts.

For a little while he was unable to do this, for what with going at the speed he did, and then the darkness of the night, it was next to impossible for him to say where he was.

But continuing his efforts, he at length became sensible that he had left the heath behind, and was pursuing a westerly direction.

If he continued this, he knew that ere long he must emerge upon the Edgware-road, somewhere in the vicinity of Kilburn, which was then a tiny village some miles distant from London.

Having made this discovery, he communicated it to Jack, who had some difficulty in understanding what he said, owing to the wind carrying his words away as he uttered them.

In the rear they could hear the dull muffled tramp of their pursuers.

"It will not do to keep up like this," said Blueskin. "If we do, Jonathan will hunt us down as sure as fate. I know him of old. Once upon our track, like he is now, he will continue it like a bloodhound until he runs us to cover."

"But what are we to do?"
 "I have been trying to think of a scheme to elude him for the last few minutes."
 "Have you hit upon one?"
 "No."
 "Try."
 "I have."
 "Did you think of one at all?"
 "Yes."
 "What is it, then? Let us hear it."
 "It is so simple a one that I am afraid Jonathan will not be imposed upon by it."
 "Tell it to me."
 "I thought this. Suppose we were to release our feet from the stirrups, and having got the horses up to a good speed, slip off their backs, and let them go down the road without us."
 "Capital."
 "It is a stale dodge, Jack, and one that Wild is well up to. If we were to slacken our speed, or stop to get off, he would know what we were doing as well as possible."
 "Never mind. Get up a good speed, and then slip off. If our feet are free from the stirrups we can't hurt ourselves much. But then what are we to do?"
 "We might hide behind this hedge until Jonathan and his crew went past."
 "So we might; but look here, Blue, a better thought strikes me."
 "Be quick, and tell it, then, Jonathan is gaining upon us rapidly."
 "Suppose, instead of hiding behind the hedge, where Wild might perhaps find us, we were to climb up one of these trees that go all along the road? They are leafy ones, and the branches grow low, so that we shall have no difficulty in getting one and should be up in a trice."
 "So we should, Jack. I like that idea vastly. If we can only slip off!"
 "We shall have to be very quick in our movements."
 "We shall."
 "And be careful how we slip off, for if we either of us got stunned it would be a case with us."
 "We must take care. Are you ready?"
 "Yes. But, Blue."
 "What?"
 "How about the horses?"
 "Never mind them."
 "What will the old Jew say?"
 "We must make matters right with him. Never mind the horses; let them go where they like. Are you quite ready?"
 "Yes."
 "Off with you, then."
 Even as he spoke, Blueskin, who had quite freed his feet from the stirrups as he proceeded, put his very perilous manoeuvre into execution.
 But in spite of the care he took to prevent such a result, he fell heavily to the ground.
 His horse, however, never stopped a moment, and half terrified by what had occurred, went much faster down the lane.
 Jack had fallen, too, and rolled over and over upon the roadway, but it would seem that, being the lightest, he had sustained the least injury, for he was the first to gain his feet.
 The horses were already a good way off, while the sounds of their pursuers became uncomfortably distinct.

CHAPTER CCXIII.

OUR FRIENDS FIND THEIR SCHEME SUCCEED TO ADMIRATION.

THE first thing, however, that Jack did was to look around him for his comrade.

He found him extended upon the ground, not exhibiting the least signs of life or motion.

With the dread at his heart that what they had talked about had occurred—namely, that Blueskin had been stunned by the fall, Jack made his way towards him.

Their position seemed now to be most perilous. Had they taken the pains they had only to accomplish their own capture?

In a few minutes Jonathan would be upon them.

Jack stooped down.

To his infinite relief, the moment he did so Blueskin spoke.

"Help me up, Jack. I am hurt a little, but not much. I shall be all right again in a minute."

These were cheering words, so Jack hastened to raise him to his feet, and when that was done Blueskin pronounced himself to be wonderfully better.

"Quick, then, as you value your life. I question now whether we shall be able to climb before Wild is upon us."

"Take it easy, Jack. He is some distance off yet—further than I expected, a great deal. He must have halted for something, or else we gained upon him surprisingly during the last few minutes."

"So much the better, then, for us," said Jack. "Now, are you better?"

"Oh! yes, much better."

"Well, then, look before you."

"I do."

"Can you see that tree?"

"Yes."

"Take that one. It is easiest to climb. You see the lowest branch is within reach of your hand."

"All right, Jack."

"I will take the one next to it. Quick! Blue—quick!"

With a good deal of uneasiness, Jack saw that his comrade had been much bruised and shaken by his fall, and now he only seemed partially conscious of what he was about.

However, he went straight to the tree, and when he reached it, a fresh accession of vigour seemed to come over him, and, seizing the lowest branch with both hands, he mounted rapidly.

Seeing this, Jack prepared to mount himself, but did not commence until his friend was fairly hidden among the foliage.

Lithe and agile as Sheppard was, the feat of climbing a tree was the simplest thing possible to him.

He was up among the branches in a moment.

His first act was to speak in a low tone of voice to his companion.

"Blue—Blue."

"Yes, Jack."

"Are you safe?"

"Quite."

"Keep still."

"Do not fear."

"Are you much hurt?"

"No. Scarcely at all."

"I am glad of that."

"I was half-stunned for the moment, but I have quite got over that now."

"Hush! Jonathan comes."

"He does. Do not speak again."

"Nor move, for the least rustle might betray us."

There was not a movement—there was not a whisper after this was said.

Breathlessly and eagerly they awaited the approach of their indomitable foe.

Was their stratagem to be successful?

We shall soon see.

On came Wild and his men.

Their speed was a rapid one.

Blueskin and Jack were, however, quite right in supposing that he had paused.

It was only for a moment or two, though.

While in full pursuit off the heath Jonathan felt certain that they would adopt some cunning stratagem to get out of his way.

He never for a moment anticipated he should have the least chance of running them down.

When the thought occurred to him, the first thing he did was to cast about him, and, by imagining himself in their position, think what would be the likeliest thing to be done.

There was the old dodge of sending the horses on and hiding in the hedge.

They might try to adopt that.

If they did, he could easily discover them.

Accordingly he halted, and called his men around him.

"I think it very likely," he said, "that Blueskin and Jack Sheppard, who are on the road before us, will try some scheme for eluding us. For instance, they might dismount, and send their horses riderless at full gallop down the lane, while in the meantime they hide in the hedge. But we can prevent them escaping us by any, such means as that if you will attend to what I say."

The men gathered eagerly around him.

The large reward he had offered, and the vexation they felt at the two fugitives having so often slipped through their fingers, made them exceedingly desirous of their capture.

"I shall want four of you to separate from the main body and go on the other side of the hedge—two on one side of the road and two on the other. You will be able to make your way over the meadows easily enough, and mind you keep as close to the hedge row as you can, so that, if they are hiding there, they will be sure to be discovered. Quick, now; two on each side."

The men understood him in a moment, and saw how admirably the scheme was calculated to effect the end proposed.

With all speed, therefore, two men got through the hedge on the right-hand side of the road and two on the left. There seemed nothing but meadows for a considerable distance, so their progress would be easy enough.

Seeing all was ready, Jonathan gave the order to move forward.

Those behind the hedge, of course, had to keep pace with the others, and they found this to be rather hazardous work.

Still they went on without the occurrence of any accident.

From this it is certain that if our friends had simply hidden in the hedge, as Blueskin had proposed, they would most unquestionably have been discovered.

Their safety, then, was attributable to Jack, who had proposed the amendment on the original plan of climbing up the tree.

Jonathan Wild came to the spot where they were hidden.

So absorbed were our two friends in listening to his approach by the roadway, that the first intimation they had of the men being in the meadows was when they rode exactly beneath the trees in which they were concealed.

Of course they made no discovery of them, and the whole troop went on their way down the lane.

Jack and Blueskin did not venture either to move or to speak until some few moments after they were both out of sight and hearing.

Seeing this little bit of policy on Jonathan's part, they could not tell how far his cunning might extend.

Then they thought, reasonably enough, that there might be some more to bring up the rear.

But in this expectation they were disappointed.

All sounds, save those slight uncertain ones which are always to be heard at night, died away.

Then Blueskin ventured to speak.

But it was in a very low tone of voice.

"Jack, Jack."

"Yes, Blue."

"Do you hear me?"

"Yes."

"Do not speak any louder than you are obliged."

"The coast seems quite clear."

"I know it. But then"—

"What?"

"Hark!"

"I hear nothing."

"No, it's all right, I fancied I did."

"Will you descend?"

"Not just yet."

"Wild has gone."

"I am not so sure of that."

"Did you notice these men who came behind the hedge?"

"Yes."

"That was a close touch."

"I know it."

"Do you see his cleverness?"

"Yes."

"He had got the idea in his head that we intended to trick him."

"And we have done so."

"Perhaps."

"Why perhaps?"

"His men may not have all gone by. They might be lurking somewhere close at hand, and would pounce upon us the moment we got to the ground."

"How shall we ascertain that?"

"By waiting here a little while."

"It will be best not to talk, then?"

"It will."

"Then I am silent; but say when you think we have waited long enough."

"I will tell you when I think it is safe."

"Very well. I leave it all to you, because I think you know Wild and his ways better than I do."

Blueskin did not seem to think it worth while to make any reply to this speech.

He remained silent, and listening for any little sound that might indicate the presence of his foes.

Half an hour, perhaps rather more, elapsed.

During that time no sound had occurred that seemed at all of a suspicious character.

Feeling by that time tolerably secure he was about to call out to Jack to descend, when the faint tramp, tramp of horses' feet struck upon his ear.

He became still again instantly.

The sounds rapidly increased in loudness.

Jack heard them, too, but he neither moved nor spoke.

At first it was difficult to say what the sounds meant, but in a little while they both came to the conclusion that it was Wild and his party returning.

The horsemen, be they whom they might, were certainly coming from the direction in which Wild had gone a little while back.

On they came at an easy pace.

Suddenly, however, when the whole party was on a level with the trees in which our friends were concealed, a voice cried out in a loud tone—

"Halt!"

The order was obeyed with military promptitude.

CHAPTER CXXIV.

JACK SHEPPARD AND BLUESKIN AGREE TO ROB WILD'S WAREHOUSE AT WESTMINSTER.

If there had been any doubts in the minds of Blueskin and Jack Sheppard as to who the horsemen were, the sound of the voice which pronounced the word "Halt!" would have dispelled them.

There was no other human being than Jonathan Wild who possessed such a voice.

The very natural apprehension filled the breasts of both the fugitives that Jonathan's motive for halting just there was because in some mysterious and incomprehensible manner he had been made acquainted with their hiding-place.

But they were wrong in that supposition.

Jonathan's halting there was a mere matter of chance, and the same thing might have happened a hundred yards further up the lane.

After giving the word to halt, the first thing that Wild did was to pour out a volley of curses of the most awful description, which were chiefly levelled at our two friends.

But having expended his wrath in this manner, Jonathan grew calmer.

"They have bilked us again, by all that's holy!" he said. "I do begin to believe that they have got the devil in league with them to aid them, or how could they have disappeared? Keep a sharp look all around you, my men, and go gently back to London. We may light upon them yet. They must be lying hidden somewhere, I am certain. Forward, gently!"

At a gentle trot Wild and his band now made their way along the lane back to London again, looking carefully all about them, but unsuccessfully.

As on the former occasion, Blueskin did not speak or move until they were quite out of earshot. Then he said—

"Descend."

"All right, Blue."

Jack had been waiting for this order, and was glad enough to receive it.

He was down on the ground in a trice.

Blueskin descended more slowly, but only a short time elapsed before he was by his side.

Their first impulse, after passing through this great danger, was to clasp each other by the hand.

"We are safely through that, Jack," said Blueskin, "and I can assure you it is almost more than I expected."

"We have had a narrow escape."

"You are right there. We have."

"But I think Jonathan has gone back to London this time."

"So do I."

"I think the best thing we can do is to make haste back after him."

"To London?"

"Yes."

"I think so, too."

"But what are we to do about the two horses?"

"Leave that to me. I will make it all right."

"Very well. Shall we get through the hedge into the lane?"

"Yes."

